START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT
CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

May 1994

Camera Operator:
John Sullivan

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER:
BSO-56-033

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library
(August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks
(Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copy-right law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: [✓ IA] IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 14X

FILM STOCK:

Kodak
IMAGELINK™ HQ
MICROFILM
35 mm x 30.5 m · 100 ft
Sp 425
DEVELOP BEFORE 01/1996
1461-0334-024-07
CAT 840 3594
29-10
Kodak

REEL 33

Volumes 59-60

BSO
1936-1937 to Pops, Tanglewood
1936-1937

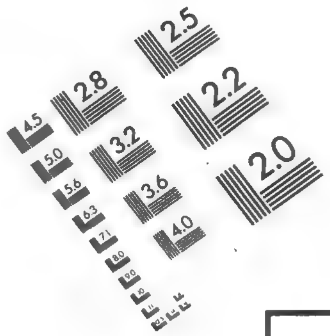
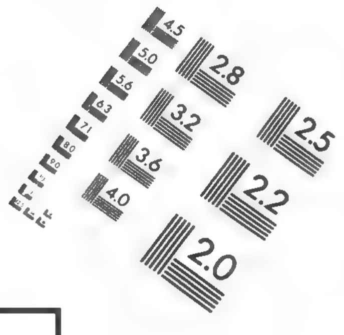
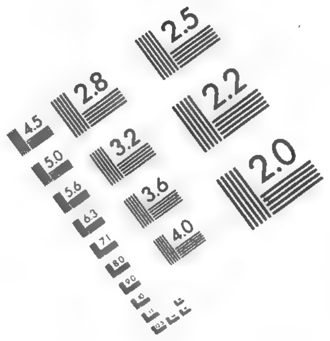
PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



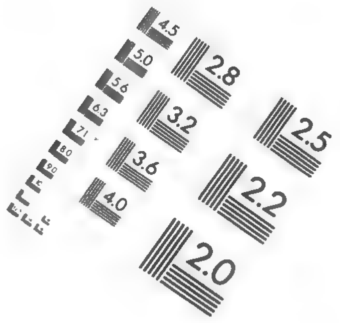
2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
3.2
2.0
5.0
3.6
4.0



4.5
2.8
5.0
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
3.2
2.0
5.0
3.6
4.0

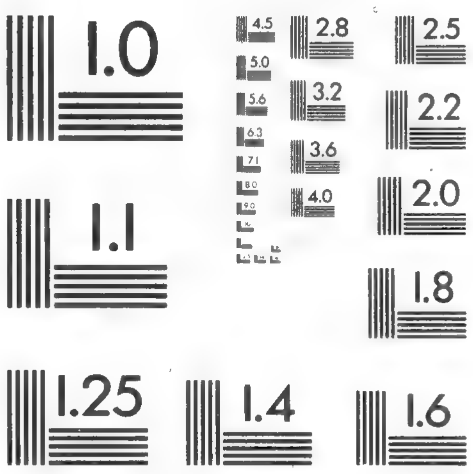


4.5
2.8
5.0
3.2
2.5
3.6
2.2
4.0
2.0

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0
4.5
2.8
2.5
5.0
3.2
2.2
5.6
6.3
3.6
2.0
7.1
4.0
1.1
1.8
1.25
1.4
1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

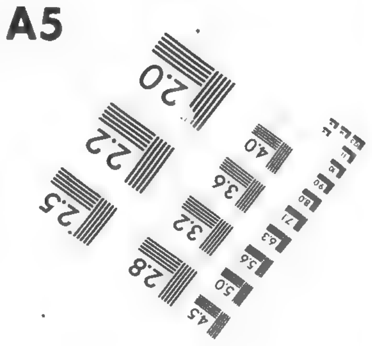
1.0 mm

1.5 mm

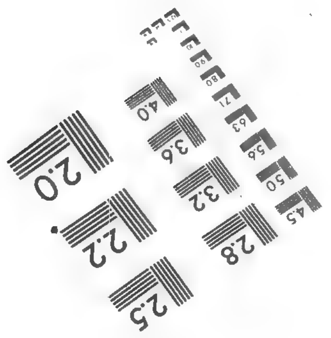
2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5



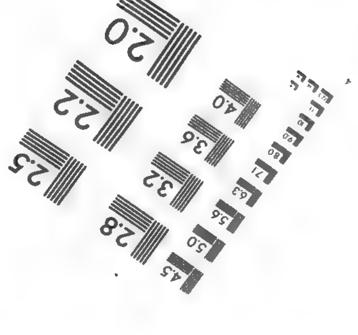
2.0
2.2
4.0
2.5
3.6
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5



4.0
2.0
3.6
3.2
5.0
2.2
4.5
2.8
2.5

A4

A3



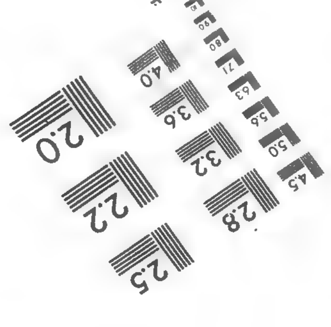
2.0
2.2
4.0
3.6
2.5
3.2
2.8
5.0
4.5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119



4.0
2.0
3.6
3.2
5.0
2.2
4.5
2.8
2.5

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES
DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

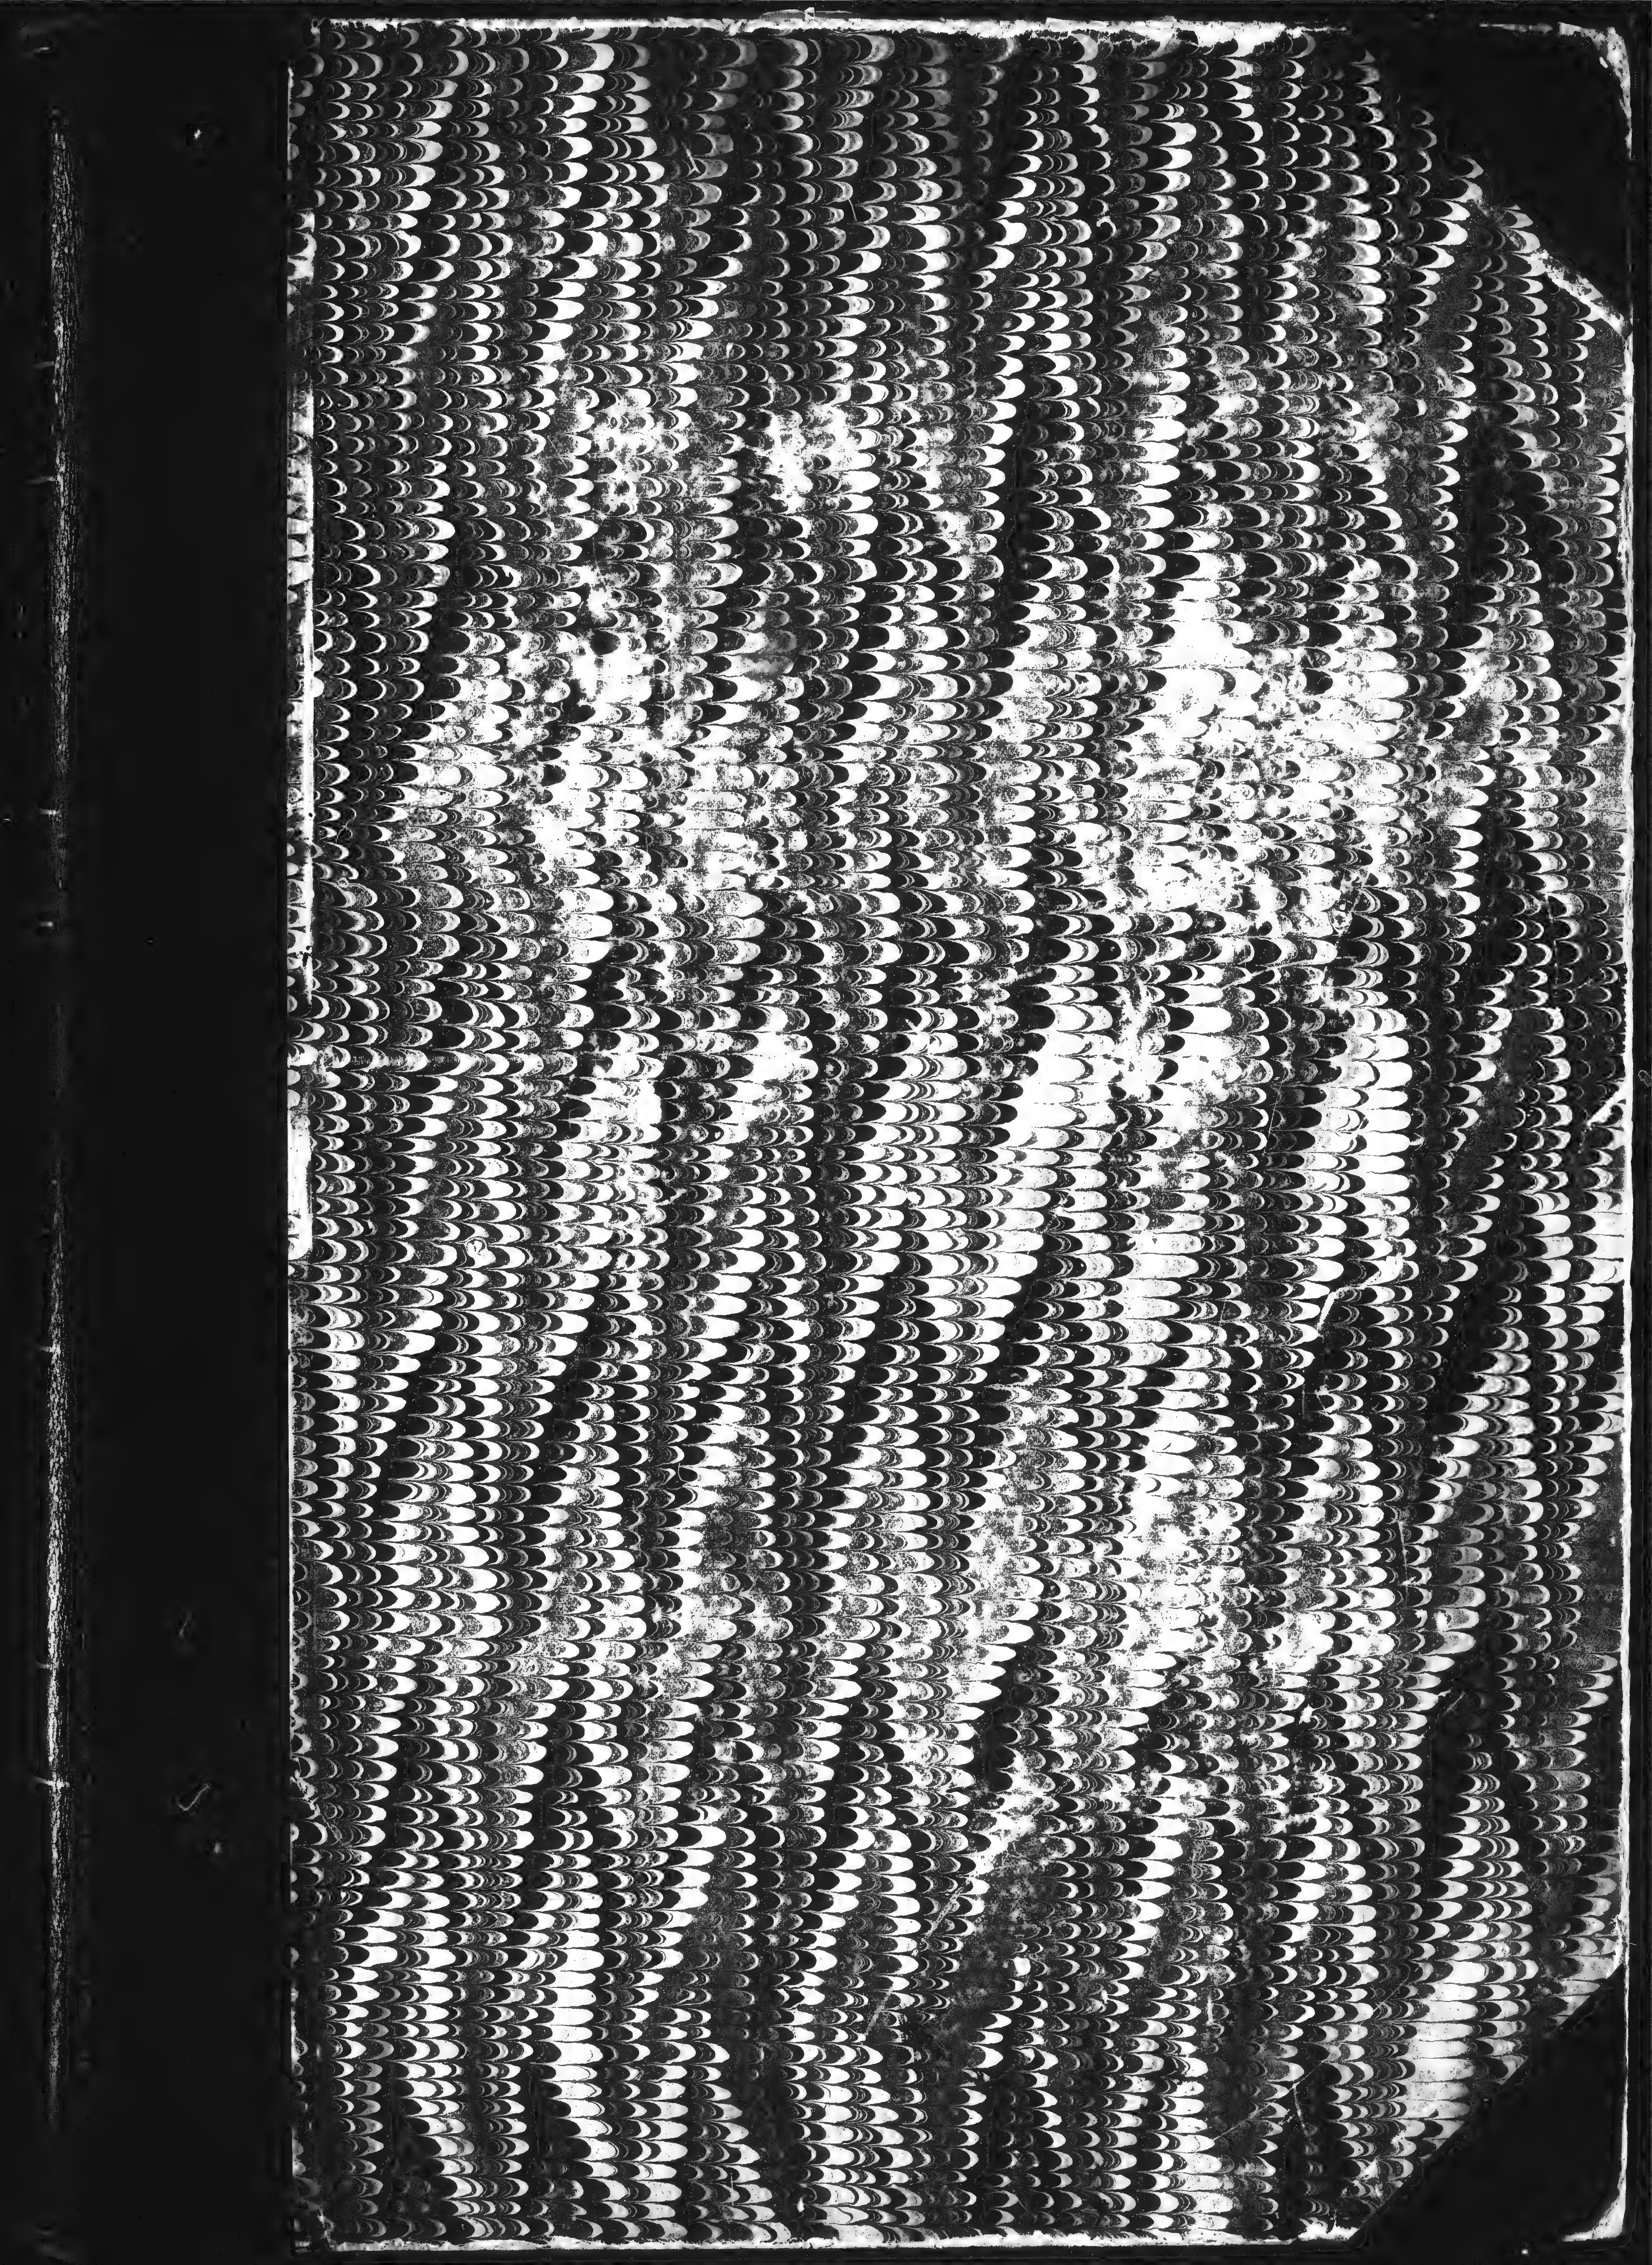
VOLUME 59

BSO

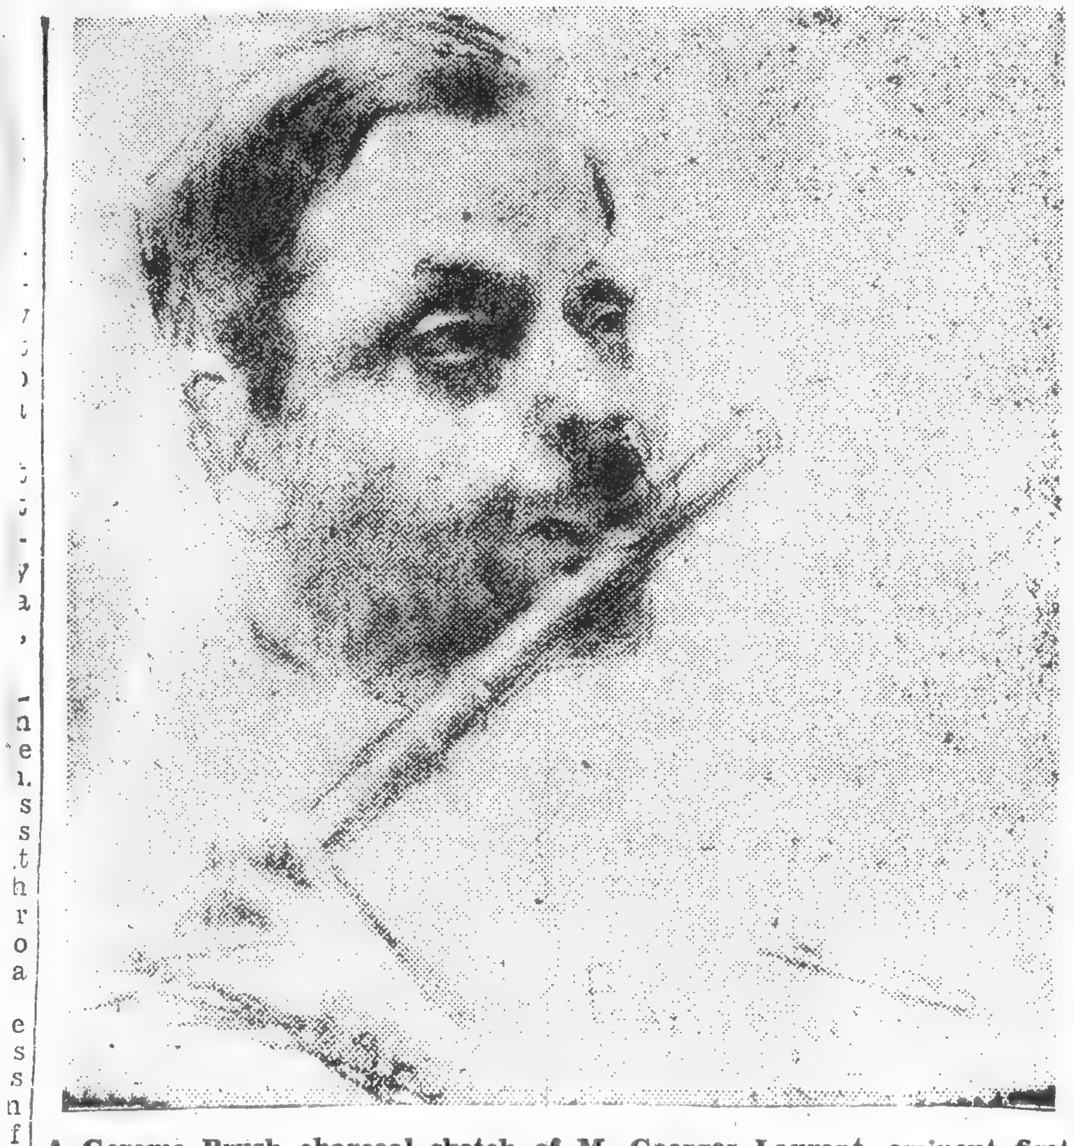
1936 - 1937



MISSING
PAGE(S)

1936 Sept. 20/36

ctober Prosp



A Gerome Brush charcoal sketch of M. Georges Laurent, eminent first flute of the Boston Symphony orchestra. This is still another example of Mr. Brush's interesting work and comes from the recently published volume of his drawings of the entire orchestra. The work is described in detail in an article elsewhere on the page.

The Boston Symphony's Plans; Sketches by Gerome Brush

By ALEXANDER W. WILLIAMS

Now that the plans of the Boston Symphony orchestra have been announced in rather more detail than usual there is perhaps no excuse for journalistic comment. We have only to sit and wait for a little less than three weeks for the season to begin in real earnest. And this year, what with the Berkshire festival in August and the Harvard concerts this past week, there is not the same suddenness of the Symphony's beginning again. Still there are a few things that can be pointed out, without mentioning the music to be played, where discussion could be carried on interminably.

The most interesting activity that has preceded the season has been the publication of Gerome Brush's portrait book of the entire personnel of the Boston Symphony. Mr. Brush has carried out the pictorial side of this enterprise with great skill and ingenuity. Last week we produced the portrait of Dr. Koussevitzky, and this week we offer another example of Mr. Brush's work in the portrait of the great and popular first flute of the orchestra, M. Georges Laurent. We are not qualified to criticize Mr. Brush's talent as an artist, but can only report that the drawings seem to us remarkably alive and are deft studies of character. The book may be bought at Symphony Hall (price $1.50).

FACTS AND PERSONALITIES

Although the pictures are the best part of the book, they are not the only part. Mr. Brush has accompanied each drawing with a few facts of each musician's career and comments of his own. There is also an introduction by Edward Weeks of the Atlantic Monthly. Some of these short biographies are well done, but it may be said as a general rule that there are too few facts and too much whimsy. Some of them are irritating for what they leave out and for the manner of saying it, the oblique approach and a rather arch style.

It is all very well to be informal, which Mr. Brush seems to have striven for in his writing; but it is a nuisance to find the breezy note so persistently sounded. For example, the text beside Mr. Stanislaus' portrait begins: "Blow me down, here comes Stanislaus from Kidderminster!" That is Mr. Brush's way of announcing the fact that Mr. Stanislaus is an Englishman by birth. This book should be a record as well as an entertainment for the passing hour. After all the purchaser of the book is obviously interested in the Boston Symphony to begin with and does not need to have the facts so stimulated as to be often obscure. It is a pity too that Mr. Battles' picture with his flute was not done, for this familiar figure in the orchestra, though technically retired, did play last season during Mr. Amerena's long illness. For a pictorial record far better than mere photographs Mr. Brush's book should be owned by every friend of the Symphony.

PHILADELPHIA AND BOSTON

The announcement from the Philadelphia orchestra has come to hand and makes a very interesting comparison with the prospectus of the Boston Symphony. The former organization has always gone in rather heavily for the star system. Thus it is not surprising to find the emphasis placed on the soloists of whom there are to be 14 in a 28-week season. Mr. Stokowski is evidently considered enough of a star to conduct his six pair of concerts without the added attraction of a soloist; and the amiable "King of Jazz," Mr. Paul Whiteman, is also billed alone. But Mr. Ormandy only gets seven pair of concerts to himself. Most of the time he must share the limelight.

In Boston only eight soloists are listed in a 24-week season. (We do not count the soloists for such works as Mahler's "Song of the Earth" and Debussy's "St. Sebastian," for there the emphasis is on the work and not on the soloist.) Mr. Mitropoulos is again the guest conductor in January, and for the rest Dr. Koussevitzky, assisted at times by Mr. Burgin, is in charge. There is something very gratifying about this attitude of not depending on soloists to lure the public, even though the billboard outside Symphony Hall momentarily belies it.

The star system can only work harm in the long run, and the management at Symphony Hall are wise to give it a cold shoulder in general policy. To be sure they occasionally embrace it when an occasion serves. Consistency, "the hobgoblin of little minds," would be inhuman in this connection. But it is sensible to keep before one the ideal of symphonic concerts. A steady, loyal public is what any manager wants; and such a public can only be built up and maintained on the basis of a regular symphonic repertoire without immoderate attention to the concerto. There are many people in the audiences of the Boston Symphony orchestra and of any other orchestra who do not like soloists at too many concerts and who feel that the most satisfactory concerts of their experience are those when the orchestra—and it alone—was playing. It is the height of folly to ignore these people as reactionaries or eccentrics, because they are the core of a musical public or at least a symphonic public. In Philadelphia this year they appear to be in for a gay life which they may not want.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

SEP 20 1936

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Gerome Brush has now done a remarkable volume of charcoal drawings of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One hundred and nine strong they adorn the pages, each man in characteristic pose with his musical mate, be it violin, tuba or the mighty double-bass. A terse biographical sketch accompanies each. This also is by Mr. Brush.

Clarence Knudson, he notes "is taken for a Yankee with the far-seeing look of a seafaring race in his blue eyes." How well Brush has brought out that aspect; the chin on violin.

BOSTON ,MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

SEP

SYMPHONY PLAYER SKETCHES IN CHARCOAL GO ON DISPLAY

The 109 drawings of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, by Gerome Brush, are being shown in Symphony Hall. The drawings are in charcoal and were made by the noted artist at the conclusion of the season last Spring.

Each musician of the orchestra is shown playing his particular instrument. The pictures have recently been published in book form. The exhibition is in the Huntington-av lobby, and is on public view.

BOSTON ,MASS.
HERALD

EXHIBIT OPENS TODAY AT SYMPHONY HALL

The 109 drawings of the members of the Boston symphony orchestra, by Gerome Brush, will be shown for the first time in Boston in Symphony Hall this morning and will remain on view there. The drawings are in charcoal and were made by the noted artist at the conclusion of the season last spring. Each musician of the orchestra is shown playing his particular instrument. The pictures have recently been published in book form. The exhibition is in the Huntington avenue lobby, and is on public view.

ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER-PRESS

Recording N ew Records

Extremely gracious romantic music, beautifully done by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Koussevitzky, is "The Enchanted Lake," by Liadow, whose research nto Russian folk lore, years ago nspired him to translation of cerain legends, this among them, into musical terms. This, also from Victor, should be very popular.—F. B.

Among recent popular record releases are the following:

BRUNSWICK
Knock, Knock, Who's There?
You Don't Love Right.
Hal Kemp and his Orchestra..
South Sea Island Magis.
It Ain't Right
Artie Shaw and his Orchestra.
Say "Si, Si."
Hot Tamales
Antobal's Cubans.

VICTOR.
The Curse of an Aching Heart
I Just Made Up With That Old Girl of Mine
"Fats" Waller and his Rhythm.
Sweet Hawaiian Moonlight
You're Still Mine in My Dreams
Eddy Duchin and his Orchestra.
Out Where the Blue Begins Organ Grinder's Swing
Jolly Coburn and his Orchestra.
Poor Little Angeline
He Was a Gentleman's Gentleman
Roy Fox and his Orchestra.

HERALD TRIBUN

Sept 10/36

Boston to Hear Its Symphony Again Oct. 9

Plans Are Announced for Orchestra's 56th Season, 13th Under Koussevitzky

Mitropoulos Will Return

Beethoven Violin Concerto Soloist Will Be Heifetz

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in a preliminary announcement arriving yesterday, outlined some of the principal features of its fifty-sixth season, which begins at Symphony Hall, Boston, on Friday afternoon, October 9. This will be the thirteenth season under Serge Koussevitzky's conductorship. Dimitri Mitropoulos, Athenian conductor, will return as guest leader in mid-season for two weeks.

The Beethoven repertoire will include the second, fourth and fifth symphonies and the violin concerto with Jascha Heifetz as the soloist. Brahm's third and fourth symphonies will be played and there will be more than the usual quota of Mozart symphonies. In addition to symphonies by Haydn, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Tchaikovsky, Sibelius and others. Revivals are announced of Liszt's "Faust" symphony, Mahler's fifth symphony and his "Das Lied von der Erde," in which Maria Ranzow and Paul Althouse will be the contralto and tenor soloists, and Bruckner's eighth symphony.

Myra Hess will be the soloist in Schumann's piano concerto and, in observance of the seventy-fifth anniversary of MacDowell's birth, his second piano concerto, in D minor, will be played by Howard Goding. Olga Averino will be the soprano soloist in Debussy's "Le Martye de St. Sebastien." Dvcrak will be represented by the cello and violin concertos, with Gregor Piatigorsky and Ruth Posselt as the respective soloists.

An American novelty will be a recently completed violin concerto by Roger Sessions, which Albert Spalding is studying for its world premiere with the Boston Symphony. A symphony by the Russian composer, Shaporin, which attracted much attention abroad, will have its first American hearing. Among other recent scores to be played are Rachmaninoff's rhapsody for piano and orchestra on a Paganini theme and Serge Prokofieff's third piano concertos, with the composers as soloists. Bach's St. Matthew Passion will be played at an extra concert on Good Friday.

The programs for the Boston Symphony's usual ten concerts here during the coming season at Carnegie Hall have not yet been announced.

NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS

MITROPOLOUS AGAIN TO LEAD SYMPHONY

BOSTON, Sept. 11 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced that Dimitri Mitropolous, Greek symphonic conductor, who led the Boston Orchestra last year, will conduct here again this season. Mitropoulos was the first of his nationality ever to conduct a major orchestra on this continent.

CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS

Recorded Music

Two Tone-Poems

* * *

The Boston Symphony, presided over by the indomitable Serge Koussevitzky, is listed with a one-record release. This is Liadow's "The Enchanted Lake," a score capable of transporting the hearer to the realm of unreality and of which the celebrated director gives a most sympathetic reading.

RECORD

Brunswick Me

SEP 3 - 1936

ORCHESTRA PROGRAM WELL RECEIVED

About 400 people enjoyed the testimonial concert to Professor Charles C. Hutchins which was given by the orchestral society last Thursday evening in Memorial Hall. The concert closed a summer music course of four weeks in Brunswick. Charles L. Deane of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was conductor, and the soloist was Miss Fabiola Caron.

The program was carefully chosen, and was well balanced. The orchestra was well received in all numbers, and the ensemble work was especially worthy of mention. Charles A. Warren of this town had charge of the group for the first two weeks of the session, after which Mr. Deane supervised the work.

One of the features of the evening was the solos by Miss Fabiola Caron, well known soprano of Brunswick. She even bettered her high standard of vocal work on Thursday's appearance. She scored a hit, and her rendition of the difficult Caro Nome from Rigoletto by Verdi was one of the high spots of the evening.

Playing in the orchestra Thursday evening were:

First violins—Mrs. Lucy Racine concert mistress, Rodney Peterson, Doris Holbrook, Eleanor Frost, Mrs. Adam Walsh, Eloie Richards, Ernest Cederfeldt. Second violins—Louis Marstaller, Frank Marstaller, Lelia Marstaller, Mrs. Agnes Coombs, Dorothy Keene, Virginia Emerson. Violas—Mrs. Charles A. Warren, Mrs. Dorothy Bollinger, Marjorie Barrows. Cellos—Dorothy Pratt, John C. Gatchell, Roland Sawyer.

Bass—Frederic M. Jackson. Horn—Arthur Warren. Flute—Madeline Caron. Clarinets—Mary Loring, Jack Winchell. Trumpets—Robert Pletts, Harry G. Shulman. Trombones—Dr. E. P. Ackley, L. F. Curtis, Alberto Warren. Tympani—Robert Warren. Piano—Lucille Morin.

RUTLAND, VT.
HERALD

SEP

Boston Symphony To Be Conducted By Mitropoulos

BOSTON, Sept. 9 (AP).—Dimitri Mitropoulos, Greek symphonic conductor who achieved notable success here last year as guest conductor of the Boston symphony, will lead the famous Hub orchestra again for two weeks during the coming season, the orchestra announced tonight.

Mitropoulos, the first of his nationality ever to conduct a major orchestra on this continent, will appear also with the Minneapolis symphony, during his visit to this country this winter.

The Boston orchestra's season will open on Friday afternoon, October 9, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky directing for his 13th season. The personnel of the orchestra will be practically the same, although, the announcement says, there may be "a replacement or two."

Among the new compositions to be presented during the season will be Rachmaninov's rhapsody for piano and orchestra; the recently completed violin concerto by Roger Sessions, American composer, and a symphony by Yuri Shaporin, Soviet Russian composer, which will have its first American performance.

Soloists will include Jascha Jeifetz, Paul Althouse, Yra Hess, Gregor Piatigorsky, and Albert Spalding.

The inclusion of the symphony by Shaporin, Boston music critics agreed today, indicates that there will continue to be no censorship at symphony hall so far as the music of Soviet Russia is concerned.

Dr. Koussevitzky himself has said that "the solution of artistic problems must not be affected by political considerations."

LOWELL, MASS.
Sept. 10 SUN '36

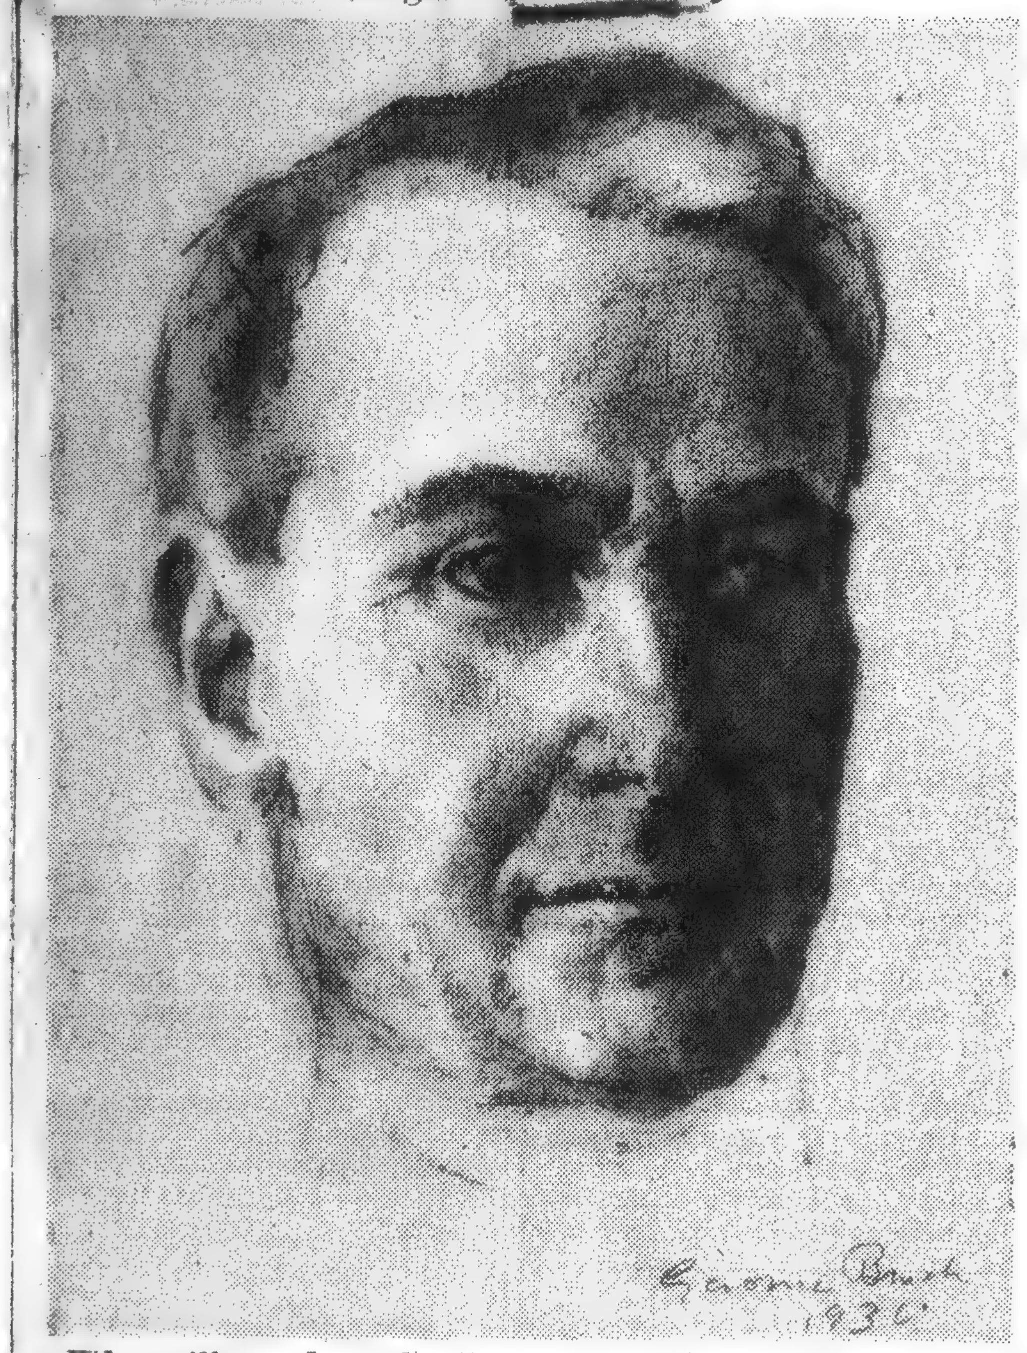
TO LEAD SYMPHONY

BOSTON, Sept. 10 (AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra announced that Dimitri Mitropolous, Greek symphonic conductor, who led the Boston orchestra last year, will conduct here again this season. Mitropoulos was the first of his nationality ever to conduct a major orchestra on this continent.

9

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
Sept. 13/36

Serge Koussevitzky



Who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts during the Harvard Tercentenary Celebration in Cambridge this week. The drawing is from the recently published book of Gerome Brush's portraits of the members of the orchestra

RECENT RECORDS

By JEROME D. BOHM

ANOTHER recording of the "Forellen" quintet of Schubert, this time with Artur Schnabel as the pianist and Messrs. Onnou, Prevost and Maas, of the Pro Arte Quartet, and Alfred Hobday as the string players, is Victor's most recent chamber-music contribution. The movement from which the quintet derives its title is the fourth, based on the song, "Die Forelle," at the suggestion of Schubert's friend, Paumgartner, the amateur cellist and guild official of Steyr, an Austrian town in which the composer tarried during the summer of 1819. As a reward for his advice, Paumgartner was presented with the manuscript of the quintet. This work, the most consistently joyous of Schubert's major creations, brought him but poor pecuniary compensation, for Schott & Son, its publishers, balked at paying the 60 florins asked by the composer, holding it "a too extravagant price" and valued its worth at but 25 florins, about $12. The fourth movement was conceived with such rapidity that Schubert immediately wrote out the string parts and only penned the full score after the first performance, at which he himself had played the piano part, memorized in the process of composition.

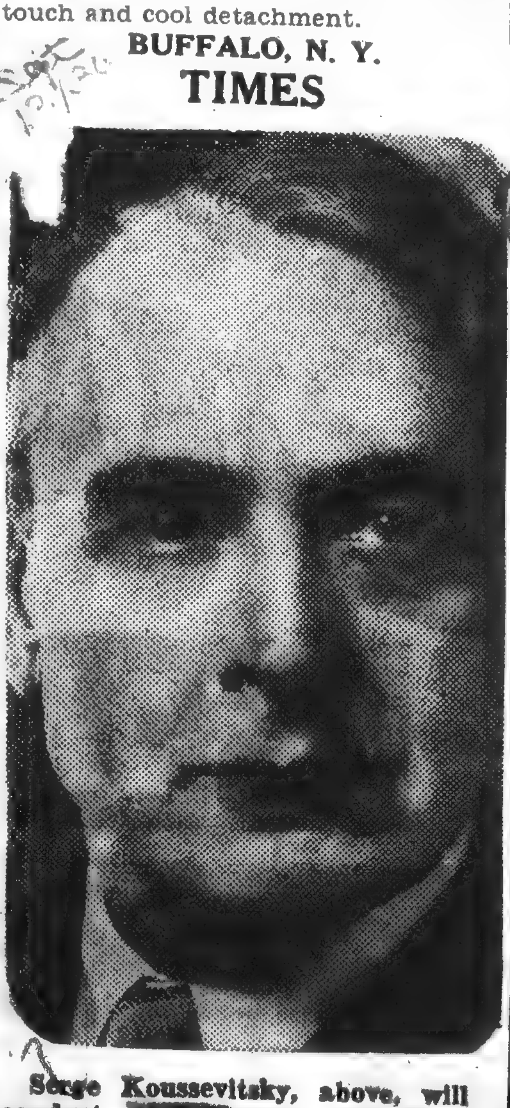
This recording approaches perfection both from the mechanical as well as the interpretative aspects. Mr. Schnabel is one of the most experienced and authoritative of ensemble players and the tonal qualities of his performance are as fine as those in his recent transference to the disks of the second piano concerto of Brahms.

Of Victor's other newly released album, the fourth in the Sibelius Society's series, containing the symphonic poems, "Night-Ride and Sunrise," Op. 55, and "The Oceantides," Op. 73, it is less easy to speak with enthusiasm. Neither work reveals the Finnish master at his best, nor for that matter, even at his second best. Apart from the individual coloring of the instrumentation, these are the products of feeble inspiration. It is remarkable that "Night-Ride and Sunrise" has, to my knowledge, so far escaped the ministrations of the Hollywood music arrangers, who would find it incomparable material to illustrate one of those mad pursuits so frequently encountered in the "movies." The recording by the B. B. C. Orchestra, under Adrian Boult, is wholly admirable.

Beyond reproach, too, are both performance and reproduction of Liadoff's soothingly suave tone poem, "The Enchanted Lake," by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's direction. Abbreviated versions of the scherzi from Bruckner's first and second symphonies, unknown here in the concert hall, should please the Bruckner Society. They are played by the Berlin State Opera Orchestra under the competent leadership of Fritz Zaun. Beethoven and Schubert are the sources of these two movements, although both already bear the stamp of the composer's personality.

Rosalyn Tureck gives capable performances of the fugues in F minor and C sharp minor from the first book of Bach's Well Tempered Clavichord and in F major from the second book; wrongly listed as being a part of the Well Tempered Clavichord along with the latter is the first two part invention in C major. These disks also hold the gavotte and musette and gigue from the English suite in G minor, and examples of theme augmentation and inversion and a stretto from various Bach fugues, which should be of value to lecturers on music appreciation. Rachmaninoff is revealed from the least compelling angles, both as composer and pianist, in a disk which brings his Serenade on one side and a scherzo by Borodin on the other. Both pieces are set forth with hard, brittle touch and cool detachment.

Sept 12/36
BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES



Serge Koussevitzky, above, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert Dec. 8 in Elmwood Music Hall.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

Harvard Ready For Full Week Of Pageantry

Sept 13/36

Roosevelt to Talk Friday at Alumni Gathering on School's 300th Birthday

Masefield to Read Poem

62 Visiting Scholars Will Receive Honorary Degrees

By Joseph Barnes
A Staff Correspondent

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Sept. 12.—With academic panoply unique in American history the Harvard Yard will be the setting this week for Harvard University's 300th birthday. On Friday President Roosevelt and the greatest assemblage of foreign scholars ever to gather in the United States will celebrate three centuries of higher education in America. Throughout the week returning alumni, already filtering into Cambridge, will honor the grant by the General Court of Massachusetts Bay on October 28, 1636, of 400 pounds "toward a schoale or colledge."

Although 15,000 persons are expected to witness the tercentenary exercises in the Yard on Friday, which will be broadcast over national radio networks, the program will be kept rigidly within the academic university tradition. Its symbols and its ceremony will be those of Abelard or St. Thomas Aquinas, and the President of the United States will speak later in the day, at a meeting of the Harvard Alumni Association, only as Franklin D. Roosevelt of the class of '04.

Sixty-two Scholars To Be Honored.

The climax of the tercentenary celebration, which was officially begun a year ago, will follow closely the conference on arts and sciences with which Harvard has tried during the last fortnight to complete an inventory of the goods of modern scholarship. Sixty-two of the distinguished scholars from nearly all the countries of the world who have shared in this scientific stock-taking will receive honorary degrees at the tercentenary exercises.

The program will be held on the eastern side of the Yard, where a platform already has been built against the portico of the new memorial church, and several acres of seats have been set up where villagers yarded their cattle at night when the college was first founded. The procession of academic dignitaries, wearing turbans, gowns trimmed with furs and golden crowns of Byzantine universities will move to the platform from the steps of Widener Library, present repository of the 400 volumes with which John Harvard, consumptive son of a London butcher, endowed the young college two years after it was started.

Graduate Schools Plan Meetings

Three of Harvard's graduate schools will hold tercentenary celebrations of their own at the beginning of the week. The medical school tomorrow will open a two-day program of symposiums and demonstrations on medicine. The dental school has scheduled a session for Tuesday, and the graduate school of business administration, which does not yet measure its age in decades, will hold sessions for the alumni on Wednesday and Thursday. Paul Reyanud, former Finance Minister of France, will speak as a special dinner Wednesday night of the business school alumni.

The tercentenary celebration itself will get under way on Wednesday, with an official reception in Sanders Theater of the 551 accredited delegates from other universities and learned societies. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will lead the first of three special tercentenary concerts arranged for Wednesday, Thursday and Friday.

Thursday morning will be devoted to a meeting of the Associated Harvard Clubs. James B. Conant, president, and Professor Samuel Eliot Morison, historian of the tercentenary, will report to this meeting on the package of alumni letters recently found in Widener archives, which was sealed by President Josiah Quincy in 1836 with instructions that it should not be opened for a hundred years.

Water Pageant to Be Included

Professor Bronislaw Malinowski, London University anthropologist, will be the orator, and Robert S. Hillyer the poet at a meeting of the Harvard chapter of Phi Beta Kappa scheduled for Thursday evening. Herman Hagedorn will also read an ode to Harvard during the day's ceremonies. The 1936 Harvard football team will go through an exhibition drill, and at 9 in the evening the banks of the Charles River, down which Harvard's first students came in flat boats with grain and fruit to pay for their tuition, will be floodlighted for a spectacular water pageant, with torchlights and fireworks, of Harvard's history.

The tercentenary exercises, with the awarding of honorary degrees, a Latin oration, and an address from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts which in Colonial days eked out the payments in kind of the students, will fill the program Friday morning. John Masefield, poet laureate of England, will read a poem written for Harvard. In the afternoon the Harvard Alumni Association will hold its own tercentenary meeting, at which President Roosevelt is to speak.

Sept. 10/36
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

MITROPOULOS TO CONDUCT

Again will lead Boston Symphony in coming season.

Boston, Sept. 9 — (AP) — Dimitri Mitropoulos, Greek symphonic conductor, successful here last year as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony, will lead the famous hub musicians again for two weeks during the coming season, the orchestra announced tonight.

Mitropoulos, the first of his nationality ever to conduct a major orchestra on this continent, will appear also with the Minneapolis symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

SEP 13 1936

The achievements of all these leaders will be celebrated in Cambridge this week in the presence of the foremost scholars of the world, and the largest gathering of Harvard alumni ever to assemble in one spot.

Tercentenary week opens tonight with an organ recital in Harvard's new Memorial Church by Professor A. T. Davison and other guest organists. Tomorrow there will be a concert of chamber music composed by Harvard graduates, and the tercentenary session of the medical school. On Tuesday there will be another concert and the celebration of the dental school.

The historical observance of the tercentenary opens Wednesday, when there will be a reception for delegates from other colleges and learned societies and a welcome by Harvard students of undergraduates from other institutions. That night there will be the first of three concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Serge Koussevitzky.

Thanksgiving Thursday

Thursday's program includes a special service of "thanksgiving and remembrance" in the Memorial Church, which will be followed by a meeting of alumni in the tercentenary theater, built for the occasion in the Harvard Yard. Dr. James Bryant Conant, university president, is expected to outline his policies and plans. The rest of the day will be devoted to reunions of alumni and a students' torchlight procession at night. Robert Frost, '01, will read an ode to the alumni, and John Masefield, poet laureate of England, will deliver an ode to Harvard at the formal ceremonies which climax the tercentenary celebration Friday morning.

There Charles Francis Adams, former Secretary of the Navy, as chief marshal, will lead a procession of alumni into the theater to the accompaniment of the college orchestra and a chorus of 200 voices. There will be a Latin oration by Professor Edward K. Rand, a formal recital of the history of Harvard by Dr. Samuel Eliot Morison, and the tercentenary oration by Dr. Conant. Then honorary degrees will be awarded to distinguished scholars.

That afternoon the alumni will meet in The Yard where Abbott Lawrence Lowell, president-emeritus, will take office as president of the day. Dr. Conant then will move "adjournment until 2036."

COLUMBIA, S. C.
STATE

SEP 13 193

REALM OF MUSIC

New York, Sept. 12—(AP)—Symphony concerts are no longer being bought by the "pig in the poke" method. At least not in the East.

It used to be that subscribers to the hundreds of orchestral seasons throughout the country were expected to approach the box office, money in hand, sometime in the summer. They paid their money, received their tickets, and went home hoping that Conductor X would prepare decent programs for a change.

Now many of the major orchestras are not only listeing their conductors, but telling in advance the soloists to be expected, the special events planned and as definitely as possible the music to be played.

Partly, it is explained by orchestra managers, this is being done in an effort to attract patronage. Partly it is done in a spirit of fairness. And partly it is done because more and more the emphasis is being laid on the music itself rather than upon the prima donna who does the conducting.

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony society led off with an announcement, which listed in fair detail the music to be expected from its three guest conductors, and sketching in a general outline for John Barbirolli and Arthur Rodzinski, the two "regular" conductors.

The Philadelphia orchestra said little about the actual music to be programmed, but it did list in detail the soloists to be heard, a most impressive list indeed. Later some of the music was announced.

But the Boston symphony has gone farther than any up to date. Up in Boston Serge Koussevitzky has chosen and announced nearly all the major numbers to be played, and in the case of the soloists has even published what work each will be heard in.

This extends even to the standard repetroire. And as usual, Doctor Koussevitzky has dug up a few new things. One is a violin concerto by Roger Sessions, which Albert Spalding will play for the first time, another is a symphony by one Shaporin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM GREENSBORO, N. C.
NEWS

SEP 13 1936

MUSIC LOVERS GIVEN DETAILED PROGRAMS

"Pig In Poke" Policy Is No Longer In Vogue With Symphony Orchestras.

PATRONS GIVEN "BREAK"

New York, Sept. 12.—(AP)—Symphony concerts are no longer being bought by the "pig in the poke" method. At least not in the east.

It used to be that subscribers to the hundreds of orchestral seasons throughout the country were expected to approach the box office, money in hand, sometime in the summer. They paid their money, received their tickets, and went home hoping that Conductor X would prepare decent programs for a change.

Now many of the major orchestras are not only listing their conductors, but telling in advance the soloists to be expected, the special events planned, and as definitely as possible the music to be played.

Partly, it is explained by orchestra managers, this is being done in an effort to attract patronage. Partly it is done in a spirit of fairness. And partly it is done because more and more the emphasis is being laid on the music itself rather than upon the prima donna who does the conducting.

The New York Philharmonic Symphony society led off with an announcement which listed in fair detail the music to be expected from its three guest conductors, and sketching in a general outline for John Barbirolli and Arthur Rodzinski, the two "regular" conductors.

The Philadelphia orchestra said little about the actual music to be programmed, but it did list in detail the soloists to be heard, a most impressive list indeed. Later some of the music was announced.

But the Boston symphony has gone farther than any up to date. Up in Boston Serge Koussevitzky has chosen and announced nearly all the major numbers to be played, and in the case of the soloists has even published what work each will be heard in.

This extends even to the standard repertoire. And as usual, Dr. Mousseevitzky has dug up a few new things. One is a violin concerto by Roger Sessions, which Albert Spalding will play for the first time; another is a symphony by Shaporin.

Sept 12/36
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens its fifty-sixth season at Symphony all, Boston, Friday, Oct. 9, under Serge Koussevitzky, will offer, among its novelties this season, a recently completed violin concerto by Roger Sessions, which will be given its world première with Albert Spalding as soloist. A symphony by the Russian composer Shaporin is another work to be accorded a first American hearing. Recent scores scheduled include Rachmaninoff's rhapsody for piano and orchestra on a Paganini theme and Serge Prokofieff's third piano concerto, with the composers as soloists.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

SEP 13 1936

SUMMER MUSIC AND FESTIVAL FANCIES

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

WITH the approach of mid-September, the summer music season can be regarded as closed, although the indefatigable Federal Music Project is continuing outdoor activities until the end of the month. But, so far as events for which admission is charged, the summer musical history of 1936 in this country has been told. The tale is encouraging, showing an increase both in the extent and the artistic importance of American musical activities during the warm period which, not so long ago, marked the calmest part of the doldrums so far as music here was concerned.

In New York the Stadium Concerts closed a season which seemed to leave this historic series with more auspicious future prospects than it has enjoyed in several years, while operetta at Jones Beach and Randall's Island was added to the city's amenities as a summer resort. Elsewhere on the Eastern seaboard, the Philadelphian concerts at Robin Hood Dell closed their seventh season, and the Water Gate series in Washington, threatened at the start when the local musicians' union and the National Symphony Orchestra Association could not arrive at an agreement, was ultimately carried through by the musicians themselves. The Berkshire Symphonic Festival, in the hills of western Massachusetts, gained notably in prestige by the presence of the Boston Symphony as a unit under its regular conductor, and also was financially successful, doing something more than enabling both economic ends to meet.

* * *

The Increasing Extent of Summer Music

WEST of the Appalachians, one could cite the symphony concerts at the Great Lakes Exposition in Cleveland, the "Zoo" opera series in Cincinnati, the long-established municipal operetta series and some symphony concerts in St. Louis, a new concert series by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra at Ravinia Park and, on the Pacific Coast, besides the Hollywood Bowl concerts and various concerts in San Francisco, a new summer series in Portland, Ore. But this is not a catalogue, and an attempt to supply one would probably, while inadvertently, overlook several other significant local seasons.

Most of these summer musical activities, it can be noted, take place outdoors, and most of them are mainly devoted to orchestral concerts. The opportunity to hear symphony concerts here and in some other American cities during the summer is quite possibly not duplicated in western or central continental Europe—London, of course, has its long-established Promenade Concerts from August to October.

But, during the last few weeks, those of us whose friends have been attenting various European festivals, especially those at Salzburg, Bayreuth and Glyndebourne, may have felt some twinges of envy while listening to their accounts of matters of exceptional interest or artistic delectation in these events.

* * *

Major Factors in Foreign Festivals

OUR thoughts might have assumed this somewhat verdant hue as we heard about the glories of "Die Meistersinger," "Fidelio" and "Falstaff" at the Salzburg festival, or about Bruno Walter's Mozart interpretations and his revival of Hugo Wolf's "Der Corregidor." Another source of slightly jealous reflections might have been the laudable new settings in the Bayreuth production of "Lohengrin" and the exceptional vitality and power of this representation as a whole. Still another source might have been the notable opportunity afforded British music-lovers to witness Mozart productions of the highest quality in Mr. John Chrystie's festival at Glyndebourne, Sussex. And, while realizing that there are certain experiences of exceptional musical value which still are obtainable only by crossing the ocean, we may be led to wonder both what are the factors contributing to the appeal of festivals such as these, and how many of them might, at least in theory, be realized here.

Of course, a major factor in the prestige of the Salzburg festival was Mr. Toscanini himself and, beyond the evanescent imaginings of a pipe dream there is no prospect on the horizon of his return here either for a regular or a festival series. But other factors which we would probably expect to find in a festival such as that at Salzburg or at Bayreuth are a musical tradition associated with the place itself, an unusual concentration of exceptionally equipped interpretative artists—not that this is invariably the case—with an orchestra and conductors of the first rank, and opportunity to hear the operas more intensively prepared than they are likely to be in the course of a regular repertoire season.

In the case of Salzburg, we might also look for the chance of hearing operas which, while of marked musical value, we are unlikely to hear in our regular opera-going at home. But another important factor supplied by the audience itself, is the heightened appreciative capacity of the holiday mood or, more fundamentally, the consideration that many while not all, of those who attend such a festival do so primarily on account of the music. This is the major interest and focus of the day, and the members of the audience can devote more time and more concentrated attention to it under these circumstances than they could at home, where musical activities must compete with the exactions of the day's regular duties.

* * *

Two Different Purposes

IT MIGHT be said that the major European operatic festivals and, to varying extents, choral or symphonic festivals here cater to music-lovers gathered under exceptional circumstances, while our regular American summer activities fill a different, while equally valuable mission in serving a mainly resident musical public pursuing its regular activities. At the Lewisohn Stadium or Robin Hood Dell, for instance, the typical audience which the managements have in mind is probably composed mainly of permanent or temporary New Yorkers or Philadelphians rather than of musical pilgrims coming from variously distant points for a specialized musical purpose, and the repertoire is organized with this point in view.

Series such as these have not by any means reached the limits of their development, especially if it should prove possible at some future time to supplement private donations with some form of official support. But, as a complement to the established urban seasons, there is still room for more festivals in the sense of the term summarized above, in which performances of a specialized character can be offered with unusually thorough preparation for audiences whose activities are, for the time being, focused and oriented upon these performances.

Such an atmosphere, indeed, is not absent from existing American festivals. One can find it, among others, in the Bach festivals at Bethlehem, and it could be noticed in this summer's Berkshire festival, held in a region which already acquired a musical tradition of its own through the chamber music programs sponsored by Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge.

* * *

Something Still Lacking

BUT we have so far lacked much opportunity to hear opera in America under festival conditions, as contrasted with the inevitable limitations of a metropolitan repertoire season observing an intensive schedule and having to consider the varied tastes and attentive capacity of its audiences. One might imagine a Wagner festival with the best participants obtainable, in which all the later music-dramas could be given in full before hearers who would find none of them a note too long. Or imagination might compass a Mozart festival of corresponding artistic standards, or a one not specializing in any particular composer but offering both carefully studied familiar works and others which many of us would like to hear but which, lacking an assured general appeal, are unlikely to be presented in a regular subscription series.

As a time for such a festival, further imagining might suggest September when there would be relatively few chances for conflict with established musical activities here and abroad, and when, for this reason, more of the world's best artists would be available. The opportunity for thoroughly concentrated attention and enjoyment, with the minimum risk of mundane distractions and preoccupations, might perhaps be best realized outside the largest cities, while in places not too inaccessible from them. Of course, the difficulty here would probably be the question of an adequate theater, and the necessary beginnings would undoubtedly be costly. Still, the success and prestige gained by the Glyndebourne festival suggest that something like this might be possible here, although this far and probably for some time to come only in theory.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
Sept. 13/36 TIMES

NEWLY RECORDED MUSIC

By COMPTON PAKENHAM

IN its original issue the violin concerto in D—played by Jascha Heifetz with the London Philharmonic Orchestra and released domestically in Victor Album M-309—was part of the Sibelius Society's fourth volume. The remainder of that set is now listed here and Album M-311 contains two tone poems—"Night Ride and Sunrise" (Op. 55) and "The Oceanides" (Op. 73)—played by the British Broadcasting Corporation's orchestra, under Adrian Boult.

Though a comparison of publication dates shows that these apparently are about five years apart, in conception the gap between them is about three times wider. The former was commenced about the same time as the violin concerto, circa 1901, while the latter was composed to the commission of Carl Stoeckel for the twenty-eighth annual festival of the Litchfield County (Conn.) Choral Union and was first performed on that occasion under the direction of Sibelius himself in 1914.

Behind "Night Ride and Sunrise" there was apparently no definite narrative, and the listener does not require more than the title as a guide. Throbbing with the astounding energy that characterizes Sibelius, it carries one away at the first hearing. But, unlike too many works that manage to do that, its effect increases rather than diminishes with further hearing, as does one's admiration of the composer. Taken for themselves, the material and method are nothing out of the way; the themes are not extraordinary and others have overworked mere iteration. Here, however, it almost seems an original device, thanks to the resourcefulness the composer displays in the treatment of detail.

According to Homer, Oceanus was the father of all things created, even the gods. Of daughters he had 3,000—the Oceanides. Glorifying them, Sibelius has achieved something entirely different from anything else he has done, and certainly no other has approached, unless, as is frequently claimed, it is Debussy. For those who quarrel with the use of the word "color" applied to music, here, surely, in this lively, shifting canvas is complete conviction.

* * *

A fresh set of Wagner's "Faust Overture" has been badly needed for some time, for the Coates and Fried records have more than their age against them. In Columbia Album X-36 is a highly satisfactory recorded performance by the London Philharmonic Orchestra, under Sir Thomas Beecham. Supremely confident in his own abilities, driven to despair by his Paris experiences, possessed of the cursed-wanderer idea eventually to result in "The Flying Dutchman," and set thinking by a performance of Beethoven's Ninth symphony (the overture also is in the key of D minor), Wagner set himself to work out a "Faust" symphony.

As motto for the first movement he selected some lines from Goethe drama that matched the morbidity of his own mood, the passage concluding:

> "And so existence is a load at best.
> I loathe my life, and long to be at > rest."

He had an opportunity to present this fragment at a Paris concert, but instead, considering it would be too German and philosophical for his audience, chose his "Columbus Overture." The symphony was never realized, if it was ever seriously projected. Fifteen years later he returned to revise what he had done, and as an overture it remains the last of Wagner's compositions purely for full orchestra.

Beecham handles the overture with power and broadly, while the usual excellent recording he receives is, if anything, bettered. On the fourth side of the set is yet another prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin." The same qualities are to be found here, but one cannot forget that this is a filler side and that only a few weeks back the superb Philharmonic-Symphony (Toscanini) recording was released.

On a single disk (Victor 14078) the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Koussevitzky, supplies what is evidently the first electrically recorded version of Liadow's "Enchanted Lake." The second of the composer's three symphonic poems is the least known by reason of its not having been used for the ballet. It is something stemming more obviously from the second act of "Siegfried" than the Fauré Ballade, mentioned last week, which has been definitely attributed to that influence. A placid and serene pastorale, working logically to a climax, beautifully orchestrated and played with clarity and dignity, this makes a singularly attractive loose record.

* * *

Speaking of programs and sources of inspiration, it would be difficult for any one to guess that Grétry's "La Rosiere Republicaine"—to be found on Columbia Nos. 17067/8-D by the Grand Orchestra Philharmonic of Paris, under Selmar Meyrowitz—deals with the passions of the French Revolution. A ballet suite composed in celebration of that event, its score has only just been found after being misplaced over a century ago. Rather staid and stodgy to our ears, it is played and recorded with beautiful clarity. Much has reached our ears of the recent gramophone work of Meyrowitz and his orchestra, and it is to be hoped that these two ten-inch disks are only the first to be repressed here.

SAN JOSE, CALIF.
MERCURY-HERALD

SEP 13 1936

Permission has been granted by Doubleday, Doran and Company for transcribing into Braille, "Philip Hale's Boston Symphony Orchestra Notes," edited by John N. Burk. The story, "The Smart Aleck," from Local Color by Irvin S. Cobb, will also be transcribed for the use of the blind.

Music Season Looms Richly

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

THAT the 1936-37 music season in Boston will be an exceptionally important and interesting one becomes increasingly apparent through perusal of the lists of bookings that have been pouring in of late from the several concert managements of the city.

The season is officially opened, of course, with the first pair of Boston Symphony concerts on October 9 and 10 for which Conductor Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has designated a program which includes Haydn's Symphony in B flat No. 102—the ninth of the London series—Debussy's "Le Mer," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

(The notable list of soloists engaged for performance with the orchestra during the coming season, as well as a resume of the works to be heard was published in these columns last week.)

* * *

OTHER EVENTS to take place in Symphony Hall during October are recitals by Fritz Kreisler and Roland Hayes—Kreisler to open his American tour with an appearance here on Sunday afternoon, October 19, the great Negro tenor to be heard on the Sunday following.

From the offices of Aaron Richmond a brilliant list of attractions is issued.

Col. de Basil's Monte Carlo Ballet Russe will return for a five day engagement at the Boston Opera House beginning Tuesday evening, November 24, immediately following its New York opening at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Among the new ballets to be produced in Boston for the first time are Leonide Massine's "Symphonie Fantastique" based upon the Berlioz symphony of that name, and "Pavillon," a creation of David Lichine upon music of Borodine.

Revivals from the Diaghilev repertoire to be presented here are "Cimarosian" (choreography by Massine) and "L'Apres Midi d'un Faune" the famous work of Vaslav Nijinsky upon the music of Debussy. In the last-named work the original Bakst settings and costumes will be used.

* * *

HUNTINGTON, W. VA.
ADVERTISER

SEP 13 1936

MUSIC LOVERS PROGRAMS

NEW YORK, Sept. 12—(AP)—Symphony concerts are no longer being bought by the "pig in the poke" method. At least not in the east.

It used to be that subscribers to the hundreds of orchestral seasons throughout the country were expected to approach the box office, money in hand, sometime in the summer. They paid their money, received their tickets, and went home hoping that Conductor X would prepare decent programs for a change.

Now many of the major orchestras are not only listing their conductors, but telling in advance the soloists to be expected, the special events planned, and as definitely as possible the music to be played.

Partly, it is explained by orchestra managers, this is bing done in an effort to attract patronage. Partly it is done in a spirit of fairness. And partly it is done because more and more the emphasis is being laid on the music itself rather than upon the prima donna who does the conducting.

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony society led off with an announcement which listed in fair detail the music to be expected from the three guest conductors, and sketching in a general outline for John Barbirolli and Arthur Rodzinski, the two "regular" conductors.

The Philadelphia orchestra said little about the actual music to be programmed, but it did list in detail the soloists to be heard, a most impressive list indeed. Later some of the music was announced.

But the Boston symphony has gone farther than any up to date. Up in Boston Serge Koussevitzky has chosen and announced nearly all the major numbers to be played, and in the case of the soloists has even published what work each will be heard in.

This extends even to the standard repertoire. And as usual, Dr. Koussevitzky has dug up a few new things. One is a violin concerto by Roger Sessions, which Albert Spalding will play for the first time; another is a symphony by one Shaporin.

Sept 13 36

MUSIC

THE WEEK'S

CRITICAL REPORTING

Reviewers in Smaller Cities Confronted By Special Questions and Needs

By OLIN DOWNES

NOW and again this department receives woeful letters from those who report musical activities in small cities. Frequently the writers show that they are serious, well informed, enthusiastic for their work, but they find little that is important to write about. Sometimes they are discouraged because of the resentment they meet when they express themselves with independence.

If the local orchestra is not adjudged the equal of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, if the local pianist is not acclaimed as at the least an incipient Paderewski and the fiddler who performed at Mrs. Jones's is mentioned as less than a Kreisler, harsh things are said of the critic. Not that this kind of reaction is wholly unknown in the big cities. But the career of the music critic in a minor community may be very hard and discouraging. Local influences, financial or social, and neighborhood rivalries of sorts can make trouble, when a reviewer would be unassailable if he wrote on a large paper in a great city. Moreover, the man who writes about music in a small place is likely to be a youngster. A position which demands exceptional balance, tact and experience to carry the thing off must be filled by a fledging. It can be hard lines for that young man, as also for his readers!

* * *

There are, on the other hand, things to be said in explanation of a small community's attitude toward music criticism and the special problems that confront the local chronicler. Here he must pursue his objectives under conditions which often call for an exceptional degree of judgment, tact and courage.

Sometimes, of course, it is hard to get into the head of a sophomore a just definition of tact and courage. These are qualities needed in writing for a newspaper. But in what does their exercise consist? Wherever it is situated, or whatever its power, a newspaper aspires to a constructive influence in its community. To be constructive involves being fearless, but to be fearless it is not necessary to fail to grasp realities and act upon them. The question is admirably discussed by an editorial in the present issue of Musical America. The title of the piece is "Common Sense in Music Reviewing in the Secondary Cities." The newspaper reviewer in the small city has his work cut out for him. "He may find it difficult so to adjust his outlook as to be fair to musical enterprises which, on the basis of his broader experience, he knows leave much to be desired." But "if he tries to write in a city of 100,000 as he would expect to write in a city of 1,000,000, he may be made to feel—and justly so—that he is merely vaunting his own knowledge and opinions at the expense of musical movements in the community."

* * *

It may be said in general that it is the beginner who is most impatient and resentful of the limitations of his environment. And his first proceeding, in order to show his independence and courage, will of course be to flay without mercy. To shade an opinion by ever so little, to stimulate by an optimistic if not tolerant tone the public enthusiasm for a deserving if not perfectly conducted musical enterprise, would be for him nothing short of cowardly compromise. For it is amazing how belligerent people who are not sure of themselves must be. And there is no remedy for it but experience.

What experience? Best of all, we believe, for the practical education of the music critic, would be a course in common or dog reporting under a wholly unsympathetic and realistic city editor. This is calculated to instill some sense of proportion, to teach the applicant to put down facts simply and accurately, in a manner utterly free of personal bias, and to be humanly aware of the life about him. Yes! That's the thing: to be kicked around the block quite a number of times in the course of the exercise of a reporter's professional duty! It is the surest and quickest road to common sense and orientation. Then it is possible to size up news as well as critical values, to learn to see one's self and one's subject in relation to the boundless panorama of human life and thought. The commentator with that training learns not to waste his strength, try his reader's patience, and soothe his self-esteem by lengthy denunciation of some minor and helpless aspirant. He does not wander from his theme, or neglect main issues. If he strikes, he takes an opponent worth going for, and he aims to win, and that for a useful and not a vainglorious purpose.

* * *

A great deal more might be said about this phase of a critic's work, and the self-approbation that some arbiters of taste find in venting innuendo or sarcasm upon a helpless and more or less incompetent practitioner—or one doomed to be inaccurately estimated as such. Granting that the facts of the review, as regards the imperfect executant or interpreter, are correct, what then? There are some things to be remembered. The moral issue, among others, has importance.

Tactically, the writer has the advantage of the performer. He has the last word. The musician who feels himself unjustly "roasted" may venture to reply by a letter for publication. He may have his letter published, and, if his reviewer has space and plays fair, get some personal satisfaction and justification from that. In general, he has made a bad matter worse by calling attention to it at all, and if the reviewer should be so petty as to harbor resentment at his talking back, the musician has made an enemy. Of course, a reviewer with any decent conceptions of his position will take pains never to abuse it.

* * *

A reviewer must remember what it means to serve an art, even if the servant be without exceptional capacity. A violinist who plays his part of a Brahms sonata with clean technique and the understanding of a musician has already done a fine thing. A pianist who so much as strikes the notes of a late Beethoven sonata in a competent manner has earned the right to respect and to considerate treatment. He should not be subjected to the sneer or the amusing witticism. If the performance has marked defects, but also shows sincerity and artistic purpose, and especially if the performer is young, it deserves discriminating encouragement. What is never desired is the writer who flaunts himself in the presence of a Mozart or a Beethoven. These things hold true in any place, in any city.

But if a sense of proportion is indispensable in a metropolis, how much the greater is the need of balanced opinion in the small city? "One important distinction," continues our editorial writer, "needs to be borne in mind in comparing the task of a newspaper reviewer in a secondary community with that of his contemporary in a metropolis. Civic issues enter strongly into the one, and almost not at all into the other. In the great cities, it is more or less understood that if one musical institution goes under, another will take its place. In lesser communities the need for the fostering of projects that can be maintained only with difficulty presents a very different situation. Continual harping on the deficiencies of a local orchestra, for instance—or on the weaknesses of its conductor—is as likely to be as destructive in the smaller city as it may be constructive in the larger one. All too easily the public may decide that a venture calling for so much fault-finding is not worth the support asked for it. Then, instead of an improvement, there may be a collapse, with the painful necessity of a new and more rudimentary beginning.

* * *

"Common sense comes into the picture here as well as in details of writing. The reviewer dealing with local institutions simply cannot expect to apply the same standards yardstick that would be applied to the few outstanding organizations of their kind. He must know that a local orchestra cannot survive the tests that in the musical capitals are applied to the virtuoso best. But if common sense argues against the rigid applications of standards that do not fit, it also argues against false praise. The skilled reporter learns that there are ways of writing interestingly about events, without concocting puffs or eternally intruding his personal dissatisfactions on the reader. Conductors, soloists, every type of performer, need to reconcile themselves to a kind of sensible reporting in which there is more of description and less of laudation or blame. The reviewer writes about them, not for them. For the community it is music that counts, not the fortunes of either the performer or the reviewer. The perspective must remain that of the community, much as the individual may strive to enlarge it or better it according to his own lights and convictions."

To the beginner anxious to prove his mettle another consideration might occur. It is the reasonable and fair-intentioned commentator, who has done what he could to merit the confidence of his readers, who, when the time comes to strike at an artistic nuisance, is likely to be able to accomplish most in the useful directions of improvement or extermination.

DALLAS; TEX.
NEWS

SEP 13 1936

Shifting Tides Bring New Deal For Music Fans

Used to Buy Tickets and Hope; Now They Get Advance Dope

BY JOHN SELBY.

NEW YORK, Sept. 12 (AP).—Symphony concerts are no longer being bought by the pig in the poke method. At least not in the East.

It used to be that subscribers to the hundreds of orchestral seasons throughout the country were expected to approach the box office money in hand, sometime in the summer. They paid their money, received their tickets and went home hoping that Conductor X would prepare decent programs for a change.

Now many of the major orchestras are not only listing their conductors, but telling in advance the soloists to be expected, the special events planned, and as definitely as possible the music to be played.

Partly, it is explained by orchestra managers, this is being done in an effort to attract patronage. Partly it is done in a spirit of fairness. And partly it is done because more and more the emphasis is being laid on the music itself rather than upon the prima donna who does the conducting

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society led off with an announcement which listed in fair detail the music to be expected from its three guest conductors, and sketching in a general outline for John Barbirolli and Arthur Rodzinski, the two regular conductors.

The Philadelphia orchestra said little about the actual music to be programmed, but it did list in detail the soloists to be heard, a most impressive list indeed. Later some of the music was announced.

But the Boston Symphony has gone farther than any up to date. Up in Boston Serge Koussevitzky has chosen and announced nearly all the major numbers to be played and in the case of the soloists has even published what work each will be heard in.

This extends even to the stranded repertoire. And as usual, Dr. Koussevitzky has dug up a few new things. One is a violin concerto by Roger Sessions, which Albert Spalding will play for the first time; another is a symphony by one Shaporin.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

SEP 13 1936

HARVARD JUBILEE NEARS ITS CLIMAX

College "Yard" Is Transformed Into Open Air Theatre for Three-Day Fete.

10,000 ALUMNI EXPECTED

62 Famous Scholars to Get Degrees; Roosevelt to Speak; Students Plan for Parade

Cambridge, Mass., Sept. 12.—(AP)—Harvard University, scene for the past two weeks of conferences between great scholars of the world, turns next week toward the fanfare and ceremony that will climax its tercentenary observance.

In the historic college "yard" now transformed into a spacious open air theatre for the festivities, more than 10,000 alumni will gather for three days beginning Sept. 16 to honor Harvard upon its 300th anniversary.

Delegates from universities and learned societies throughout the world, 62 distinguished scholars who are to receive honorary degrees, President Roosevelt, and dignitaries representing the State and nation will take part in the three-day ceremonies.

Less formal than the dignified exercises within the locked gates of the yard will be the spectacular public events of Thursday night. Two barges, one carrying the college band and the other laden with fireworks, will move up the Charles River between brightly illuminated shores.

Torch-Light Parade

After a fireworks display opposite the new houses and the business school, undergraduates in a torch-light parade will swing through Cambridge streets to the yard as they did 100 years ago in Harvard's bicentennial.

Tercentenary Week, bringing to an end a summer of observances, opens tomorrow night with an organ recital in Harvard's Memorial Church by Dr. Archibald Davison. Monday and Tuesday are given over to observances by the medical, dental and business schools, at which eminent authorities in the various fields will speak.

More than 550 delegates from other universities will be tendered a reception Wednesday afternoon as the last act of the Tercentenary begins. Undergraduates will welcome student delegates from 31 American and European colleges. That evening the Harvard Club of Boston will be host to the Council of Associated Harvard Clubs, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the first of three concerts especially arranged for Harvard's Tercentenary by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

To Read 1836 Letters

Thursday is to be Alumni Day, when a capacity throng of graduates will assemble in the theatre behind historic University Hall—on the site, incidentally, of the 18th century college piggery — to hear President James B. Conant report on the contents of a package of letters, sealed by President Josiah Quincy in 1836 and held in the university vaults through the intervening century.

Dr. Thomas Shirley Hale, Master of Emmanuel—John Harvard's college at Cambridge University, England—will be guest speaker.

A formal but colorful procession of the faculty, visiting scholars, delegates and alumni will usher in the final phase of Harvard's 300th anniversary celebration on Friday morning. Honorary degrees will be conferred upon the 62 distinguished scholars. President Conant will deliver the tercentenary oration on "The university tradition in America—yesterday and tomorrow." Speakers will include the Governor of Massachusetts, and Prof. Samuel Eliot Morison.

Roosevelt to Speak

Friday afternoon the alumni will meet once again to hear President Roosevelt, a member of the class of 1904, address them. A Lawrence Lowell, President Emeritus of the university, will take the chair. The 1936 exercises will then come to an end when President Conant makes a motion, as did his predecessor in the bi-centennial, that the meeting "adjourn to 2036."

Numerous class reunions, dinners and meetings will accompany the formal observance. The more important events will be broadcast.

FORT WORTH, TEXAS
Morning Star-Telegram

Symphony Program System Is Changed

9-13-36

BY JOHN SELBY.

NEW YORK, Sept. 12 (AP).—Symphony concerts are no longer being sought by the "pig in the poke" method. At least not in the East.

It used to be that subscribers to the hundreds of orchestral seasons throughout the country were expected to approach the box office money in hand, some time in the Summer. They paid their money, received their tickets, and went home hoping that Conductor X would prepare decent programs for a change.

Now many of the leading orchestras are not only listing their conductors, but telling in advance the soloists to be expected, the special events planned, and as definitely as possible the music to be played.

Music Emphasized.

Partly, it is explained by orchestra managers, this is being done in an effort to attract patronage. Partly, it is done in a spirit of fairness. And partly it is done because more and more the emphasis is being laid on the music itself rather than upon the prima donna who does the conducting.

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society led off with an announcement which listed in fair detail the music to be expected from its three guest conductors, and sketching in a general outline for John Birbirolli and Arthur Rodrinski, the two "regular" conductors.

The Philadelphia orchestra said little about the actual music to be programmed, but it did list in detail the soloists to be heard, a most impressive list indeed. Later some of the music was announced.

Boston Goes Farther.

But the Boston Symphony has gone farther than any up to date. Up in Boston Serge Koussevitzky has chosen and announced nearly all the major numbers to be played, and in the case of the soloists has even published what work each will be heard in.

This extends even to the standard repertoire. And as usual, Dr. Koussevitzky has dug up a few new things. One is a violin concerto by Roger Sessions, which Albert Spalding will play for the first time. Another is a symphony by one Shaporin.

DURHAM, N. C.
SUN

SYMPHONIES GIVING PROGRAM PREVIEWS

12

New York Philharmonic Leads New Policy—Boston Orchestra Goes Farthest

New York, Sept. 12.—(AP)—Symphony concerts are no longer being bought by the "pig in the poke" method. At least not in the east.

It used to be that subscribers to the hundreds of orchestral seasons throughout the country were expected to approach the box office, money in hand, sometime in the summer. They paid their money, received their tickets, and went home hoping that Conductor X would prepare decent programs for a change.

Now many of the major orchestras are not only listing their conductors, but telling in advance the soloists to be expected, the special events planned, and as definitely as possible the music to be played.

Partly, it is explained by orchestra managers, this is being done in an effort to attract patronage. Partly it is done in a spirit of fairness. And partly it is done because more and more the emphasis is being laid on the music itself rather than upon the prima donna who does the conducting.

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony society led off with an announcement which listed in fair detail the music to be expected from its three guest conductors, and sketching in a general outline for John Barbirolli and Arthur Rodzinski, the two "regular" conductors.

The Philadelphia orchestra said little about the actual music to be programmed, but it did list in detail the soloists to be heard, a most impressive list indeed. Later some of the music was announced.

But the Boston symphony has gone further than any up to date. Up in Boston Serge Koussevitzky has chosen and announced nearly all the major numbers to be played, and in the case of the soloists has even published what work each will be heard in.

This extends even to the standard repertoire. And as usual, Dr. Koussevitzky has dug up a few new things. One is a violin concerto by Roger Sessions, which Albert Spalding will play for the first time; another is a symphony by one Shaporin.

BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN

Tercentenary Week To End Harvard's Gala Celebration

More Than 10.000 Alumni To Gather For Three-Day Event, Beginning Wednesday— Franklin Roosevelt, '04, To Speak Friday

[By the Associated Press]

Cambridge. Mass., Sept. 12—Harvard University, the scene the last two weeks of conferences between great scholars of the world, turns next week toward the fanfare and ceremony that will be the climax of its tercentenary observance.

In the historic college Yard, now transformed into a spacious open-air theater for the festivities, more than 10,000 alumni will gather for three days, beginning Wednesday, to honor Harvard upon its three hundredth anniversary.

Delegates from universities and learned societies throughout the world, sixty-two distinguished scholars who are to receive honorary degrees, President Roosevelt and dignitaries representing the state and nation will take part in the three-day ceremonies.

Public Events Thursday

Less formal than the dignified exercises within the locked gates of the Yard will be the spectacular public events of Thursday night. Two barges, one carrying the college band and the other laden with fireworks, will move up the Charles river between brightly illuminated shores. After a fireworks display opposite the new houses and the business school, undergraduates in a torchlight parade will swing through Cambridge streets to the Yard as they did a hundred years ago in Harvard's bicentennial.

Tercentenary week, bringing to an end a summer of observances, will open tomorrow night with an organ recital in Harvard's Memorial Church by Dr. Archibald Davison. Monday and Tuesday are given over to observances by the medical, dental and business schools.

More than 550 delegates from other universities will be tendered a reception Wednesday afternoon as the last act of the tercentenary begins. Undergraduates will welcome student delegates from thirty-one American and European colleges. That evening the Harvard Club of Boston will be host to the Council of Associated Harvard Clubs, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the first of three concerts especially arranged for the tercentenary by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

To Report On Letters

Thursday is to be alumni day, when a capacity throng of graduates will assemble in the theater behind historic University Hall—on the site, incidentally, of the eighteenth century college piggery—to hear James B. Conant, president, report on the contents of a package of letters, sealed by Josiah Quincy when president in 1836, and held in the university vaults through the intervening century.

Dr. Thomas Shirley Hale, master of Emmanuel-John Harvard's College at Cambridge University, England, will be guest speaker.

A formal but colorful procession of the faculty, visiting scholars, delegates and alumni will usher in the final phase of the celebration Friday morning. Honorary degrees will be conferred upon the sixty-two scholars.

Conant To Give Oration

President Conant will deliver the tercentenary oration on "The University Tradition in America—Yesterday and Tomorrow." Speakers will include the Governor of Massachusetts and Prof. Samuel Eliot Morison.

Friday afternoon the alumni will meet once again to hear President Roosevelt, a member of the class of 1904. A. Lawrence Lowell, president emeritus of the university, will take the chair. The 1936 exercises then will come to an end when President Conant makes a motion that the meeting "adjourn to 2036."

Numerous class reunions, dinners and meetings will accompany the formal observance.

COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

Subscribers Know All About Season's Plans

NEW YORK, SEPT. 12.—(AP).—Symphony concerts are no longer being bought by the "pig in the poke" method. At least not in the East.

It used to be that subscribers to the hundreds of orchestral seasons throughout the country were expected to approach the box office, money in hand, sometime in the summer. They paid their money, received their tickets, and went home hoping that conductors would prepare decent programs for a change.

Now many of the major orchestras are not only listing their conductors, but telling in advance the soloists to be expected, the special events planned, and as definitely as possible the music to be played.

* * *

PARTLY, IT IS explained by orchestra managers, this is being done in an effort to attract patronage. Partly it is done in a spirit of fairness. And partly it is done because more and more the emphasis is being laid on the music itself rather than upon the prima donna who does the conducting.

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony society led off with an announcement which listed in fair detail the music to be expected from its three guest conductors, and sketching in a general outline for John Barbirolli and Artur Rodzinski, the two "regular" conductors.

The Philadelphia orchestra said little about the actual music to be programed, but it did list in detail the soloists to be heard, a most impressive list, indeed. Later some of the music was announced.

* * *

BUT THE Boston Symphony has gone farther than any up to date. Up in Boston, Serge Koussevitzky has chosen and announced nearly all the numbers to be played, and in the case of the soloists, has even published what work each will be heard in.

This extends even to the standard repertoire. And as usual, Dr. Koussevitky has dug up a few things. One is a violin concerto by Roger Sessions, which Albert Spalding will play for the first time; another is a symphony by one Shaporin.

BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN

SEP 1 3 1936

The Bill Of Fare For The Symphonies

Koussevitzky Announces Nearly All The Major Numbers For The Entire Season, Including Even Soloists And What They Will Play

By JOHN SELBY

NEW YORK (AP).

SYMPHONY concerts are no longer being bought by the "pig in the poke" method. At least not in the East.

It used to be that subscribers to the hundreds of orchestral seasons throughout the country were expected to approach the box office, money in hand, sometime in the summer. They paid their money, received their tickets, and went home hoping that conductors would prepare decent programs for a change.

Now many of the major orchestras are not only listing their conductors, but telling in advance the soloists to be expected, the special events planned, and as definitely as possible the music to be played.

SPIRIT OF FAIRNESS

Partly, it is explained by orchestra managers, this is being done in an effort to attract patronage. Partly it is done in a spirit of fairness. And partly it is done because more and more the emphasis is being laid on the music itself rather than upon the prima donna who does the conducting.

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society led off with an announcement which listed in fair detail the music to be expected from its three guest conductors, and sketching in a general outline for John Barbirolli and Artur Rodzinski, the two "regular" conductors.

The Philadelphia orchestra said little about the actual music to be programmed, but it did list in detail the soloists to be heard, a most impressive list indeed. Later some of the music was announced.

BOSTON'S PLANS

But the Boston Symphony has gone further than any up to date. Serge Koussevitzky has chosen and announced nearly all the major numbers to be played, and in the case of the soloists has even published what work each will be heard in.

This extends even to the standard repertoire. And as usual, Dr. Koussevitzky has dug up a few new things. One is a violin concerto by Roger Sessions, which Albert Spalding will play for the first time; another is a symphony by one Shaporin.

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

No 'Pig in Po for Easte

By JOHN

NEW YORK, Sept. 12—(AP)—Symphony concerts are no longer being bought by the "pig in the poke" method. At least not in the East.

It used to be that subscribers to the hundreds of orchestral seasons throughout the country were expected to approach the box office, money in hand, sometime in the summer. They paid their money, received their ticket, and went home hoping that conductor would prepare decent programs for a change.

Now many of the major orchestras are not only listing their conductors, but telling in advance the soloists to be expected, the special events planned, and as definitely as possible the music to be played.

Partly, it is explained by orchestra managers, this is being done in an effort to attract patronage. Partly it is done in a spirit of fairness. And partly it is done because more and more the emphasis is being laid on the music itself rather than upon the prima donna who does the conducting.

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society led off with an announcement which listed in fair detail the music to be expected from its three guest conductors, and sketching in a general outline for John Barbirolli and Artur Rodzinski, the two "regular" conductors.

The Philadelphia Orchestra said little about the actual music to be programmed, but it did list in detail the soloists to be heard, a most impressive list indeed. Later some of the music was announced.

But the Boston Symphony has gone farther than any up to date. Up in Boston, Serge Koussevitzky has chosen and announced nearly all the main numbers to be played and, in the case of the soloists, has even published what work each will be heard in.

This extends even to the standard repertory. And as usual, Dr. Koussevitzky has dug up a few new things. One is a violin concerto by Roger Sessions, which Albert Spalding will play for the first time; another is a symphony by one Shaporin.

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

Symphony Co Wares in Po

NEW YORK, Sept. 12 (AP)—Symphony concerts are no longer being bought by the "pig in the poke" method. At least not in the east.

It used to be that subscribers to the hundreds of orchestral seasons throughout the country were expected to approach the box office, money in hand, sometime in the summer. They paid their money, received their tickets, and went home hoping their conductor would prepare decent programs for a change.

Now many of the major orchestras are not only listing their conductors, but telling in advance the soloists to be expected, the special events planned, and as definitely as possible the music to be played.

Fairness Shown

Partly, it is explained by orchestra managers, this is being done in an effort to attract patronage. Partly it is done in a spirit of fairness. And partly it is done because more and more the emphasis is being laid on the music itself rather than upon the prima donna who does the conducting.

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony society led off with an announcement which listed in fair detail the music to be expected from its three guest conductors, and sketching in a general outline for John Barbirolli and Arthur Rodzinski, the two "regular" conductors.

The Philadelphia orchestra said little about the actual music to be proclaimed, but it did list in detail the soloists to be heard, a most impressive list indeed. Later some of the music was announced.

But the Boston symphony has gone farther than any up to date. Up in Boston Serge Koussevitzky has chosen and announced nearly all the major numbers to be played, and in the case of the soloists has even published what work each will be heard in.

This extends even to the standard repertoire. And as usual, Dr. Koussevitzky has dug up a few new things. One is a violin concerto by Roger Sessions, which Albert Spalding will play for the first time, another is a symphony by one Shaporin.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

SEP 1 3 1936

HARVARD ENTERS 'BIRTHDAY' WEEK

Fifteen Thousand Will Share in Great Three-Day Celebration of 300th Year.

FRIDAY WILL CLIMAX FETE

Thursday Has Been Designated as 'Alumni Day'—Concert a Feature on Wednesday.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Sept. 12.—Next week Harvard University celebrates that day in the Autumn of 1636 when the General Court of Massachusetts Bay Colony, which had entered the wilderness only a few years before, voted, as the last item of the day's business, that:

"The court agreed to give 400 pounds toward a schoale or college, whereof 200 pounds to bee paid the next yeare and 200 pounds when the worke is finished."

It was the first step in the establishment of higher education in the young colony, and that, rather than the start of classes or the first commencement, is being celebrated.

Accordingly, on Friday the greatest academic gathering in American history will mark the observance of the 300th anniversary of Harvard's founding.

About 15,000 people will participate—550 delegates from universities and learned societies here and abroad, the President of the United States, the Governor of Massachusetts, some 10,000 alumni, 2,500 undergraduates, and members and former members of the faculty and governing boards.

Although Friday will be the climax of a whole Summer's program of special events, the first two of the three "tercentenary days" will be crowded with ceremonial gatherings and celebrations by special groups.

Thursday has been designated Alumni Day. Wednesday's chief events will consist of receptions to delegates, and in the evening the first of three tercentenary concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Three of the graduate schools are having special gatherings during the tercentenary week. Tomorrow and Tuesday the Medical School will hold a tercentenary session, with symposia, lectures and demonstrations, concluding with a reunion meeting and dinner Tuesday evening.

The Dental School will have a one-day tercentenary session on Tuesday, with morning and afternoon symposia and a banquet and reunion in the evening. The Business School alumni will hold their tercentenary session Wednesday afternoon and evening and Thursday afternoon.

The tercentenary days themselves will bring together all the elements of present day Harvard, the historical background, the relations with city, State and nation, the exchange of knowledge among universities, the progress of learning generally, the contributions of alumni and undergraduates. In all of these things the major emphasis will be on the function of the university today.

In addition to its regular schedule of twenty-four pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, six Monday evenings and the same number of Tuesday matinees, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give this season its usual series of eight concerts in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, five in Carnegie Hall, New York, and five in the Academy of Music in Brooklyn. Besides the Harvard concerts the Orchestra will visit the following university cities: Hanover, New Haven, Northampton, Ann Arbor and New Brunswick (Rutgers). There will be five concerts by the Orchestra in the Metropolitan Theater, Providence, and single concerts in Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Toledo, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, Springfield, Worcester and Hartford.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

SEP 14 1936

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Noted Conductor, Dies

Detroit Symphony Head Succumbs to Long Illness — Was Son-in-Law of Mark Twain CAREER ENDS

Ossip Gabrilowitsch

Detroit, Sept. 14 (AP)—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra since 1918, died today after a long illness. He was 58.

Gabrilowitsch had been ill since the Spring of 1935 when he collapsed after giving a piano recital in New York city. He underwent two operations at Henry Ford Hospital in 1935 in an attempt to relieve the stomach disorder which had caused his illness.

He had been on a leave of absence from the Detroit Symphony since the start of his illness.

Gabrilowitsch is survived by his wife, Clara Clemens Gabrilowitsch, Mark Twain's daughter, whom he married in 1909, and a daughter, Nina.

An internationally famous pianist and orchestra director for 40 years, Gabrilowitsch made his debut at the age of 18 in the European musical centers. He was born in St. Petersburg (now Leningrad), Feb. 7, 1878.

Caused Dynamiting of Church

The mild-mannered Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who was said to conduct with a sedative air, once caused a church to be dynamited. That occurred back in 1920, a year after he had first gone to Detroit to conduct its symphony orchestra. The music committee of that mid-Western city desired to renew the contract with the Russian pianist but he solemnly shook his shaggy head and said he couldn't conduct again under the same conditions.

During the entire first year, the Detroit Symphony Orchestra gave concerts in an armory, a bare, barren place that gave its sensitive conductor a bad case of jitters. He would have to have the right kind of a concert hall, if he were to conduct the symphony for another year. The music committee threw up its hands and said such a thing would be impossible. The gentle Gabrilowitsch agreed it would be and went solemnly off to New York.

Hardly had the pianist-conductor left the room than the committee realized its error. A quarter of a million dollars was raised in 15 minutes and word was sent to Gabrilowitsch that he must come back at all costs. This was in April and in order to have the concert hall ready for the October music season, a church had to be dynamited to make room for the building. There was no time to wreck the church in the usual way.

Met Wife in Vienna

Gabrilowitsch's marriage to Mark Twain's daughter, also a musician and writer, is one of the beautiful romances of the music world. They met in 1899, when they were studying in Vienna, according to an interview given by Mark Twain at the time of their marriage in 1909. To save all embarrassment for the happy couple, the humorist prepared the following interview, given at his country home at West Redding, Conn., the day of the ceremony:

"Clara and Gabrilowitsch were pupils together under Leschetzky in Vienna, 10 years ago. We have known him intimately ever since. It's not new, the engagement. It was made and dissolved twice six years ago. Recovering from a serious surgical operation, two or three months were passed by him here in the house, and a week or 10 days ago the engagement was renewed. The wedding had to be sudden, for Gabrilowitsch's European season is about to begin. The pair will sail in a fortnight from now. The first engagement will be in Germany. They have taken a house in Berlin."

Gabrilowitsch was known throughout Europe as a brilliant pianist. When the German Dr. Karl Muck resigned from the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the war Gabrilowitsch mentioned as a possible successor. He was the first celebrated piano virtuoso since Lizst to take up conducting on orchestra as a regular job. When he went to Detroit to conduct, he gave up all serious ideas of composing, saying:

"One can do two jobs, but not three."

THIS CLIPPING FROM SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

Symphonies List Conductors, Season's Artists

Major Orchestras Give General Outline of Principal Numbers to Be Played

New York, Sept. 14 (AP).—Symphony concerts are no longer being brought by the "pig in the poke" method. At least not in the East.

It used to be that subscribers to the hundreds of orchestral seasons throughout the country were expected to approach the box office, money in hand, sometime in the summer. They paid their money, received their tickets, and went home hoping that Conductor X would prepare decent programs for a change.

Now many of the major orchestras are not only listing their conductors, but telling in advance the soloists to be expected, the special events planned, and as definitely as possible the music to be played.

Partly, it is explained by orchestra managers, this is being done in an effort to attract patronage. Partly it is done in a spirit of fairness. And partly it is done because more and more the emphasis is being laid on the music itself rather than upon the prima donna who does the conducting.

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society led off with an announcement which listed in fair detail the music to be expected from its three guest conductors, and sketching in a general outline for John Barbirolli and Arthur Rodzinski, the two "regular" conductors.

The Philadelphia Orchestra said little about the actual music to be programmed, but it did list in detail the soloists to be heard, a most impressive list, indeed. Later some of the music was announced.

But the Boston Symphony has gone farther than any up to date. Up in Boston Serge Koussevitzky has chosen and announced nearly all the major numbers to be played, and in the case of the soloists has even published what work each will be heard in.

This extends even to the standard repertoire. And as usual, Dr. Koussevitzky has dug up a few new things. One is a violin concerto by Roger Sessions, which Albert Spalding will play for the first time; another is a symphony by one Shaporin.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

SEP 14 1936

Students to Participate in Harvard Rites As Hosts to Delegates at Tercentenary

By JAMES MacDONALD
Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Sept. 13.—About 2,000 Harvard undergraduates are expected to return to Cambridge tomorrow, two weeks before the opening of college, to prepare to act as hosts to fifty-four student delegates to the institution's celebration of the 300th anniversary of its founding and to begin their own program in connection with the tercentenary.

Tomorrow also will mark the beginning of a two-day session at the Harvard Medical School, with symposia on the various branches of medicine.

A gala round of festivities has been planned for the student delegates, representing twenty-seven American institutions of learning, as well as Oxford, Cambridge, the Sorbonne and Bologna. While they are here they will live with their student-hosts in the undergraduate houses.

The visitors will be welcomed officially on Wednesday afternoon at ceremonies closing with the presentation of insignia to the guests, who will be "called up" in order according to the age of the institutions they represent.

Thursday has been designated undergraduate day. In contrast to the profundities of last week, when scholars of the world wrestled with the problems of man and his universe, the students will celebrate with lunches, dinners and other amenities.

The Harvard eleven will give an exhibition football practice at Soldiers Field in the afternoon. A torchlight parade from the Charles River to Harvard Yard in the evening will be followed by a "pop" concert and dancing in Memorial Hall.

On Friday, the final day of the Harvard celebration, the student delegates will participate in the climactic celebration in the Yard, which will include the awarding of sixty-two honorary degrees to noted scholars and scientists who attended the Tercentenary Conference of Arts and Sciences.

The Medical School session will comprise clinics, demonstrations and exhibits dealing with anatomy, bacteriology, biological chemistry, comparative pathology, dermatology, gynecology, medicine, neurology and psychiatry.

At tomorrow's symposium on "Nutrition and the Deficiency Diseases" the chairman will be Dr. George R. Minot, one of the three Nobel Prize winners for the discovery of the use of liver in combating pernicious anemia.

The symposia on Tuesday will be "The Nervous System, Central and Sympathetic," "The Infectious Diseases" and "The Endocrine Glands."

The Harvard Dental School will hold a symposium Tuesday and Wednesday. On Tuesday evening Dr. Earnest A. Hooton, Professor of Anthropology, will lecture on "Man as the Director of Human Evolution."

An elaborate program of chamber, orchestral and choral music has been planned for the week in token of Harvard's long connections with the study of music and its many contributions to musicology. This program includes concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday evenings.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

Sept. 14 36

Students Back Early to Assist Harvard's Fete

Returning to Meet Foreign Delegates; Hold Undergraduate Day Thursday

Medical Clinics Today

Laborers Work on Sunday to Get the Yard Ready

By Joseph Barnes
A Staff Correspondent

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Sept. 13.—A large portion of the undergraduate student body will arrive at Harvard tomorrow, two weeks in advance of the college's opening, to participate in a student program in connection with the tercentenary celebration. They will be hosts to the delegates from twenty-seven American and European universities who are guests of Harvard. A program of festivities and entertainment has been arranged for these guests, who will live with the students in the undergraduate houses.

Formal welcome will be extended to the student guests Wednesday. The program will include presentation of insignia to the guests. The students will receive badges in the order of the ages of the universities they represent.

Student Day Thursday

On Thursday, undergraduate day, the students will hold lunches, dinners and other events. In the afternoon the Harvard eleven will give an exhibition of football practice. In the evening a torchlight procession will be held, from the Charles River to Harvard Yard. There will be a popular concert and dancing in Memorial Hall.

Many musical programs have been planned for the week, including chamber, orchestral and choral events. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, will give concerts on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday evenings.

The visiting scholars, delegates from other universities, early comers among the alumni and the early arrivals among the students who thronged the Yard today saw something which would have been considered sacrilegious when Harvard was founded 300 years ago. Scores of workmen were erecting ornamental pillars and flagpoles, with surmounted gold lions, giving a gala appearance to the Yard. Such manual work on Sunday would have been considered profaning the Sabbath when Harvard was founded.

Clinics Are Planned

The Medical School will open its tercentenary sessions tomorrow. There will be clinics, demonstrations and exhibits dealing with anatomy, bacteriology, biological chemistry, comparative pathology, dermatology, gynecology, medicine, neurology and psychiatry. A symposium on "Nutrition and Deficiency Diseases" will be held tomorrow, with Dr. George R. Minot as chairman. Dr. Minot was one of the three scientists who received the Nobel Prize for discovery of the use of liver extract in the treatment of pernicious anemia. On Tuesday symposiums will be held on "The Nervous System, Central and Sympathetic," "The Infectious Diseases" and "The Endocrine Glands."

The Harvard Dental School will hold symposiums Tuesday and Wednesday. Dr. Ernest A. Hooton, professor of anthropology, will lecture Tuesday evening on "Man as the Director of Human Evolution."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MUSIC NOTES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present programs this evening, tomorrow afternoon and Friday evening in Boston and Cambridge in connection with the Harvard Tercentenary observance.

MT. VERNON, N. Y.
ARGUS

Boston Symphony Orchestra T Present Program Tonight

Noted Musical Ensemble Under Direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky To Interpret Johannes Brahm's 'Academic Festival Overture'

Three special concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in celebration of Harvard University's Tercentenary at Symphony Hall, Boston, tonight and Thursday and Friday will be brought to the United States' coast-to-coast radio audience exclusively over WJZ.

For the first of this series, to be heard tonight from 9 to 10 o'clock, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has selected Johannes Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture."

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

SEP 17 1936

Review Given Of Harvard Broadcast

By ALFRED FRANKENSTEIN

This story is a tentative beginning. It is the first of a series of occasional reviews to be devoted to the more important radio broadcasts in the musical field. These reviews are attempted in the belief that there are a few—a very few—radio programs of such intrinsic musical worth and general appeal as to demand attention from a newspaper department that aims to cover all the more significant events in its own particular territory. If the concerts of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra are matters of intense interest to thousands of listeners in San Francisco, the San Francisco press cannot well ignore them.

BOSTON SERIES

Ordinarily one might wait until the winter broadcasting schedule was under way before embarking on such a venture, but it happens that yesterday afternoon the national air was agitated with sounds from Boston that had a great more than parochial importance. The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened a series of three concerts as part of the Harvard tercentenary celebration, according to music a rather spectacular place in a world observance.

As Randall Thompson pointed out in his slightly mike-shy address before the concert proper began, Harvard was the first American university to establish a chair of music. What he did not stress was the fact that this chair was established only 51 years ago, and that Harvard permitted John Knowles Paine to serve on its faculty for 13 years before dignifying his subject with the professorial status. The great school in Cambridge was celebrating its first half century when Bach was born, but the whole era of art by Bach was drawing to a close before an American university recognized music as a learned profession. Tremendous advances have been made since the days of Paine, and Harvard may justly make a noise about them, but the three hundredth anniversary of the first American university still finds music just beginning to make its way on the academic front.

BRAHMS OVERTIME

Koussevitzky began his program with that classic of mortar-boarded whoopee, the "Academic Festiva overture of Brahms. Then came t truly just observance of the aft noon, a pair of movements fror sinfonietta by Edward Burling Hill, who has been teaching c position at Harvard for many y and whose grandfather, as p dent of the university, eng Paine to inaugurate his work. And if the Harvard music department today leads the country, Hill is one of the men most responsible. For he has never taken refuge in academic dogmatism, has always regarded music as a growing and continuing art. This was amply reflected in the breadth, richness, life and full emotional power of the slow movement presented yesterday.

A magnificent performance of the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" concluded the hour. A second concert in the series, with a program devoted to unspecified works of Bach, Haydn and Beethoven, comes through KGO at 12:30 today.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

SEP 10 1936

GREEK TO CONDUCT

BOSTON, Sept. 10 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced that Dimitri Mitropoulos, Greek symbolic conductor, who led the Boston orchestra last year will conduct here again this season. Mitropoulos was the first of his nationality ever to conduct a major orchestra on this continent.

Sept 15/36 NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

GABRILOWITSCH, 58, DEAD IN DETROIT

Famous Pianist Had Raised Symphony He Directed to Leading Rank in Nation.

MARK TWAIN'S SON-IN-LAW

Married Clara Clemens in 1909 —Had Headed Orchestra in Michigan for 18 Years.

Special to The New York Times.

DETROIT, Sept. 14.—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, director of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra and rated among the half dozen greatest pianists of this generation, died at his home here. He was 58 years old.

With him were his wife, the former Clara Clemens, daughter of Mark Twain, and their daughter, Nina.

A public funeral at Orchestra Hall will be held here Wednesday, at which his orchestra will play. Then the pianist's body will be sent to Elmira, N. Y., to be buried in the Clemens family plot, near the body of the great humorist.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch became ill in March, 1935, and had not been able to conduct the orchestra since that time. In the interval he had undergone a series of operations in Henry Ford Hospital.

Came to America in 1900.

Both as a pianist and musical director—he disliked intensely the term conductor — Ossip Gabrilowitsch was a consummate artist. A Russian by birth, he came to the United States in 1900, made an instantaneous success and became an American citizen in 1921. Before he came across the Atlantic he had made a profound reputation in the great musical centers of Europe, chiefly, however, as a concert pianist.

It was not until 1917 that Mr. Gabrilowitsch began to conduct great symphony orchestras, and the following year he was appointed conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra. How he built a small nucleus of musicians into one of the most important orchestras on this continent is a matter of recent record.

On the occasion of his twenty-fifth anniversary of American concerts he directed an orchestra in Carnegie Hall in Chopin and Schumann works, and a reviewer wrote:

"Mr. Gabrilowitsch has maintained inviolate his selfless devotion to his art, his sanity, his rare perceptions of beauty. There have been few who could command the attention and enthusiasm of the public by such genuine and simple means."

He was sure in his art, but seldom manifested temperament as did some of his contemporaries. On one occasion, however, he balked and resigned from the advisory board of the Schubert Centennial Committee because that body was offering a prize for the "completion" of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony.

"This, to me," he wrote to the committee, "seems like adding a pair of arms to the Venus of Milo. Such an undertaking is undignifed and inartistic. Moreover, it is entirely superfluous. I regret I cannot be associated with a musical escapade of this sort."

The project was abandoned shortly afterward.

Began Piano Study at 10.

Ossip Salomonovitch Gabrilowitsch was born at St. Petersburg on Feb. 7, 1878. When he was 10 years old, having a decided talent for the piano, he entered the Conservatory of Music there and was a pupil of Tolstoff, Liadoff and Glazunoff. When he was 16 he was graduated and won the coveted Rubinstein Prize.

Although it was generally considered that he was ripe for the concert stage, Mr. Gabrilowitsch himself seized eagerly the opportunity to study further under Leschetizky in Vienna. He studied theory and composition at the same time with Navratil.

Many years later Leschetizky was instrumental in introducing Gabrilowitsch to his future wife, Clara Clemens, the daughter of Samuel L. Clemens—Mark Twain. She was a pupil of the great teacher at the time, and was later to become a singer, actress and author of note. They were married in 1909.

Gabrilowitsch made his concert début in Berlin in 1896, with marked success. He appeared in many other cities, and came to New York in 1900 on his first visit. He had played in Germany, Austria, Russia, France and England, and for some years he lived in Munich.

Although his compositions were few, he wrote some songs, piano pieces and an elegy for 'cello and piano. He was acknowledged to be a fine interpreter of Chopin.

OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH

During the many years that Mr. Gabrilowitsch lived in the United States he endeared himself to the music-loving public, not only because of his mature art but perhaps also because of his unaffected and charming ways. During his earlier years in this country, he toured most of the principal cities here and in Canada.

Often a "Guest" Conductor.

He was a frequent guest conductor in New York, Philadelphia, Boston and elsewhere. In 1929 he created something of a furor in Berlin when he conducted Richard Strauss's "Don Juan."

When Arturo Toscanini refused to conduct "Giovinezza," the Fascist hymn, in Milan in 1931, Mr. Gabrilowitsch was one of his most ardent supporters, and he canceled an engagement at La Scala in protest.

Although he was a celebrated conductor, Mr. Gabrilowitsch was never really so happy as when he played the piano.

"There is a satisfaction in the piano to me," he said, "that the orchestra can never have, for all its magnificence. The intimacy, the immediate response. Then, too, I can change an interpretation at will, on the spur of the moment, without consulting anybody, without first having a rehearsal and saying to this man, 'Play it so this time' and to the other, 'Do it this way.' The piano responds instantly to your will; what you do is all yours."

TRIBUTES BY MUSICIANS

They and Music Lovers Join in Mourning Gabrilowitsch.

Musicians and music-lovers joined yesterday in paying tribute to Ossip Gabrilowitsch. Among the messages, including those from Serge Koussevitzky in Boston and Albert Spalding in Great Barrington, Mass., were:

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor of the Boston Symphony—America has lost a great artist. Gabrilowitsch was the truest exponent of the finest style of romantic and classic music. Personally I am deeply grieved at the loss of my old friend.

ALBERT SPALDING, violinist—I am deeply shocked and grieved by the great loss that the musical world has sustained in the death of Ossip Gabrilowitsch. He is an irreplaceable figure. No words of mine are needed as comment on him as an artist, for the memory of his playing lies enshrined in the heart of every music lover in our land. In addition to this he was a man of much wide culture and such a great heart that quite aside from his musical gifts he exerted a very wide influence. I have been a warm personal friend of his for many years and find it difficult to express my sorrow over his passing.

JOHN ERSKINE, President of the Juilliard School — He was a princely man and a noble artist. His friendship was one of the precious things in my life. Music in our country and everywhere has suffered a terrible loss.

ERNEST HUTCHESON of the Juilliard School—Ossip Gabrilowitsch ennobled his profession by a singular purity of idealism and a rare nobility and generosity of soul. His life was characterized by an unswerving devotion to music and a warm and compelling sympathy in all his human relationships and contacts. The world is poorer for the loss of a personality so radiant in beauty and strength. I grieve deeply at the passing of a dear friend and an outstanding musician.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
NEWS Sept. 16/36

SYMPHONY WILL HONOR HARVARD

Tercentenary Concert Will Feature Choruses From Pair of Colleges

Gladys George, Arline Judge and Isabel Jewell to Be Heard in Preview of 'Valiant Is the Word for Carrie' During 'Hollywood Hotel' Tonight

A chorus of students from Harvard University and Radcliffe College will be heard with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's direction during the third of three Harvard Tercentenary concerts from Symphony Hall, Boston, over a coast-to-coast network tonight.

The first part of the program will consist of three portions of Bach's B Minor Mass, the Et Incarnatus, Crucifixus and Cum Sancto Spiritu. Following this Dr. James B. Conant, president of Harvard University, will make a brief address. The combined student choruses will conclude the program with a singing of "Fair Harvard." (KGO: 6 p. m.).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UTICA, N. Y.
DISPATCH

BLIND BUYING OF ORCHESTRA TICKETS ENDS

New York—(AP)—Symphony concerts are no longer being brought by the "pig in the poke" method. At least not in the East.

It used to be that subscribers to the hundreds of orchestral seasons throughout the country were expected to approach the box office, money in hand, sometime in the summer. They paid their money, received their tickets, and went home hoping that Conductor X would prepare decent programs for a change.

Now many of the major orchestras are not only listing their conductors, but telling in advance the soloists to be expected, the special events planned, and as definitely as possible the music to be played.

Partly, it is explained by orchestra managers, this is being done in an effort to attract patronage. Partly it is done in a spirit of fairness. And partly it is done because more and more the emphasis is being laid on the music itself rather than upon the primo donna who does the conducting.

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society led off with an announcement which listed in fair detail the music to be expected from its three guest conductors, and sketching in a general outline for John Barbirolli and Arthur Rodzinski, the two "regular" conductors.

The Philadelphia Orchestra said little about the actual music to be programmed, but it did list in detail the soloists to be heard, a most impressive list indeed. Later some of the music was announced.

But the Boston Symphony has gone farther than any up to date. Up in Boston Serge Koussevitzky has chosen and announced nearly all the major numbers to be played, and in the case of the soloists has even published what work each will be heard in.

This extends even to the standard repertoire. And as usual, Doctor Koussevitzky has dug up a few new things. One is a violin concerto by Roger Sessions, which Albert Spalding will play for the first time! another is a symphony by one Shaporin.

Sept. 16/36 SUN Hanover, Pa.

Dial TWISTS

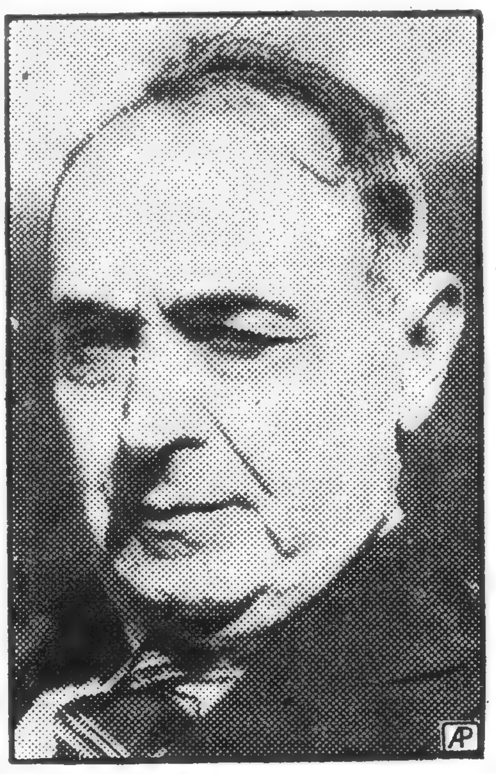
Broadcasts From Harvard

The Harvard Tercentenary Celebration at Cambridge, Mass., is the occasion of several interesting broadcasts this week. Exercises welcoming visitors were broadcast this afternoon. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the first tercentenary concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra this evening from 8 to 9 o'clock in a WJZ broadcast from Symphony Hall, Boston. The program will include Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80, Brahms; Two Movements from Sinfonietta for String Orchestra, Op. 40, Hill, and Daphnis et Chloe, Second Suite; Lever du Aour, Pantomime and Danse General, By Ravel.

Six Harvard broadcasts are listed for the NBC networks tomorrow. From 8.30 to 9.15 a. m., over WJZ, the service of thanksgiving and remembrance at Memorial Church will be heard. A meeting of the Associated Harvard Clubs in Sanders Theater will be broadcast over WEAF at 11.30 a. m. The remaining four programs will be heard over WJZ. From 1.30 to 2.30 p. m., a luncheon given by the faculty of the university in honor of the delegates will be the occasion for a broadcast. The second tercentenary concert of the Boston Symphony, with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, will be broadcast from 3 to 4 p. m., consisting of Suite No. 2 in B minor, for flute and strings, Bach; Symphony in G major, No. 88, Haydn, and Symphony in E flat, Mozart. Tencentenary orations by the Harvard chapter of Phi Beta Kappa are scheduled for 6.45 p. m. tomorrow, and a torchlight procession of undergraduates from the Charles River to Memorial Hall will be described from 8.30 to 9 p. m. Additional broadcasts will take place Friday.

HOLLYWOOD, CAL.
CITIZEN-NEWS

Noted Conductor



AP

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, director of the Boston Symphony to be heard at 6.30 p. m. over KECA, left Russia, his birthplace, after the Revolution. When refused permission to depart because "Russia needs your music," he said, "If you do not give permission, I will retire from music and never play or conduct another note in Russia again, and the result will be the same." Dr. Koussevitzky was allowed to leave but he lost his fortune. He succeeded Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony in 1924.

SCHOOL & SOCIETY
Sept 19/36 LANCASTER, PA.

14

the present week. The [illegible] ceremonies opened on Wednesday afternoon with an official reception in Sanders Theater of five hundred and fifty-one accredited delegates from universities and learned societies. Thursday, the second of the tercentenary days, opened with a service of thanksgiving and remembrance in Memorial Church at 9:30 A.M.

Members of the governing boards, faculties, delegates and distinguished guests proceeded to seats on the stage of the Tercentenary Theater. President Conant made an address and the contents of the package sealed by President Josiah Quincy at the close of the celebration in 1836 was made known. There followed the reading of a ceremonial ode to Harvard, the unveiling of a bust of the late Le Baron Russell Briggs, and formal presentation of gifts to the university by the Harvard Alumni of China and the Harvard Club of Japan. The guest speaker was Dr. Thomas Shirley Hele, master of Emanuel College, Cambridge University, from which John Harvard was graduated.

The meeting was the first to be held in the Tercentenary Theater set up for this occasion between the Widener Library and the Memorial Church to seat about 15,000 people.

Dr. Bronislaw Malinowski, professor of anthropology at the University of London, was the orator and Robert S. Hillyer the poet on Thursday evening at a meeting of the Harvard chapter of Phi Beta Kappa. Hermann Hagedorn also read an ode to Harvard during the day's ceremonies.

On the final day, Friday, there were two events: the tercentenary exercises themselves in the morning and the tercentenary meeting of the Harvard Alumni Association in the afternoon.

The morning exercises included an address of welcome by Professor Edward Kennard Rand, Latin orator; a formal recital of the acts constituting the founding of Harvard College by the tercentenary historian, Professor Samuel Eliot Morison; an address from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts by Governor James M. Curley; the tercentenary oration by President James B. Conant, and the conferring of honorary degrees upon sixty-two distinguished scholars from many different countries who participated in the Tercentenary Conference of Arts and Sciences. In the afternoon President Roosevelt spoke before the Alumni Association of the university.

Concerts were given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky on Wednesday and Thursday and Friday. The 1936 Harvard football team went through an exhibition drill on Thursday and in the evening the banks of the Charles River were floodlighted for a water pageant.

Sept. 19/36 HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR

SUBCHAIRMEN OF THE B'KSHIRE SYMPHONIC FESTIVAL IN MEETING

An informal meeting of the subchairmen of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., was held yesterday afternoon at the charming home of Mrs. Charles C. Griswold in Stockbridge, Mass., one of the trustees of the organization.

The meeting was presided over by Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith of Stockbridge and New York city, president of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., subchairmen being present from Lee, Pittsfield, Stockbridge, Lenox, Mass., Hillsdale, Hudson and Chatham. Mrs. Alexander Bloch represented the Hillsdale section, Miss Ann Terrell, Chatham and surrounding territory, and Mrs. O. H Bradley and Gerald S. Bliss this section of Columbia county. Miss Robinson Smith spoke of the overwhelming success of this year's festival with its concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, and stated that Dr. Koussetvitsky would be in Stockbridge within a few days when plans for next year's Festival would be discussed. Already many boxes have been taken for next year's concerts, and an appreciable sum of money from subscriptions is already on deposit.

Folowing the business meeting tea was served and a social hour enjoyed.

Sept. 15/36 NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

GABRILOWITSCH, 58, DEAD IN DETROIT

Famous Pianist Had Raised Symphony He Directed to Leading Rank in Nation.

MARK TWAIN'S SON-IN-LAW

Married Clara Clemens in 1909 —Had Headed Orchestra in Michigan for 18 Years.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

DETROIT, Sept. 14.—Ossip Gabrilowitsch, director of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra and rated among the half dozen greatest pianists of this generation, died at his home here. He was 58 years old.

With him were his wife, the former Clara Clemens, daughter of Mark Twain, and their daughter, Nina.

A public funeral at Orchestra Hall will be held here Wednesday, at which his orchestra will play. Then the pianist's body will be sent to Elmira, N. Y., to be buried in the Clemens family plot, near the body of the great humorist.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch became ill in March, 1935, and had not been able to conduct the orchestra since that time. In the interval he had undergone a series of operations in Henry Ford Hospital.

Came to America in 1900.

Both as a pianist and musical director—he disliked intensely the term conductor – Ossip Gabrilowitsch was a consummate artist. A Russian by birth, he came to the United States in 1900, made an instantaneous success and became an American citizen in 1921. Before he came across the Atlantic he had made a profound reputation in the great musical centers of Europe, chiefly, however, as a concert pianist.

It was not until 1917 that Mr. Gabrilowitsch began to conduct great symphony orchestras, and the following year he was appointed conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra. How he built a small nucleus of musicians into one of the most important orchestras on this continent is a matter of recent record.

On the occasion of his twenty-fifth anniversary of American concerts he directed an orchestra in Carnegie Hall in Chopin and Schumann works, and a reviewer wrote:

"Mr. Gabrilowitsch has maintained inviolate his selfless devotion to his art, his sanity, his rare perceptions of beauty. There have been few who could command the attention and enthusiasm of the public by such genuine and simple means."

He was sure in his art, but seldom manifested temperament as did some of his contemporaries. On one occasion, however, he balked and resigned from the advisory board of the Schubert Centennial Committee because that body was offering a prize for the "completion" of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony.

"This, to me," he wrote to the committee, "seems like adding a pair of arms to the Venus of Milo. Such an undertaking is undignifed and inartistic. Moreover, it is entirely superfluous. I regret I cannot be associated with a musical escapade of this sort."

The project was abandoned shortly afterward.

Began Piano Study at 10.

Ossip Salomonovitch Gabrilowitsch was born at St. Petersburg on Feb. 7, 1878. When he was 10 years old, having a decided talent for the piano, he entered the Conservatory of Music there and was a pupil of Tolstoff, Liadoff and Glazunoff. When he was 16 he was graduated and won the coveted Rubinstein Prize.

Although it was generally considered that he was ripe for the concert stage, Mr. Gabrilowitsch himself seized eagerly the opportunity to study further under Leschetizky in Vienna. He studied theory and composition at the same time with Navratil.

Many years later Leschetizky was instrumental in introducing Gabrilowitsch to his future wife, Clara Clemens, the daughter of Samuel L. Clemens—Mark Twain. She was a pupil of the great teacher at the time, and was later to become a singer, actress and author of note. They were married in 1909.

Gabrilowitsch made his concert début in Berlin in 1896, with marked success. He appeared in many other cities, and came to New York in 1900 on his first visit. He had played in Germany, Austria, Russia, France and England, and for some years he lived in Munich.

Although his compositions were few, he wrote some songs, piano pieces and an elegy for 'cello and piano. He was acknowledged to be a fine interpreter of Chopin.

OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH

During the many years that Mr. Gabrilowitsch lived in the United States he endeared himself to the music-loving public, not only because of his mature art but perhaps also because of his unaffected and charming ways. During his earlier years in this country, he toured most of the principal cities here and in Canada.

Often a "Guest" Conductor.

He was a frequent guest conductor in New York, Philadelphia, Boston and elsewhere. In 1929 he created something of a furor in Berlin when he conducted Richard Strauss's "Don Juan."

When Arturo Toscanini refused to conduct "Giovinezza," the Fascist hymn, in Milan in 1931, Mr. Gabrilowitsch was one of his most ardent supporters, and he canceled an engagement at La Scala in protest.

Although he was a celebrated conductor, Mr. Gabrilowitsch was never really so happy as when he played the piano.

"There is a satisfaction in the piano to me," he said, "that the orchestra can never have, for all its magnificence. The intimacy, the immediate response. Then, too, I can change an interpretation at will, on the spur of the moment, without consulting anybody, without first having a rehearsal and saying to this man, 'Play it so this time' and to the other, 'Do it this way.' The piano responds instantly to your will; what you do is all yours."

TRIBUTES BY MUSICIANS

They and Music Lovers Join in Mourning Gabrilowitsch.

Musicians and music-lovers joined yesterday in paying tribute to Ossip Gabrilowitsch. Among the messages, including those from Serge Koussevitzky in Boston and Albert Spalding in Great Barrington, Mass., were:

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor of the Boston Symphony—America has lost a great artist. Gabrilowitsch was the truest exponent of the finest style of romantic and classic music. Personally I am deeply grieved at the loss of my old friend.

ALBERT SPALDING, violinist—I am deeply shocked and grieved by the great loss that the musical world has sustained in the death of Ossip Gabrilowitsch. He is an irreplaceable figure. No words of mine are needed as comment on him as an artist, for the memory of his playing lies enshrined in the heart of every music lover in our land. In addition to this he was a man of much wide culture and such a great heart that quite aside from his musical gifts he exerted a very wide influence. I have been a warm personal friend of his for many years and find it difficult to express my sorrow over his passing.

JOHN ERSKINE, President of the Juilliard School — He was a princely man and a noble artist. His friendship was one of the precious things in my life. Music in our country and everywhere has suffered a terrible loss.

ERNEST HUTCHESON of the Juilliard School—Ossip Gabrilowitsch ennobled his profession by a singular purity of idealism and a rare nobility and generosity of soul. His life was characterized by an unswerving devotion to music and a warm and compelling sympathy in all his human relationships and contacts. The world is poorer for the loss of a personality so radiant in beauty and strength. I grieve deeply at the passing of a dear friend and an outstanding musician.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
NEWS Sept. 16/36

O EAS

Tercentenary Concert Will Feature Choruses From Pair of Colleges

Gladys George, Arline Judge and Isabel Jewell to Be Heard in Preview of 'Valiant Is the Word for Carrie' During 'Hollywood Hotel' Tonight

A chorus of students from Harvard University and Radcliffe College will be heard with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's direction during the third of three Harvard Tercentenary concerts from Symphony Hall, Boston, over a coast-to-coast network tonight. The first part of the program will consist of three portions of Bach's B Minor Mass, the Et Incarnatus, Crucifixus and Cum Sancto Spiritu. Following this Dr. James B. Conant, president of Harvard University, will make a brief address. The combined student choruses will conclude the program with a singing of "Fair Harvard." (KGO: 6 p. m.).

THIS CLIPPING FROM
UTICA, N. Y.
DISPATCH

BLIND BUYING OF ORCHESTRA TICKETS ENDS

New York—(AP)—Symphony concerts are no longer being brought by the "pig in the poke" method. At least not in the East.

It used to be that subscribers to the hundreds of orchestral seasons throughout the country were expected to approach the box office, money in hand, sometime in the summer. They paid their money, received their tickets, and went home hoping that Conductor X would prepare decent programs for a change.

Now many of the major orchestras are not only listing their conductors, but telling in advance the soloists to be expected, the special events planned, and as definitely as possible the music to be played.

Partly, it is explained by orchestra managers, this is being done in an effort to attract patronage. Partly it is done in a spirit of fairness. And partly it is done because more and more the emphasis is being laid on the music itself rather than upon the primo donna who does the conducting.

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society led off with an announcement which listed in fair detail the music to be expected from its three guest conductors, and sketching in a general outline for John Barbirolli and Arthur Rodzinski, the two "regular" conductors.

The Philadelphia Orchestra said little about the actual music to be programmed, but it did list in detail the soloists to be heard, a most impressive list indeed. Later some of the music was announced.

But the Boston Symphony has gone farther than any up to date. Up in Boston Serge Koussevitzky has chosen and announced nearly all the major numbers to be played, and in the case of the soloists has even published what work each will be heard in.

This extends even to the standard repertoire. And as usual, Doctor Koussevitzky has dug up a few new things. One is a violin concerto by Roger Sessions, which Albert Spalding will play for the first time! another is a symphony by one Shaporin.

Sept. 16/36 SUN Hanover, Pa.

Dial TWISTS

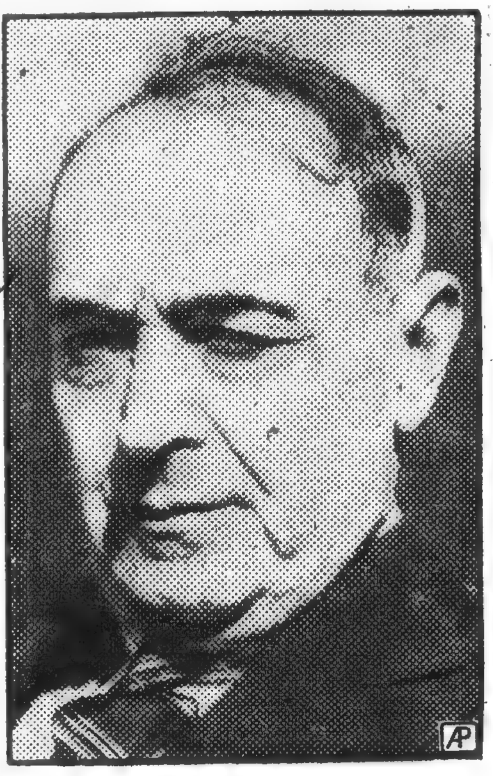
Broadcasts From Harvard

The Harvard Tercentenary Celebration at Cambridge, Mass., is the occasion of several interesting broadcasts this week. Exercises welcoming visitors were broadcast this afternoon. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the first tercentenary concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra this evening from 8 to 9 o'clock in a WJZ broadcast from Symphony Hall, Boston. The program will include Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80, Brahms; Two Movements from Sinfonietta for String Orchestra, Op. 40, Hill, and Daphnis et Chloe, Second Suite; Lever du Aour, Pantomime and Danse General, By Ravel.

Six Harvard broadcasts are listed for the NBC networks tomorrow. From 8.30 to 9.15 a. m., over WJZ, the service of thanksgiving and remembrance at Memorial Church will be heard. A meeting of the Associated Harvard Clubs in Sanders Theater will be broadcast over WEAF at 11.30 a. m. The remaining four programs will be heard over WJZ. From 1.30 to 2.30 p. m., a luncheon given by the faculty of the university in honor of the delegates will be the occasion for a broadcast. The second tercentenary concert of the Boston Symphony, with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, will be broadcast from 3 to 4 p. m., consisting of Suite No. 2 in B minor, for flute and strings, Bach; Symphony in G major, No. 88, Haydn, and Symphony in E flat, Mozart. Tencentenary orations by the Harvard chapter of Phi Beta Kappa are scheduled for 6.45 p. m. tomorrow, and a torchlight procession of undergraduates from the Charles River to Memorial Hall will be described from 8.30 to 9 p. m. Additional broadcasts will take place Friday.

Sept. 18/36 HOLLYWOOD, CAL.
CITIZEN-NEWS

Noted Conductor



DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, director of the Boston Symphony to be heard at 6.30 p. m. over KECA, left Russia, his birthplace, after the Revolution. When refused permission to depart because "Russia needs your music," he said, "If you do not give permission, I will retire from music and never play or conduct another note in Russia again, and the result will be the same." Dr. Koussevitsky was allowed to leave but he lost his fortune. He succeeded Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony in 1924.

SCHOOL & SOCIETY
Sept. 19/36 LANCASTER, PA.

THE HARVARD TERCENTENARY CELEBRATION

THE final exercises of the Harvard Tercentenary celebration have been in progress during the present week. The formal ceremonies opened on Wednesday afternoon with an official reception in Sanders Theater of five hundred and fifty-one accredited delegates from universities and learned societies. Thursday, the second of the tercentenary days, opened with a service of thanksgiving and remembrance in Memorial Church at 9: 30 A.M.

Members of the governing boards, faculties, delegates and distinguished guests proceeded to seats on the stage of the Tercentenary Theater. President Conant made an address and the contents of the package sealed by President Josiah Quincy at the close of the celebration in 1836 was made known. There followed the reading of a ceremonial ode to Harvard, the unveiling of a bust of the late Le Baron Russell Briggs, and formal presentation of gifts to the university by the Harvard Alumni of China and the Harvard Club of Japan. The guest speaker was Dr. Thomas Shirley Hele, master of Emanuel College, Cambridge University, from which John Harvard was graduated.

The meeting was the first to be held in the Tercentenary Theater set up for this occasion between the Widener Library and the Memorial Church to seat about 15,000 people.

Dr. Bronislaw Malinowski, professor of anthropology at the University of London, was the orator and Robert S. Hillyer the poet on Thursday evening at a meeting of the Harvard chapter of Phi Beta Kappa. Hermann Hagedorn also read an ode to Harvard during the day's ceremonies.

On the final day, Friday, there were two events: the tercentenary exercises themselves in the morning and the tercentenary meeting of the Harvard Alumni Association in the afternoon.

The morning exercises included an address of welcome by Professor Edward Kennard Rand, Latin orator; a formal recital of the acts constituting the founding of Harvard College by the tercentenary historian, Professor Samuel Eliot Morison; an address from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts by Governor James M. Curley; the tercentenary oration by President James B. Conant, and the conferring of honorary degrees upon sixty-two distinguished scholars from many different countries who participated in the Tercentenary Conference of Arts and Sciences. In the afternoon President Roosevelt spoke before the Alumni Association of the university.

Concerts were given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky on Wednesday and Thursday and Friday. The 1936 Harvard football team went through an exhibition drill on Thursday and in the evening the banks of the Charles River were floodlighted for a water pageant.

Sept. 19/36 HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR

SUBCHAIRMEN OF THE B'KSHIRE SYMPHONIC FESTIVAL IN MEETING

An informal meeting of the subchairmen of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., was held yesterday afternoon at the charming home of Mrs. Charles C. Griswold in Stockbridge, Mass., one of the trustees of the organization.

The meeting was presided over by Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith of Stockbridge and New York city, president of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., subchairmen being present from Lee, Pittsfield, Stockbridge, Lenox, Mass., Hillsdale, Hudson and Chatham. Mrs. Alexander Bloch represented the Hillsdale section, Miss Ann Terrell, Chatham and surrounding territory, and Mrs. O. H. Bradley and Gerald S. Bliss this section of Columbia county. Miss Robinson Smith spoke of the overwhelming success of this year's festival with its concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, and stated that Dr. Koussevitsky would be in Stockbridge within a few days when plans for next year's Festival would be discussed. Already many boxes have been taken for next year's concerts, and an appreciable sum of money from subscriptions is already on deposit.

Folowing the business meeting tea was served and a social hour enjoyed.

15 WORCESTER, MASS Sept 18 36
TELEGRAM

Quotes 1836 Speaker

"Harvard men," the president said, "might well look backwards not only at Harvard's history but at three centuries of human activity—three centuries of sustained scholarly effort. If we can learn anything from such history it is surely that, in the past, patience and courage have won victories for the life of the spirit. Can we believe that in the future it will be otherwise?"

Although the president's report upon the contents of a package sealed for the tercentenary after the bi-centennial in 1833 revealed comparatively few letters of interest, the raising of the flag preserved from the century-dead festivities afforded an impressive spectacle. Quoting the words of the last speaker of the 1836 alumni meeting, who said of the flag "Our hope is that a century hence it will collect under its folds the alumni of Harvard. Over what a scene will it on that day display its blazonry! What a feeling of relationship will it establish between that age and the present!" Dr. Conant concluded:

"Gentlemen — The hope of one hundreds years ago has been fulfilled.

The ancient banner, created decades before Harvard adopted the crimson as its colege color, showed on its age-yellowed folds a Harvard seal in blue and gold.

Gifts to University

After three present students spoke on modern conditions of under-graduate life, Dr. Stephen Duggan, director of the Institute for International Education, addressed the gathering upon the development of British educational methods at Emmanuel College since the days when John Harvard was a student there.

Generous applause greeted Fred C. Sze of the Harvard Club of China, who presented the university with a marble Chinese dragon, 20 feet high; and Dr. Masaharu Anesaki, of the Harvard Club of Japan, who presented a ceremonial lantern.

President Conant was visibly moved as he accepted a bust of the late Dean Le Baron Russell Briggs, best loved Harvard teacher of the past century. The presentation was made by Professor Joseph H. Beale of the Harvard Law School.

Dr. Duggan offered a tribute to Harvard from non-Harvard men, accompanied by a check for five thousand dollars contributed by friends outside of the alumni body.

Concert Broadcast

Aerial bombs, detonating at periods of one minute, tonight marked the progress of ceremonial barges up the Charles River to the Anderson bridge near the boat houses and the stadium.

Lights gleamed along the shores and the towers of modern Harvard houses on the Cambridge side shone in the glare of floodlights.

Student marshals bore a plaster statue of John Harvard at the head of the torchlight of students which moved its flickering way toward the yard from the river. A pop concert and dance for students ended the festivities. During the late afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra played ~~in Sanders~~ Theater the second of a series of three Tercentenary concerts. This, with the chief Tercentenary exercises, was broadcast for the benefit of distant alumni.

Sept. 25/36 LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS AN EXTENSIVE SEASON'S ITINERARY

The Boston Symphony orchestra will begin its 56th season in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 9 and 10, the 13th season under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

The season will consist as usual of 24 pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, together with the two shorter series of six on Monday evenings, and on Tuesday afternoons; likewise eight in Sanders theatre, Cambridge.

The usual New York series will be given of five evening concerts and five Saturday afternoons in Carnegie hall, and five in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn. There will be five concerts in the Metropolitan theatre, Providence.

The orchestra will also visit the following cities: Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, Springfield, Worcester, Hartford.

In addition to the concerts to be given in Cambridge, under the auspices of Harvard university, the orchestra will play at Hanover, N. H., (Dartmouth college); New Haven (Yale); Northampton (Smith), and New Brunswick (Rutgers university.)

DRAMATIC PAGE

L THI

Post Sept 20/36

News of the World of Music

Symphony Musicians in New Book

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

IF certain members of the Macedonian phalanx had been in the habit of dropping their spears, Alexander would not have had to worry about new worlds to conquer. If each and every member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were not an artist in his own right, master of his instrument, a responsible and responsive musician, that orchestra would not excite to the degree that it does, American navy and European admiration. Yet outside the leaders of the various choirs, who from time to time rate mention in the reviews, the individual men in the orchestra do not figure very conspicuously in the minds of the audiences, who are inclined to look upon the orchestra as a unit rather than as an assemblage of units.

Perhaps it is because we know them, but some of us are inclined to think that the players in the Symphony Orchestra amount to a little more as men and as individuals than do the rank and file of those who constitute the other great American bands. Now, thanks to Gerome Brush, so appropriately named, a gifted artist who wields the pen hardly less expressively than he does brush or crayon, each of the 109 men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is limned for us in portrait, biographical sketch and word-picture in the volume lately issued by Symphony Hall. The title of this volume is simply "Boston Symphony Orchestra; Charcoal Drawings of Its Members With Biographical Sketches"; its price is the modest amount of $1.50; and it is inconceivable that any subscriber to any one of the four series of Symphony concerts will be willing to do without it.

It is but natural that the likenesses of these men should vary in fidelity. For the most part, the identity of each portrait would be quickly discerned even if each man were not depicted playing his own particular instrument—which in each case he is. Due to Mr. Brush's tact and resourcefulness as interviewer we learn from his book many interesting facts about these men. We learn what are their hobbies, their intellectual interests apart from their regular jobs. We learn that Heinrich Lorbeer of the horn octet is not only the oldest member of the orchestra, having served it for 45 years, but that at the age of 71 he is physically one of the strongest. We learn that these men have come to us from virtually every important country in Europe, and that a gratifying number of them were born in what Mr. Menchen has been pleased to call These States. . . . And, of course, there is a portrait of Dr. Koussevitzky to head a list which begins with five A's and ends with no less than four Z's.

* * * *

At the time of this writing an announcement, unofficial, has been received to the effect that, owing to technical obstacles, Paul Allen's opera, "Mam'selle Figaro," will not be heard from the WPA forces at the Opera House Tuesday evening, but that there will be a performance of the work later this season. For the moment d'Albert's "Die toten Augen," of which the present official translation is "Sightless," will stand unpartnered. A 20-minute-long prologue, which was to have been dropped, is now to be restored, presumably making nearly a full evening's entertainment although the opera itself runs in a single act. By consulting Irving Kolodin's "The Metropolitan Opera," reviewed in these columns not long ago, one learns that "Die toten Augen" was heard twice early in January, 1924, from the touring German Opera Company then playing in New York. Mr. Kolodin writes: d'Albert's well-contrived score was cordially received, but after a repetition on January 7, the enterprise was declared bankrupt and neither the opera nor the company was heard from again."

* * * *

Other operas of this week at the Boston Opera House will be "The Flying Dutchman" tomorrow evening, "Madame Butterly" Wednesday evening and Thursday afternoon, and "The Flying Dutchman" on Thursday evening.

* * * *

Other WPA activities of the week include concerts by the State Symphony Orchestra under Alexander Thiede at the Museum of Fine Arts this afternoon and at the Dorchester Manor, 800 Morton street, on Wednesday evening.

* * * *

From Symphony Hall comes word that the recital season will be inaugurated there on Sunday, Oct. 18 by Fritz Kreisler, and that Roland Hayes will sing there a week later.

Her. Sept. 20/36

Symphony Plans for Wide Itinerary; Further Plans

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 56th season in Symphony Hall, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 9 and 10, the 13th season under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The season will consist as usual of 24 pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, together with the two shorter series of six on Monday evenings, and on Tuesday afternoons; likewise eight in Sanders Theater, Cambridge. The usual New York series will be given of five evening concerts and five Saturday afternoons in Carnegie Hall, and five in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn. There will also be five concerts in the Metropolitan Theatre, Providence. The orchestra will also visit the following cities: Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, Springfield, Worcester, Hartford. In addition to the concerts to be given in Cambridge, under the auspices of Harvard University, the orchestra will play at Hanover, New Hampshire (Dartmouth College); New Haven (Yale); Northampton (Smith); New Brunswick (Rutgers University).

For the Friday and Saturday series, Dr. Koussevitzky plans an engrossing list of works, of which a few are announced at this time. Symphonies of Beethoven and Brahms will take an important place in the list, and more by Mozart will be heard. Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, and Mahler's Fifth; also the "Song of the Earth" by the same composer, and Liszt's "Faust" Symphony are specified. Soloists will include Jascha Heifetz, Myra Hess, Gregor Piatigorsky, Howard Goding, Ruth Posselt, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Albert Spalding, Serge Prokofieff, Paul Althouse, Olga Averino and Maria Ranzow.

New works will include a Soviet Symphony by Shaporin; a violin concerto by Roger Sessions; the Piano Rhapsody of Rachmaninoff, which the composer is to play. Prokofieff will appear with the orchestra in his own Third Piano Concerto. Dimitri Mitropoulos will be guest conductor for two weeks.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Sept. 22/36 EAGLE

OUSSEVITZKY DISCUSSES PLANS

Confers With Committee From Berkshire Symphonic Festival

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor and George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were in Stockbridge yesterday to discuss plans next year with a special committee from the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. While in the Berkshires they were the guests of Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of the Festival.

At the conference were Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Judd, Miss Robinson Smith, John C. Lynch, treasurer and George W. Edman clerk of the Festival.

The annual meeting of the Festival trustees is scheduled Oct. 13 and the annual meeting of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is scheduled for tomorrow. Before plans can be settled proved by the two boards. Dr. definitely, they will have to be ap- Koussevitzky expressed himself as delighted with the response to the concerts given this year.

Harvard Tercentenary Concerts

Sept 22

By L. A. Sloper

MUSIC played an important part in the Harvard University Tercentenary Celebration. An organ recital by Prof. Archibald T. Davison and guest organists (Sept. 13) opened the Tercentenary Week. Three concerts of chamber music written by graduates of the university were given in Sanders Theater in Memorial Hall, Cambridge, Mass. Finally, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (LL.D., '29), presented three concerts, two in Symphony Hall, Boston, and one in Sanders Theater. The final concert of this series (Sept. 18), in which the orchestra was assisted by a large chorus made up of present and former members of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, was the concluding event of the celebration.

It was a tribute to the musical achievement of the university that three impressive programs could be arranged of chamber music written by Harvard graduates now living. The composers represented were Arthur Foote, Daniel Gregory Mason, Edward Burlingame Hill, Frederick S. Converse and John Alden Carpenter of the older generation, and William C. Heilman, Randall Thompson, Edward Ballantine and Walter Piston of the younger group. These three concerts were the gift of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, munificent patroness of chamber music. The performers were the Boston String Quartet and J. M. Sanromá, pianist.

* * *

The participation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the celebration was felicitous in all respects. The results were in marked contrast to those of that other extracurricular adventure in Stockbridge, Mass., in August. On this later occasion virtually the full personnel of the orchestra, instead of only three-quarters of it, had been reassembled. Moreover, the concerts were given indoors—after all, symphonic music was written to be played within walls. None of the values, therefore, was missed, as many of them were missed at Stockbridge; although the sounds of motor vehicles, coming through the open windows of Sanders Theater, mingled oddly with the notes written by Bach, Haydn and Mozart. Conductor and orchestra were on their mettle for all these concerts, and inasmuch as the personnel has been for some years now almost unchanged, they played in mid-season form. The distinguished guests of the university for whom these concerts were given must surely have been profoundly impressed by the artistry of the Boston orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky opened the first of the concerts (Sept. 16) with the Brahms "Academic Festival" Overture. He then paid tribute to the Harvard music department by playing two movements of Professor Hill's Sinfonietta for strings. The other items were Ravel's Second Suite from "Daphnis et Chloé" and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, both magnificently performed.

* * *

The concert in Sanders Theater the following afternoon was in memory of Henry Lee Higginson, founder and for many years sole sustainer of the orchestra. Major Higginson was a lover of the classics, and the program was appropriately made up of Bach's Suite in B minor for flute and strings, and the symphonies by Hadyn in G major (B. & H. No. 13) and by Mozart in E flat (K. 543). Georges Laurent earned and was accorded an ovation for his flute playing.

The final concert was quite in the Koussevitzkyan festival tradition. It opened with the Harvard Hymn written by John Knowles Paine, first professor of music at Harvard, sung by the huge chorus under the direction of Professor Davison, its former conductor, with G. Wallace Woodworth, its present conductor, at the organ. Dr. Koussevitzky directed the Vivaldi-Siloti Concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ, the Brahms Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and choruses from the St. Matthew Passion and the B minor Mass of Bach and the German Requiem of Brahms. In all these, the orchestra and chorus performed superbly. For conclusion there was "Fair Harvard" in Dr. Koussevitzky's new arrangement for chorus and orchestra, spiced with new harmonies and contrapuntal play, and brought to a rousing climax. It was a crashing finale to the celebration, and was received in kind by the audience.

HARTFORD, CONN.
Sept 28/36 TIMES

BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL PLANNED ON LARGER SCALE

Boston Symphony Series of Six Concerts in View for 1937

Special to The Hartford Times

Stockbridge, Mass.—Development of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, so successful in 1936, into a festival that will make the Bershire as outstanding as the festival centers of Europe, is now being considered by the organization and a group of business men in the county.

Several representative business men of Berkshire met yesterday afternoon with Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, at her home in Stockbridge, to discuss the reactions to the 1936 Festival. If there is sufficient sentiment in favor of the Festival, it will be continued.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and George E. Judd, manager, were in the Berkshires earlier in the week and it was because of this visit that the conference was called yesterday.

Boston Symphony Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Dr. Koussevitzky will come to Berkshire next year for six concerts instead of three as given this year as the beginning of the plan.

Six concerts constitute the first condition of their returning. The second condition is that, a shed be built to replace the tent. To meet these conditions, it is the consensus of the Festival executive committee, which coincides with that of Dr. Koussevitzky, that a permanent home must be found, and a long range plan adopted to achieve the aim of making Berkshire as outstanding in America as the great festival centers of Europe.

Urges Early Response

In a statement today Miss Smith urged that persons who intend to become patrons and members of the 1937 Festival do so at once.

She said: "In view of the possibilities of the future, obviously the decision of the Board of Trustees will depend largely on the response of members and patrons.

"We must give an answer to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra not later than Nov. 1.

"We are not asking members and patrons to commit themselves for six concerts—only three. Inquiries and memberships may be addressed to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Stockbridge, Mass."

SYMPHONY HALL—56th SEASON 1936-37
24 Friday Afts.—24 Saturday Eves. Opening Oct. 9-10

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Soloists who will appear during season are

RACHMANINOFF
PIATIGORSKY
HEIFETZ
AVERINO
SPALDING
GODING
RANZOW
HESS
PROKOFIEFF
POSSELT
ALTHOUSE
MITROPOULOS

SEASON TICKETS ON SALE AT BOX OFFICE. COM. 1492

SUN. AFT. OCT. 18 at 3:30

KREISLER

Mail Orders filled promptly—Checks to Symphony Hall

Sept. 20/36

16

From: Tel. BOgardus 4-1729

ARGUS PRESSCLIPPING BUREAU
OTTO SPENGLER, DIRECTOR
352 THIRD AVE., NEW YORK

TERMS: Payable in advance
$40—for 1000 clippings $12—for 250 clippings
$22—for 500 clippings $6—for 100 clippings
No time limit
WE FILE NEW YORK DAILIES FOR 12 MONTHS
ASK US ABOUT "THE BOOKSHELF SCRAP BOOKS."
Sizes: 6 x 9¼, 9 x 12, 11 x 14 and 18½ x 23½.

SEP 29 1936

GREATER FESTIVAL IN BERKSHIRES SEEN

Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Urge Expansion of Summer Program.

WOULD DOUBLE CONCERTS

Orchestra Also Asks Permanent Quarters for Performances Instead of a Tent.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, have proposed that the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, at which they took part for the first time last month, be extended next Summer, it was announced yesterday. They have made two conditions for their return as participants in the festival—that there be six concerts instead of three and that a shed be built to replace the tent under which the programs were presented.

Mr. Koussevitzky and George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, met with representative business men of the Berkshire area at the home of Miss Gertrude Robinson-Smith, chairman of the festival committee, in Stockbridge, Mass., several days ago. Two major questions were discussed: whether the time was ripe for further development of the festival idea and whether there is sufficient interest among business men to support a plan covering several years.

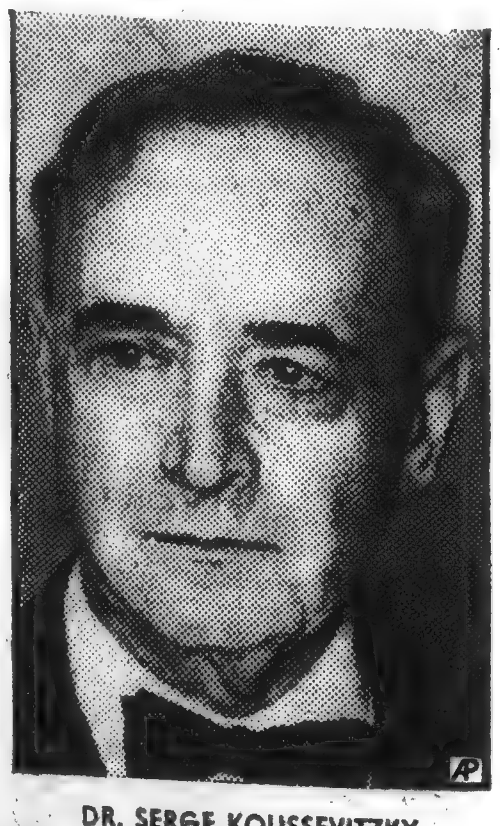
The festival executive committee agreed with Mr. Koussevitzky that the festival must find a permanent home and that a long range plan must be adopted to achieve the aim of making these programs as outtanding as the great European music festivals.

"In view of the possibilities of the future," Miss Robinson-Smith said in a statement issued yesterday, "obviously the decision of the board of trustee will depend largely on the response of members and patrons. We must give an answer to Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra not later than Nov. 1. With the bigger plan in mind, naturally memberships and patrons become our only capital. We cannot, therefore, give an affirmative answer unless we have a substantial response."

Miss Robinson-Smith pointed out that sustaining members and patrons will be able to buy tickets for series of three concerts at the same price that prevailed last month and that tickets for additional concerts will be available at similar rates.

MONTPELIER, VT.
ARGUS

NOTED MUSICIAN



DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

This is a new photograph of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, famed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

SEP 28 1936

The Lively Arts

BY T. H. PARKER.

An exceedingly attractive folder from the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that prospects for the fifty-sixth year, as outlined by Dr. Koussevitzky, are more particularized than they have been previously in advance of the season's beginning. There will be 24 Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, together with the two shorter series. From the works of Beethoven, the Second, Fourth and Fifth Symphonies will be played, and the Violin Concerto, with Jascha Heifetz as soloist. Of Brahms, the Third and Fourth Symphonies are announced, and "more than usual from the fine treasury of Mozart." There will also be Symphonies by Haydn, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Tschaikovsky, Sibelius and others.

Symphonies of outstanding importance will be reviewed from the near or distant past: Liszt's "Faust" Symphony; Mahler's Fifth Symphony, and the same composer's "Song of the Earth," with Maria Ranzow and Paul Althouse, as contralto and tenor; also Bruckner's Eighth Symphony.

The Piano Concerto of Schumann, Myra Hess appearing with the Orchestra, will be but one of the works of this master. MacDowell's Second Piano Concerto will be played on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the composer's birth, with Howard Goding, the American pianist as soloist. Debussy's music to d'Annunzio's "Saint Sebastian," will be performed, with Olga Avering as soprano soloist.

There will be two works of Dvorak which have not been heard at these concerts for a number of years; the Violoncello Concerto with Piatigorsky, who holds a particular reputation in other cities for his interpretation of this score; also the Violin Concerto with Ruth Posselt as soloist.

Newer scores will include the Rhapsody for Piano and Orchestra by Sergei Rachmaninoff, the composer taking the piano part, and Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto, again with the composer as soloist.

There will also be a recently completed Violin Concerto by Roger Sessions, which Albert Spalding is studying for its first performance by the Orchestra. The remarkable symphony by Shaporin will have its first American hearing.

Tone poems, suites, overtures and music in other forms will have of course their important place in the season's repertory. Bach's Passion According to St. Matthew will again be performed at an additional concert on Good Friday.

Dimitri Mitropoudos, the Athenian conductor who made a striking impression when he came from Europe last season to lead this Orchestra, will return for a two weeks' stay as guest conductor in mid-season.

THE guests of Harvard at the Tercentenary celebration will long remember the three concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as part of the festivities.

The Boston Symphony season proper, the 56th of the famous orchestra, will open in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Friday afternoon, October 9, and Saturday evening, October 10. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will as usual give series of concerts in Cambridge, New York, Brooklyn, and Providence. Visits will be made to: Springfield, Hartford, New Haven, Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Pittsburgh, Hanover, Northampton, New Brunswick, Philadelphia, and Worcester.

A list of dates, works and soloists for the four Boston series, or information about the concerts in other cities, will be furnished on request. Address G. E. Judd, Manager, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN
TIMES

ORCHESTRAS LIST WORKS OF SEASON

Symphony Goes No Longer to Buy 'Pig in a Poke.'

Advance Notice of Music to Be Played Called Fair and Good Business.

NEW YORK, Sept. 19 (AP).—Symphony concerts are no longer being bought by the "pig in the poke" method. At least not in the east.

It used to be that subscribers to the hundreds of orchestral seasons throughout the country were expected to approach the box office, money in hand, some time in the summer. They paid their money, received their tickets, and went home hoping that Conductor X would prepare decent programs for a change.

Now many of the major orchestras art not only listing their conductors, but telling in advance the soloists to be expected, the special events planned and as definitely as possible the music to be played.

Partly, it is explained by orchestra managers, this is being done in an effort to attract patronage. Partly it is done in a spirit of fairness. And partly it is done because more and more the emphasis is being laid on the music itself rather than upon the prima donna who does the conducting.

Continued

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony society led off with an announcement which listed in fair detail the music to be expected from its three guest conductors, and sketching in a general outline for John Barbirolli and Arthur Rodzinski, the two "regular" conductors.

The Philadelphia orchestra said little about the actual music to be programmed, but it did list in detail the soloists to be heard, a most impressive list indeed. Later some of the music was announced.

But the Boston Symphony has gone farther than any up to date. Up in Boston Serge Koussevitzky has chosen and announced nearly all the major number to be played, and in the case of the soloists has even published what work each will be heard in.

This extends even to the standard repertoire. And as usual, Dr. Koussevitzky has dug up a few new things. One is a violin concerto by Roger Sessions, which Albert Spalding will play for the first time; another is a symphony by one Shaporin.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD TELEGRAM

SEP 10 1936

Boston Symphony Planning Concerts

Three concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, are announced for September 16, 17 and 18—the first and third in Symphony Hall, Boston, and the second in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, as a part of the Harvard University Tercentenary celebration. In the last concert the orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor.

Music and Musicians

Plans for an Extended Berkshire Symphonic Festival Next Summer; Other Items of Interest

Sept 28

By Moses Smith

The sponsors of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival are committed to expanding the size of the festival rather sooner than had been expected. It is learned that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and George E. Judd, conductor and manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were in the Berkshires last week to discuss the prospects for next summer's festival. The Boston Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky will return there evidently only if the number of concerts is increased from three to six and if a more substantial shed be built to replace the tent that housed the huge audiences last summer. The Berkshire Committee has agreed to both conditions as authoritatively as it can, and is now engaged in enlisting support for the enlarged venture. For the time being, subscribers are sought only on the basis of three concerts, with the provision that they will be permitted to buy tickets for the additional concerts at the same price. The option with the Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky will expire on Nov. 1.

Roland Hayes has assembled an unusually attractive program for his recital in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 25, for the benefit of the committee for the Home Care of Children with Heart Disease. Of especial interest is the fact that he will embark on a Wagnerian voyage, singing two excerpts from "Die Meistersinger," —"Walthar Before the Master Guild" and "Walther's Prize Song." At the beginning of the program he will sing "Alma del Core" by Caldara, Bach's "Jesu Seelenangst," an anonymous "Altes Mailied in der Bettewoche," and Beethoven's "Trocknet Nicht" and "Sehnsucht." Later in the program he will sing the air of Azael from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue," Helen Hopekirk's "People Who Have Gardens," and "Thought Takes Off," Percival Parham's "Not Those Who Soar," and four "Traditional Negro Melodies" —"New Born Again," "An' She'll Rise in His Arms," "Little Boy," and "Peter Go Ring dem Bells."

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 56th season in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct 9 and 10, the 13th season under the leadership of Dr Serge Koussevitzky.

The season will consist as usual of 24 pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, together with the two shorter series of six on Monday evenings, and on Tuesday afternoons; likewise eight in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

The usual New York series will be given of five evening concerts and five Saturday afternoons in Carnegie Hall, and five in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn. There will be five concerts in the Metropolitan Theatre, Providence.

The orchestra will also visit the following cities: Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Pittsburg, Philadelphia, Springfield, Worcester, Hartford.

In addition to the concerts to be given in Cambridge, under the auspices of Harvard University, the orchestra will play at Hanover, N H (Dartmouth College); New Haven (Yale); Northampton (Smith), and New Brunswick (Rutgers University.)

From: Tel. BOgardus 4-1729

ARGUS PRESSCLIPPING BUREAU
OTTO SPENGLER, DIRECTOR
352 THIRD AVE., NEW YORK

TERMS: Payable in advance
$40—for 1000 clippings $12—for 250 clippings
$22—for 500 clippings $6—for 100 clippings
No time limit
WE FILE NEW YORK DAILIES FOR 12 MONTHS
ASK US ABOUT "THE BOOKSHELF SCRAP BOOKS."
Sizes: 6 x 9¼, 9 x 12, 11 x 14 and 18½ x 23½.

NEW YORK TIMES

SEP 29 1936

GREATER FESTIVAL IN BERKSHIRES SEEN

Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Urge Expansion of Summer Program.

WOULD DOUBLE CONCERTS

Orchestra Also Asks Permanent Quarters for Performances Instead of a Tent.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, have proposed that the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, at which they took part for the first time last month, be extended next Summer, it was announced yesterday. They have made two conditions for their return as participants in the festival—that there be six concerts instead of three and that a shed be built to replace the tent under which the programs were presented.

Mr. Koussevitzky and George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, met with representative business men of the Berkshire area at the home of Miss Gertrude Robinson-Smith, chairman of the festival committee, in Stockbridge, Mass., several days ago. Two major questions were discussed: whether the time was ripe for further development of the festival idea and whether there is sufficient interest among business men to support a plan covering several years.

The festival executive committee agreed with Mr. Koussevitzky that the festival must find a permanent home and that a long range plan must be adopted to achieve the aim of making these programs as outstanding as the great European music festivals.

"In view of the possibilities of the future," Miss Robinson-Smith said in a statement issued yesterday, "obviously the decision of the board of trustee will depend largely on the response of members and patrons. We must give an answer to Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra not later than Nov. 1. With the bigger plan in mind, naturally memberships and patrons become our only capital. We cannot, therefore, give an affirmative answer unless we have a substantial response."

Miss Robinson-Smith pointed out that sustaining members and patrons will be able to buy tickets for series of three concerts at the same price that prevailed last month and that tickets for additional concerts will be available at similar rates.

MONTPELIER, VT.
ARGUS

SEP 26 1936

NOTED MUSICIAN

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

This is a new photograph of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, famed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

SEP 28 1936

The Lively Arts

BY T. H. PARKER.

An exceedingly attractive folder from the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that prospects for the fifty-sixth year, as outlined by Dr. Koussevitzky, are more particularized than they have been previously in advance of the season's beginning. There will be 24 Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, together with the two shorter series. From the works of Beethoven, the Second, Fourth and Fifth Symphonies will be played, and the Violin Concerto, with Jascha Heifetz as soloist. Of Brahms, the Third and Fourth Symphonies are announced, and "more than usual from the fine treasury of Mozart." There will also be Symphonies by Haydn, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Tschaikovsky, Sibelius and others.

Symphonies of outstanding importance will be reviewed from the near or distant past: Liszt's "Faust" Symphony; Mahler's Fifth Symphony, and the same composer's "Song of the Earth," with Maria Ranzow and Paul Althouse, as contralto and tenor; also Bruckner's Eighth Symphony.

The Piano Concerto of Schumann, Myra Hess appearing with the Orchestra, will be but one of the works of this master. MacDowell's Second Piano Concerto will be played on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the composer's birth, with Howard Goding, the American pianist as soloist. Debussy's music to d'Annunzio's "Saint Sebastian," will be performed, with Olga Avering as soprano soloist.

There will be two works of Dvorak which have not been heard at these concerts for a number of years; the Violoncello Concerto with Piatigorsky, who holds a particular reputation in other cities for his interpretation of this score; also the Violin Concerto with Ruth Posselt as soloist.

Newer scores will include the Rhapsody for Piano and Orchestra by Sergei Rachmaninoff, the composer taking the piano part, and Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto, again with the composer as soloist.

There will also be a recently completed Violin Concerto by Roger Sessions, which Albert Spalding is studying for its first performance by the Orchestra. The remarkable symphony by Shaporin will have its first American hearing.

Tone poems, suites, overtures and music in other forms will have of course their important place in the season's repertory. Bach's Passion According to St. Matthew will again be performed at an additional concert on Good Friday.

Dimitri Mitropoudos, the Athenian conductor who made a striking impression when he came from Europe last season to lead this Orchestra, will return for a two weeks' stay as guest conductor in mid-season.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN
TIMES

SEP 20 1936

ORCHESTRAS LIST WORKS OF SEASON

Symphony Goes No Longer to Buy 'Pig in a Poke.'

Advance Notice of Music to Be Played Called Fair and Good Business.

NEW YORK, Sept. 19 (AP).—Symphony concerts are no longer being bought by the "pig in the poke" method. At least not in the east.

It used to be that subscribers to the hundreds of orchestral seasons throughout the country were expected to approach the box office, money in hand, some time in the summer. They paid their money, received their tickets, and went home hoping that Conductor X would prepare decent programs for a change.

Now many of the major orchestras art not only listing their conductors, but telling in advance the soloists to be expected, the special events planned and as definitely as possible the music to be played.

Partly, it is explained by orchestra managers, this is being done in an effort to attract patronage. Partly it is done in a spirit of fairness. And partly it is done because more and more the emphasis is being laid on the music itself rather than upon the prima donna who does the conducting.

Continued

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony society led off with an announcement which listed in fair detail the music to be expected from its three guest conductors, and sketching in a general outline for John Barbirolli and Arthur Rodzinski, the two "regular" conductors.

The Philadelphia orchestra said little about the actual music to be programmed, but it did list in detail the soloists to be heard, a most impressive list indeed. Later some of the music was announced.

But the Boston Symphony has gone farther than any up to date. Up in Boston Serge Koussevitzky has chosen and announced nearly all the major number to be played, and in the case of the soloists has even published what work each will be heard in.

This extends even to the standard repertoire. And as usual, Dr. Koussevitzky has dug up a few new things. One is a violin concerto by Roger Sessions, which Albert Spalding will play for the first time; another is a symphony by one Shaporin.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD TELEGRAM

SEP 10 1936

Boston Symphony Planning Concerts

Three concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, are announced for September 16, 17 and 18—the first and third in Symphony Hall, Boston, and the second in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, as a part of the Harvard University Tercentenary celebration. In the last concert the orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor.

Tercentenary Issue, HARVARD ALUMNI BULLETIN ADVERTISEMENTS Sept. 30/36

16

THE guests of Harvard at the Tercentenary celebration will long remember the three concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as part of the festivities.

The Boston Symphony season proper, the 56th of the famous orchestra, will open in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Friday afternoon, October 9, and Saturday evening, October 10. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will as usual give series of concerts in Cambridge, New York, Brooklyn, and Providence. Visits will be made to: Springfield, Hartford, New Haven, Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Pittsburgh, Hanover, Northampton, New Brunswick, Philadelphia, and Worcester.

A list of dates, works and soloists for the four Boston series, or information about the concerts in other cities, will be furnished on request. Address G. E. Judd, Manager, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass.

Mention the Bulletin

Music and Musicians

Plans for an Extended Berkshire Symphonic Festival Next Summer; Other Items of Interest

Sept 29 36

By Moses Smith

The sponsors of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival are committed to expanding the size of the festival rather sooner than had been expected. It is learned that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and George E. Judd, conductor and manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were in the Berkshires last week to discuss the prospects for next summer's festival. The Boston Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky will return there evidently only if the number of concerts is increased from three to six and if a more substantial shed be built to replace the tent that housed the huge audiences last summer. The Berkshire Committee has agreed to both conditions as authoritatively as it can, and is now engaged in enlisting support for the enlarged venture. For the time being, subscribers are sought only on the basis of three concerts, with the provision that they will be permitted to buy tickets for the additional concerts at the same price. The option with the Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky will expire on Nov. 1.

Roland Hayes has assembled an unusually attractive program for his recital in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 25, for the benefit of the committee for the Home Care of Children with Heart Disease. Of especial interest is the fact that he will embark on a Wagnerian voyage, singing two excerpts from "Die Meistersinger," —"Walthar Before the Master Guild" and "Walther's Prize Song." At the beginning of the program he will sing "Alma del Core" by Caldara, Bach's "Jesu Seelenangst," an anonymous "Altes Mailied in der Bettewoche," and Beethoven's "Trocknet Nicht" and "Sehnsucht." Later in the program he will sing the air of Azael from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue," Helen Hopekirk's "People Who Have Gardens," and "Thought Takes Off," Percival Parham's "Not Those Who Soar," and four "Traditional Negro Melodies" —"New Born Again," "An' She'll Rise in His Arms," "Little Boy," and "Peter Go Ring dem Bells."

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 56th season in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct 9 and 10, the 13th season under the leadership of Dr Serge Koussevitzky.

The season will consist as usual of 24 pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, together with the two shorter series of six on Monday evenings, and on Tuesday afternoons, likewise eight in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

The usual New York series will be given of five evening concerts and five Saturday afternoons in Carnegie Hall, and five in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn. There will be five concerts in the Metropolitan Theatre, Providence.

The orchestra will also visit the following cities: Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Pittsburg, Philadelphia, Springfield, Worcester, Hartford.

In addition to the concerts to be given in Cambridge, under the auspices of Harvard University, the orchestra will play at Hanover, N H (Dartmouth College); New Haven (Yale); Northampton (Smith), and New Brunswick (Rutgers University.)

(17)

Athens Maestro Again to Lead Symphony Here

Sept 9

By Moses Smith

Dimitri Mitropoulos, the Athenian symphonic conductor who achieved great success on the occasion of his appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season, will again conduct a fortnight of concerts of that organization the coming season. The return engagement, which was first referred to as likely in the columns of the Transcript several months ago, when it became known that he would appear with the Minneapolis Orchestra this season, is made official in the prospectus for the season now about to be distributed by the management at Symphony Hall.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, resuming direction of his world-famous orchestra for the thirteenth season, will face a band of players almost unchanged. A single replacement or two may occur before the season officially begins on Friday afternoon, Oct. 9. But otherwise the orchestra will be the same superb aggregation of instrumentalists whom Bostonians heard last year, and substantially will be accomplished.

Continued on Page 2—Column 5

Mitropoulos Again to Lead Symphony

Continued from Page One

the same as has functioned as a unit for almost ten years.

The prospectus lists the musical prospects for the season in unusual detail. The Second, Fourth and Fifth Symphonies of Beethoven are promised; the Third and Fourth of Brahms; "more than usual" from Mozart; and at least one each by Haydn, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Tchaikovsky and Sibelius.

Among the more exceptional works to be produced will be Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, Mahler's Fifth Symphony and "Song of the Earth," Bruckner's Eighth Symphony and Debussy's "Saint Sebastian." In addition, two works by the neglected Dvorak—the Violin and 'Cello Concertos—will be heard. Bach's "Passion According to Saint Matthew," which was notably received last year, will again be given at what is described as "an additional concert on Good Friday.

The new compositions to be presented will include Rachmaninov's Rhapsody for piano and orchestra which was passed by last year; the recently completed Violin Concerto by Roger Sessions, American composer—a work that has been promised several times in the past and will have its first performance here and a symphony by Yuri Shaporin in first American performance. Shaporin, it should be noted, is composer of Soviet Russia.

As in the past seasons several celebrated musicians will appear with the orchestra as soloists, although no attempt is made to minimize the importance of the orchestra itself a

---

"soloist." Jascha Heifetz will play the Beethoven Violin Concerto. Maria Ranzow and Paul Althouse will sing in Mahler's "Song of the Earth." Myra Hess will play the Schumann Piano Concerto. Gregor Piatigorsky will play the Dvorak 'Cello Concerto. Rachmaninov and Prokofiev will be the soloists for their respective Rhapsody and Third Piano Concerto. Albert Spalding is now preparing the first performance of the Sessions Violin Concerto.

Three Bostonians are announced as soloists. Olga Averino, soprano, who has sung with the orchestra frequently in the past, will be heard in Debussy's "Saint Sebastian." Howard Goding will play the MacDowell Second Piano Concerto on the occasion of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the composer's birth. And Ruth Posselt, who was well received in appearances with the orchestra last year, both in the regular and the Pops seasons, will present the Dvorak Violin Concerto.

Critics

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT ON OCT. 9

Plans for Season Announced In Detail

Sept 10

Plans are announced by the Boston Symphony orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in rather more detail than usual for the coming and 56th season. The 24 Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, together with the two shorter subsidiary series, will take place just as usual. The first pair of concerts will be Oct. 9 and 10 and the last on April 30 and May 1.

A great many details about programs have been given out and these always constitute the most interesting part of the orchestra's activity. From the works of Beethoven the 2d, 4th and 5th Symphonies will be played and the Violin Concerto with Jascha Heifetz as soloist. The 3d and 4th Symphonies of Brahms and more than usual of the works of Mozart and Schumann will be offered. The latter's Piano Concerto will be played, with Myra Hess as soloist. There will be symphonies by Haydn, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Tchaikovsky, Sibelius and many others as well.

Some important scores will be revived: Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, Mahler's 5th Symphony and "Song of the Earth" (Maria Ranzow and Paul Althouse, soloists), Bruckner's 8th Symphony. Further MacDowell's 2d Piano Concerto (Howard Goding, soloist), Debussy's "Saint Sebastian" music (Olga Averino, soloist) and two works of Dvorak will be revived. Of Dvorak Gregor Piatigorsky will be the soloist in the 'Cello'Concerto, and Ruth Posselt will play the Violin Concerto.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, the Athenian conductor who made such a success here last winter, will again be the guest conductor for two weeks. Bach's "St. Matthew Passion" will be played again on Good Friday.

Newer scores will include the Rhapsody for Piano and Orchestra, with the composer, Sergei Rachmaninoff, taking the piano part. Prokofieff's 3d Piano Concerto will be played, also with the composer as soloist. A recently completed Violin Concerto by Roger Sessions will have its first performance with Albert Spalding as soloist. The Symphony by the Soviet composer, Shaporin, will have a first American hearing during the season. Altogether this announcement looks forward to a very interesting year of music. The box-office is now open and ready to give information about season tickets.

Judging from both the expressed plans and omissions of the prospectus, one may safely predict that the forthcoming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will continue in the path laid out by Dr. Koussevitzky in his latter years in Boston. Some of the more provocative music of our day will be passed by for one reason or another—principally, no doubt, because, in the opinion of the conductor, much of it has little but provocativeness to recommend it. Presumably the conductor will seek, as in the past, not to limit his choice to particular nationalities, periods or styles; but will attempt to range over the lengths and breadths of symphonic music for the benefit of the widest possible public and without sacrifice of artistic standards. In his twelve years in Boston he has made the Boston Symphony concerts in this respect—as in many others—probably the finest in the world.

The inclusion of the symphony of Shaporin, in the opinion of this writer, is a subject for congratulation. For, following the performances of the Shostakovitch First Symphony last year, it indicates that there is to be no censorship at Symphony Hall so far as the music of Soviet Russia is concerned. Dr. Koussevitzky obviously agrees with other eminent musicians that the solution of artistic problems must not be affected by political considerations.

There was some prospect, this writer learned, of bringing back for another visit Dr Adrian Boult, conductor of the London B. B. C. Orchestra, who came here a couple of seasons ago as guest. But the negotiations evidently fell through; and will probably be resumed for next season.

The plan and number of concerts will be unchanged from recent seasons. There will be two subscription series of twenty-four concerts on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. There will be supplementary series of half a dozen each on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons. The traffic in subscriptions is brisk, according to reliable report, and exceeds considerably that which was prevalent at this time of year last season.

Roger Huntington Sessions and His New Concerto for the Violin

Note on a Native Composer of Singular Self-Effacement; Other News of Music

Sept 10

By Moses Smith

One of the most interesting items of news contained in the new prospectus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts for the season is the projected first performance of the Violin Concerto by Roger Huntington Sessions, American composer. For several seasons the production of this work at a Boston Symphony concert has been in Dr. Koussevitzky's mind, to the point, on at least an occasion or two, of being mentioned in pre-seasonal announcements. For one reason or another the production was postponed—the orchestration was not quite complete, or the conductor had to change his plans, which led Mr. Sessions to delay completing his work, etc.

Evidently the latest announcement is to be taken seriously, since it also contained word that the violin part is being prepared by Albert Spalding (instead of Richard Burgin, to whom was originally delegated the task of presenting the first performance). The solo part, this writer has been informed, is of unusual difficulty, frequently departing from the traditional, orthodox type of violinism.

So far as a hasty survey may be relied upon, Mr. Sessions has been represented at the Boston Symphony concerts on only one occasion, in April, 1927, when his Symphony in E minor was given its first performances. This work made a strong impression on the present writer—strong enough to warrant its more frequent appearance in the symphonic repertory.

Without a trace of sensationalism, Mr. Sessions' music has a strong individualism. It is the product of a most sincere and almost equally severe musician, who is never guilty of a half-baked score. If a work of Sessions does not hit its mark in actual performance it is not because he has not employed every means he has at his command to present his musical thoughts clearly and cogently. More likely it is because the expression is so succinct that a single hearing can scarcely begin to do it justice. The present writer experienced a specific instance last winter on first hearing the stimulating suite of incidental music that Sessions wrote for the Russian play, "The Black Maskers."

According to David Ewens' "Composers of Today" (a reference work that is not always reliable), Sessions was born in Brooklyn on Dec. 28, 1896. He was graduated from Harvard in 1915. He studied music under the late Horatio Parker at Yale and subsequently under Ernest Bloch, who had a profound influence over his creative development. He spent several years in Europe, principally in Florence, on a Guggenheim fellowship.

His works are not many, but they are carefully wrought. Another reason for his small creative output is that he has had to spend much, if not most, of his time on the task of earning a livelihood. Many a contemporary composer is similarly handicapped, for the market value of their scores, in terms of money, is negligible.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Sept 10/36

M ROPOULOS TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY AGAIN

Greek Conductor Will Appear for Two Weeks During Season.

Boston, Sept. 9.—(AP)—Dimitri Mitropoulos, Greek symphonic conductor, successful here last year as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony, will lead the famous Hub musicians again for two weeks during the coming season, the orchestra announced tonight.

Mitropoulos, the first of his nationality ever to conduct a major orchestra on this continent, will appear also with the Minneapolis Symphony.

The Boston orchestra's season will open Friday, Oct. 9, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky directing for his 13th season.

The orchestra will be practically the same, although, the announcement says, there may be "a replacemnt or two."

New compositions will be presented, among them a symphony by Yuri Shaporin, Soviet Russia composer, which will have its first American performance.

Soloists will include Jascha Heifetz, Paul Althouse, Myra Hess, Gregor Piatigorsky and Albert Spalding.

SYMPHONY'S SEASON WILL OPEN ON OCT 9

Prospectus Is Mailed Out to Subscribers

Sept. 10/36.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 56th season Friday afternoon, Oct 9. Dr Serge Koussevitzky wil return for a 13th year as conductor. This announcement was made yesterday in a prospectus of the season which the orchestra is mailing to its subscribers.

Twenty-four pairs of concerts will be played, as customary, on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings through the season, which will end with the Saturday concert of May 1, 1937. There will be the usual two series of supplementary concerts—six on Monday evenings, beginning Oct 19, and six on Tuesday afternoons, starting Nov 3.

Photo by US&US

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Some highlights of the season, as outlined in the prospectus, will be revival of the Fifth Symphony and "The Song of the Earth" (Maria Ranzow, contralto, and Paul Althouse, tenor, soloists) by Gustav Mahler; the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt, the Bruckner Eighth Symphony, and the "St Sebastian" music of Debussy, to text by d'Annunzio, with Olga Averine as soprano soloist. Bach's "The Passion According to St Matthew," revived by the orchestra last Spring, will again be heard.

The list of new scores includes Sergei Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody for piano and orchestra, to be performed with the composer playing the piano part; the Symphony by Shaporin, the Soviet composer, which is new to America, and a Violin Concerto, recently completed, by the American composer, Roger Sessions. This will be given for the first time anywhere, with Albert Spalding the soloist.

Two scores by Dvorak will be brought back after a silence of several years, the Cello Concerto, to be played with the orchestra by Gregor Piatigorsky, and the Violin Concerto, the solo part of which will be taken by the young American musician, Ruth Posselt.

Myra Hess will return to be soloist in the Schumann Piano Concerto. At the concerts of Dec 18 and 19, Howard Goding will play the piano part of Edward MacDowell's Second Piano Concerto, in observance of the 75th anniversary of MacDowell's birth. He was born in New York, Dec 18, 1861. Serge Prokofieff, the modern Russian composer, will be soloist in his own Third Piano Concerto.

In the "standard" repertory, Dr Koussevitzky lists the Violin Concerto of Beethoven, with Jascha Heifetz as soloist, and that master's Second, Fourth and Fifth Symphonies; the Third and Fourth Symphonies by Brahms; symphonies by Haydn, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Tchaikovsky and Sibelius, and a larger representation than usual from the works of Mozart.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, the Greek conductor, who made such a successful first visit to Boston as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony last Winter, will come back for two weeks in mid-season.

It is most encouraging that the advance sale of tickets, at the present time, is said to represent a substantial increase over the sale at the same period last year.

By way of pre-season activity the Boston Symphony will present three concerts in connection with the Tercentenary celebration of Harvard University, in Symphony Hall Sept 16 and 18, and in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Sept 17, "in honor of the delegates of universities, colleges and learned societies and other distinguished guests."

TWO COMPANIES BID

Gl MUSIC AND

Sept 13

Boston Symphony Will Begin 56th Season Oct 9

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 56th season in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Oct 9, the 13th year under the leadership of Dr Serge Koussevitzky. The season will consist as usual of 24 pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, together with the two shorter series of six on Monday evenings and on Tuesday afternoons. The classical symphonies to be heard include the Second, Fourth and Fifth Symphonies of Beethoven, the Third and Fourth of Brahms, and more than usual of Mozart. Bruckner's Eighth Symphony will be played, and two by Mahler—the Fifth, and the "Song of the Earth," Maria Ranzow and Paul Althouse taking the voice parts in the latter score. Liszt's "Faust" Symphony will also be played.

Jascha Heifetz will appear as soloist in Beethoven's Violin Concerto; Myra Hess in Schumann's Piano Concerto; Howard Goding in MacDowell's Second Piano Concerto; Ruth Posselt in Dvorak's Violin Concerto; Gregor Piatigorsky in the same composer's Cello Concerto; Sergei Rachmaninoff in his Rhapsody for piano and orchestra, to be performed for the first time in Boston; Serge Prokofieff in his own Third Piano Concerto.

Albert Spalding will give first public performance of a new Violin Concerto by Roger Sessions. An unusual novelty will be the sensational Symphony of Shaporin, the Soviet composer, which has not yet been heard in America. Bach's "St Matthew Passion," notably revived last season, will be repeated on Good Friday.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, the Athenian conductor, will make another journey from Europe and preside over the orchestra again for two weeks in mid-season.

A special interest attaches to the new book, reproducing in lithograph a collection in charcoal by Gerome Brush of the 109 members of the orchestra. The book, said to be the first venture of its kind, was published this week-end.

The orchestra will this week offer three programs in connection with the Harvard University tercentenary celebration. The programs:

Wednesday evening in Symphny Hall. Brahms: "Academic Festival" Overture; E. B. Hill: slow movement and scherzo from String Sinfonietta; Ravel: "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2; Beethoven: Symphony No. 5.

Thursday evening, in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge. Bach: Suite No. 2, in B minor for flute and strings; Haydn: Symphony in G minor; No. 88; Mozart: Symphony in E-flat (K-543).

Friday evening, in Symphony Hall. J. K. Paine: "Harvard Hymn" (chorus and organ); Bach: Final chorus from "The Passion According to St Matthew"; Vivaldi: Concerto for Orchestra in D minor; Brahms: Chorus, "Behold, All Flesh," from "A German Requiem," Variations on a Theme By Haydn; Bach: Choruses from the B minor Mass (Et Incarnatus, Crucifixus, Cum Sancto Spiritu); "Fair Harvard" (in arrangement by Dr Koussevitzky for orchestra and chorus). The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society will assist.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

The programs have been announced for the three concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra in connection with the Harvard University Tercentenary celebration. The first, to be given Sept. 16 in Symphony hall, will consist of the Brahms "Academic Festival" overture, two movements from Hill's "String Sinfonietta," Ravels "Daphnis and Chloe" (second suite) and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

The second concert will be devoted to 18th century music and will be given in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, Thursday afternoon, Sept. 17. The program will include Bach's suite in B minor, Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 88, and Mozart's Symphony in E flat major.

The final concert is slated for Friday night, Sept. 18, in Symphony hall. The orchestra will appear jointly with the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral society. The program will include Paine's "Harvard Hymn"; Bach's final chorus from the "St. Matthew Passion;" Vivaldi's concerto in D minor; "Behold, All Flesh," from the "German Requiem" of Brahms; the Brahms "Variations on a Theme by Haydn": three choruses from the Bach Mass in B minor; and "Fair Harvard," in an arrangement for orchestra and chorus by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Next Tuesday officers for the next year's Berkshire Symphonic Festival will be elected. On Sept. 20 Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will go to the Berkshires to discuss next season's program. Although nothing has been decided as yet, there is talk of a possible fortnight of concerts, perhaps four a week. It is also known that Dr. Koussevitzky would like to present choral as well as orchestral works.

18

First Symphony on Oct. 9 Opens Season

Old and New Subscribers Will Gather When Koussevitzky Once More Raises Baton

Trans. Sept. 12/36

As daffodils and new straw hats are synonomous of spring, furs and the first fall of snow, of winter, so autumn leaves, both on the trees and crisply burning, and the Symphony Concerts herald the New England fall.

And New England is not an exaggerated term, for though music lovers from Boston and its environs do make up a large part of the audience, there are a great number of faithful subscribers, who year after year have trekked by train or automobile, and now perhaps, even by plane, gladly making a trip of several hours to hear the exquisite cadences that fall, week after week, from beneath Dr. Koussevitzky's baton.

They come from Providence, R. I., from Hartford, Conn., from Portland, Me., from Vermont, from many different locales in New Hampshire, and in Massachusetts itself, there are many who come up from Cape Cod, Stockbridge, Southbridge, Worcester, Springfield, and of course, from both the South and North Shores.

Again the oldest, and probably most consistent subscriber over the longest number of years to the Symphony, is Henry Monroe Rogers of Beacon street, who, in his ninety-seventh year, among very few others, can look back upon the very beginnings of the Symphony Orchestra as such, when the first concerts took place, in the '80s, in the old Music Hall, and were conducted by Sir George Henschel.

This year the newest and certainly one of the youngest subscribers, is the debutante Miss Eleanor Coolidge, whose father, William H. Coolidge, Jr., of Andover and Beverly Farms, has just given her, as her "coming out" present, a year's subscription ticket to the Friday afternoon concerts. So she will have two debuts, one at the tea at which she and her cousin, Miss Harriot Cole, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin E. Cole of Andover, are being presented by their grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. Edward B. Cole, at their Wenham estate, "Brookby Farm," on Saturday, Sept. 19, and again, at the opening concert of the season, on Friday, Oct. 9.

Next to Mr. Rogers, Miss Martha Hansen is one of the most noted of the subscribers, as this, the fifty-sixth season of the concerts, will be her fiftieth consecutive one. Other outstanding ticket holders are Mrs. Eugene Kingman, who for a number of years, has come every Friday afternoon, all the way from Providence, but attends every one of the Tuesday afternoon concerts, as well; and Mrs. J. Warner Fobes, who makes the trip every week from Peacedale, R. I.

Listed here are just a few of those whose names are inscribed in the enormous black book marked only, in small letters "Friday," kept in the inner sanctums of the Symphony offices, and catalogued in large and small drawers, filed in innumerable different ways, and all guarded closely by those efficient factotums, without whom the Symphonies, even under Dr. Koussevitzky's innimitable leadership, could hardly continue.

They include Mrs. George R. Agassiz, Mrs. Maximilian Agassiz, Mrs. Talbot Aldrich, Mrs. Richard Ames, Mrs. Walter Atherton, Mrs. Charles F. Ayer, Mrs. Frederick Ayer, Mrs. James B. Ayer, Mrs. Roland M. Baker, Mrs. Hugh Bancroft, Mrs. Matthew Bartlett, Mrs. John W. Bartol, Mrs. A. Farwell Bemis, Mrs. Francis W. Bird, Mrs. Benjamin S. Blake, Mrs. Archibald Blanchard, Miss Sarah and Miss Susan Bradlee, Mrs. Edward D. Brandegee, Mrs. J. Lewis Bremer, Mrs. Theodore G. Bremer, Mrs. Howard W. Brown, Mrs. Theo-

SPRINGFIELD ,MASS.
REPUBLICAN

rtrait Book of Boston Symphony

harcoal portraits of each member of the Boston Symphony orchestra, 109 in all, have been made by Gerome Brush, noted New England artist, and will be published in book form Tuesday. This is probably the first time that a large Symphony orchestra has ever been presented in individual portraiture. Each musician is shown in the act of playing his particular instrument. The artist has also made a personal characterization of each in the form of a biographical sketch, which will appear opposite the portrait. The book, handsomely printed, is being published by the Boston Symphony orchestra, and will be sold in conjunction with exhibitions of the original drawings to be shown in Boston and other cities.

News of the World of Music

Three New Pieces For Boston Symphony

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

THERE was a time when announcements of the Symphony season pivoted around the pieces which Dr. Koussevitzky would play for the first time in Boston, for the first time in America or for the first time anywhere. Of late, for one or the other reason, the conductor has said little about his novel numbers beforehand. In fact, they themselves have decreased somewhat in quantity during the period and some might say have decreased in importance as well, a fact for which the conductor is in no wise responsible.

The handsomely executed prospectus of this, the orchestra's 56th season, mentions but three new pieces: the Symphony by the Russian Shaporin, for orchestra with chorus, which was to have received its first performance here last spring; the Violin Concerto of Roger Sessions to be played by Albert Spalding, and Mr. Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody for Piano and Orchestra with the composer as pianist.

A large proportion of those who attend the Symphony Concerts are, we fear, chiefly interested in the music of the 19th century or of the very early 20th, an epoch which your advanced musician, who prefers either the remoter past or the more immediate present, shudderingly disclaims. From this period which, whatever its faults, produced music of the greatest richness of substance, Dr. Koussevitzky purposes to revive the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt, which he has already conducted here with distinction: the Fifth Symphony of Mahler, unheard since the days of Dr. Muck; that composer's moving "Song of the Earth," which Dr. Koussevitzky has twice given us, and the Eighth Symphony of Bruckner, the first music of that composer which was conducted by him in Boston. At this point the repeated plaint may be made that there are symphonies of Bruckner and of Mahler either wholly unknown here or unknown to the present generation of concert-goers, but at least the combined allotment from these composers is greater than once it was, and for their steadily growing army of admirers that must for the present suffice.

A less exciting prospect is the revival of two concertos by Dvorak; the Violoncello Concerto, to be played by Mr. Piatigorsky, and the Violin Concerto to be played by Ruth Posselt, who will make her first appearances at the regular Symphony Concerts. Another resident musician to be honored during this coming season will be Howard Goding of the faculty of the Conservatory, who will play MacDowell's Second Pianoforte Concerto in recognition of the 75th anniversary of the composer's birth.

In view of the fact that guest conductors have never returned immediately it seemed too much to hope that the orchestra would once again this season offer us in that capacity Dmitri Mitropoulos, who scored an unequivocal triumph here last season. But Mr. Mitropoulos, who will be guest-conductor in Minneapolis this season, will also preside over the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a period of two weeks.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

SEP 1 1936

UNIQUE PORTRAIT BOOK OF MEMBERS OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Charcoal portraits of each member of the Boston Symphony orchestra, 109 in all, have been made by Gerome Brush, the noted New England artist, and published in book form. This is probably the first time that a large symphony orchestra has ever been presented in individual portraiture. Each musician is shown in the act of playing his particular instrument. The artist has also made a personal characterization of each in the form of a biographical sketch, which will appear opposite the portrait. The book, handsomely printed, is being published by the Boston Symphony orchestra, and will be sold in conjunction with exhibitions of the original drawings to be shown in Boston and other cities.

Trans. Sept. 9/36

Serge Koussevitzky

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in a New Photograph

(Lipnitzki, Paris)

Symphony Plans for Wide Itinerary; Further Plans

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 56th season in Symphony Hall, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 9 and 10, the 13th season under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The season will consist as usual of 24 pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, together with the two shorter series of six on Monday evenings, and on Tuesday afternoons; likewise eight in Sanders Theater, Cambridge. The usual New York series will be given of five evening concerts and five Saturday afternoons in Carnegie Hall, and five in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn. There will also be five concerts in the Metropolitan Theatre, Providence. The orchestra will also visit the following cities: Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, Springfield, Worcester, Hartford. In addition to the concerts to be given in Cambridge, under the auspices of Harvard University, the orchestra will play at Hanover, New Hampshire (Dartmouth College); New Haven (Yale); Northampton (Smith); New Brunswick (Rutgers University).

For the Friday and Saturday series, Dr. Koussevitzky plans an engrossing list of works, of which a few are announced at this time. Symphonies of Beethoven and Brahms will take an important place in the list, and more by Mozart will be heard. Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, and Mahler's Fifth; also the "Song of the Earth" by the same composer, and Liszt's "Faust" Symphony are specified. Soloists will include Jascha Heifetz, Myra Hess, Gregor Piatigorsky, Howard Goding, Ruth Posselt, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Albert Spalding, Serge Prokofieff, Paul Althouse, Olga Averino and Maria Ranzow.

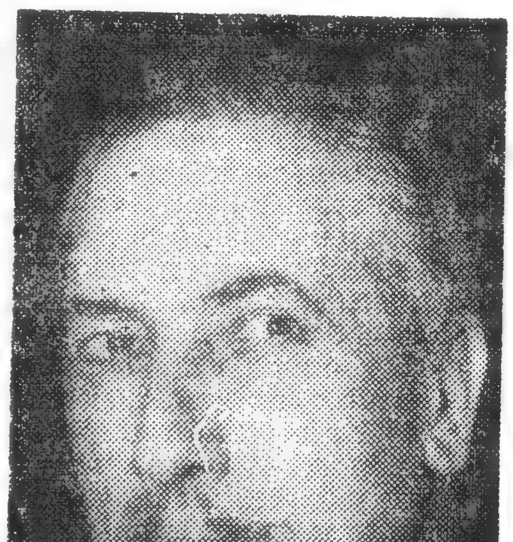
New works will include a Soviet Symphony by Shaporin; a violin concerto by Roger Sessions; the Piano Rhapsody of Rachmaninoff, which the composer is to play. Prokofieff will appear with the orchestra in his own Third Piano Concerto. Dimitri Mitropoulos will be guest conductor for two weeks.

---

have converted what is one of the ugliest, cheapest, and most thoroughly unromantic streets in the whole world into a de luxe avenue of fairyland."

He then proceeds to take his reader by the hand and escort him on a tour of Times square, shop by shop, window by window, past all the cheap, grimy, second-rate exhibits that make up the market place that is the fabled "crossroads of the world," and reveals it for what it has become.

He could do the same, if he were so moved, for the boulevards of Paris, or the Main streets of any sizable city in the world. And when he speaks of the old Broadway as a sweeter and better place to stroll in than this new collection of flashy shops and honky-tonks, he is forgetting just how messy the old Broadway was. Even without the huckster pushcart and Coney Island barker atmosphere southern European Americans brought to it, it was a messy, overpraised, exaggerated, small town affair.



Frank Thomas, one of the players in the Federal Theater's production of "Class of '29," a drama by Orrie Lashin and Milo Hastings, opening on Tuesday evening, Sept. 22, at the Repertory Theater.

TON SUNDAY ADVERTISER—Largest Sunday Ci

Music Notes

The Boston String Quartet will present three concerts Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings in Sanders Theater, Cambridge. Each concert will be composed on chamber works from the pens of Harvard men.

Harrison Keller and Paul Fedorovsky, violins; Georges Fourel, viola, and Alfred Zighera, violincello, are the personnel of The Quartet, and in scores requiring pianoforte, the performer will be Jesus Maria Sanroma.

* * *

Its 12th season under the leadership of Dr. George Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony orchestra will begin its 56th season in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, October 9. The season will consist as usual of 24 pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, together with the two shorter series of six on Monday evenings and on Tuesday afternoons.

* * *

The State Symphony Orchestra will give a Berlioz-Strauss program of music this afternoon at the Museum of Fine Arts. Alexander Taiede will conduct.

NEW YORK JOURNAL
Sept. 18/36

Music in Review

—By Henriette Weber—

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, not content with immortalizing itself in tone, has now been placed between the covers of a book, consisting of artistic charcoal drawings of Serge Koussevitzky and the 109 members of the orchestra. The artist is Gerome Brush, who also supplies delightfully informal biographies of the players, accomplishing the feat of summing up a life ambition in less than a hundred words in each case.

The book is in a handsome format, with each drawing reproduced in a full page picture which makes one realize the sensitive soul of the real musician, so sympathetically has Mr. Brush reproduced the salient features of his subjects.

The Boston Orchestra, now in its fifty-sixth year and the thirteenth under the inspiring leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky, will, of course, again give the accustomed series of five evening and five Saturday matinee concerts in Carnegie Hall, and the usual five concerts in Brooklyn. The regular Boston season opens October 9.

Critics

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT ON OCT. 9

Plans for Season Announced In Detail

Plans are announced by the Boston Symphony orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in rather more detail than usual for the coming and 56th season. The 24 Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, together with the two shorter subsidiary series, will take place just as usual. The first pair of concerts will be Oct. 9 and 10 and the last on April 30 and May 1.

A great many details about programs have been given out and these always constitute the most interesting part of the orchestra's activity. From the works of Beethoven the 2d, 4th and 5th Symphonies will be played and the Violin Concerto with Jascha Heifetz as soloist. The 3d and 4th Symphonies of Brahms and more than usual of the works of Mozart and Schumann will be offered. The latter's Piano Concerto will be played, with Myra Hess as soloist. There will be symphonies by Haydn, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Tchaikovsky, Sibelius and many others as well.

Some important scores will be revived: Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, Mahler's 5th Symphony and "Song of the Earth" (Maria Ranzow and Paul Althouse, soloists), Bruckner's 8th Symphony. Further MacDowell's 2d Piano Concerto (Howard Goding, soloist), Debussy's "Saint Sebastian" music (Olga Averino, soloist) and two works of Dvorak will be revived. Of Dvorak Gregor Piatigorsky will be the soloist in the 'Cello'Concerto, and Ruth Posselt will play the Violin Concerto.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, the Athenian conductor who made such a success here last winter, will again be the guest conductor for two weeks. Bach's "St. Matthew Passion" will be played again on Good Friday.

Newer scores will include the Rhapsody for Piano and Orchestra, with the composer, Sergei Rachmaninoff, taking the piano part. Prokofieff's 3d Piano Concerto will be played, also with the composer as soloist. A recently completed Violin Concerto by Roger Sessions will have its first performance with Albert Spalding as soloist. The Symphony by the Soviet composer, Shaporin, will have a first American hearing during the season. Altogether this announcement looks forward to a very interesting year of music. The box-office is now open and ready to give information about season tickets.

Music Season

Trib. N.Y. Sept. 10/36

(19) THE ORCHESTRAS

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will preface the opening of its fifty-sixth regular season with three special concerts under Serge Koussevitzky's direction this week in Boston and Cambridge in connection with Harvard University's tercentenary celebration. Wednesday night's program in Symphony Hall includes Brahms's Academic Festival Overture, part of Edward Burlingame Hill's Sinfonietta for strings, Ravel's second "Daphnis et Chloe" suite and Beethoven's fifth symphony.

An eighteenth century program will be played in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, Thursday afternoon, including Bach's second suite, Haydn's symphony in G major, No. 13 (88) and Mozart's symphony in E flat.

The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe College Chorus will sing in the final program Friday night in Symphony Hall, which opens with John Knowles Paine's "Harvard Hymn" and closes with an arrangement of "Fair Harvard" by Dr. Koussevitzky. The rest of the program consists of choral excerpts from Bach's St. Matthew Passion and B minor Mass and Brahms's "A German Requiem" and Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn. A limited number of tickets may be on public sale for the Wednesday and Friday concerts.

Boston Programs

Several features have been announced for the programs of the regular season in Boston, which opens Friday afternoon, October 9. Beethoven will be represented by the second, fourth and fifth symphonies and the violin concerto with Jascha Heifetz as soloist. Brahms's third and fourth symphonies will be played, and there will be more than the customary quota of Mozart symphonies. Haydn, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Tchaikovsky and Sibelius will also be represented on the symphonic list.

There will be revivals of Liszt's "Faust" symphony and of Mahler's fifth symphony and his "Das Lied von der Erde," in which Maria Ranzow and Paul Althouse will be the solo singers. Bruckner's eighth symphony will also be played.

Myra Hess will be the soloist in Schumann's piano concerto. MacDowell's second piano, in observance of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the composer's birth, will be played with Howard Goding as soloist. Olga Aberino, soprano, will sing in Debussy's music for "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien." Dvorak's cello and piano concertos will be played with Gregor Piatigorsky and Ruth Posselt in the respective solo roles.

Albert Spalding is studying Roger Sessions's new violin concerto, which will have its American premiere in these concerts. A new symphony by the Russian composer Shaporin will be introduced to America. Sergei Rachmaninoff will be the soloist in his Paganini Variations for piano and orchestra, and Serge Prokofieff in his third piano concerto. Bach's St. Matthew Passion will be performed in a special concert on Good Friday.

The season includes the usual twenty-four Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, six concerts on Monday evenings and six on Tuesday afternoons. Dimitri Mitropoulos will return in mid-season for two weeks as guest conductor.

Atlantic City Concert

The United Singers of Philadelphia, a chorus of 400 men, will give their annual concert on the Steel Pier, Atlantic City, next Sunday afternoon, September 20, under Leopold Syre's direction. The Harmony Women's Chorus of Philadelphia will also take part in the program. John Stahl, violinist, will be the guest soloist.

---

st Sunday Circulation in New England—

Adver. Sept. 10/36

Drama in Prospec

The Unfolding Music Season

By Ruth Marsters

Music Editor

AS the new music season approaches interest becomes focused upon Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's plans for this, the fifty-sixth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

That each year the conductor's announcements are so eagerly anticipated is indicative of of his genius in the subtle art of program building.

A glance at the list of works performed during his twelve years with the orchestra are a revelation of his insight.

It is a list which contains all of the works of established greatness in orchestral literature together with the brightest efforts of the day.

Always quick to recognize a great personality on the horizon, his championship of Sibelius, and of Scriabin in earlier years, are but two instances of his accuracy of judgment.

Likewise his ability to discern trends has resulted in the inclusion on the programs of only the most highly representative of modern efforts. Thus while his audiences are constantly stimulated to an interest in contemporary music, and made aware of its direction their time is not wasted, or their ears tried with music of purely passing significance.

* * *

OUTLINES of plans for the series of 24 pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, which begin on October 9 and 10, present a particularly engrossing list.

From the works of Beethoven, Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen for performance the Second, Fourth, and Fifth Symphonies, and the Violin Concerto, with Jascha Heifetz as soloist.

The Third and Fourth Symphonies of Brahms are to be included with Haydn, Schubert Mendelssohn, Tchaikovsky and Sibelius generously represented. More than the usual number of Mozart's works are indicated.

Among works of importance to be revived are Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, Mahler's Fifth Symphony, and "Song of the Earth," and Bruckner's Eighth Symphony.

* * *

THE LIST of soloists engaged is an imposing one.

Myra Hess will appear with the Orchestra, in the performance of Schumann's Piano Concerto.

Newer scores will be presented with the composers as soloists: Sergei Rachmaniff playing the piano part in his Rhapsody for Piano and Orchestra, and Prokofieff appearing in the performance of his Third Piano Concerto.

Albert Spalding will be the soloist in the first performance by the Orchestra of Roger Sessions' recently completed Violin Concerto.

Another new work to the repertoire of the orchestra will be the symphony of Shaporin in its first American hearing.

Gregor Piatigorsky will play Dvorak's Violoncello Concerto, his interpretation of which holds a particular reputation in other cities. The work has not been performed at these concerts for a number of years.

MacDowell's Second Piano Concerto will be played on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the composer's birth with Howard Goding, the American pianist, as soloist.

* * *

DEBUSSY'S music to d'Annunzio's "Saint Sebastian" will be performed with Olga Averino as soprano soloist.

Tone poems, suites, overture, and music in other forms will have, of course, their important place in the season's repertoire.

Bach's Passion According to St. Matthew will again be performed at an additional concert on Good Friday.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, the Athenian conductor who made such a striking impression when he made his first American appearance with this orchestra last season will return for a two weeks' stay as guest conductor

---

(This and the preceding page were found to late to paste in according to date. The last clippings for Sept. come two pages back.)

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

ON THE RECORDS

Sept. 6/36

By MICHAEL SHAW, JR. 11-17

A POETIC DELICACY none too frequent on wax or in the concert hall has been achieved by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony in "The Enchanted Lake," the most beautiful of Liadow's three tone poems (Victor 14078).

The orchestra mirrors the score's fairy tarn and sound experts have kept inviolate the exceptionally smooth quality of muted strings, harp and woodwinds.

MODERN TONAL prestidigitators have been so publicized we are apt to forget contrapuntal masterpieces were being tossed off 500 and more years ago. The London Madrigal Group, directed by T. B. Lawrence, helps to refresh our memory, and in a most beautiful fashion, with six numbers on two 10-inchers. Particularly charming are Wilbye's "Sweet Honey-Sucking Bees" (Victor 4317), "I Thought That Love," by Byrd, and "Summer Is Icumen In" (Victor 4316). The latter Thirteenth Century Cuckoo Song probably has excited more comment from musical historians than any other composition.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens its fifty-sixth season at Symphony all, Boston, Friday, Oct. 9, under Serge Koussevitzky, will offer, among its novelties this season, a recently completed violin concerto by Roger Sessions, which will be given its world première with Albert Spalding as soloist. A symphony by the Russian composer Shaporin is another work to be accorded a first American hearing. Recent scores scheduled include Rachmaninoff's rhapsody for piano and orchestra on a Paganini theme and Serge Prokofieff's third piano concerto, with the composers as soloists.

N.Y. Times Sept. 10/36

Everett Haydn organlogue will be other features of the show.

SYMPHONY PLAYER SKETCHES IN CHARCOAL GO ON DISPLAY

The 109 drawings of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, by Gerome Brush, are being shown in Symphony Hall. The drawings are in charcoal and were made by the noted artist at the conclusion of the season last Spring.

Each musician of the orchestra is shown playing his particular instrument. The pictures have recently been published in book form. The exhibition is in the Huntington-av lobby, and is on public view.

---

street.

Lowell C. Sel. Sept. 27

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON

The 56th season of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will open in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 9 and 10. These will be the first of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, about to begin his 13th season, announces works of interest and notable soloists for the two series. The works to be heard will include the following classical symphonies, among others: the 2nd, 4th, and 5th of Beethoven; the 3rd and 4th of Brahms; the symphonies also of Mozart, Haydn, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Tchaikovsky, and Sibelius. Revivals will include Liszt's "Faust" Symphony; Mahler's Fifth Symphony, and "Song of the Earth"; Bruckner's Eighth; and Debussy's music to "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." Shaporin's Symphony, and Roger Sessions' Violin Concerto are among the new works to be heard. The instrumental soloists will include Myra Hess, Jascha free and it is desirable that a large and representative audience start the ball rolling for a successful se-

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

SEP 14 1936

SEVENTH OR EIGHTH?

To the What Do You Think Editor—Sir: Julius Fischer, in answer to Rudolph K.'s letter, states on good authority that Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" was "the seventh in a series of nine." In Philip Hale's "Boston Symphony Programme Notes" Schubert's eighth symphony is listed as the "Unfinished," the seventh being a regular four-movement work. Which is the "Unfinished"?

PUZZLED PENGUIN.

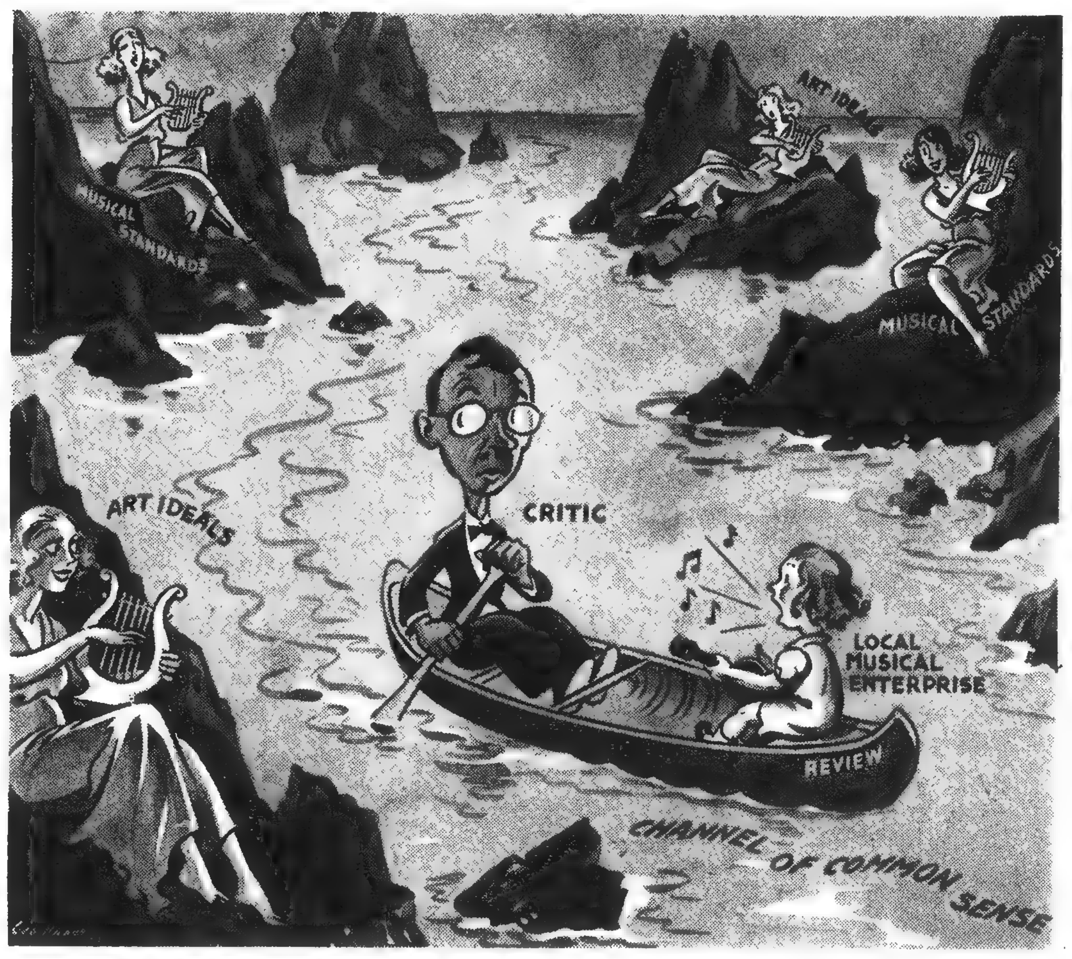
Month of October

1936

THE PROBLEMS OF THE "PROVINCIAL" CRITIC

To Steer Between Scylla of Fullsome Praise and Charybdis of Scorn—To Be a Link, Not a Barrier Between Listener and Performer—To Be of Service to Readers and to Music

By H. EARLE JOHNSON
(Music Critic, the New Haven 'Register')



Steering a Safe Course

REVIEWERS throughout the country may be grateful to distinguished members of their fraternity, resident in New York, for recent articles on musical criticism in the secondary cities. Oscar Thompson and Olin Downes have sounded appropriate warnings at a time when reviewing is a novelty in many of these smaller communities. In view of the helpful suggestions made by Metropolitan critics it may be of interest to consider certain problems from the viewpoint of the local practitioner.

Under the transparent guise of Florestan, Robert Schumann wrote: "Critics and reviewers are not alike; the former stands nearer to the artist, the latter to the mechanic." ('Maxims.'). Perhaps his statement has had too great an influence, or has been misinterpreted, but insofar as the critic in the secondary city is concerned, I am convinced that he will find himself in a position to render greater service to his readers, and to the art for which he is spokesman, if he is less conscious of his critical privileges and more constant as a reviewer. Critics in the key cities have a duty, seldom imposed elsewhere, to embody their conclusions in an expression of judgment; hence their criticisms are not, in all cases, to be taken as models for the field at large.. We, in the secondary cities, may agree with Margaret Fuller that "the use of criticism in periodical writing is to sift, not to stamp a work" (The Dial, 1840), or with William Foster Apthorp, that "criticism should be nothing but an expression of enlightened opinion, as enlightened as possible, but never dogmatic" (Music and Musicians).

No New England Youngsters

Emphasis on the extreme youth of reviewers in the hinterland is not always borne out by the facts. I speak only for the cities of New England where most of the reviewers are known to me, either personally, or through their writing, but in the five major cities, excluding Boston, the principal reviewers are all thirty years of age, or over; two are well past middle life. Two are Doctors of Philosophy, one is a Master of Music, and one a Bachelor of Arts with specialization in music; two are members of University faculties; all, of course, are professional musicians of good standing in their respective communities. In the smaller towns, the staff reporters may be permitted to review the concerts, but not for several years has that been the case in the principal cities. Insofar as I am aware, there is no regular reviewer in any New England city with a population of less than 150,000 or, for that matter, is there an extensive concert season. We are fortunate, of course, in the proximity of Boston, Philadelphia, and New York which enables us to make periodic visits to these centres of musical activity.

Our duties consist, as do those of the Metropolitan critics, in covering concerts for the daily press and, in four cities, of writing a weekly article of 1,500 words for the Sunday edition. I am surprised that any should be hard-pressed for sufficient material of interest to make a weekly column, especially in view of the obligation to extend the horizon of readers by relating the musical life of our own city to that of the entire world. Incidentally, employment of the term "local" is forbidden in the hinterland; in fact, many editors feel strongly about the matter, holding that none are "local" musicians, poets, or painters; all art is potentially world-wide.

The wise reviewer refrains from criticism of resident conductors, for, if few of them are truly great, they are usually very much in earnest and deserving of some credit for their modest accomplishments. Many of them merit a higher respect than they are likely to achieve, for they work under conditions which would cause many a Philharmonic conductor to flee the town. That which one fails to praise may carry more effect than severe censure. Specific criticism of individuals is best left unwritten, for as Mr. Thompson has suggested, the fostering of extreme partisanship may wreck the entire enterprise.

A Link, Never a Barrier

Reviewers in secondary cities have the rare opportunity of being constructive forces within the community. Especially is this true at a time when orchestras of talented amateurs await public encouragement in sufficient degree to make professional status a possibility. While never forsaking the main issue, which is at all times the creditable performance of worth-while music, the critic may suffer much in the interest of a noble purpose and fuller understanding of the musical art. But he knows the capabilities of the resident talent (sometimes better than they know themselves) and may, by judicious writing, spur them to fulfillment of their highest accomplishment. The critic stands between skeptical listener and timid performer, as a link, never as a barrier. Above all, an impersonal tone is most desirable; no music critic has ever become a "local" celebrity.

Student recitals or resident small-fry are seldom reviewed, and they are better avoided; advance announcement, with pictures may serve as encouraging stimulus, but the event itself had better find the reviewer in another part of town. However, if the artist is insistent, or other influences are brought to bear, the critic must temper judgment with kindness, if possible. Every community has its professional musicians whose sincere purpose and genuine talent are among the most pleasing features of a musical season, for with them rests much of the responsibility for the artistic development of both listener and performer. Mutual co-operation between native artist and music reviewer is the most potent influence for civic advancement.

Troublesome "Other Influences"

These "other influences" referred to, are often extremely troublesome in a small community. Various clubs and societies sponsor their individual and collective "finds," and the large-bosomed president commands the reviewer to write a nice account, since the performer has been guaranteed flattering press-notices in part-payment for her performance. For adequate comment on this old and widespread custom, the reader is referred to a brilliant article written some time ago for The American Mercury by the distinguished critic, William J. Henderson. Undoubtedly clubs and societies contribute handsomely to the success of legitimate musical enterprises, but they frequently threaten the burning of professional integrity at the stake.

When They "Play Down"

The critical privilege is exercised most often in connection with celebrities who visit every secondary city in the course of their annual pilgrimages. Most of these are artistic as well as celebrated, but they may require a modicum of censure to flavor great praise. Now and then a concert artist hardly knows the name of the town surrounding the platform on which he plays, for towns with less than 200,000 population are alike to him, and his programs (Numbered One, Two, and Three) are apportioned with scant respect for the individual differences which mark the cultural life of each city. Grave disappointment often results for, after a decade of enlightenment, the audience may be above the program.

Two instances are given.

(1) A violinist of world renown played a program one hour and three-quarters in length; ten minutes, in all, were devoted to music composed for violin and piano, the remaining to transcriptions (some of them operatic), and orchestral concertos. Probably the artist does not know that his recital was given before a university audience which hears a dozen concertos played with orchestra each year, and that his carelessness caused serious question of his previously-established artistic integrity.

(2) A justly-esteemed singer made his first appearance in the same city; for the most part, the program consisted of songs from the radio repertoire, and of comic dialogues to musical accompaniment. During the intermission a young man approached the singer and engaged in a revealing conversation. The artist was amazed, and profoundly regretful, that he had not known the nature of his audience, although he had sensed the cool reception; he would have greatly enjoyed singing his New York program! Indeed, had he done so, he would have been invited to return again and again, for we are very loyal to our favorites.

Whether or not such instances are the fault of the artist or of the manager, the critic must guard against careless imposition by those whose high fees warrant, and whose musicianship demands, a high standard of achievement and a greater consideration for the tastes of audiences.

Among Valuable Services

The reviewer may be of great service to his readers by preparing the way for an understanding of such new, or contemporary, music as may be heard in the course of the season. Frequently he is the only one familiar with the sources of accurate data regarding the contemporary musician; by comment on the theories or biographical facts necessary to provide a background, he will not only fulfil the utmost in function, but lift the consciousness of his readers into enlarged experience. By so doing he will definitely further the artistic progress of his city.

In assembling local history, the reviewer may perform a valuable service; moreover, the substance of his investigations will make for interesting reading during periods of inactivity in the concert hall. Many cities can boast a concert life of fifty to seventy-five years; research may even bring to light valuable historical material dating from 1820. This phase of musical research is practically untouched outside the four or five major cities of the country.

Publishers do not generally offer material to the secondary reviewer, but he may profitably make the most of those publications which are available from any source within reach and thus satisfy the interest of readers who frequently evidence a real concern in the wise selection of books on musical subjects. The newspaper is not a means of education, primarily, or of academic discussion, but the same purpose may be served through these contributory channels.

The appointment of reviewers in the secondary cities of the country has come about through the increasing interest in music, as distinguished from musical personalities. The rise of schools of music, the radio, the phonograph, civic management of concerts, improved instruction in the public schools,—all have contributed to the heightened musical culture. Both in relation to each other and to the larger cities, our problems frequently differ, as Mr. Thompson clearly states, but the music itself, which is of more real concern than the immediate performer in these secondary cities, is not so much subject to the perspective of community or personality as many suppose.

CAREER OF SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first Russian conductor, was born in 1874 in the small, central Russian province of Tver. There was no musical life about him, except from small visiting theatrical companies. When his father opposed a career so remote from the experience of their own community, he ran away and presented himself at the Philharmonic School in Moscow. The School was full—the year begun, but the authorities at once sensed the unusual qualities of the penniless young applicant and made a place for him. There was only one possible scholarship open to him for a student of the double-bass, and he accordingly took on this strange instrument. In a short time he astonished everyone by coaxing a lovely 'cello-like tone and delicate melody from his huge, cumbrous bass, with its fist-wise bow. This was the Koussevitzky who later could elicit such transcendent tone and sheer melodic songfulness from a body of strings. And then, as now, he was tireless in his quest until he had reached new and unprecedented heights of beauty. Koussevitzky was soon known all over Europe as a virtuoso of the double-bass.

Coming to the end of its possibilities, Koussevitzky aspired to that richest of instruments, the hundredfold orchestra. He made his first trials in Berlin, and then, having independent means, he assembled his own orchestra in Moscow and gave memorable concerts there and in St. Petersburg. When his public heard the erstwhile double-bassist on the infinitely more expressive instrument, the effect was electric. Koussevitzky was then, as ever, a pioneer for his art. He chartered a steamer to take his orchestra the length of the Volga through his vast country, conveying to the musically starved people of innumerable provincial towns their "first symphony concert."

After the revolution, Koussevitzky conducted for a while under government subsidy, but, fleeing restriction, established his famous "Concerts Koussevitzky" with his own orchestra in Paris. Here, and by guest performances in London and other cities, western Europe came under the spell of this magnetic and forceful leader.

Such was the leader who came to America and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924. In his twelve seasons at the head of the great Orchestra, he has touched new heights of his art and brought the Orchestra even in this present era of much fine music to new and surpassing importance. It requires a succession of seasons to test the scope of a conductor's interest in new music and old, the extent of his vision and his ability to refine his orchestra into an ever more perfect instrument, to keep his approach to the more familiar "classics" vital and absorbing. Koussevitzky's lengthening term shows him to have these abilities to a transcendent degree. The Boston Symphony concerts have never held such an abundant musical life, such utter freedom from routine, such a brilliant and engrossing eloquence.

GROWTH OF A GREAT ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is something more than half a century old. More notable than the span of its years is its place in the growth of musical America.

In 1881, the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in America an orchestra of the sort he had heard as a student in Vienna. It was an ambitious dream for an impecunious young man, but after many years, having made his fortune as a banker, he was able to give the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the world. He engaged the finest musicians in Europe and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. He set a new precedent by exacting of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the Orchestra. The conductor he gave entire artistic freedom. The wisdom of these policies soon showed as each conductor expended his genius to the cumulative improvement of an ensemble which soon had the world's attention.

George Henschel first established the Orchestra in his three seasons of 1881-1884. Then came Wilhelm Gericke, who through twelve years drilled it into what came to be its tradition of perfection. Arthur Nikisch, most illustrious conductor of the day, had a shorter term, as did also Emil Paur and Max Fiedler. In 1900, Symphony Hall, the Orchestra's present home, was built. Dr. Karl Muck, from 1906, carried the Orchestra to an unprecedented degree of virtuosity and beauty. In his 84th year, the Orchestra's founder left it in the control of a board of trustees. After two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, the term of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began in 1924 and, it will be seen, has extended beyond any single term of a previous conductor. The long association of such an orchestra and such a leader is eloquently justified by the results. The great Russian conductor has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory new and old of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

On August 26 Julien Bryan, roving camera reporter, left Moscow for Istanbul to film the new Turkey. If he is as successful as with his Soviet Union and Far East movies, Mr. Bryan will have the first documentary film of present-day Turkey.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
Oct. 2/36

Bigger Music Festival Aim Of $100,000 Drive

Campaign Will be Launched at Once to Raise Money for Program of More and Better Programs and for Building to Shelter Them With Audience of 5,000 People—Announcement of Ambitious Project Follows Assurance of Leading Berkshire Business Men That Money Can be Raised—Dr. Koussevitzky Makes Return of Boston Symphony Conditional on Expansion of Program to Include Six Concerts and Construction of Permanent Shelter.

A campaign to raise $100,000 for the purpose of financing facilities to make the Berkshire Symphonic Festival as big and as good as the leading festivals in Europe and for the express purpose of constructing a shed to shelter the orchestra and 5,000 persons will be launched at once, it was announced by Miss Gertrude E. Robinson-Smith, president of the Festival, following a meeting of bankers, real estate brokers, hotel men and business men from all parts of Berkshire county at Pittsfield on Wednesday night under the sponsorship of the Berkshire Hills conference. Assurance that the money could be raised was given at the session.

The return of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who thrilled large gatherings this past summer with his Boston Symphonic orchestra depends on the success of the campaign, it was revealed, and Dr. Koussevitzky must have his answer by Nov. 1st. Miss Robinson-Smith revealed that two conditions must be met before Dr. Koussevitzky will bring his orchestra to the Berkshires again despite this year's outstanding success. First, he demands that the concert program be increased to six concerts next year and second, he insists that there be a musical shed to cover the orchestra and an audience of 5,000.

Lawrence K. Miller of Pittsfield, president of the conference, who presided at the session, announced that the conference will be represented in the co-operating committee to be formed to conduct the campaign to raise the required funds. Mr. Miller will appoint the special committee.

Miss Robinson-Smith told the gathering that Dr. Koussevitzky is tremendously impressed with the possibilities offered by the Berkshire Festival and feels that some day it will rank with the greatest in the world. If the requirements set down by Dr. Koussevitzky are met, he plans to cancel such engagements as the coronation concert in London, and a concert at Salzburg, Miss Robinson-Smith revealed. She also announced that 40 per cent of next season's boxes are already sold. Besides housing the orchestra, Miss Robinson-Smith indicated that the proposed building might be used for conventions and other similar attractions which could be brought to the Berkshires, including a championship prize fight. The site of the proposed music hall has not been selected. She also announced that the Festival grossed $21,000 in 1936. The speaker frankly admitted that the Festival could not proceed with its proposed enlarged program unless it had the support of business men in its drive to raise $100,000 and she made a special appeal to them on the basis of the money brought into the Berkshires as a result of the festival. She also said that the budget must be increased 100 per cent next year.

Testimonials and reassurance of support were received by a number of Southern Berkshire businessmen. Henry C. Neff of Adams was called upon to speak and he told the gathering of the success in raising $4,500 for the purpose of land at the foot of Mount Greylock as part of the proposed winter sports center.

LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER

Fortunately for the success of the Berkshire Music Festival last August the weather favored the venture. The concerts, it will be recalled, were given under a tent, furnishing only limited shelter and not ideal acoustically. If the Boston Symphony orchestra is to participate in future festivals, Dr. Koussevitzky has stipulated that there must be a total of at least six concerts and that steps be taken for a shed suitable for the purpose. It speaks well for the enthusiasm of the promoters of the festival that the proposal does not dismay them. There is not the slightest idea of abandoning the venture. And the intent is to set busily to work securing assurance of the necessary funds. It looks as if the Berkshire Music Festival is likely to become an established annual fixture in that beautiful region.

---

and Musicians --- Ne

News of Music

Programs and Soloists for Extra Symphony Series; Prospects Here and Elsewhere

The programs of the Monday evening supplementary series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be devoted to "established masterpieces of symphonic music." Among the soloists will be Gaspar Cassado, the Spanish 'cellist, and Harold Bauer, the pianist. Dimitri Mitropoulos, the Greek conductor, will preside over one of the Monday evening concerts during his two-weeks' direction of the orchestra.

The Tuesday afternoon extra series—half a dozen concerts, as in recent seasons—will once more have a unifying thread. This season it will exhibit music by "important composers of the nineteenth century." The music will come from the following masters: Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Berlioz, Rossini, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov Moussorgsky, Franck, Strauss, Debussy and Sibelius.

The Monday concerts will begin on Oct. 19, the Tuesday on Nov. 3.

Frank Glazer, pianist resident in these environs for several years, will make his New York debut in a recital in Town Hall on Tuesday evening, Oct. 20. He will play Schubert's A minor Sonata, Bach's English Suite in G minor, Brahm's Sonata in F minor and shorter works by Chopin.

During the month of October, the Sunday afternoon free concerts at the Museum of Fine Arts will be omitted, the reason being the current exhibition of Japanese art. The concerts will be resumed in November.

TOWN & COUNTRY
NEW YORK CITY

SKI-HIGH

The Berkshires will have no more than caught their breath after Koussevitzky's debut there with the Boston Symphony Orchestra—a debut in the open air, with Beethoven's Seventh wafting to the stars—than snow and the skiing season will be upon them. But at least it won't find them unprepared. The disciples of the Snow Train have something awaiting them at the end of the trail, or rather the tracks, in the form of a brand-new ski run down Greylock's west flank.

The Stony Ledge trail on Massachusetts' highest mountain has a vertical drop of 1,405 feet to Goodell Hollow. It is from 20 to 50 feet wide, and turns and twists to the bottom so that it is shielded from the wind by tall woods that line its sides. On the whole, it is expected to be the most popular trail in the Berkshires this coming season.

For the uninitiate, there are more than twenty miles of foot trails winding over the mountain, suddenly springing on the expectant hiker views of distant ranges, towns like Adams and North Adams, farm lands, and thousands of acres of unbroken tree tops. The trails go by such enticing names as Hopper Trail, Bellows Pipe, Roaring Brook, Deer Hill, and Circular, and are probably tops for wild terrain in southern New England.

ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS

$100,000 MUSIC HALL ASSURED

Berkshire Symphonic Festival to Heed Koussevitsky's Demand

Pittsfield, Mass.—The Berkshire Symphonic Festival has been assured $100,000 for the erection of a great concert hall by community leaders.

The assurance was given Miss Gertrude E. Robinson-Smith, president of the Festival, at the Berkshire Hills Conference last night in the Electric Auditorium here. About 100 representatives from Williamstown to Great Barrington attended the meeting.

The future of the Festival depends upon the erection of the hall, according to Miss Robinson-Smith, for Dr. Serge Koussevitsky has demanded it before he will lead his Boston Symphonic orchestra there. Dr. Koussevitsky made two demands which must be met before he again plays for the Berkshire Festival. They are: That there be six concerts next year and that there must be a musical shed or barrack covering the orchestra and an audience of 5,000 persons.

Miss Robinson-Smith said Dr. Koussevitsky sees possibilities of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival ranking with the biggest and best of Europe.

"After a conference with him last Sunday, we of the Festival Corporation are no longer interested just from the standpoint of a small festival of three to six days. We are interested in bringing people, not only from California, but from Europe," she said.

"We shall plan six concerts next year, nine the year following and, in 1939, the World's Fair year at New York, the possibilities for the Festival are unlimited."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

Orchestral News

Boston, Chicago, St. Louis, Cleveland Symphonics Have Busy Seasons

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its fifty-sixth season in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 9 and 10—the thirteenth season under the leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky. The season will consist as usual of twenty-four pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, together with the two shorter series of six on Monday evenings, and on Tuesday afternoons; likewise eight in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge. The usual New York series will be given of five evening concerts and five Saturday afternoons in Carnegie Hall, and five in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn. The orchestra will also visit many other cities.

New works will include a Soviet Symphony by Shaporin, a Violin Concerto by Roger Sessions, the Piano Rhapsody of Rachmaninoff, which the composer is to play. Prokofieff will appear with the orchestra in his own Third Piano Concerto. Dimitri Mitropoulos will be guest conductor for two weeks.

* * *

The Cleveland Orchestra opens its nineteenth season October 15 at Severance Hall. Due to the fact that Artur Rodzinski will be in New York for part of the season, the conductorship will be shared by Igor Stravinsky, Georges Enesco, Vladimir Golschmann and Hans Lange, with Rudolph Ringwall as associate conductor. Verdi's Requiem and the Beethoven Ninth Symphony are features of the coming season.

* * *

Dr. Frederick Stock, "Grand Old Man" of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, will open the orchestra's forty-sixth season and his thirty-second season as its conductor. Assisting him will be Hans Lange, whose appointment as associate conductor was recently announced.

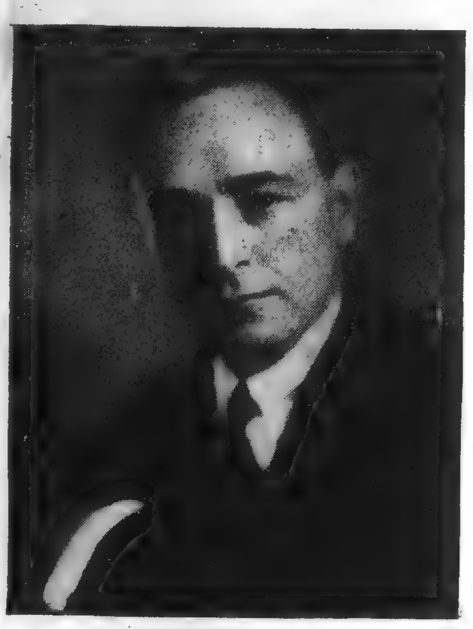
* * *

Vladimir Golschmann will begin his sixth year as leader of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, which launches its fifty-seventh consecutive season October 30. Two outstanding presentations of the year will be the Berlioz "Damnation of Faust" and William Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast."

CLEVELAND, O.
PLAIN DEALER

"Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1936," contains biographical sketches of the members and charcoal portraits, by Gerome Brush. It is a delightful book, from the standpoint of design as a whole, and also because of the comprehensive and clearly written material on the members, and the sympathetic and able rendering of their portraits—each member shown, not only as a man but as a musician listening to and absorbed in the tones he evokes from his chosen instrument. It should be of interest to a large and varied public and is printed for the orchestra by the Merrymount Press, Boston.

CAREER OF SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first Russian conductor, was born in 1874 in the small, central Russian province of Tver. There was no musical life about him, except from small visiting theatrical companies. When his father opposed a career so remote from the experience of their own community, he ran away and presented himself at the Philharmonic School in Moscow. The School was full—the year begun, but the authorities at once sensed the unusual qualities of the penniless young applicant and made a place for him. There was only one possible scholarship open to him—for a student of the double-bass, and he accordingly took on this strange instrument. In a short time he astonished everyone by coaxing a lovely 'cello-like tone and delicate melody from his huge, cumbrous bass, with its fist-wise bow. This was the KOUSSEVITZKY who later could elicit such transcendent tone and sheer melodic songfulness from a body of strings. And then, as now, he was tireless in his quest until he had reached new and unprecedented heights of beauty. KOUSSEVITZKY was soon known all over Europe as a virtuoso of the double-bass.

Coming to the end of its possibilities, KOUSSEVITZKY aspired to that richest of instruments, the hundred-fold orchestra. He made his first trials in Berlin, and then, having independent means, he assembled his own orchestra in Moscow and gave memorable concerts there and in St. Petersburg. When his public heard the erstwhile double-bassist on the infinitely more expressive instrument, the effect was electric. KOUSSEVITZKY was then, as ever, a pioneer for his art. He chartered a steamer to take his orchestra the length of the Volga through his vast country, conveying to the musically starved people of innumerable provincial towns their "first symphony concert."

After the revolution, KOUSSEVITZKY conducted for a while under government subsidy, but, fleeing restriction, established his famous "Concerts KOUSSEVITZKY" with his own orchestra in Paris. Here, and by guest performances in London and other cities, western Europe came under the spell of this magnetic and forceful leader.

Such was the leader who came to America and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924. In his twelve seasons at the head of the great Orchestra, he has touched new heights of his art and brought the Orchestra even in this present era of much fine music to new and surpassing importance. It requires a succession of seasons to test the scope of a conductor's interest in new music and old, the extent of his vision and his ability to refine his orchestra into an ever more perfect instrument, to keep his approach to the more familiar "classics" vital and absorbing. KOUSSEVITZKY's lengthening term shows him to have these abilities to a transcendent degree. The Boston Symphony concerts have never held such an abundant musical life, such utter freedom from routine, such a brilliant and engrossing eloquence.

GROWTH OF A GREAT ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is something more than half a century old. More notable than the span of its years is its place in the growth of musical America.

In 1881, the late Major HENRY L. HIGGINSON realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in America an orchestra of the sort he had heard as a student in Vienna. It was an ambitious dream for an impecunious young man, but after many years, having made his fortune as a banker, he was able to give the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the world. He engaged the finest musicians in Europe and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. He set a new precedent by exacting of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the Orchestra. The conductor he gave entire artistic freedom. The wisdom of these policies soon showed as each conductor expended his genius to the cumulative improvement of an ensemble which soon had the world's attention.

GEORGE HENSCHEL first established the Orchestra in his three seasons of 1881-1884. Then came WILHELM GERICKE, who through twelve years drilled it into what came to be its tradition of perfection. ARTHUR NIKISCH, most illustrious conductor of the day, had a shorter term, as did also EMIL PAUR and MAX FIEDLER. In 1900, Symphony Hall, the Orchestra's present home, was built. Dr. KARL MUCK, from 1906, carried the Orchestra to an unprecedented degree of virtuosity and beauty. In his 84th year, the Orchestra's founder left it in the control of a board of trustees. After two French conductors, HENRI RABAUD and PIERRE MONTEUX, the term of Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY began in 1924 and, it will be seen, has extended beyond any single term of a previous conductor. The long association of such an orchestra and such a leader is eloquently justified by the results. The great Russian conductor has brought new beauties to the Boston Symphony concerts, a fresh importance and distinction reflected in the greatly enlarged public, the festivals and special choral concerts, the broadened repertory—new and old—of the regular concerts, and the qualities of performance which are as indefinable as the genius which directs them.

On August 26 JULIEN BRYAN, roving camera reporter, left Moscow for Istanbul to film the new Turkey. If he is as successful as with his Soviet Union and Far East movies, Mr. BRYAN will have the first documentary film of present-day Turkey.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
Oct. 2/36

Bigger Music Festival Aim Of $100,000 Drive

Campaign Will be Launched at Once to Raise Money for Program of More and Better Programs and for Building to Shelter Them With Audience of 5,000 People—Announcement of Ambitious Project Follows Assurance of Leading Berkshire Business Men That Money Can be Raised—Dr. Koussevitzky Makes Return of Boston Symphony Conditional on Expansion of Program to Include Six Concerts and Construction of Permanent Shelter.

A campaign to raise $100,000 for the purpose of financing facilities to make the Berkshire Symphonic Festival as big and as good as the leading festivals in Europe and for the express purpose of constructing a shed to shelter the orchestra and 5,000 persons will be launched at once, it was announced by Miss Gertrude E. Robinson-Smith, president of the Festival, following a meeting of bankers, real estate brokers, hotel men and business men from all parts of Berkshire county at Pittsfield on Wednesday night under the sponsorship of the Berkshire Hills conference. Assurance that the money could be raised was given at the session.

The return of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who thrilled large gatherings this past summer with his Boston Symphonic orchestra depends on the success of the campaign, it was revealed, and Dr. Koussevitzky must have his answer by Nov. 1st. Miss Robinson-Smith revealed that two conditions must be met before Dr. Koussevitzky will bring his orchestra to the Berkshires again despite this year's outstanding success. First, he demands that the concert program be increased to six concerts next year and second, he insists that there be a musical shed to cover the orchestra and an audience of 5,000.

Lawrence K. Miller of Pittsfield, president of the conference, who presided at the session, announced that the conference will be represented in the co-operating committee to be formed to conduct the campaign to raise the required funds. Mr. Miller will appoint the special committee.

Miss Robinson-Smith told the gathering that Dr. Koussevitzky is tremendously impressed with the possibilities offered by the Berkshire Festival and feels that some day it will rank with the greatest in the world. If the requirements set down by Dr. Koussevitzky are met, he plans to cancel such engagements as the coronation concert in London, and a concert at Salzburg, Miss Robinson-Smith revealed. She also announced that 40 per cent of next season's boxes are already sold. Besides housing the orchestra, Miss Robinson-Smith indicated that the proposed building might be used for conventions and other similar attractions which could be brought to the Berkshires, including a championship prize fight. The site of the proposed music hall has not been selected. She also announced that the Festival grossed $21,000 in 1936. The speaker frankly admitted that the Festival could not proceed with its proposed enlarged program unless it had the support of business men in its drive to raise $100,000 and she made a special appeal to them on the basis of the money brought into the Berkshires as a result of the festival. She also said that the budget must be increased 100 per cent next year.

Testimonials and reassurance of support were received by a number of Southern Berkshire businessmen. Henry C. Neff of Adams was called upon to speak and he told the gathering of the success in raising $4,500 for the purpose of land at the foot of Mount Greylock as part of the proposed winter sports center.

LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER
Oct. 2/36

Fortunately for the success of the Berkshire Music Festival last August the weather favored the venture. The concerts, it will be recalled, were given under a tent, furnishing only limited shelter and not ideal acoustically. If the Boston Symphony orchestra is to participate in future festivals, Dr. Koussevitzky has stipulated that there must be a total of at least six concerts and that steps be taken for a shed suitable for the purpose. It speaks well for the enthusiasm of the promoters of the festival that the proposal does not dismay them. There is not the slightest idea of abandoning the venture. And the intent is to set busily to work securing assurance of the necessary funds. It looks as if the Berkshire Music Festival is likely to become an established annual fixture in that beautiful region.

---

and Musicians --- Ne

Trans. Oct. 1/36

News of Music

Programs and Soloists for Extra Symphony Series; Prospects Here and Elsewhere

The programs of the Monday evening supplementary series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be devoted to "established masterpieces of symphonic music." Among the soloists will be Gaspar Cassado, the Spanish 'cellist, and Harold Bauer, the pianist. Dimitri Mitropoulos, the Greek conductor, will preside over one of the Monday evening concerts during his two-weeks' direction of the orchestra.

The Tuesday afternoon extra series—half a dozen concerts, as in recent seasons—will once more have a unifying thread. This season it will exhibit music by "important composers of the nineteenth century." The music will come from the following masters: Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Berlioz, Rossini, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, Moussorgsky, Franck, Strauss, Debussy and Sibelius.

The Monday concerts will begin on Oct. 19, the Tuesday on Nov. 3.

Frank Glazer, pianist resident in these environs for several years, will make his New York debut in a recital in Town Hall on Tuesday evening, Oct. 20. He will play Schubert's A minor Sonata, Bach's English Suite in G minor, Brahm's Sonata in F minor and shorter works by Chopin.

During the month of October, the Sunday afternoon free concerts at the Museum of Fine Arts will be omitted, the reason being the current exhibition of Japanese art. The concerts will be resumed in November.

TOWN & COUNTRY
NEW YORK CITY

SKI-HIGH

The Berkshires will have no more than caught their breath after Koussevitzky's debut there with the Boston Symphony Orchestra—a debut in the open air, with Beethoven's Seventh wafting to the stars—than snow and the skiing season will be upon them. But at least it won't find them unprepared. The disciples of the Snow Train have something awaiting them at the end of the trail, or rather the tracks, in the form of a brand-new ski run down Greylock's west flank.

The Stony Ledge trail on Massachusetts' highest mountain has a vertical drop of 1,405 feet to Goodell Hollow. It is from 20 to 50 feet wide, and turns and twists to the bottom so that it is shielded from the wind by tall woods that line its sides. On the whole, it is expected to be the most popular trail in the Berkshires this coming season.

For the uninitiate, there are more than twenty miles of foot trails winding over the mountain, suddenly springing on the expectant hiker views of distant ranges, towns like Adams and North Adams, farm lands, and thousands of acres of unbroken treetops. The trails go by such enticing names as Hopper Trail, Bellows Pipe, Roaring Brook, Deer Hill, and Circular, and are probably tops for wild terrain in southern New England.

ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS
Oct. 2/36

$100,000 MUSIC HALL ASSURED

Berkshire Symphonic Festival to Heed Koussevitsky's Demand

Pittsfield, Mass.—The Berkshire Symphonic Festival has been assured $100,000 for the erection of a great concert hall by community leaders.

The assurance was given Miss Gertrude E. Robinson-Smith, president of the Festival, at the Berkshire Hills Conference last night in the Electric Auditorium here. About 100 representatives from Williamstown to Great Barrington attended the meeting.

The future of the Festival depends upon the erection of the hall, according to Miss Robinson-Smith, for Dr. Serge Koussevitsky has demanded it before he will lead his Boston Symphonic orchestra there. Dr. Koussevitsky made two demands which must be met before he again plays for the Berkshire Festival. They are: That there be six concerts next year and that there must be a musical shed or barrack covering the orchestra and an audience of 5,000 persons.

Miss Robinson-Smith said Dr. Koussevitsky sees possibilities of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival ranking with the biggest and best of Europe.

"After a conference with him last Sunday, we of the Festival Corporation are no longer interested just from the standpoint of a small festival of three to six days. We are interested in bringing people, not only from California, but from Europe," she said.

"We shall plan six concerts next year, nine the year following and, in 1939, the World's Fair year at New York, the possibilities for the Festival are unlimited."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

OCT 3 - 1936

Orchestral News

Boston, Chicago, St. Louis, Cleveland Symphonies Have Busy Seasons

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its fifty-sixth season in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 9 and 10—the thirteenth season under the leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky. The season will consist as usual of twenty-four pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, together with the two shorter series of six on Monday evenings, and on Tuesday afternoons; likewise eight in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge. The usual New York series will be given of five evening concerts and five Saturday afternoons in Carnegie Hall, and five in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn. The orchestra will also visit many other cities.

New works will include a Soviet Symphony by Shaporin, a Violin Concerto by Roger Sessions, the Piano Rhapsody of Rachmaninoff, which the composer is to play. Prokofieff will appear with the orchestra in his own Third Piano Concerto. Dimitri Mitropoulos will be guest conductor for two weeks.

The Cleveland Orchestra opens its nineteenth season October 15 at Severance Hall. Due to the fact that Artur Rodzinski will be in New York for part of the season, the conductorship will be shared by Igor Stravinsky, Georges Enesco, Vladimir Golschmann and Hans Lange, with Rudolph Ringwall as associate conductor. Verdi's Requiem and the Beethoven Ninth Symphony are features of the coming season.

* * *

Dr. Frederick Stock, "Grand Old Man" of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, will open the orchestra's forty-sixth season and his thirty-second season as its conductor. Assisting him will be Hans Lange, whose appointment as associate conductor was recently announced.

* * *

Vladimir Golschmann will begin his sixth year as leader of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, which launches its fifty-seventh consecutive season October 30. Two outstanding presentations of the year will be the Berlioz "Damnation of Faust" and William Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast."

CLEVELAND, O.
PLAIN DEALER

OCT 4 - 1936

"Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1936," contains biographical sketches of the members and charcoal portraits, by Gerome Brush. It is a delightful book, from the standpoint of design as a whole, and also because of the comprehensive and clearly written material on the members, and the sympathetic and able rendering of their portraits—each member shown, not only as a man but as a musician listening to and absorbed in the tones he evokes from his chosen instrument. It should be of interest to a large and varied public and is printed for the orchestra by the Merrymount Press, Boston.

Music and Musicians --- Concerts and Dance Events

Beginning a New Season

Oct. 3/36

Considering the Place of Orchestras and Conductors As the Boston Symphony Faces a New Year

By Moses Smith

It is not the age but the youth of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that gives one pause as one looks forward to the beginning of the fifty-sixth season of the world-renowned institution next Friday afternoon. Surveying the history of the orchestra, its sometimes gradual, sometimes rapid changes, its achievements and its present estate, one finds it difficult to believe that only fifty-five years have passed since Georg Henschel conducted the first concert.

There have been enormous changes in the world of music, as well as in the character of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, since then. Naturally those changes have had much to do with the development of the orchestra. To a considerable degree, however, the growth of the Boston orchestra—and symphony orchestras elsewhere—have affected the rest of the musical world. Orchestral concerts have, in the course of the last half-century, seriously displaced opera in popularity. In this country, for example, they are actually heard by a far larger audience than hears opera.

The reputations of composers are now established by successful symphonic works in much the same way as they were by successful operas in the past. This generalization holds good with regard to not only artistic reputation but also financial success. It may be true that no artist accumulates a huge fortune by means of symphonic creations. But, Puccini and Verdi and possibly one or two others aside, there was no "big money" for opera composers in the past, either.

In America, especially, the symphony orchestra is the heart of our musical life. Opera gives signs of revival, but it is still a long way behind orchestral music in importance here. A city like Boston, with an artistically imposing series of symphony concerts and with practically no opportunity to hear opera, is not exceptional in America. It is more nearly the type of American large city.

The consequence is that the responsibility of orchestral managers and conductors is all the greater. If they neglect their duties to the public and to the art of music, or if they make errors of judgment, they cannot so readily soothe their consciences with the reflection that their contribution to the musical life of the city is relatively small. Actually, it is enormous. It is, in fact, too large to be healthy. But since the condition exists, we must all make the best of it.

If the criticism directed against a symphonic conductor or artistic entrepreneur amid a given set of circumstances seems too severe for the occasion, the reader will do well to remember that a critic is concerned—and ought to be concerned—with long-run tendencies as well as immediate implications. The impersonal report and appraisal of an event in the concert-hall has its value, of course. But the most effective criticism is more personal, more enthusiastic about artistic performance, more impatient with cheapness, and always eager that standards be raised higher. Perhaps criticism has no appreciable direct effect on artists. But it has some effect on audiences. And even the greatest artists must be affected eventually by their audiences.

* * *

I must resist the temptation to wander even further away from what occasions this article, which is a salute to Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the beginning of another season. For Dr. Koussevitzky it will be the beginning of a thirteenth season with the Boston orchestra. He has had a longer continuous tenure than any previous conductor of that Orchestra, and by the end of this season he will have been in charge as long as the combined two terms of Wilhelm Gericke. The only other conductor who has had more than a single term here was Karl Muck; and his total service, abruptly terminated by the Great War, was a little less than eight years.

Dr. Koussevitzky has not only built a great orchestra and insisted upon first-rate performances. He has also been concerned with the broader implications of his position as artistic director, with a two-fold responsibility to the community in which he has worked and to the art that he has served. On the whole he has seemed to deserve this responsibility as much as any symphonic conductor in America. The testimony of his programs—of a catholicity, quality and range quite unexcelled in America—and of the performances under his direction should be sufficient justification for this statement. If any further evidence were needed it could readily be furnished by those who have watched him work, and who know how untiringly and sincerely and pasisonately he has devoted himself to his task.

Being human, he has made mistakes. Not all of us might agree as to what these mistakes were. But it seems only reasonable to agree that a conductor, like any mortal, should be subject to criticism, adverse as well as favorable. Those who find in Dr. Koussevitzky—or in any great artist—only a summary of perfections are not his best friends. Some of us who have had occasion to disagree with the wisdom and efficacy and artistic value of some of his accomplishments have been jealous of the position of artistic eminence which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has enjoyed by virtue of Dr. Koussevitzky's long association with it.

If this discourse begins to take on a familiar appearance, no apology need be offered. There is more danger of understating than of overemphasizing the thesis that we must look to an artist to realize the best that is in him; and to this end we employ his own previous accomplishments as a gauge. The more we demand of an artist the more, by inference, we praise him. An artist of the first rank may justifiably be censured for a performance which would call forth enthusiastic praise if a second-rater were in question.

* * *

The programs that Dr. Koussevitzky will offer during the coming year will not have the provocativeness of those of his early years with the orchestra, according to the prospectus of the orchestra's plans announced some time ago. One reason is that the conductor has so "educated" his audiences in the last twelve years that many a composition which might have been regarded ten years ago with suspicion or displeasure, because of its uncomfortable "modernism," is now received by Boston audiences quite in stride; and even, in many cases, positively enjoyed.

But there is no doubt that the conductor has become somewhat conservative in his tastes; perhaps it would be more accurate to say, instead of conservative, disillusioned. Perhaps, too, he has begun to realize that there must be limits to his achievements, no matter how ambitious he may be. Two or three works that he had announced for performance last year had to be put over to this season. If this season's list seems less pretentious than usual in the matter of novel works and revivals of important scores, it may well be that the conductor has finally adopted caution as a virtue.

I hope not. At least, I hope that Dr. Koussevitzky will be cautious as to the extent to which he regards caution as a virtue. I hope that before the season is over he will find a way to present here such a work as the Vaughan Williams Symphony that was promised for last year, or the still new Symphony by William Walton. Or that, crossing over to the Finnish shore, he slights on some music of Sibelius, a composer for whom Koussevitzky has been perhaps the most notable interpreter. Or that, going south and east, he may run upon at least a single stimulating score—no matter how unpopular—from Austria or Hungary or even (if it is possible) Germany.

Metropolitan Opera

Considerable interest in Boston attaches to the announcement of Edward Johnson, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Association in New York, about plans for the season. For the Metropolitan will spend from ten days to two weeks here in the spring, and any additions or changes in the way of repertory or singers will be reflected in the Boston season. Mr. Johnson's announcement, it may be added, is not final, but it includes, very likely, the most important as well as the majority of new developments that will occur this season at the Metropolitan.

The only new opera scheduled for the Metropolitan repertory this season is Richard Hageman's "Caponsacchi," postponed from last year's supplementary spring season. There will be six revivals — "The Flying Dutchman," Cimarosa's "Secret Marriage," "Samson and Delilah," "The Tales of Hoffman," Rimsky-Korsakov's "Coq d'Or" and Bellini's "Norma." The production of the "Bartered Bride, given in the spring, will be taken over and enlarged for the main season. There will thus be three operas in English—"Caponsacchi," "Secret Marriage" and "The Bartered Bride."

The new singers, most of whom have been unofficially announced at one time or another previously, will be Franca Somigli, lyric soprano from New York via Rome, Milan and Salzburg (her real name is Marian Clark); Kerstin Thorborg, Swedish contralto; Gina Cigna, dramatic soprano; Gertrud Ruenger, Polish soprano; Vina Bovy, coloratura soprano; Bidu Sayoa, Brazilian coloratura soprano; Stella Andreva, British coloratura soprano; Irene Jessner, Viennese lyric soprano; Karl Laufkoetter, German tenor, and John Brownlee, Australian baritone.

Worcester Festival

From Monday through Saturday of next week the seventy-seventh annual Worcester Music Festival will be given in the Municipal Auditorium at Worcester. As in recent seasons the conductor will be Albert Stoessel; and the Worcester Festival Chorus and the Festival Orchestra will take part. The programs and soloists are indicated below:

Monday Evening—"Samson and Delilah" by Saint-Saens in concert form. Joan Peebles, Paul Althouse, Frederic Baer and Gean Greenwell will be the solo singers.

Tuesday Evening—Program of orchestral music, including John Powell's "Set of Three" Virginia Folk Dances, Tchaikovsky's Concerto in B-flat minor for piano and orchestra, William Grant Still's "Afro-American" Symphony, "The Swan of Tuonela" by Sibelius, "Fetes" by Debussy and Chabrier's Rhapsody, "Espana." Josef Lhevinne will be the soloist.

Wednesday Afternoon — Children's concert (orchestral), with a program of music by Humperdinck, Saint-Saens, Lamar Stringfield, Paul White and Auber.

Thursday Evening—Choral and orchestral program, which will consist of Liszt's Thirteenth Psalm, the first two parts of Ernest Bloch's "Sacred Service," unaccompanied choral numbers arranged by Kurt Schindler and Noble Cain and excerpts from Borodin's "Prince Igor," Moussorgsky's "Joshua" and Wagner's "Lohengrin." Helen Jepson, soprano, will sing a group of arias with the orchestra. The other soloists will be Ruby Mercer, Pauline Pierce, William Hain, George Britton and Gean Greenwell.

Friday Evening — Miscellaneous program, Lawrence Tibbett, baritone, will sing airs with orchestra and songs with piano. The orchestra will play the Overture to Glinka's "Russlan and Ludmilla," two movements from Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony and the "Roses from the South" Waltz by Strauss. At the end of the program will come Vacquero's Song from Victor Herbert's "Natoma" and excerpts from "The Yeomen of the Guard," with incidental solos by Pauline Pierce and George Britton.

Saturday Evening—Staged performance of Gounod's "Faust." Helen Jepson will appear as Marguerite, William Hain as Faust, Gean Greenwell as Mephistopheles, Pauline Pierce as Siebel, Joan Peebles as Martha, George Britton as Valentine and Samuel Rea as Wagner. The performance will be in English, the translation by Robert A. Simon.

ALBANY, N. Y.
Knickerbocker Press

OCT 4 - 1936

Better Shelter For Symphony At Big Festival

More substantial shelter than the tent used this year has been made one of the conditions under which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will return for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival near Stockbridge, Mass., next August.

Another condition laid down by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is that his orchestra be engaged for a series of six instead of only three concerts at the festival. Because business men of the Berkshires are said to realize the tremendous value of the festival to them, no great difficulty is expected to be encountered in underwriting both a permanent structure for the concerts and the doubling of the program.

The president of the festival has begun by urging all who plan to be subscribers to the 1937 festival make their purpose known to her at once.

"We must give our answer to Dr. Koussevitzky no later than Nov. 1," she added. 'Only substantial subscriptions at this time will make this possible."

"We are not asking members and patrons to commit themselves for six concerts—only three."

Concert Calendar

Next Week

Friday Afternoon — In Symphony Hall, opening concert of the fifty-sixth season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. The program will consist of Haydn's Symphony in B-flat major, No. 102; Debussy's "La Mer" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

Saturday Evening — In Symphony Hall, first of the evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, repeating Friday's program.

(See also Free Concerts)

Week of Oct. 11

Tuesday Evening—In Steinert Hall, concert by the Boston Brass Quartet, assisted by the Izobel Burgstaller Trio. The Quartet will play a chorale by Neander, Corelli's Ninth Concerto Grosso, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Flight of the Bumble Bee," Ramsoe's Fifth Quartet, and the Siegfried Death-Music from Wagner's "Gotterdammerung," the arrangements being made by Robert D. King, a member of the Quartet. The Trio will play Mozart's Trio in G major (K. 564) and Rudolf Friml's "Rural Life in Bohemia."

Wednesday Evening — In Jordan Hall, first of two performances of "The Beatitudes" of Cesar Franck by the Boston Federal Music Project. Chorus, orchestra and soloists will be directed by A. Buckingham Simson.

Thursday Evening — In Sanders Theater, Cambridge, first of the annual series of eight concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. No program has been received.

In Jordan Hall, second of two performances of "The Beatitudes," enlisting the same participants as on the preceding evening.

Friday Afternoon—In Symphony Hall, second matinee concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. No program has been received.

Saturday Evening — In Symphony Hall, second evening concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. No program has been received.

Week of Oct. 18

Sunday Afternoon—In Symphony Hall, recital by the eminent violinist, Fritz Kreisler. No program has been received.

Monday Evening — In Symphony Hall, first of the supplementary evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. No program has been received.

Tuesday Evening—In Jordan Hall, recital by Felix Fox, established and musicianly Boston pianist, now appearing in public relatively rarely. The program will consist of three sonatas by Scarlatti; a Bach Chorale, "Rejoice, Ye Christians All" (transcribed by Philipp); Schumann's Sonata in F-sharp minor; the Twelve Etudes of Chopin's Opus 10 and pieces by Brahms and Philipp.

Friday Afternoon — In Symphony Hall, third matinee concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. No program has been received.

Saturday Evening — In Symphony Hall, third evening concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. No program has been received.

Oct 5

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Season Will Begin This Week

The first concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 56th season will be given at 2:30 next Friday afternoon and 8:15 Saturday evening in Symphony Hall. Dr Koussevitzky has chosen according to custom, a program of familiar music which does not call for a soloist. The numbers are as follows: Haydn: Symphony in B-flat, No 102 (London series No 9); Debussy: Three Orchestral Sketches, "La Mer"; Beethoven: Fifth Symphony.

From Dr Koussevitzky has come more detailed information about the suplementary Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts, of which six will be played in each series. As it is phrased, the Monday series will be devoted "to the established masterpieces of symphonic music." The first program comes Oct 19. In this series, Gaspar Cassado, young Spanish 'cellist new to America, and Harold Bauer, the eminent pianist, will appear as soloists. Dimitri Mitropoulos, the Athenian conductor, will preside at a Monday concert.

The Tuesday programs will be given over to composers of the 19th century, as follows: Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Berlioz, Rossini, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Rimsky - Korsakov, Moussorgsky, Franck, Richard Strauss, Debussy and Sibelius. The series will begin Nov 3.

Oct. 4/36

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival means business. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra management have proposed to the festival committee that it expand next year's festival from three to six concerts. They ask, furthermore, that a permanent shed be erected for the orchestra to use as an auditorium instead of the tent that was employed last August. It is also suggested that a permanent home be selected for the festival.

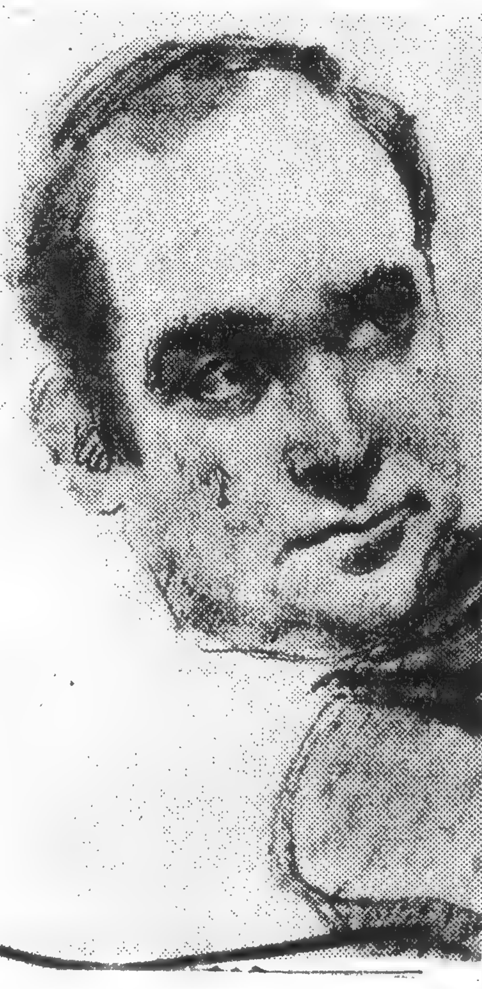
The festival committee is eager to have the enterprise grow in size and scope. It intends to conduct a campaign for an increased list of members and patrons so that it may accept the orchestra's proposals.

It is clear, in any event, that both the committee and the orchestra hope to move along steadily toward the goal of establishing a Summer festival for America on a scale that will compare favorably with the leading European festivals.

DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL

OCT 3 - 1936

Gerome Brush has made individual studies of members of Boston Symphony orchestra and these are included together with miniature biographies in a volume just issued by the orchestra. This study is of Leon Gorodetzky, Russian violinist.



Oct 6 Trans

News of Music

The first rehearsal for the fifty-sixth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Symphony Hall yesterday. The musicians greeted Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who addressed them on the subject of the season's prospects, about which he was optimistic. He indicated that the orchestra will this year have a larger public than in recent seasons.

Fritz Kreisler has completed a

28

Entering 1st Fri. aft. concert' of 1936

Fall Season Finds Crowded October Calendar

Mrs Richard King Thorndike Jr (Lucy Saltonstall Rantoul) of Marlboro st was among the early arrivals at the opening Symphony concert of the season Friday.

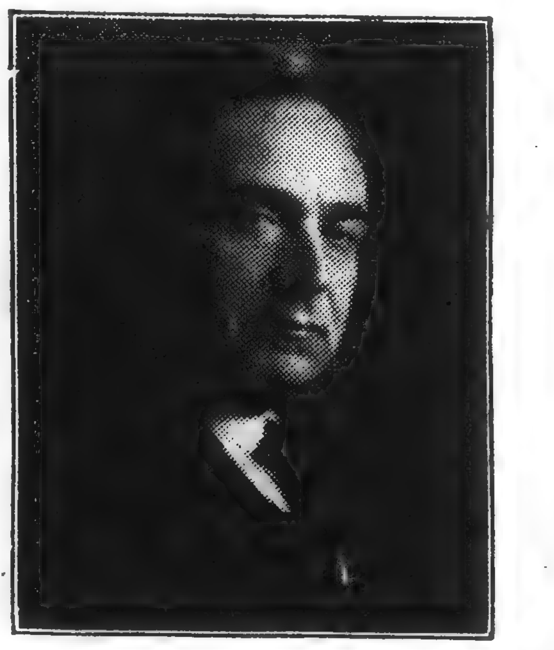
Among the debutantes of this season at the first Symphony concert on Friday evening was Miss Eleanor Coolidge, daughter of Mr and Mrs William H. Coolidge Jr of Beverly Farms.

The Music Box

Harvard Crimson

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Begin Its Season This Afternoon

Under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its regular season with concerts this afternoon and tomorrow evening in Symphony Hall in Boston. The orchestra and its conductor need no introduction in this column; it appears that the program for the pair of concerts is likewise familiar.



DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Haydn's Symphony in B flat major No. 102 is the first number. Composed during the winter of 1794-95 while Haydn was on his second visit to London, the symphony exhibits both a wealth of eighteenth century charm and a real developed orchestration. It is not without a certain justification that with such a work as this to his credit, Haydn is often known as the father of the symphony.

The remainder of the program is taken up with Debussy's three symphonic sketches, "La Mer," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The former is delightful musical description of a light, joyous variety (there is no great storm or torrent as in many other program pieces with similar names). The latter is often considered the greatest of Beethoven's nine symphonies; but let the music speak for itself—it is far more eloquent than mere words.

28

Entering 1st Fri. aft. concert of 1936

Fall Season Finds Crowded

Mrs Richard King Thorndike Jr (Lucy Saltonstall Rantoul) of Marlboro st was among the early arrivals at the opening Symphony concert of the season Friday.

October Calendar

Among the debutantes of this season at the first Symphony concert on Friday evening was Miss Eleanor Coolidge, daughter of Mr and Mrs William H. Coolidge Jr of Beverly Farms.

Harvard Crimson

The Music Box

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Begin Its Season This Afternoon

Under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its regular season with concerts this afternoon and tomorrow evening in Symphony Hall in Boston. The orchestra and its conductor need no introduction in this column; it appears that the program for the pair of concerts is likewise familiar.

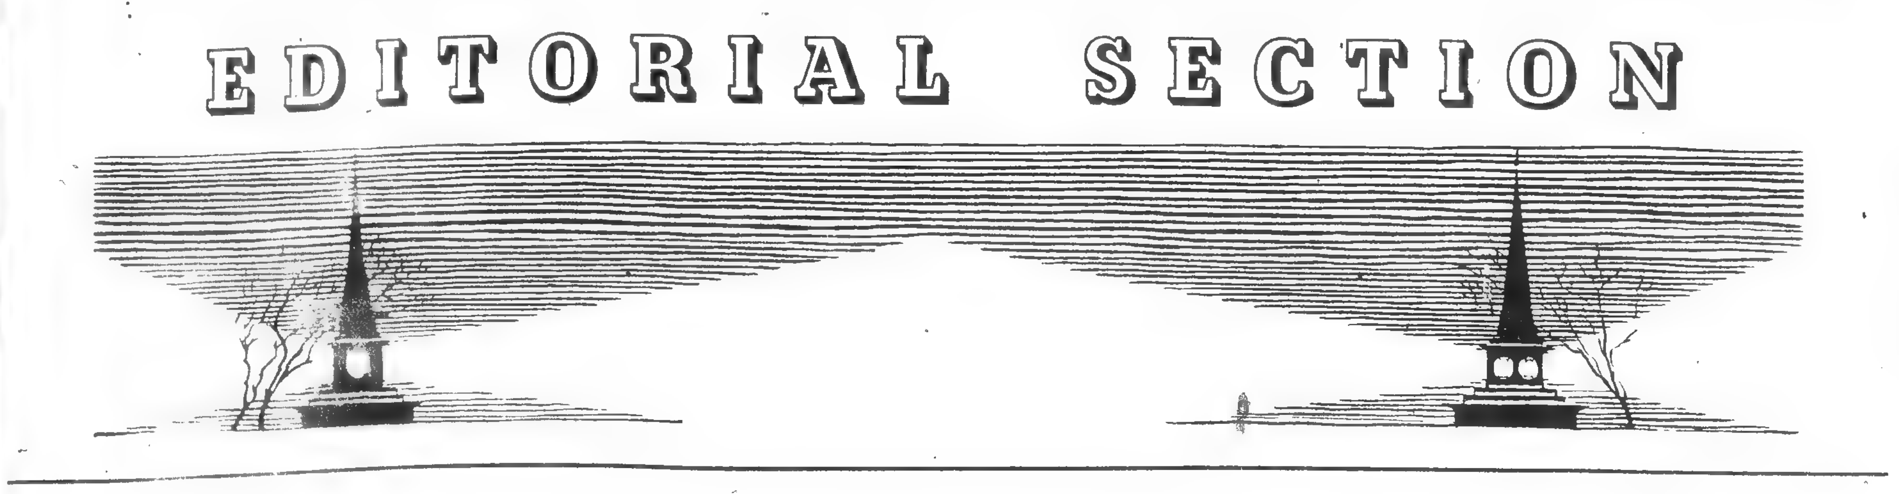
DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Haydn's Symphony in B flat major No. 102 is the first number. Composed during the winter of 1794-95 while Haydn was on his second visit to London, the symphony exhibits both a wealth of eighteenth century charm and a real developed orchestration. It is not without a certain justification that with such a work as this to his credit, Haydn is often known as the father of the symphony.

The remainder of the program is taken up with Debussy's three symphonic sketches, "La Mer," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The former is delightful musical description of a light, joyous variety (there is no great storm or torrent as in many other program pieces with similar names). The latter is often considered the greatest of Beethoven's nine symphonies; but let the music speak for itself—it is far more eloquent than mere words.

, Oct., 193

24

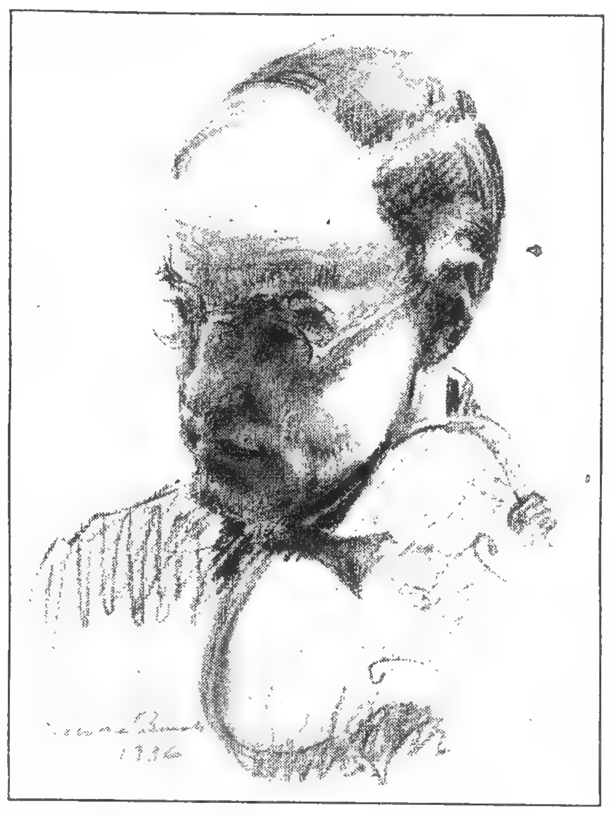


NEW ENGLANDERS MAKING GOOD IN NEW ENGLAND

No. 7

Some Musicians and an Artist

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra is the greatest artistic effort in New England. Prompted, backed, and fostered at first by that old Yankee, Major Higginson; it stands out now not only in New England but is one of the few really great orchestras of the world. At the time Major Higginson started this orchestra, there were so few recognized musicians in this country that he looked to Europe for his talent, and the Boston blue bloods took it for granted that if they wanted to hear Bach or Beethoven decently played it would have to be by foreigners . . . The very fact of this great orchestra's being in Boston has developed the American musician, and today, unbeknownst to most of us, over ten per cent of the musicians now playing in the orchestra are real New England Yankees: to wit,—M. Beale, M. Bryant, C. Deane, H. Grover, C. Pinfield, L. Rogers, K. V. Smith, A. Snow, C. Stockbridge, L. Stonestreet, R. Tapley, (being a partial list.)



Portrait of Charles Deane, Viola, B. S. O. from "The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 1936" by Gerome Brush, published by the B. S. O. Inc.

This was brought out recently by the exhibit of 109 portrait drawings of the various members of the orchestra by the Yankee artist, Gerome Brush . . . first on exhibition at Stockbridge, Mass., during the musical festival there and following that, at the Widener Library in Cambridge, Mass., during the Tricentennial Festival. The exhibit is now at Symphony Hall in Boston.

It is said in well informed art circles that this exhibit represents the largest single collection of portraits by any one living man today.

It is even more interesting to realize that while Mr. Brush was drawing these famous musicians he had the opportunity of talking to them . . . learning something of the lives of each so that his recent book, called The Boston Symphony Orchestra, of 1936 contains not only the reproductions of all these many drawings, but brief biographies of each musician as well.

One of these drawings is reproduced here through the courtesy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc. the publishers of the book.

The following are excerpts from some of the biographies of these Yankee musicians: (the words are Mr. Brush's)

L. ROGERS: "Sir Oliver Lodge said the last thing a fish would think of was water. Mr. Rogers like a fish in the deep, is the only musician in the Boston Symphony who toils day and night without ever making a sound; and the last thing he would think of is his remarkable ability to read music. He is the librarian . . ."

A. SNOW: "They had a melodeon in the front parlor. That is how he became an organist . . ."

C. L. DEANE: "As Americans go, we think of them as hard headed, tight fisted people, who think in terms of potatoes and fish and who tell about moose,—but like Scotland, Maine has given birth to the gentle, the thoughtful, and the artistic . . ."

M. A. BEALE: "New Englanders are scions of Puritanism, scorners of music. From time to time, there is the throw back, and when they throw them back,—they are among the finest artists in the world."

H. F. GROVER: "He has no curiosity about the European point of view. His love is for his family, right in Boston. His passion is the viola. He still likes Indian pudding and ice cream."

CARL STOCKBRIDGE: " . . . whose progenitor was one of a 1635 landing party is the son of a 'cellist who played under Sir Georg Henschel, the first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Despite the grandeur of European training, with which these Yankees have been in competition, it is thrilling to realize that so many have risen from our own little white wooden towns, with nothing but their own native initiative to back them.

Oct 4

DRAMATIC PAGE

OPEN T

NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

John McCormack Is Back Again

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

ABSENT from American concert halls for two seasons, John McCormack is once more on our shores. On the evening of Nov. 12 he will once again be heard in Symphony Hall. This very evening at 10 o'clock he may be heard via radio from the Academy of Music in Philadelphia, where he will be soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra, Mr. Stokowski conducting.

Apropos tenors, it is interesting to note that Roland Hayes, when he sings in Symphony Hall three weeks from this afternoon will include two airs of Walther from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," the Trial Song of the first act and the more familiar Prize Song.

* * * *

It would appear that the supplementary series of Symphony Concerts, the six of Monday evenings and the same number of Tuesday matinees, will this season be of special interest. The purely orchestral pieces on Monday evenings will once more be of the standard variety: "established masterpieces" is what the Symphony Hall announcement calls them. Of these one only is thus far specified, the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt, in the performance of which the orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and Rulon Robison, tenor. The revival of this symphony at this and at the regular series of concerts is in recognition of the fact that Liszt was born in 1811 and died in 1886, a double anniversary commemorated in the composer's native Hungary some months ago.

For soloists these Monday concerts will offer, among others, Gaspar Cassado, the young Spanish 'cellist about to make his first visit to America, and the eminent pianist, Harold Bauer. Subscribers to this series will once more be privileged to hear the Athenian Mitropoulos as guest conductor.. Oct. 19 is the date of the first concert.

For the concerts of Tuesday, the first of which falls on Nov. 3 (a date this year when attention is apt to be centred on matters other than musical), is once more planned a series of special programmes. Last year, it will be recalled, these concerts were given over to the music of Schubert, Schumann and Brahms. This year their preoccupation will be with important composers of the 19th century, including both those whose major works were written subsequent to 1800 and those who are still living today. In detail these somewhat freely generalized 19th century composers are Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Berlioz, Rossini, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, Moussorgsky, Franck, Strauss, Debussy and Sibelus. It looks as though the subscribers to the Tuesday concerts were in for a good time.

* * * *

It seems that the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Berkshires next summer is contingent on the granting of certain demands which were not made this year. At a recent conference in Stockbridge, attended by the conductor and the manager of the orchestra, it was stated that the orchestra would appear there next year only on condition that there be six concerts instead of three and that a shed be built to replace the tent. It is now up to the guarantors of the concerts who are asked, however, to subscribe for but three of the six concerts.

* * * *

In view of the present dearth of chamber-music hereabouts, it is good to know that the Boston String Quartet, which recently played programmes of Harvard music at the University's Tercentenary, will again give a series of three concerts in Jordan Hall, the first of them falling on Jan. 4. Among the works scheduled for performance are three by American composers: quartets by Randall Thompson and Quincy Porter, and a trio by Walter Piston. Also announced are Beethoven's quartet, Opus 95, Brahms' in C minor, Mozart's string quintet, a work by Jean Kras for harp and quartet, and a pianoforte quartet by Jean Hure; a stimulating list.

* * * *

The recital season at Jordan Hall will open on Tuesday evening, Oct. 20, with a recital by Felix Fox, resident pianist. On Thursday evening, the 29th, he will be followed there by an 11-year-old pianistic prodigy from the Middle West, Marilyn Meyer. On the evening of Oct. 25 Jordan Hall will be the scene of a concert by the Russian Symphonic Choir.

* * * *

For more immediate prospect the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its regular season on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week, playing Haydn's Symphony in B flat, No. 102, Debussy's "The Sea" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

AND in Boston the music news is still concerned with the opening of the 56th season of e Boston Symphony Orchestra, which occurs
th the pair of concerts to be given next Fri-y afternoon and Saturday evening in Symony Hall.

Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen Haydn's Symony in B flat major, No. 102—the ninth in the ries written for Salomon in London; Debussy's a Mer"; and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony for the opening program.

Announcements have been made concerning the series of six Monday evening concerts and six Tuesday afternoon concerts.

As in past seasons, Dr. Koussevitzky has designed the Tuesday series with a particular purpose. In the season to come, the concerts will be in representation of important 19th century composers. Accordingly, the music drawn upon will be that of Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Berlioz, Rossini, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, Moussorgsky, Franck, Strauss, Debussy, and Sibelius.

* * *

THE PROGRAMS of the Monday evening series will be devoted to the established masterpieces of symphonic music.

Gaspar Cassado, the young Spanish 'cellist who is about to make his first visit to America will come to Boston to appear in this series.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, the Athenian conductor who is to make his second visit to America to act as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during mid-season will appear at one of the Monday evening concerts.

Oct 4

News of the World of Music

Symphony Musicians in New Book

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

IF certain members of the Macedonian phalanx had been in the habit of dropping their spears, Alexander would not have had to worry about new worlds to conquer. If each and every member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were not an artist in his own right, master of his instrument, a responsible and responsive musician, that orchestra would not excite to the degree that it does, American navy and European admiration. Yet outside the leaders of the various choirs, who from time to time rate mention in the reviews, the individual men in the orchestra do not figure very conspicuously in the minds of the audiences, who are inclined to look upon the orchestra as a unit rather than as an assemblage of units.

Perhaps it is because we know them, but some of us are inclined to think that the players in the Symphony Orchestra amount to a little more as men and as individuals than do the rank and file of those who constitute the other great American bands. Now, thanks to Gerome Brush, so appropriately named, a gifted artist who wields the pen hardly less expressively than he does brush or crayon, each of the 109 men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is limned for us in portrait, biographical sketch and word-picture in the volume lately issued by Symphony Hall. The title of this volume is simply "Boston Symphony Orchestra; Charcoal Drawings of Its Members With Biographical Sketches"; its price is the modest amount of $1.50; and it is inconceivable that any subscriber to any one of the four series of Symphony concerts will be willing to do without it.

It is but natural that the likenesses of these men should vary in fidelity. For the most part, the identity of each portrait would be quickly discerned even if each man were not depicted playing his own particular instrument—which in each case he is. Due to Mr. Brush's tact and resourcefulness as interviewer we learn from his book many interesting facts about these men. We learn what are their hobbies, their intellectual interests apart from their regular jobs. We learn that Heinrich Lorbeer of the horn octet is not only the oldest member of the orchestra, having served it for 45 years, but that at the age of 71 he is physically one of the strongest. We learn that these men have come to us from virtually every important country in Europe, and that a gratifying number of them were born in what Mr. Menchen has been pleased to call These States. . . . And, of course, there is a portrait of Dr. Koussevitzky to head a list which begins with five A's and ends with no less than four Z's.

SPRINGFIELD ,MASS.
REPUBLICAN

News o

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL WILL EXPAND IN 1937

Development of the Berkshire Symphonic festival, so successful in 1936, into a great festival that will make the Berkshires as outstanding as the great festival centers of Europe is now being considered by the festival organization and a group of business men in the county.

Several representative business men of Berkshire met last week with Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of the Berkshire Symphonic festival, at her home in Stockbridge, to discuss the reactions to the 1936 festival to consider whether the time is ripe for further development of the festival idea and to discover whether there is sufficient interest on the part of business men to support a plan covering several years. If there is sufficient sentiment in favor of the festival, it will be continued.

Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and George E. Judd, manager, were in the Berkshires earlier in the week and it was because of this visit that the conference was called.

The Boston Symphony orchestra with Dr Koussevitzky, will come to Berkshire next year for six concerts instead of three as given this year as the beginning of the plan. Six concerts constitute the first condition of their returning. The second condition is that a shed be built to replace the tent. To meet these conditions, it is the consensus of the festival executive committee, which coincides with that of Dr Koussevitzky, that a permanent home must be found, and a long range plan adopted to achieve the aim of making Berkshire as outstanding in America as the great festival centers of Europe.

Miss Smith explained to the group that the long range plan, if adopted, must have the support of the leading businessmen of the Berkshire community who have sufficient imagination and vision to realize its possibilities. The long range plan will include the six concerts next year with more developments each year.

Several men expressed their conviction that the festival this year had been of tremendous value to the whole Berkshire region, that a real festival will be established somewhere in this country, that Berkshire has the opportunity to become the pioneer.

Miss Robinson Smith, president of the Berkshire Symphonic festival, urged that persons who intend to become patrons and members of the 1937 festival do so at once.

She said: "In view of the possibilities of the future, obviously the decision of the board of trustees will depend largely on the response of members and patrons. We must give an answer to Dr Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra not later than November 1. With the bigger plan in mind, naturally memberships and patrons become our only capital. We cannot, therefore, give an affirmative answer unless we have a substantial response.

"May I repeat that if there are six concerts next year, sustaining members and patrons will be able to buy tickets for additional concerts at the same price. Sustaining memberships are $5 for one or two tickets depending on location, for three concerts.

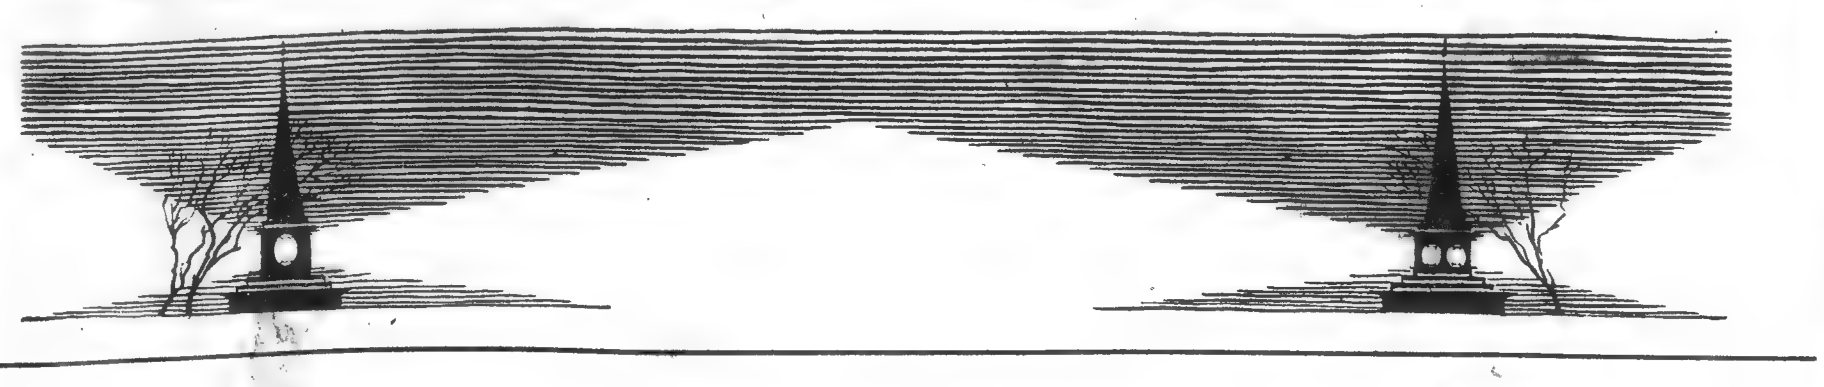
Patrons pay $75 for boxes with six chairs for three concerts.

"We are not asking members and patrons to commit themselves for six concerts—only three. Inquiries and memberships may be addressed to the Berkshire Symphonic festival, Stockbridge, Mass."

"Yankee" Monthly, Oct., 1936

24

EDITORIAL SECTION



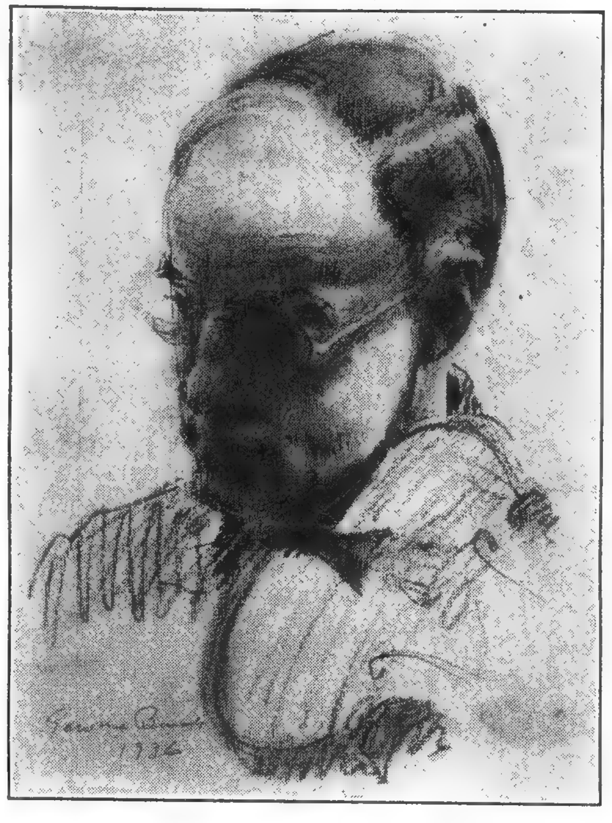
NEW ENGLANDERS MAKING GOOD IN NEW ENGLAND

No. 7

Some Musicians and an Artist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the greatest artistic effort in New England. Prompted, backed, and fostered at first by that old Yankee, Major Higginson; it stands out now not only in New England but is one of the few really great orchestras of the world. At the time Major Higginson started this orchestra, there were so few recognized musicians in this country that he looked to Europe for his talent, and the Boston blue bloods took it for granted that if they wanted to hear Bach or Beethoven decently played it would have to be by foreigners . . . The very fact of this great orchestra's being in Boston has developed the American musician, and today, unbeknownst to most of us, over ten per cent of the musicians now playing in the orchestra are real New England Yankees: to wit,—M. Beale, M. Bryant, C. Deane, H. Grover, C. Pinfield, L. Rogers, K. V. Smith, A. Snow, C. Stockbridge, L. Stonestreet, R. Tapley, (being a partial list.)

This was brought out recently by the exhibit of 109 portrait drawings of the various members of the orchestra by the Yankee artist, Gerome Brush . . . first on exhibition at Stockbridge, Mass., during the musical festival there and following that, at the Widener Library in Cambridge, Mass., during the Tricentennial Festival. The exhibit is now at Symphony Hall in Boston.



Portrait of Charles Deane, Viola, B. S. O. from "The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 1936" by Gerome Brush, published by the B. S. O. Inc.

It is said in well informed art circles that this exhibit represents the largest single collection of portraits by any one living man today.

It is even more interesting to realize that while Mr. Brush was drawing these famous musicians he had the opportunity of talking to them . . . learning something of the lives of each so that his recent book, called The Boston Symphony Orchestra, of 1936 contains not only the reproductions of all these many drawings, but brief biographies of each musician as well.

One of these drawings is reproduced here through the courtesy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc. the publishers of the book.

The following are excerpts from some of the biographies of these Yankee musicians: (the words are Mr. Brush's)

L. Rogers: "Sir Oliver Lodge said the last thing a fish would think of was water. Mr. Rogers like a fish in the deep, is the only musician in the Boston Symphony who toils day and night without ever making a sound; and the last thing he would think of is his remarkable ability to read music. He is the librarian . . ."

A. Snow: "They had a melodeon in the front parlor. That is how he became an organist . . ."

C. L. Deane: "As Americans go, we think of them as hard headed, tight fisted people, who think in terms of potatoes and fish and who tell about moose,—but like Scotland, Maine has given birth to the gentle, the thoughtful, and the artistic . . ."

M. A. Beale: "New Englanders are scions of Puritanism, scorners of music. From time to time, there is the throw back, and when they throw them back,—they are among the finest artists in the world."

H. F. Grover: "He has no curiosity about the European point of view. His love is for his family, right in Boston. His passion is the viola. He still likes Indian pudding and ice cream."

Carl Stockbridge: " . . . whose progenitor was one of a 1635 landing party is the son of a 'cellist who played under Sir Georg Henschel, the first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Despite the grandeur of European training, with which these Yankees have been in competition, it is thrilling to realize that so many have risen from our own little white wooden towns, with nothing but their own native initiative to back them.

Oct 4

DRAMATIC PAGE

OPEN T

NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

John McCormack Is Back Again

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

ABSENT from American concert halls for two seasons, John McCormack is once more on our shores. On the evening of Nov. 12 he will once again be heard in Symphony Hall. This very evening at 10 o'clock he may be heard via radio from the Academy of Music in Philadelphia, where he will be soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra, Mr. Stokowski conducting.

Apropos tenors, it is interesting to note that Roland Hayes, when he sings in Symphony Hall three weeks from this afternoon will include two airs of Walther from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," the Trial Song of the first act and the more familiar Prize Song.

* * * *

It would appear that the supplementary series of Symphony Concerts, the six of Monday evenings and the same number of Tuesday matinees, will this season be of special interest. The purely orchestral pieces on Monday evenings will once more be of the standard variety: "established masterpieces" is what the Symphony Hall announcement calls them. Of these one only is thus far specified, the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt, in the performance of which the orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and Rulon Robison, tenor. The revival of this symphony at this and at the regular series of concerts is in recognition of the fact that Liszt was born in 1811 and died in 1886, a double anniversary commemorated in the composer's native Hungary some months ago.

For soloists these Monday concerts will offer, among others, Gaspar Cassado, the young Spanish 'cellist about to make his first visit to America, and the eminent pianist, Harold Bauer. Subscribers to this series will once more be privileged to hear the Athenian Mitropoulos as guest conductor.. Oct. [illegible] is the date of the first concert.

For the concerts of Tuesday, the first of which falls on Nov. 3 (a date this year when attention is apt to be centred on matters other than musical), is once more planned a series of special programmes. Last year, it will be recalled, these concerts were given over to the music of Schubert, Schumann and Brahms. This year their preoccupation will be with important composers of the 19th century, including both those whose major works were written subsequent to 1800 and those who are still living today. In detail these somewhat freely generalized 19th century composers are Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Berlioz, Rossini, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, Moussorgsky, Franck, Strauss, Debussy and Sibelus. It looks as though the subscribers to the Tuesday concerts were in for a good time.

* * * *

It seems that the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Berkshires next summer is contingent on the granting of certain demands which were not made this year. At a recent conference in Stockbridge, attended by the conductor and the manager of the orchestra, it was stated that the orchestra would appear there next year only on condition that there be six concerts instead of three and that a shed be built to replace the tent. It is now up to the guarantors of the concerts who are asked, however, to subscribe for but three of the six concerts.

* * * *

In view of the present dearth of chamber-music hereabouts, it is good to know that the Boston String Quartet, which recently played programmes of Harvard music at the University's Tercentenary, will again give a series of three concerts in Jordan Hall, the first of them falling on Jan. 4. Among the works scheduled for performance are three by American composers: quartets by Randall Thompson and Quincy Porter, and a trio by Walter Piston. Also announced are Beethoven's quartet, Opus 95, Brahms' in C minor, Mozart's string quintet, a work by Jean Kras for harp and quartet, and a pianoforte quartet by Jean Hure; a stimulating list.

* * * *

The recital season at Jordan Hall will open on Tuesday evening, Oct. 20, with a recital by Felix Fox, resident pianist. On Thursday evening, the 29th, he will be followed there by an 11-year-old pianistic prodigy from the Middle West, Marilyn Meyer. On the evening of Oct. 25 Jordan Hall will be the scene of a concert by the Russian Symphonic Choir.

* * * *

For more immediate prospect the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its regular season on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week, playing Haydn's Symphony in B flat, No. 102, Debussy's "The Sea" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

AND in Boston the music news is still con- rned with the opening of the 56th season of e Boston Symphony Orchestra, which occurs th the pair of concerts to be given next Fri- y afternoon and Saturday evening in Sym- ony Hall.

Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen Haydn's Sym- ony in B flat major, No. 102—the ninth in the ries written for Salomon in London; Debussy's a Mer"; and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony for the opening program.

Announcements have been made concerning the series of six Monday evening concerts and six Tuesday afternoon concerts.

As in past seasons, Dr. Koussevitzky has designed the Tuesday series with a particular purpose. In the season to come, the concerts will be in representation of important 19th century composers. Accordingly, the music drawn upon will be that of Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Berlioz, Rossini, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, Moussorgsky, Franck, Strauss, Debussy, and Sibelius.

* * *

THE PROGRAMS of the Monday evening series will be devoted to the established masterpieces of symphonic music.

Gaspar Cassado, the young Spanish 'cellist who is about to make his first visit to America will come to Boston to appear in this series.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, the Athenian conductor who is to make his second visit to America to act as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during mid-season will appear at one of the Monday evening concerts.

Oct 4

News of the World of Music

Symphony Musicians in New Book

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

IF certain members of the Macedonian phalanx had been in the habit of dropping their spears, Alexander would not have had to worry about new worlds to conquer. If each and every member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were not an artist in his own right, master of his instrument, a responsible and responsive musician, that orchestra would not excite to the degree that it does, American navy and European admiration. Yet outside the leaders of the various choirs, who from time to time rate mention in the reviews, the individual men in the orchestra do not figure very conspicuously in the minds of the audiences, who are inclined to look upon the orchestra as a unit rather than as an assemblage of units.

Perhaps it is because we know them, but some of us are inclined to think that the players in the Symphony Orchestra amount to a little more as men and as individuals than do the rank and file of those who constitute the other great American bands. Now, thanks to Gerome Brush, so appropriately named, a gifted artist who wields the pen hardly less expressively than he does brush or crayon, each of the 109 men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is limned for us in portrait, biographical sketch and word-picture in the volume lately issued by Symphony Hall. The title of this volume is simply "Boston Symphony Orchestra; Charcoal Drawings of Its Members With Biographical Sketches"; its price is the modest amount of $1.50; and it is inconceivable that any subscriber to any one of the four series of Symphony concerts will be willing to do without it.

It is but natural that the likenesses of these men should vary in fidelity. For the most part, the identity of each portrait would be quickly discerned even if each man were not depicted playing his own particular instrument—which in each case he is. Due to Mr. Brush's tact and resourcefulness as interviewer we learn from his book many interesting facts about these men. We learn what are their hobbies, their intellectual interests apart from their regular jobs. We learn that Heinrich Lorbeer of the horn octet is not only the oldest member of the orchestra, having served it for 45 years, but that at the age of 71 he is physically one of the strongest. We learn that these men have come to us from virtually every important country in Europe, and that a gratifying number of them were born in what Mr. Menchen has been pleased to call These States. . . . And, of course, there is a portrait of Dr. Koussevitzky to head a list which begins with five A's and ends with no less than four Z's.

Oct. 4/36

SPRINGFIELD ,MASS. REPUBLICAN

News o

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL WILL EXPAND IN 1937

Development of the Berkshire Symphonic festival, so successful in 1936, into a great festival that will make the Berkshires as outstanding as the great festival centers of Europe is now being considered by the festival organization and a group of business men in the county.

Several representative business men of Berkshire met last week with Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of the Berkshire Symphonic festival, at her home in Stockbridge, to discuss the reactions to the 1936 festival to consider whether the time is ripe for further development of the festival idea and to discover whether there is sufficient interest on the part of business men to support a plan covering several years. If there is sufficient sentiment in favor of the festival, it will be continued.

Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and George E. Judd, manager, were in the Berkshires earlier in the week and it was because of this visit that the conference was called.

The Boston Symphony orchestra with Dr Koussevitzky, will come to Berkshire next year for six concerts instead of three as given this year as the beginning of the plan. Six concerts constitute the first condition of their returning. The second condition is that a shed be built to replace the tent. To meet these conditions, it is the consensus of the festival executive committee, which coincides with that of Dr Koussevitzky, that a permanent home must be found, and a long range plan adopted to achieve the aim of making Berkshire as outstanding in America as the great festival centers of Europe.

Miss Smith explained to the group that the long range plan, if adopted, must have the support of the leading businessmen of the Berkshire community who have sufficient imagination and vision to realize its possibilities. The long range plan will include the six concerts next year with more developments each year.

Several men expressed their conviction that the festival this year had been of tremendous value to the whole Berkshire region, that a real festival will be established somewhere in this [illegible], that Berkshire has the opportunity to become the pioneer.

Miss Robinson Smith, president of the Berkshire Symphonic festival, urged that persons who intend to become patrons and members of the 1937 festival do so at once.

She said: "In view of the possibilities of the future, obviously the decision of the board of trustees will depend largely on the response of members and patrons. We must give an answer to Dr Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra not later than November 1. With the bigger plan in mind, naturally memberships and patrons become our only capital. We cannot, therefore, give an affirmative answer unless we have a substantial response.

"May I repeat that if there are six concerts next year, sustaining members and patrons will be able to buy tickets for additional concerts at the same price. Sustaining memberships are $5 for one or two tickets depending on location, for three concerts.

Patrons pay $75 for boxes with six chairs for three concerts.

"We are not asking members and patrons to commit themselves for six concerts—only three. Inquiries and memberships may be addressed to the Berkshire Symphonic festival, Stockbridge, Mass."

25

OCTOBER 5, 1936 B

cians --- News of th

Music News and Comment

Bernard Zighera's Plans for a Series of Concerts of Music Composed for Chamber Orchestra

By Moses Smith

An attractive and—for Boston—unusual series of programs is in prospect this season from a chamber orchestra of Boston Symphony Orchestra members conducted by Bernard Zighera, first harpist of the orchestra, who will also be making his Boston debut as conductor. There will be three subscription concerts in Jordan Hall on Tuesday evenings, Dec. 15, Jan. 12 and Feb. 9. The programs are to consist entirely of music written for small orchestra—for the most part original works. Many of the numbers will be new to Boston even though, in some cases, they were written in an earlier century.

At each concert there will be a soloist or soloists. The first program, which may no doubt be taken as typical, is now at hand. It is an engaging list of music for the most part little known hereabouts. How attractive the music will be in the actual listening it would, of course, be presumptuous to say before the actual performance. The program will open with a Symphony in D major by H. J. Rigel, an eighteenth-century composer. Then follows a group of "Interludes" for four French horns. Jacques Ibert's "Concertino da camera" for alto saxaphone and small orchestra will be played for the first time in America, with Chester Hazlett as the soloist. The fourth number will be Alfredo Casella's arrangement for chamber orchestra of Domenico Scarlatti's Toccata, Bouree and Gigue. Guiomar Novaes, the fine-grained, musicianly Brazilian pianist, who has not played in public in Boston in many years, will be the soloist in the Mozart Concerto in E-flat major. The final number will be Hindemith's "Kammermusik No. 1."

The soloists at the second concert will be Ethel Bartlett and Rae Robertson, the English two-piano team that was so well received in its first appearance in Boston last season. They will play in a Bach Concerto for two pianos and strings in C minor and one other number not yet fixed. At the final concert Olga Averino, the Boston soprano, and another to be announced will be the soloists. The second and third programs have not been finally settled, but they will probably include music by Saint-Saens, Vivaldi, Mozart, Wagner, Boccherini, Bach and Ernst Toch; possibly, also, by Darius Milhaud and one or two others.

Mr. Zighera, the conductor and, in a sense, the entrepreneur of the new venture, has been a member of the Symphony Orchestra since 1926. Before that he studied at the Conservatoire in Paris under Philipp, Tournier, Camille Chevillard and Lucien Capet, taking a first prize in both piano and harp. (The only other student to have accomplished this feat, it is said, was Carlos Salzedo.) Mr. Zighera had conductorial ambitions in Paris before coming to America, I am informed. In the last ten years those ambitions have been more or less dormant. Now his plan has the good-will and support of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

It is a good plan. There is a large "literature" for chamber orchestra. In recent seasons Boston has had to rely on occasional performances for even an inkling of this repertory. Now and then Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra have offered an item written for a small group. But such excursions have had to be, at most, infrequent. Besides, Symphony Hall is too large for the successful projection of the intimate kind of music written for chamber orchestra.

Subscribers to the new series will naturally have preference over those who seek tickets for single concerts. Mrs. Anita Davis-Chase at 234 Boylston street is in charge of the advance sale.

Looking Backward

This department has received several communications on the subject of the recent performances of opera in the Boston Opera House by the local Federal Music Project under Ernst Hoffmann. All of the letters, as it happens, were commendatory both of the character of the performances and of the laudable tendency of the opera project as a whole.

Since the letters commended the reviews and comment printed in these columns it would be impertinent to print them, especially since they were probably not intended for publication. But at least two of the writers made a point which ought not to be passed by. It was to the effect that the general audience, which attended in great numbers, was evidently more aware of the significance of the project than the so-called high-brows, who stayed away in droves. This department is happy to have its own views on this point confirmed by expert observers.

And while on the subject of W P A opera it is timely to repair a neglect. Several months ago this department expressed its concern over the obviously uncertain administration of the music project here, over the charges of rivalry, meddling and politics which apparently had some basis in fact. At that time it seemed that Mr. Hoffman's promotion of his opera plans was at a stalemate. I was happy to observe, from the admirable way in which the recent performances were presented, that either the original doubts were not based on fact or that conditions had changed within the W P A administration. At any rate, the present executive director, Mr. William Haddon, obviously has the hearty cooperation and good-will of his subordinates.

Educational Note

A course of illustrated lectures on "Appreciation of Symphonies," based on the week-end programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be given this year, as in past seasons, in the Lecture Hall of the Boston Public Library. The time of the lectures will be 5.15 P.M. on the Thursday preceding each Friday concert. The first lecture will be given on Thursday of this week. Richard G Appel is in general charge of the course, which is given under the auspices of the Division of University Extension and which, as in recent seasons, enlists the aid of Alfred H. Meyer and guest speakers.

Other courses in the Division's current leaflet that are of general, non-technical interest are Professor Meyer's in "Music Appreciation," meeting at the Library on Tuesdays at 7.45 P.M.; Dorothy Tremble Moyer's series on "Backgrounds for Music Enjoyment," meeting at the Library on Wednesdays beginning Oct. 21, at 7.45, and a shorter course of eight lectures on "Modern Music" by Nicolas Slonimsky, meeting on Wednesdays at six, beginning Nov. 18. Mrs. Moyer's lectures will stress the social background of the art of music from the time of the Middle Ages. Mr. Slonimsky will trace the current of modernism from the turn of the century.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

OCT 10 1936

Hub Honors Symphony's Conductor

BOSTON, Oct. 9 (AP)—As Dr. Serge Koussevitzky took the podium today to open the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 56th season, the entire audience arose and gave him a mighty ovation.

Dr. Koussevitzky, opening his 13th season with the Hub orchestra, conducted Haydn's Symphony No. 102; Debussy's La Mer, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5.

Because the Boston orchestra had performed on several occasions since last season's concerts, notably at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in August and at Harvard Tercentenary last month, critics found the orchestra's performance of unusually high calibre for an opening concert.

The same program will be repeated tomorrow night.

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY,

Oct. 8/36

and Musi

Concert and Operatic News as It Arrives

New Parisian Composer to Be Presented at Symphony Concerts Next Week

There will be two novel works on the program for the second pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday and Saturday, Oct. 16 and 17. One, the Symphony in A major by Mozart (K. 201), is more than a century and a half old, but it has never been played at the Boston orchestra's concerts. The other, "Les Offrandes oubliees," was written by Olivier Messaien, one of the new group of four young Parisian composers who call themselves "La jeune France." The program will be rounded out with the Fifth Symphony by Sibelius, and "Don Juan," by Strauss.

OCTOBER 8, 1936 C

cians --- Ne

Symphonic Programs

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will play the following program in its opening concerts of the season tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening: Haydn's Symphony in B-flat, No. 102; Debussy's "La Mer" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

Eugene Ormandy, new conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, will lead that organization in its opening concerts of the season tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. The program will consist of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in F minor and Chorale, "Jesu, Joy of Man's Desiring," each arranged for orchestra by Lucien Caillet; Mozart's Fourth Concerto in D major for violin and orchestra, and Schubert's Seventh Symphony in C major. Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist.

---

r News

Trav Oct 10

Symphony Program For This Week; Other Series

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second pair of concerts of its 56th season next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in Symphony Hall. There will be two symphonies upon this program—the Symphony of Mozart in A major (K. No. 201). This work was written when the composer was 18 years old. It is to have its first performance at these concerts. The Fifth Symphony of Jean Sibelius will close the program. Serge Koussevitsky will introduce to this country music of a newly constituted group in Paris—four composers who call themselves "La Jeune France." The composer to be heard is Olivier Messaien, and the score in entitled "The Foreign Sacrifice" ("Les Offrandes Oubliees") and is a religious subject. Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan" will also be played.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open the series of six Monday evening concerts in Symphony Hall earlier than usual this season, a week from tomorrow, Oct. 19. The series of six Tuesday afternoon concerts will begin on Nov. 3. For the Monday evening series, soloists to be heard are Harold Bauer, the famous pianist, and Gaspar Cassado, the young Spanish 'cellist of high European reputation, who is to make his first visit to America in the coming winter. Dimitri Mitropoulos will also conduct one of these concerts as guest.

For the Tuesday afternoon series, Dr. Koussevitsky has planned a representation of the music of the century past, beginning with Beethoven and extending through the earlier works of Richard Strauss and Debussy.

SYMPHONY OPENS 56TH MUSIC YEAR

Oct. 10/36

Beethoven, Haydn and Debussy Pieces Played

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It was a curiously made programme with which Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony began at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon the orchestra's 56th season and the conductor's 13th at its head. Within their somewhat limited sphere, however, symphony concerts are addressed to the many rather than to the few, and the enthusiastic response of the many more than justified this initial list, which places Debussy's "The Sea" between a symphony of Haydn and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven.

HAYDN'S 102D

Haydn's Symphony in B flat, the ninth of the 12 composed for London and No. 102 in the present more accurate cataloguing, is one peculiarly associated with our orchestra. It was played in the first concert, that of Oct. 21, 1881, under the direction of Sir George Henschel and repeated when the aged conductor crossed the ocean to open the orchestra's 50th season. The total number of performances at these concerts was yesterday brought to nine. Certain other symphonies of Haydn have been heard more frequently, yet no less an authority than Donald Tovey calls it one of the two greatest.

Its most captivating moments are the introductory Largo and the Trio of the Minuet, in both of which Haydn uses the wind instruments with prophetic skill and taste, and both were beautifully played yesterday. The Adagio has a peculiar charm and grace. The two Allegros are typical Haydn. Let it be here recorded as one listener's opinion that the performance of the symphony, or shall we say the symphony itself, was the high point of the concert. A tumult of hand-clapping at the end served to return Dr. Koussevitzky many times to the stage.

Debussy's The Sea

The late H. T. Parker once remarked that Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung" was made, not begotten. That apt bit of criticism came to mind yesterday as the three movements of Debussy's "La Mer" were passed in review. By comparison with the Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," or even the Nocturnes, these "orchestral sketches" are music of manner, artifice, contrivance. Last year they chanced to receive in Symphony Hall a markedly individual, singularly intense performance at the hands of Mr. Mitropoulos.

Dr. Koussevitzky's reading yesterday was at once more conventional, more rational, perhaps, and less engrossing. At least the music served to remind us afresh of the matchless tonal qualities of our orchestra.

Beethoven's Fifth

A conductor might play the Fifth Symphony as Beethoven heard it in his mind's ear, and risk failure. Dr. Koussevitzky prefers, and no doubt with much wisdom, to "interpret" the music, letting hardly a measure go by untouched by some stroke of accent or color, and with the greatest freedom in the matter of tempo. Through such performance, many believe, the symphony may be made to make upon an audience of 1936 something of the impression it made upon audiences 125 years ago. That yesterday's audience was stirred was plain enough to be seen.

From first to last yesterday the applause was of more than usual heartiness and warmth. In the meantime, what some will consider more interesting programmes are in immediate prospect.

Oct. 10/36

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

RGE KOUSSEVITZKY IVEN GREAT OVATION

Boston Symphony Opens 56th Season with Three Offerings.

Boston, Oct. 9.—(AP)—As Dr. Serge Koussevitzky took the podium today to open the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 56th season. the entire audience arose and gave him a mighty ovation.

Dr. Koussevitzky. opening his 13th season with the Hub orchestra, conducted Haydn's Symphony No. 102; Debussy's La Mer, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5.

Because the Boston orchestra had performed on several occasions since last season's concerts. notably at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in August and at the Harvard Tercentenary last month, critics found the orchestra's performance of unusually high calibre for an opening concert.

BANGOR, ME.
NEWS

B SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR IS GIVEN OVATION

Oct. 10/36

BOSTON, Oct. 9—(AP)—As Dr. Serge Koussevitzky took the podium today to open the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 56th season, the entire audience arose and gave him a mighty ovation.

Dr. Koussevitzky, opening his thirteenth season with the Hub orchestra, conducted Haydn's Symphony No. 102; DeBussy's La Mer, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5.

Because the Boston orchestra had performed on several occasions since last season's concerts, notably at the Berkshire symphonic festival in August and at the Harvard tercentenary last month, critics found the orchestra's performance of unusually high calibre for an opening concert. The same program will be repeated tomorrow night.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

AY AND TUESDAY SYMPHONY SERIES

Boston Symphony orchestra will open the series of six Monday evening concerts in Symphony Hall earlier than usual this season, a week from Monday, October 19. The series of six Tuesday afternoon concerts will begin on November 3.

For the Monday evening series, soloists to be heard are Harold Bauer, the famous pianist, and Gaspar Cassado, the young Spanish 'cellist of high European reputation, who is to make his first visit to America in the coming winter. Dimitri Mitropoulos will also conduct one of these concerts as guest.

For the Tuesday afternoon series, Serge Koussevitzky has planned a representation of the music of the century past. Beginning with Beethoven and extending through the earlier works of Richard Strauss nad Debussy.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

KOUSSEVITZKY HAILED AT SYMPHONY OPENING

BOSTON, Oct 9 (AP)—As Dr. Serge Koussevitzky took the podium today to open the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 56th season, the entire audience arose and gave him a mighty ovation.

Because the Boston Orchestra had performed on several occasions since last season's concerts, notably at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in August and at the Harvard tercentenary last month, critics found the orchestra's performance of unusually high calibre for an opening concert.

Portland

OCT 10

* * *

Boston Symphony Opens Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 56th season yesterday with a program of familiar music requiring no soloist. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, was welcomed warmly by an enthusiastic audience, according to the U. P.

Only one change has been made in the personnel of the orchestra this year. The program marked the beginning of Dr. Koussevitzky's 13th season here as conductor.

* * *

MIDDLETOWN, CONN.
PRESS

BOSTON SYMPHONY BEGINS

BOSTON, Oct. 10. (UP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra began its 56th season yesterday with a program of familiar music requiring no soloist. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, was welcomed warmly by an enthusiastic audience.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE

OCT 10 1936

BOSTON, Oct. 9 (AP)—As Dr. Serge Koussevitzky took the podium today to open the Boston Symphony orchestra's 56th season, the entire audience arose and gave him a mighty ovation. Dr. Koussevitzky, opened his thirteenth season with the Hub orchestra.

First Symphony

Hayden had in mind the British public and its late-coming habits, the program notes stated yesterday, in explaining the composer's stipulation that his Symphony in B-flat Major should be played always at the beginning of the second part of the program. But Dr. Koussevitzky knows his Friday afternooners, and many of them were in their places a good three-quarters of an hour before he raised his baton for the opening note of that same composition, that opened the Boston Symphony's 56th season.

The Massachusetts avenue crush was such that one bewildered passer-by asked those standing on the steps amid flashing camera bulbs if Leslie Howard were playing there. That could be the only possible explanation to her of the throngs hurrying in. Mrs. Russell Burrage, up from the Shore, missed the opening movement by about a minute, so she stood with the other disappointed ones outside the closed doors, while each asked the other if it didn't seem much too warm to be coming to Symphony.

Mrs. Burrage was herself a symphony, in a tie silk of cocoa brown, dotted in black and white, brown edging the pockets of her thin black wool coat and sables hanging down her back, all topped by a smart beret of black velvet. Mrs. Alexander Steinert and her daughter. Mrs. Samuel Newman, just made the entrance in time and Mrs. Robert Saltonstall, Jr., in a long coat and matching hat of beige wool, dashed in at the last moment.

Miss Lucile Swift waited impatiently in line for her tickets, a high black felt with a feather of the material topping an all-black ensemble with a long coat of matching thin wool. Mrs. Philip Wrenn, Jr.'s, black wool was striped in bright red and green, diagonally, and her companion, Mrs. Moses Williams, Jr., wore a black velvet jacket with a dark gray skirt.

Mrs. Jaffray d'Hauteville Bell, in a navy and white print and shiny black straw, was escorted to her third row seat by a tall, blond young man, after they'd watched with interest the pictures being taken on the steps and the captain of police on the beat shaking hands with all the regulars, and asking if they'd had a nice summer. Miss Lucy Stone begged to be let off pictures, as she hurried in, in her powder blue tweeds with a matching hat; Mrs. C. Bertram Currier, in a suit of slightly darker shade, was able to reach the door in her motor, but Mrs. Louis F. S. Bader and her companions walked some distance, Mrs. Bader in a spruce green wool with the new full flared skirt. silver foxes and a black velour turban.

Mrs. Richard King Thorndike, Jr., was in navy blue from the little wings on her turban to her feet; Miss Constance Turner wore a wine red ensemble; Miss Dorothea Dean, black with touches of red; Miss Rebecca Ames, brown with a checked jacket; Miss Natalie Winslow all black but for the full-blown velvet rose atop her hat, and the touches of velvet on her frock; Miss Nancy Ames wore tailored gray; Miss Nancy Wellington oxford gray with a white satin blouse and gardenias on her jacket; Mrs. John Hallowell, Miss Elinor Fay and Mrs. Morgan Butler all greeted friends in the lobby at intermission and everything was very gay.

Mr. and Mrs. Sohier Welch chatted with George Judd, in his formal clothes, Mr. Welch in a gray lounge suit and Mrs. Welch in black satin with touches of white, flat sandals of black suede, silver foxes and a brimmed black felt with a twisted cord around the crown. Mrs. Allan Forbes and her daughter were in the midst of a throng, Mrs. Forbes in brown and yellow and Miss Phyllis in a shirtmaker dress of blue wool, bareheaded as usual. Mrs. Francis P. Sears, in very dark blue, with brighter gloves, sat with her North Shore neighbor, Mrs. Frederick Ayer, and Mrs. Louis Agassiz Shaw joined them, a green silk print showing at the neck of her gray plaid suit.

Trans. Oct 10

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

Koussevitzky Is Hailed At Opening of Season

BOSTON, Oct. 9 (AP)—As Dr. Serge Koussevitzky took the podium today to open the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 56th season, the entire audience arose and gave him a mighty ovation.

Dr. Koussevitzky, opening his 13th season with the hub orchestra, conducted Haydn's Symphony No. 102; Debussy's "La Mer," and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5.

Impression of Koussevitzky as He Directs an English Orchestra

Trans. Oct. 10/36

Sidelights, Informative and Amusing, of the Boston Conductor at Work

To possess a great reputation as an instrumental virtuoso means a long start for a conductor when he confronts an orchestra. The effect is that the players are all put on their mettle—and not only those of his particular department. Throughout the orchestra all immediately seek to demonstrate beyond a doubt their mastery of their instruments.

Serge Koussevitzky is a virtuoso. (Understand the word in the finest sense, a sense implying the service of brilliant technical accomplishments to the cause of art.) As a double-bass player he built up an international reputation at an early age. Later on he became a virtuoso of the orchestra. Through experience gained in many countries and culminating in his work with the Boston Orchestra—whose chief he has been since 1924—he has arrived at an exhaustive knowledge of the resources and possibilities of every orchestral instrument. And from one and all he demands the same mastery that he himself attained on the bass. He goes to any length to obtain it.

His personality is made up of typically Russian elements—nervous intensity and fire, a tremendous energy that is tempered by charm and humor, and withal something of a tyrant, a tyrant who must be constantly beguiled by the finest playing if he is to be kept within bounds.

Seemingly it is his custom to play the boundless tyrant from time to time. A day comes when the safety valve must be released, and the most innocent member of the orchestra may experience the descent upon his head of a torrent of wrath. In America a luckless bass-clarinetist who, as it happened, was enjoying a few bars' rest, was once singled out as the scapegoat.

"It is impossible, I cannot work like thees! You, you, Mr. X.! How dare you sit there? I weel ask you to go if I haf not your attention."

And so on; and a scapegoat he had to remain until the pressure became normal again.

* * *

A rehearsal of "Le Sacre du Printemps" at Queen's Hall once broke down.

"Eet is impossible—I can no longer work with you! Yo haf no rhyt'm! I don' know why eet is, but there ees no rhyt'm in vat you do." Then, muttered as he passes the violins on the way out: "I am sorry, but I go!"

He was persuaded back out of the Paris express only just in time. And all this was merely because of a misunderstanding or a miscalculation in the rehearsal time-sheet. The orchestra was the scapegoat.

No slip is ever allowed to pass at a Koussevitzky rehearsal. Nothing less than the utmost concentration is required the whole time, and Koussevitzky's grip never relaxes. The interruption of a quite important question on some detail of bowing has been known to provoke:

"Do not spik! If you spik I go home!"

Some such remark is generally called forth by an unguarded murmur in the orchestra. And woe to the string leader who turns to give whispered instruction to his department! Professional inquirers of doubtful notes are quickly suppressed!

Intonation throughout the orchestra and matters of ensemble are worked at ceaselessly until they are correct. And then, sometimes, through sheer nerves, they go wrong again and have to be tackled at subsequent rehearsal.

The painful treatment of insisting on repetition upon repetition of some particularly nasty passage by one section of the orchestra, while the rest sit and look on, frequently produces nerves, and demoralization sets in. Some wretched wight perhaps gets his fingers tied up, and Koussevitzky, his face expressing utter contempt, shrugs his shoulders, bangs the desk with his stick and says: "I must do some work with you alone!" This brought the house down on an occasion when the victim was a one-note man.

But such are the various springs of his nature that in the thick of a time of stress a howling "domino" may quite possibly result in a good story told against himself—and at once the atmosphere changes and calm reigns.

* * *

Koussevitzky's attitude is essentially that of the great executant who refuses to approach the platform until his technique is flawless. Incessantly he strives after the most perfect playing, and he conveys the feeling that if only he can succeed in making the players reproduce perfectly his own idea the interpretation will be supremely right.

His stick is a fine instrument of artistry. His beat is straightforward, and he must be one of the few famous conductors who are in the habit of giving one or two unobtrusive introductory beats for difficult openings, like that of the scherzo of the "Eroica." It certainly insures confidence in setting a new tempo.

His magnetism is largely conveyed by his face, which is extraordinarily expressive, lighting up instantly at any playing that touches him—and this is not infrequent— and again clouding as quickly.

"Y'know, I don' like it!" said in an intimate manner, is one of his happiest comments, which generally precedes a valuable suggestion as to the turn of a phrase—very different from the crash of his baton on the desk, like a pistol shot, with: "Stop! Absolutely chaotic!" followed by a lengthy pause and then a curtain lecture on the text. "Rhyt'm! There ees no rhyt'm at all! Not sufficient you play in time—I must have rhyt'm, otherwise I cannot vork with you!"

When deeply touched he can come out with a warm-hearted, "Vonnderval!" to those nearest him, which quite offsets his biting criticism.

Koussevitzky never, to begin with, plays through any considerable section of a work. Taking the "Eroica" Symphony, for instance, he starts by working on the first two chords, which have to be repeated again and again to obtain his required effect of terrific rage. The volume of string tone does not satisfy him unless the attack and power in the short crochet becomes electrifying. Then he begins practising, at a slightly quicker tempo than usual, the first subject.

He makes no points other than those directed in the score. The quest of vital rhythm provides most of the reasons for stoppages and corrections. It seems that the string playing can never be short and sharp enough for him. Only after repeated demands for "De bow deep in the strings" does he find satisfaction.

The great tutti chords across the beat, shortly before the double bar, he actually directs, not indicating the rests at all. Then: "Pianissimo must always have substance and arrive to the audience! Vibrato! Always vibrato in pianissimo!" This of the phrase immediately after the double bar.

In the Funeral March immense weight is placed on the ascending grace-notes in the double-basses, which he directs on the first beat. The tune is moulded exhaustively to obtain a lovely quality, full of substance in spite of extreme quietness. The rhythmic accompanying figures in the strings are touched upon. But with the non troppo adagio of the tempo he adopts in this movement few difficulties of ensemble arise.

The utmost sostenuto is repeatedly demanded in the subject of the fugato, and a powerful rhythm in the semiquavers. A great, sustained sound, a lovely pianissimo quality from the strings, and the fullest volume at the climax—these take up most of the time. And, permeating all the rehearsal, are the phrases one must for ever associate with Koussevitzky: "Zing! Alvays zing your phrases! Eet ees absolutely necessary. Ther ees no music without zingen!"

Giving out streams of energy, he demands every ounce of the orchestra, and it may be suspected that some of the performances at his rehearsals are finer than those of the concert itself. Certainly few if any peaks are attained at the concert that have not been scaled at the rehearsal. The concert itself is less of a strain, for the conductor changes from being an insatiable refiner to the role of irresistible leader. A slip or even a bad mistake never seems to upset him at the concert. He either overlooks the matter or only betrays by a severe glance under raised eyebrows that his concentration has been distracted.

Gustav Holst used to tell of a marvelous performance at Boston of Wagner's "Faust" overture, marred only by a glaring false entry by a bassoon—who stuck to his error. Holst half-expected the conductor to leap on his stand in fury, but Koussevitzky seemed not to move a muscle. It would have been a different story at a rehearsal!

With all his experience—as soloist as well as of conducting—he yet does not conduct from memory. He may but glance at the score, but it is always there on the stand. No conductor has a greater knowledge of the capabilities of an orchestra, and, since he also has the precious gift of communicating his mind, to work with Koussevitzky is an unforgettable experience which no player can fail to treasure.

(Bernard Shore in the London Daily Telegraph)

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

Season Opens in Boston

BOSTON, Oct. 9 (AP).—As Dr. Serge Koussevitzky took the podium today to open the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifty-sixth season, the entire audience arose and gave him a mighty ovation. Dr. Koussevitzky, opening his thirteenth season with the orchestra, conducted Haydn's Symphony No. 102, Debussy's "La Mer" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5.

The same program will be repeated tomorrow night.

Elman Recital

Mischa Elman, the eminent violinist, will give a recital in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 15.

Music and Musicians

Trans.
10/36

26

Symphony Concert

Season's Opening by the Boston Orchestra, With Works By Haydn, Debussy and Beethoven

By Moses Smith

The last thing that is supposed to matter at the opening of the symphonic season is the program. It is an established rule merely that the program contain nothing provocative. Otherwise, the music-making on such an occasion is an excuse for bringing old friends together once more: the conductor with the orchestra, the performers with the public, the members of the public with one another.

As it happens the program for the first concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played yesterday afternoon and to be repeated tonight, indicates considerable care in planning on the part of the conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The Haydn Symphony in B-flat, one of the London series, has not been frequently played by symphony concerts hereabouts, even though it is one of the composer's most delightful works. Debussy's "La Mer," which comes near being his masterpiece in the opinion of some, is second on the program. In its thirty years' existence it has been played more often at the Boston Symphony concerts than has the Haydn Symphony in the orchestra's fifty-five years. It was played as recently as last January, when Dimitri Mitropoulos was the guest conductor. But it can scarcely be placed, as yet, in the category of over-familiar masterpieces.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony has been overplayed, of course, as far as many regular attendants of symphony concerts are concerned. But, at least for this listener, it emerged from another hearing with astonishing freshness. In any event, those who grumble at the lack of music they know on our symphony programs are satisfied by the inclusion of the Fifth on the present program. Others may still exercise their right to leave the concert early.

* * *

There was no doubt of the friendliness that filled the atmosphere yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. When Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, walked on the stage he was cordially applauded by an unusually prompt matinee audience. When a minute or two later the conductor appeared, the orchestra and—according to an almost established custom—the audience rose to greet him. While he acknowledged the greeting and prepared to settle down to the program of the day, newspaper photographers broke ancient custom by taking flashlight photographs, while many in the audience gasped in surprise. The only apparent damage was the disturbance of the conductor's composure when, after he had his arm raised, ready to begin, the belated flash from a single bulb made it necessary for him to go through his preparations all over again.

* * *

The Haydn B-flat Symphony, it is interesting to note, appeared on the opening program of the Boston Orchestra in its first year, 1881, when the late George Henschel was the conductor. And it was last played at the beginning of the orchestra's fiftieth season in 1930, when Sir George was again, by a miracle, on hand to conduct. Yesterday's performance reminded us how lovely the music is. We were also reminded of the fact that the best known of Haydn's symphonies are not necessarily the most ingratiating. There are others, among the master's huge number of works in this form, that, like the B-flat, may profitably replace any of the two or three that may be hit on when a conductor finds it is time to do "some Haydn." Especially if they are as beautifully played as the B-flat Symphony was yesterday under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction.

The performance of "La Mer," a composition as opposed to Haydn's in mood and style as night is to day, was equally eloquent. Discounting the excessive brilliance of the end, one may report that conductor and orchestra seemed perfectly attuned to the poetry and awesome mystery of the Debussyan music. Here—as in performance of other works by Debussy and Ravel—one forgets the presence of Dr. Koussevitzky or of his players; one forgets that musicians are imprisoned in a network of staves and notes and bar-lines—especially bar-lines!

* * *

After this the performance of the Beethoven Symphony was a letdown. No doubt, Dr. Koussevitzky was himself profoundly moved by the music and likewise urged the players to extraordinarily excited performance. Unfortunately the resultant excitement was often more nearly hysterical than related to the noble humanitarian drama that we may legitimately associate with Beethoven's masterful score.

One might assent to the vigorous assault on the lower strings that began the Trio of the Scherzo. But when the attack remained undiminished in force so that the poor violas could scarcely be heard at all at their entrance, the excitement began to resemble noise. Of a different nature, but equally objectionable, was the entire treatment of the bridge section from the Scherzo to the Finale, and of the Finale itself. And at the very beginning of the symphony the unrestrained intensity of the attack on the four-note motto gave it more the character of a scream of terror than of a rude, powerful protest.

* * *

The orchestra and conductor—to return to pleasanter matters—were in midseason form. What a magnificent body of musicians we are privileged to listen to! In texture the orchestra is almost exactly the same as last year. The one notable exception is the first horn player, who is now Gottfried Freiberg, until recently of the Vienna State Opera, to replace Mr. Boettcher, resigned. The program did not offer sufficient opportunity to assay the newcomer's merits; a single concert is inconclusive anyhow. Two other players in the wind section, previously performers in the orchestra at irregular intervals, are now dignified by inclusion in the official list—B. Valkenier, French horn (son of Willem Valkenier, who has been a member of the section these many years) and V. Smith, trombone.

The audience was very large. Official word has it that the Hall is almost sold out for Friday afternoons, and that subscriptions for both matinee and evening concerts considerably surpass in number those of last year. In character the audience has not changed much. It was a little more cordiad to the performers yesterday than customarily.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS HERE OCT. 27

The Boston Symphony Orchestra which opened its 56th season in Symphony Hall, Boston, yesterday afternoon, will begin the usual series of five concerts in the Metropolitan Theatre, Providence, Tuesday evening, Oct. 27—the remaining concerts to be given Nov. 24, Jan. 26, March 2, and April 20.

Serge Koussevitzky plans programs of exceptional interest for Providence to include a performance of Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, in which the final male chorus will be sung by the Harvard Glee Club, with Eulon Robison, the tenor, as soloist. At another concert of the series, Albert Spalding, famous American violinist, will appear as soloist.

27

THE BOSTON GLOBE—SATURDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1936

Symphony Season Started With Enthusiastic Audience

Tradition Preserved as Dr Koussevitzky Receives Ovation on Appearance

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 56th season uptown in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Since the opening of the local orchestral year is always in the nature of an important rite, the auditorium was crowded by a throng who permitted no check upon their enthusiasm.

Dr Serge Koussevitzky was again accorded a significant expression of the esteem he enjoys, when his first appearance upon the stage brought orchestra and audience to their feet. In a word, his position here is extraordinary; this is his 13th season as leader of the orchestra; as each Autumn comes around, he seemingly returns to a greater following. When the present season is over, he will have equaled the longest tenure in the history of the Boston Symphony, that of Wilhelm Gericke, who served 13 years in two terms.

Institution in Boston

Whatever the outlanders may think of Bostonian reserve, let them remember that a peculiar and creditable pride prevails here in the case of great institutions. The Boston Symphony, it goes almost without saying, is one such, and what is more, it is a living institution, which continues to disseminate in distinguished fashion the best in orchestral art.

In view of the custom governing the first and last concerts, the program consisted of familiar music, which required no soloist. Yet there was a degree of novelty in the very first number, the Symphony in B-flat by Haydn. Although it stood upon the opening concert of this orchestra in 1881, it has been played but seven times since then; thus to many of the subscribers it was largely unfamiliar. The remaining two items were the Three Orchestral Sketches, "The Sea," by Debussy, and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven.

Haydn's Symphony proved a delightful surprise to many, somewhat richer in texture and freer in imaginative play than many of the symphonic pieces which that prolific Croat turned out in his long career. The slow introduction to the first movement shows, for one thing, where Beethoven found some of the ideas he was later to employ in his orchestral writing. The adagio represents Haydn at his songful best, and the scherzo rollicks along in his exuberant folkish style. The finale is impetuous, interrupted toward the end by a few amusing touches of humor. It could scarely have sounded fresher, as if it had been composed only yesterday, to the London audience which first heard it in 1795, when Haydn, on his second visit to the English capital, wrote it for Salomon's Orchestra.

Debussy Well Established

The rank of Debussy's remarkable graphic impressions of the sea, an aspect of nature which always fascinated him, is new well established. The orchestral style in which he couched his ideas still arouses wonder. Yet, strangely enough, these are not the sort of music which can make effect under any circumstances. Dr Koussevitzky's interpretation is felicitous, but it could be even more intense. The reading last Winter by the visiting Athenian, Dimitri Mitropoulos, remains the strongest in memory.

The C minor Sympony of Beethoven is an old story both to the conductor and to the Symphony subscribers. Dr Koussevitzky adheres to his own individual dramatic conception of it.

Another indication that the Boston Symphony is at the apogee of a brilliant episode in its history may be found in the fact that only one change in personnel has been made; Mr Boettcher of the horns has departed, to be succeeded by Mr Freiberg, a Viennese, who assumes the first desk of that section. As Dr Koussevitzky has moulded the orchestra, it now stands a highly perfected instrument.

The program next week will be as follows: Mozart, Symphony in A major (K 201) (first time at these concerts); Olivier Messiaen, "The Forgotten Offerings" (first times in America); Strauss, "Don Juan"; Sibelius, Fifth Symphony. C. W. D.

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR IS WELCOMED AS SEASON O

ORCHESTRA AND AUDIENCE RISE TO GREET DR KOUSSEVITZKY

Her

MUSIC

Oct 10

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The first concert of the 56th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the orchestra in the following program:

Symphony in B flat No. 102........Haydn
"La Mer," Three Orchestral Sketches Debussy
Symphony No. 5 in C minor.....Beethoven

An audience that filled every seat in Symphony hall applauded the first concert of the Boston Symphony's 56th season and, in particular, the performance of the Fifth Symphony. In spite of the fact that the whole summer had not gone by without symphony concerts (there were those of the Tercentenary and in the Berkshires), there was the same intense pleasure to be noted in the beginning of another season. This year for the first time photographers with their disagreeable "flashes" were allowed in to take pictures of the ceremony of standing to greet the conductor. All would have passed off well enough if one zealous camera-man had not waited to get a picture, as it were, of the first bars of the Haydn Symphony. This, however, was the only false note in the afternoon.

The orchestra was in splendid form. The personnel is exactly the same as last season, with one exception. Mr. Boettcher's place at the first horn desk has been taken by Mr. Freiberg. This united front, then, is one reason why the Boston Symphony sounds so well at the beginning of a new season. It is also true that the players are on their mettle at the first concert to show just how good a first-class orchestra can be. Dr. Koussevitzky, for his part, brought the energy and intelligence of his personality to bear on the interpretations.

Haydn's symphonies, especially the later ones, are excellently suited to be the opening number on any program. And in a sense they are neglected, at least in comparison with Beethoven and Brahms. This great and ingenious work, for example, has not been heard at these concerts for six years and has had only nine performances in all. Yet it deserves to be thoroughly known by the public.

It is foolish to underrate Haydn—to suppose him trivial because he is gay. Because there is often a merry briskness about his music and because his symphonies are easy to follow are no reasons to patronize him as a composer. It is the old business of imagining that a philosopher must be great because he is hard to read. Yet a writer like Plato can be clear and entertaining and untechnical. Is he the less profound? At any rate there is small danger of yesterday's audience inclining to dismiss Haydn after such an impressive performance of so great a masterpiece.

The Haydn Symphony was followed on the program by another masterpiece, Debussy's "La Mer." This superb example of orchestral tone color is also a flight of loveliest imagination. It is one of the most beautiful and poetic works of its time. Nor have its brilliance and its glory dimmed. The performance yesterday was one of searching eloquence. After the intermission Dr. Koussevitzky conducted a stirring performance of the Fifth Symphony, and the audience remained to applaud and cheer. All in all it was an incomparably fine start for the season.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will play Mozart's early symphony in A major, Olivier Messiaen's "Les Offrandes oubliees," Strauss's "Don Juan," and Sibelius's Fifth Symphony.

Trans. Oct. 10/36

Chicago Organist to Be Heard at Symphony Hall

Trans. Oct. 10/36

Porter Heaps, organist of the New England Congregational Church of Chicago, will give an organ recital at Symphony Hall, Friday evening, Oct. 23. Mr. Heaps will use the new Hammond organ, an instrument which is the size and shape of the current spinet piano—four feet square. The organ operates by electricity and without the traditional pipes. Admission is by invitation and without charge. Applications should be made to M. Steinert and Sons or to the Symphony Hall box office.

Porter Heaps was the recipient last year of the prize for composition offered by the American Guild of Organists.

The Philadelphia Orchestra has admitted a woman into its violin section for the first time in its history. Lois Pulitz, who has been thus distinguished, is the wife of Sylvan Levin, pianist.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give the second pair of concerts of its 56th season next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in Symphony hall. There will be two symphonies upon this programme—the Symphony of Mozart in A major, Ko. No. 201. This work was written when the composer was 18 years old. It is to have its first performance at these concerts. The Fifth Symphony of Jean Sibelius will close the programme. Serge Koussevitzky will introduce to this country music of a newly constituted group in Paris—four composers who call themselves "La Jeune France." The composer to be heard is Olivier Messaien, and the score is entitled "The Forgotten Sacrifice" ("Les Offrandes oubliées"), and is a religious subject. Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan" will also be played.

The first of the series in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, will take place next Thursday evening, October 15. Serge Koussevitzky will then conduct Haydn's Symphony in B flat No. 102, Debussy's "La Mer," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

Concert Calendar

Trans. Oct. 10/36

Next Week

Tuesday Evening—In Steinert Hall, concert by the Boston Brass Quartet, assisted by the Izobel Burgstaller Trio. The Quartet will play a chorale by Neander, Corelli's Ninth Concerto Grosso, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Flight of the Bumble Bee," Ramsoe's Fifth Quartet, and the Siegfried Death-Music from Wagner's "Gotterdammerung," the arrangements being made by Robert D. King, a member of the Quartet. The Trio will play Mozart's Trio in G major (K. 564) and Rudolf Friml's "Rural Life in Bohemia."

Wednesday Evening — In Jordan Hall, first of two performances of "The Beatitudes" of Cesar Franck by the Boston Federal Music Project. Chorus, orchestra and soloists will be directed by A. Buckingham Simson.

Thursday Evening — In Sanders Theater, Cambridge, first of the annual series of eight concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. The program will be the same as the one presented at the initial pair of Boston concerts, comprising Haydn's Symphony in B-flat (No. 102), Debussy's "La Mer" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

In Jordan Hall, second of two performances of "The Beatitudes," enlisting the same participants as on the preceding evening.

Friday Afternoon—In Symphony Hall, second matinee concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. The program lists Mozart's Symphony in A major (K. 201), "Les Offrandes Oubliees," by Olivier Messiaen, Strauss's "Don Juan," and the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius.

Saturday Evening—In Symphony Hall, second evening concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. The program will be the same as at Friday's concert.

(See also Free Concerts)

Week of Oct. 18

Sunday Afternoon—In Symphony Hall, recital by the eminent violinist, Fritz Kreisler. His admirable program comprises Schumann's Fantasy in C major, Opus 131, Bach's Sonata in G minor for violin alone, the second movement of Paganini's Second Concerto, and the Fantasy on Russian Themes of Rimsky-Korsakov, arranged by Kreisler.

Monday Evening—In Symphony Hall, first of the supplementary evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. No program has been received.

Tuesday Evening—In Jordan Hall, recital by Felix Fox, established and musicianly Boston pianist, now appearing in public relatively rarely. The program will consist of three sonatas by Scarlatti; a Bach Chorale, "Rejoice, Ye Christians All" (transcribed by Philipp); Schumann's Sonata in F-sharp minor; the Twelve Etudes of Chopin's Opus 10 and pieces by Brahms and Philipp.

Friday Afternoon — In Symphony Hall, third matinee concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. No program has been received.

Saturday Evening — In Symphony Hall, third evening concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor. No program has been received.

Week of Oct. 25

Sunday Afternoon—In Symphony Hall, concert of the distinguished Negro tenor, Roland Hayes. The program will include Wagnerian excerpts, eighteenth century music, songs by Beethoven, Debussy, Parham and Hopekirk, and a group of spirituals.

Sunday Evening—In Jordan Hall, concert of a cappella choral music by the Russian Symphonic Choir, Basile Kibalchich conductor.

Thursday Evening—In Jordan Hall, Boston debut of the nine-year-old pianist, Marilyn Meyer. The program comprises piano pieces by Brahms (Opus 116), the "Waldstein" Sonata of Beethoven, the Sonata in B-flat minor and shorter pieces by Chopin.

Friday Afternoon—In Symphony Hall, fourth afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor.

Saturday Evening—In Symphony Hall, fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor.

Trans. Oct. 10/36

❧

Fritz Kreisler

Violinist, Who Will Play In Symphony Hall On Sunday Afternoon, Oct. 18

❧

Gentlemen of the Orchestra

If a resident company of 109 eminent actors played the classics of drama from every literature of the ages, giving scores of performances in Boston yearly, the public would be on edge to know their personal histories. This is exactly, in the literature of music (one of the great literatures of the world), what the players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are, yet it is not until this Autumn, when the orchestra begins its 56th season, that such a volume of charcoal drawings with paragraph biographies of its members makes its appearance—perhaps because, until Mr Gerome Brush gave us this brilliant performance as artist in both forms, no one knew how entertaining such a volume could be.

Genial and witty, it is at the same time a sociological document. Thirty years ago the orchestra was an exotic hybrid; German, French and Italian grown under glass in Boston. Today the Europeans are still here and so may they always be, for it is a necessity of the art that it take the finest artists wherever they may be had, irrespective of race, nationality, politics, religion or class. During the World War and after, we had a melancholy experience of the opposite. Rent by public dissensions, the Boston orchestra was all but wrecked and sank in four years from its long-held position as the finest in the world down to pallid mediocrity. Under Dr Koussevitzky it has again risen to where it disputes the primacy with the best on earth.

And now Yankees are in the orchestra by the right of artistic merit. Mr Brush's sketches tell succinct life-histories of artists from Boston, Lynn (it may be farther from Lynn to Symphony Hall than it is from Warsaw), Rockland, Bridgewater, Melrose, Revere, New Bedford, Vinal Haven, and even from farthest Ohio! who sit as peers with instrumentalists from Paris and Berlin.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has for more than half a century been, like the Boston Latin School and Harvard University, one of the institutions which give unique distinction to the city, but radio broadcast has recently opened its treasures to poor and rich equally and spread them over the continent, though its maintenance still rests largely on the generosity and loyal affection of people moderately well-to-do; and where else, unless it be to relieve crude physical suffering, can money be given where it can give greater happiness to more people?

In personnel the orchestra is a preliminary sketch of an ideal international society. It is a democracy entirely composed of aristocrats. These charcoal sketches present 109 heads of men, reflective, scholarly, sensitive, fine-grained, every face mirroring the life of intellect and spirit lived by a master musician. World War veterans sit at elbows with voluntary exiles from politically upheaved natal lands and yet, weirdly assorted though their origins sound, there is usually in the story some fated assignation with a beloved musical instrument which reads as though such careers went by destiny.

And to an age of blatantly self-advertising egoism what an example they are of self-effacing modesty! Every man a virtuoso, yet all that you know of them from the program book is a name and a musical instrument in small print and often you cannot even be sure which one he is. If a solo passage falls to him in the symphonic score, he plays it with a mastery won by nearly a lifetime's diligence, then, at the next bar, glides back again into the anonymous ranks of the orchestra, a melodious but nameless voice in the sea of sound.

How long before our modern life, private as well as public, will attain such dignity, such decorum, such high breeding, and such harmony as yours, "Gentlemen of the Orchestra"?

UNCLE DUDLEY.

A Season of Music Begins

Oct 11 '36

By Ruth Marsters

Music Editor

IF THE proverbial stranger from M happened upon Symphony Hall at abo o'clock on Friday afternoon, he wou guessed at once that something was

The crowds gathered on the step have indicated this. If the Martian had watching the eager stream of people into the hall until 2:30 when the last pa been wheeled to the curb by the last chauffeur, he might have sensed that something to which these earthbound attached importance.

So far he would have been quite cor those better informed than he would have him that it was an occasion of vital sig

To be sure, the greeting extended I Koussevitzky as he came upon the stage duct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in t ing concert of its 56th season was not (if it was not less) than that of the previ of his regime.

* * *

THE AUDIENCE rose to its feet and ing was one of genial warmth toward the c whom a particular group of people had be customed to seeing before them.

But through this quite comfortable an atmosphere the realization burst that thi tion which is the Boston Symphony C should no more be taken for granted than Mahal should be looked at with compla the people who live near it.

There is no doubt at all that a great s orchestra is as great a wonder as any tabulated among the seven.

Further, no amount of familiarity particular orchestra can detract from the at this moment the eyes of the music w rightly focused upon it—that both the ment and Koussevitzky, its creator, stan height of their power—an accumulation behind them, and immeasurable achi ahead.

Dr. Koussevitzky opened the progr Haydn's Symphony in B flat, No. 102— formance of which left nothing to be de

This Symphony—the ninth of the series commissioned by Salomon is surel Haydn's greatest symphonic structures. addition a glowing work of art. Its pure and robust vitality springing from a spiritual well being, its substance from thought, its outlines from an inexhaustiv of invention.

* * *

THE PROGRAM was so designed as to give full scope to the resources of the orchestra. While in the Haydn Symphony the strings were allowed to display their richness without competition, there was hardly a virtuoso in the orchestra who can escape responsibility for the unforgettable performance of Debussy's "La Mer" which followed.

Debussy's power of evoking moods, of weaving nebulous mists of color and perfume, can rarely have been so distilled into a performance. It found Dr. Koussevitzky in inspired mood and was easily the peak of the afternoon's performance.

The program closed with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of this score is always dramatic. On Friday afternoon his emphasis on breadth of line sometimes led to a slowness of tempo, as in the Second Movement (Andante con moto), which could, no doubt, be subject to differences of opinion.

The final Allegro was magnificent. It would be difficult indeed to imagine a better close for this concert than the last gigantic chords which end the symphony commonly designated as "The Fifth."

CONCERTS THIS WEEK

Symphony Hall

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Dr Serge Koussevitzky conductor, at 2:30 Friday and 8:15 Saturday. Second program. An unusually contrasted program includes two symphonies, the Fifth of Jean Sibelius and one in A major (K 201) by Mozart, written when he was 18. The latter has not before been played at these concerts. Dr Koussevitzky will give first American performances to "The Forgotten Offerings" ("Les Offrandes oubliees") by Olivier Messiaen, a young French composer and one of four in a new Parisian group who call themselves "La Jeune France." (The others are Yves Baudrier, Daniel-Lesur and Andre Jolivet.) Word from Symphony Hall states that "The Forgotten Offerings" was composed in 1931, and has been performed several times, one of them a joint concert of "La Jeune France" in Paris last June 3. The program of that concert carried a declaration of faith by these four: they are bound together by "sincerity, generosity and artistic good faith"; their aim is "to create and promote a living music." "The Forgotten Offerings" is an expression of Messiaen's Catholic faith, and falls in three parts, "The Cross," "The Sin," and "The Eucharist." Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," will also be played.

MUSICIANS

Oct 11

Trans Oct 10

First Symphony

Hayden had in mind the British public and its late-coming habits, the program notes stated yesterday, in explaining the composer's stipulation that his Symphony in B-flat Major should be played always at the beginning of the second part of the program. But Dr. Koussevitzky knows his Friday afternooners, and many of them were in their places a good three-quarters of an hour before he raised his baton for the opening note of that same composition, that opened the Boston Symphony's 56th season.

The Massachusetts avenue crush was such that one bewildered passer-by asked those standing on the steps amid flashing camera bulbs if Leslie Howard were playing there. That could be the only possible explanation to her of the throngs hurrying in. Mrs. Russell Burrage, up from the Shore, missed the opening movement by about a minute, so she stood with the other disappointed ones outside the closed doors, while each asked the other if it didn't seem much too warm to be coming to Symphony.

Mrs. Burrage was herself a symphony, in a tie silk of cocoa brown, dotted in black and white, brown edging the pockets of her thin black wool coat and sables hanging down her back, all topped by a smart beret of black velvet. Mrs. Alexander Steinert and her daughter. Mrs. Samuel Newman, just made the entrance in time and Mrs. Robert Saltonstall, Jr., in a long coat and matching hat of beige wool, dashed in at the last moment.

Miss Lucile Swift waited impatiently in line for her tickets, a high black felt with a feather of the material topping an all-black ensemble with a long coat of matching thin wool. Mrs. Philip Wrenn, Jr.'s, black wool was striped in bright red and green, diagonally, and her companion, Mrs. Moses Williams, Jr., wore a black velvet jacket with a dark gray skirt.

Mrs. Jaffray d'Hauteville Bell, in a navy and white print and shiny black straw, was escorted to her third row seat by a tall, blond young man, after they'd watched with interest the pictures being taken on the steps and the captain of police on the beat shaking hands with all the regulars, and asking if they'd had a nice summer. Miss Lucy Stone begged to be let off pictures, as she hurried in, in her powder blue tweeds with a matching hat; Mrs. C. Bertram Currier, in a suit of slightly darker shade, was able to reach the door in her motor, but Mrs. Louis F. S. Bader and her companions walked some distance, Mrs. Bader in a spruce green wool with the new full flared skirt. silver foxes and a black velour turban.

Mrs. Richard King Thorndike, Jr., was in navy blue from the little wings on her turban to her feet; Miss Constance Turner wore a wine red ensemble; Miss Dorothea Dean, black with touches of red; Miss Rebecca Ames, brown with a checked jacket; Miss Natalie Winslow all black but for the full-blown velvet rose atop her hat, and the touches of velvet on her frock; Miss Nancy Ames wore tailored gray; Miss Nancy Wellington oxford gray with a white satin blouse and gardenias on her jacket; Mrs. John Hallowell, Miss Elinor Fay and Mrs. Morgan Butler all greeted friends in the lobby at intermission and everything was very gay.

Continued on Page 3—Column 2

First Symphony

Continued from Page One

Mr. and Mrs. Sohier Welch chatted with George Judd, in his formal clothes, Mr. Welch in a gray lounge suit and Mrs. Welch in black satin with touches of white, flat sandals of black suede, silver foxes and a brimmed black felt with a twisted cord around the crown. Mrs. Allan Forbes and her daughter were in the midst of a throng, Mrs. Forbes in brown and yellow and Miss Phyllis in a shirtmaker dress of blue wool, bareheaded as usual. Mrs. Francis P. Sears, in very dark blue, with brighter gloves, sat with her North Shore neighbor, Mrs. Frederick Ayer, and Mrs. Louis Agassiz Shaw joined them, a green silk print showing at the neck of her gray plaid suit.

KOUSSEVITZKY TALKS LIKE A BOOSTER

Oct. 12/36

28

By Louis M. Lyons

Koussevitzky has discovered America. To the conductor of Boston's symphony orchestra this discovery is as important as the one Columbus made, and Columbus could hardly have exceeded Koussevitzky in exultation or in his glowing adjectivial astonishment at the new land. It was a great symphony of delight to the great musician.

A. P.

Koussevitzky

For 12 long years, America to this expatriated Russian, was bounded by the stage of Symphony Hall. His view was not much extended by the addition of occasional Pullman car rides to New York or by the incidental concert trips to "your provincial cities." Summers he returned to Europe, after the habit of European artists, and sought his rest and recreation at the traditional resorts and watering places of the old world. So at 60 this master of music had never heard the song of the surf on the shore of Maine nor ever felt his senses drunk with the rich wine of the Autumnal colors in the North Woods.

But this Summer, drawn first to the Berkshires for their music festival and, lured there by invitations of friends, on to Bar Harbor, to the White Mountains, to a motor tour of Vermont, Koussevitzky spent a Summer that exhausted his vocabulary of superlatives. Exhilaration, refreshment, delight!

* * *

Back last Sunday for the Symphony season, he felt like telling the world about this New England—its climate, its mountains, its forests, its shore—all in a few hours from Boston. Unbelievable beauty—surpassing hospitality, ineffable air.

I found Serge Koussevitzky returning from a walk at 5 in the afternoon, at his rambling frame house just over the hill from the old Brookline Reservoir. First a black spaniel burst into the room. Then came a little figure of a man in gray worsted and gray sweater, wavy gray hair that the breeze had blown, and a jaunty bow tie of blue. A keen face and sparkling eye greeted the caller, and the exhilarated, exuberant discoverer began at once, without the slightest of preliminaries, to pour out the ecstasies of his New England Summer.

It was in the first shadow of twilight that he began his account. The dusk gathered as he plunged on. The momentum of his enthusiasm mounted as his eloquent hands kept up the pace of his narration. So utterly under the spell of his memories was he that it was only when it grew so dark I could not see his face that he came down to earth long enough to realize that there was no light in the room and that his interviewer could not see to put a note on paper. Fervent and abject in apology, he reached to the lamp and then began again at the beginning.

* * *

"But your White Mountains are as wonderful! I had rather have New Hampshire than Switzerland. Your mountains are so wild and still so lovely and with roads everywhere—little small roads to walk up —what is it you call them? Yes, trails—all up the mountains pretty trails go. I am a great walker, and all around from the Crawford House where I stayed were wonderful walks. Mt Washington! Yes, of course, I climbed it. The road just goes right up, and such view! O, such view! And snow there is on it in the Summer, even. I awoke one morning and from my bedroom window I could see the snow—the mountain was covered with it—and so beautiful in the sun, the snow. That was, let me see, the 26th o September.

"Your mountains are so delightfu because they are not so picked u as in Switzerland, where everything is cleaned up and worked up.'

"Manicured?"

"Yes. In New England the country is so rich in beauty because it is left natural. Europe is so small that every bit of ground is worked None is left for the public to enjoy in its free undeveloped state. You conservate, that is the word—conservate, is it not? You keep you forests for the people to enjoy. In Europe all are exploited.

"There is nothing in Europe like your New England country. Russia has great mountains in the Caucasus But 24-36 hours away. Here in four or five hours you are in the White Mountains. In two hours you are at beautiful Dublin, N H, with its lake and mountain and splendid forests. And you have such restfu hotels with such glorious hospitality

* * *

"I motored in Vermont, O so lovely and green everywhere. And stopped at nice inns.

"I had 10 unforgettable days at Mt Desert, at Seal Harbor, where I sailed on a yacht of one of my generous Boston friends, and climbed the mountains and drove over the beautiful scenic roads that Mr Rockefeller has laid out.

"O, the air is so exhilarating there! The rest one has is far beyond anything Europe can offer.

"One discovers such a rare combination of forest and mountain and shore. The country is so rugged. Nature is so rich. New England is such an extraordinary climatic station. In Boston it will be hot and in Maine so refreshingly cool—and only a few hours away. And the water! So blue! And the view! So marvelous!

"I returned from Europe at the end of July to conduct the Berkshire music festival and I have been enjoying the New England country ever since then. It is a marvelous country in the Berkshires, and such a beautiful place for festivals. Such fine roads to bring people from the cities all around.

"Then I had my 10 days at Bar Harbor, then my Vermont motor trip, then my White Mountain stay, and I was in Dublin and Peterboro, and for the last a visit at the shore with your Gov Fuller. So I saw for the first time how extraordinarily rich is nature in America, and I know I did not see all of America. Next Summer I will stay, if not all Summer, certainly part of it.

* * *

"Now I am back, a slave again for seven months to my work, which is so exacting that I cannot even enjoy dinners with my friends in Boston. I have to deny myself everything during the Symphony season. But I am a very happy slave, you must say, because the happiest days for me are the days I work with my orchestra.

"But now I have my walking. That is my joy in the Winter. And the walks are so beautiful here in Brookline now. The colors so gorgeous in the gardens and the gardens so open for the public to see.

"I walk every morning as soon as I am up. Then I have breakfast and go to rehearsal. Then I walk again and after lunch and my nap, if I do not have a concert I walk again. Walking is wonderful, and I loved your New England country for its fine walks. So astonishing, so superb, so beautiful the country is for walking.

"Yes I enjoyed my New England vacation immensely, and my wife did also."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 11 1936

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its fifty-sixth season in Symphony Hall last week. The usual New York series will be given, consisting of five evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall, and five in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn. The orchestra will visit Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, Springfield, Worcester and Hartford, and also appear at Dartmouth and Smith Colleges and at Yale and Rutgers Universities. New works will include a Soviet symphony by Shaporin; a violin concerto by Roger Sessions; the piano "Rhapsody" of Rachmaninoff, and Prokofieff's Third concerto.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

OCT 14 1936

Two novel works will appear on the program for the second pair of concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra in Boston Friday and Saturday. One, the Symphony in A Major by Mozart (K. 201), is more than a century and a half old but has never been played by the orchestra in Boston before. The other, "Les Offrandes Oubliees," was written by Olivier Messaien, one of the new group of four young Parisian composers who call themselves "La Jeune France." The program will be rounded out with the Fifth Symphony by Sibelius and "Don Juan," by Strauss.

Gentlemen of the Orchestra

Boston Globe Oct. 10/36

If a resident company of 109 eminent actors played the classics of drama from every literature of the ages, giving scores of performances in Boston yearly, the public would be on edge to know their personal histories. This is exactly, in the literature of music (one of the great literatures of the world), what the players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are, yet it is not until this Autumn, when the orchestra begins its 56th season, that such a volume of charcoal drawings with paragraph biographies of its members makes its appearance—perhaps because, until Mr Gerome Brush gave us this brilliant performance as artist in both forms, no one knew how entertaining such a volume could be.

Genial and witty, it is at the same time a sociological document. Thirty years ago the orchestra was an exotic hybrid; German, French and Italian grown under glass in Boston. Today the Europeans are still here and so may they always be, for it is a necessity of the art that it take the finest artists wherever they may be had, irrespective of race, nationality, politics, religion or class. During the World War and after, we had a melancholy experience of the opposite. Rent by public dissensions, the Boston orchestra was all but wrecked and sank in four years from its long-held position as the finest in the world down to pallid mediocrity. Under Dr Koussevitzky it has again risen to where it disputes the primacy with the best on earth.

And now Yankees are in the orchestra by the right of artistic merit. Mr Brush's sketches tell succinct life-histories of artists from Boston, Lynn (it may be farther from Lynn to Symphony Hall than it is from Warsaw), Rockland, Bridgewater, Melrose, Revere, New Bedford, Vinal Haven, and even from farthest Ohio! who sit as peers with instrumentalists from Paris and Berlin.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has for more than half a century been, like the Boston Latin School and Harvard University, one of the institutions which give unique distinction to the city, but radio broadcast has recently opened its treasures to poor and rich equally and spread them over the continent, though its maintenance still rests largely on the generosity and loyal affection of people moderately well-to-do; and where else, unless it be to relieve crude physical suffering, can money be given where it can give greater happiness to more people?

In personnel the orchestra is a preliminary sketch of an ideal international society. It is a democracy entirely composed of aristocrats. These charcoal sketches present 109 heads of men, reflective, scholarly, sensitive, fine-grained, every face mirroring the life of intellect and spirit lived by a master musician. World War veterans sit at elbows with voluntary exiles from politically upheaved natal lands and yet, weirdly assorted though their origins sound, there is usually in the story some fated assignation with a beloved musical instrument which reads as though such careers went by destiny.

And to an age of blatantly self-advertising egoism what an example they are of self-effacing modesty! Every man a virtuoso, yet all that you know of them from the program book is a name and a musical instrument in small print and often you cannot even be sure which one he is. If a solo passage falls to him in the symphonic score, he plays it with a mastery won by nearly a lifetime's diligence, then, at the next bar, glides back again into the anonymous ranks of the orchestra, a melodious but nameless voice in the sea of sound.

How long before our modern life, private as well as public, will attain such dignity, such decorum, such high breeding, and such harmony as yours, "Gentlemen of the Orchestra"?

UNCLE DUDLEY.

A Season of Music Begins

Oct 11 '36

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

IF THE proverbial stranger from Mars had happened upon Symphony Hall at about 2:00 o'clock on Friday afternoon, he would have guessed at once that something was up.

The crowds gathered on the steps would have indicated this. If the Martian had lingered watching the eager stream of people spilling into the hall until 2:30 when the last patron had been wheeled to the curb by the last liveried chauffeur, he might have sensed that it was something to which these earthbound people attached importance.

So far he would have been quite correct—and those better informed than he would have assured him that it was an occasion of vital significance.

To be sure, the greeting extended Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as he came upon the stage to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the opening concert of its 56th season was not in excess (if it was not less) than that of the previous years of his regime.

* * *

THE AUDIENCE rose to its feet and the feeling was one of genial warmth toward the conductor whom a particular group of people had become accustomed to seeing before them.

But through this quite comfortable and homely atmosphere the realization burst that this institution which is the Boston Symphony Orchestra should no more be taken for granted than the Taj Mahal should be looked at with complacence by the people who live near it.

There is no doubt at all that a great symphony orchestra is as great a wonder as any of those tabulated among the seven.

Further, no amount of familiarity with this particular orchestra can detract from the fact that at this moment the eyes of the music world are rightly focused upon it—that both the instrument and Koussevitzky, its creator, stand at the height of their power—an accumulation of laurels behind them, and immeasurable achievements ahead.

Dr. Koussevitzky opened the program with Haydn's Symphony in B flat, No. 102—the performance of which left nothing to be desired.

This Symphony—the ninth of the London series commissioned by Salomon is surely one of Haydn's greatest symphonic structures. It is in addition a glowing work of art. Its pure melody, and robust vitality springing from a state of spiritual well being, its substance from mature thought, its outlines from an inexhaustive source of invention.

* * *

THE PROGRAM was so designed as to give full scope to the resources of the orchestra. While in the Haydn Symphony the strings were allowed to display their richness without competition, there was hardly a virtuoso in the orchestra who can escape responsibility for the unforgettable performance of Debussy's "La Mer" which followed.

Debussy's power of evoking moods, of weaving nebulous mists of color and perfume, can rarely have been so distilled into a performance. It found Dr. Koussevitzky in inspired mood and was easily the peak of the afternoon's performance.

The program closed with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of this score is always dramatic. On Friday afternoon his emphasis on breadth of line sometimes led to a slowness of tempo, as in the Second Movement (Andante con moto), which could, no doubt, be subject to differences of opinion.

The final Allegro was magnificent. It would be difficult indeed to imagine a better close for this concert than the last gigantic chords which end the symphony commonly designated as "The Fifth."

CONCERTS THIS WEEK

Symphony Hall

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Dr Serge Koussevitzky conductor, at 2:30 Friday and 8:15 Saturday. Second program. An unusually contrasted program includes two symphonies, the Fifth of Jean Sibelius and one in A major (K 201) by Mozart, written when he was 18. The latter has not before

MUSICIANS

Gl. Oct 11

been played at these concerts. Dr Koussevitzky will give first American performances to "The Forgotten Offerings" ("Les Offrandes oubliees") by Olivier Messiaen, a young French composer and one of four in a new Parisian group who call themselves "La Jeune France." (The others are Yves Baudrier, Daniel-Lesur and Andre Jolivet.) Word from Symphony Hall states that "The Forgotten Offerings" was composed in 1931, and has been performed several times, one of them a joint concert of "La Jeune France" in Paris last June 3. The program of that concert carried a declaration of faith by these four: they are bound together by "sincerity, generosity and artistic good faith"; their aim is "to create and promote a living music." "The Forgotten Offerings" is an expression of Messiaen's Catholic faith, and falls in three parts, "The Cross," "The Sin," and "The Eucharist." Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," will also be played.

---

lcoim Bradley rd Ladd, Mrs. derick T. Lord, n, Mrs. Guido Marshall Tate,
b, Mrs. Walter
Webb White. harge of subs.

ne heir home in rnoon, Dr. and iley are an-nent of their Angelia Riley, on of Mr. and y Horne of Vellesley Col-ity, graduat-te of Hebron on School of of the Uni-with the mber of the ernity.

t will open eet, Brook-
Oct. 16, for e Women's Charitable

itish abits, rday,
stipu-
B-flat ays at part ssevitboners, their of an aton for ne com-Boston

ue crush d passer-the steps os if Les-here. That explana-s hurrying , up from ning move-te, so she isappointed doors, while if it didn't o be coming rself a sym-cocoa brown, white, brown her thin black hanging down a smart beret

rs. Alexander daughter. Mrs. made the en-
Mrs. Robert Sal-long coat and ge wool, dashed ent.
ift waited im-or her tickets, a a feather of the an all-black eng coat of match-Mrs. Philip Wrenn,
as striped in bright diagonally, and her Moses Williams, Jr., lvet jacket with a d'Hauteville Bell, in ite print and shiny

as escorted to her by a tall, blond young y'd watched with ines being taken on the captain of police on ng hands with all the asking if they'd had a Miss Lucy Stone begged pictures, as she hurried wder blue tweeds with hat; Mrs. C. Bertram suit of slightly darker able to reach the door in ut Mrs. Louis F. S. Bader ompanions walked some
Mrs. Bader in a spruce with the new full flared foxes and a black velour

chard King Thorndike, Jr., avy blue from the little her turban to her feet;
stance Turner wore a wine
mble; Miss Dorothea Dean, ith touches of red; Miss Re-
Ames, brown with a checked
Miss Natalie Winslow all but for the full-blown velvet top her hat, and the touches vet on her frock; Miss Nancy wore tailored gray; Miss Nan-Wellington oxford gray with a e satin blouse and gardenias on jacket; Mrs. John Hallowell, Miss nor Fay and Mrs. Morgan Butler greeted friends in the lobby at

Continued on Page 3—Column 2

First Symphony

Continued from Page One

intermission and everything was very gay.

Mr. and Mrs. Sohier Welch chatted with George Judd, in his formal clothes, Mr. Welch in a gray lounge suit and Mrs. Welch in black satin with touches of white, flat sandals of black suede, silver foxes and a brimmed black felt with a twisted cord around the crown. Mrs. Allan Forbes and her daughter were in the midst of a throng, Mrs. Forbes in brown and yellow and Miss Phyllis in a shirtmaker dress of blue wool, bareheaded as usual. Mrs. Francis P. Sears, in very dark blue, with brighter gloves, sat with her North Shore neighbor, Mrs. Frederick Ayer, and Mrs. Louis Agassiz Shaw joined them, a green silk print showing at the neck of her gray plaid suit.

KOUSSEVITZKY TALKS LIKE A BOOSTER

Post Oct. 12/36

28

By Louis M. Lyons

Koussevitzky has discovered America. To the conductor of Boston's symphony orchestra this discovery is as important as the one Columbus made, and Columbus could hardly have exceeded Koussevitzky in exultation or in his glowing adjectivial astonishment at the new land. It was a great symphony of delight to the great musician.

A. P.

Koussevitzky

For 12 long years, America to this expatriated Russian, was bounded by the stage of Symphony Hall. His view was not much extended by the addition of occasional Pullman car rides to New York or by the incidental concert trips to "your provincial cities." Summers he returned to Europe, after the habit of European artists, and sought his rest and recreation at the traditional resorts and watering places of the old world. So at 60 this master of music had never heard the song of the surf on the shore of Maine nor ever felt his senses drunk with the rich wine of the Autumnal colors in the North Woods.

But this Summer, drawn first to the Berkshires for their music festival and, lured there by invitations of friends, on to Bar Harbor, to the White Mountains, to a motor tour of Vermont, Koussevitzky spent a Summer that exhausted his vocabulary of superlatives. Exhilaration, refreshment, delight!

* * *

Back last Sunday for the Symphony season, he felt like telling the world about this New England—its climate, its mountains, its forests, its shore—all in a few hours from Boston. Unbelievable beauty—surpassing hospitality, ineffable air.

I found Serge Koussevitzky returning from a walk at 5 in the afternoon, at his rambling frame house just over the hill from the old Brookline Reservoir. First a black spaniel burst into the room. Then came a little figure of a man in gray worsted and gray sweater, wavy gray hair that the breeze had blown, and a jaunty bow tie of blue. A keen face and sparkling eye greeted the caller, and the exhilarated, exuberant discoverer began at once, without the slightest of preliminaries, to pour out the ecstasies of his New England Summer.

It was in the first shadow of twilight that he began his account. The dusk gathered as he plunged on. The momentum of his enthusiasm mounted as his eloquent hands kept up the pace of his narration. So utterly under the spell of his memories was he that it was only when it grew so dark I could not see his face that he came down to earth long enough to realize that there was no light in the room and that his interviewer could not see to put a note on paper. Fervent and abject in apology, he reached to the lamp and then began again at the beginning.

* * *

"But your White Mountains are as wonderful! I had rather have New Hampshire than Switzerland. Your mountains are so wild and still so lovely and with roads everywhere—little small roads to walk up—what is it you call them? Yes, trails—all up the mountains pretty trails go. I am a great walker, and all around from the Crawford House where I stayed were wonderful walks. Mt Washington! Yes, of course, I climbed it. The road just goes right up, and such view! O, such view! And snow there is on it in the Summer, even. I awoke one morning and from my bedroom window I could see the snow—the mountain was covered with it—and so beautiful in the sun, the snow. That was, let me see, the 26th of September.

"Your mountains are so delightful because they are not so picked up as in Switzerland, where everything is cleaned up and worked up."

"Manicured?"

"Yes. In New England the country is so rich in beauty because it is left natural. Europe is so small that every bit of ground is worked. None is left for the public to enjoy in its free undeveloped state. You conservate, that is the word—conservate, is it not? You keep your forests for the people to enjoy. In Europe all are exploited.

"There is nothing in Europe like your New England country. Russia has great mountains in the Caucasus. But 24-36 hours away. Here in four or five hours you are in the White Mountains. In two hours you are at beautiful Dublin, N H, with its lake and mountain and splendid forests. And you have such restful hotels with such glorious hospitality.

* * *

"I motored in Vermont, O so lovely and green everywhere. And I stopped at nice inns.

"I had 10 unforgettable days at Mt Desert, at Seal Harbor, where I sailed on a yacht of one of my generous Boston friends, and climbed the mountains and drove over the beautiful scenic roads that Mr Rockefeller has laid out.

"O, the air is so exhilarating there! The rest one has is far beyond anything Europe can offer.

"One discovers such a rare combination of forest and mountain and shore. The country is so rugged. Nature is so rich. New England is such an extraordinary climatic station. In Boston it will be hot and in Maine so refreshingly cool—and only a few hours away. And the water! So blue! And the view! So marvelous!

"I returned from Europe at the end of July to conduct the Berkshire music festival and I have been enjoying the New England country ever since then. It is a marvelous country in the Berkshires, and such a beautiful place for festivals. Such fine roads to bring people from the cities all around.

"Then I had my 10 days at Bar Harbor, then my Vermont motor trip, then my White Mountain stay, and I was in Dublin and Peterboro, and for the last a visit at the shore with your Gov Fuller. So I saw for the first time how extraordinarily rich is nature in America, and I know I did not see all of America. Next Summer I will stay, if not all Summer, certainly part of it.

* * *

"Now I am back, a slave again for seven months to my work, which is so exacting that I cannot even enjoy dinners with my friends in Boston. I have to deny myself everything during the Symphony season. But I am a very happy slave, you must say, because the happiest days for me are the days I work with my orchestra.

"But now I have my walking. That is my joy in the Winter. And the walks are so beautiful here in Brookline now. The colors so gorgeous in the gardens and the gardens so open for the public to see.

"I walk every morning as soon as I am up. Then I have breakfast and go to rehearsal. Then I walk again and after lunch and my nap, if I do not have a concert I walk again. Walking is wonderful, and I loved your New England country for its fine walks. So astonishing, so superb, so beautiful the country is for walking.

"Yes I enjoyed my New England vacation immensely, and my wife did also."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 11 1936

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its fifty-sixth season in Symphony Hall last week. The usual New York series will be given, consisting of five evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall, and five in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn. The orchestra will visit Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, Springfield, Worcester and Hartford, and also appear at Dartmouth and Smith Colleges and at Yale and Rutgers Universities. New works will include a Soviet symphony by Shaporin; a violin concerto by Roger Sessions; the piano "Rhapsody" of Rachmaninoff, and Prokofieff's Third concerto.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

OCT 14 1936

Two novel works will appear on the program for the second pair of concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra in Boston Friday and Saturday. One, the Symphony in A Major by Mozart (K. 201), is more than a century and a half old but has never been played by the orchestra in Boston before. The other, "Les Offrandes Oubliees," was written by Olivier Messiaen, one of the new group of four young Parisian composers who call themselves "La Jeune France." The program will be rounded out with the Fifth Symphony by Sibelius and "Don Juan," by Strauss.

Music and Musician

29

Oct. 10/36

Symphony Concert

Season's Opening by the Boston Orchestra, With Works By Haydn, Debussy and Beethoven

By Moses Smith

The last thing that is supposed to matter at the opening of the symphonic season is the program. It is an established rule merely that the program contain nothing provocative. Otherwise, the music-making on such an occasion is an excuse for bringing old friends together once more: the conductor with the orchestra, the performers with the public, the members of the public with one another.

As it happens the program for the first concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played yesterday afternoon and to be repeated tonight, indicates considerable care in planning on the part of the conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The Haydn Symphony in B-flat, one of the London series, has not been frequently played by symphony concerts hereabouts, even though it is one of the composer's most delightful works. Debussy's "La Mer," which comes near being his masterpiece in the opinion of some, is second on the program. In its thirty years' existence it has been played more often at the Boston Symphony concerts than has the Haydn Symphony in the orchestra's fifty-five years. It was played as recently as last January, when Dimitri Mitropoulos was the guest conductor. But it can scarcely be placed, as yet, in the category of over-familiar masterpieces.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony has been overplayed, of course, as far as many regular attendants of symphony concerts are concerned. But, at least for this listener, it emerged from another hearing with astonishing freshness. In any event, those who grumble at the lack of music they know on our symphony programs are satisfied by the inclusion of the Fifth on the present program. Others may still exercise their right to leave the concert early.

* * *

There was no doubt of the friendliness that filled the atmosphere yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. When Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, walked on the stage he was cordially applauded by an unusually prompt matinee audience. When a minute or two later the conductor appeared, the orchestra and—according to an almost established custom—the audience rose to greet him. While he acknowledged the greeting and prepared to settle down to the program of the day, newspaper photographers broke ancient custom by taking flashlight photographs, while many in the audience gasped in surprise. The only apparent damage was the disturbance of the conductor's composure when, after he had his arm raised, ready to begin, the belated flash from a single bulb made it necessary for him to go through his preparations all over again.

* * *

The Haydn B-flat Symphony, it is interesting to note, appeared on the opening program of the Boston Orchestra in its first year, 1881, when the late George Henschel was the conductor. And it was last played at the beginning of the orchestra's fiftieth season in 1930, when Sir George was again, by a miracle, on hand to conduct. Yesterday's performance reminded us how lovely music is. We were also reminded of the fact that the best known of Haydn's symphonies are not necessarily the most ingratiating. There are others, among the master's huge number of works in this form, that, like the B-flat, may profitably replace any of the two or three that may be hit on when a conductor finds it is time to do "some Haydn." Especially if they are as beautifully played as the B-flat Symphony was yesterday under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction.

The performance of "La Mer," a composition as opposed to Haydn's in mood and style as night is to day, was equally eloquent. Discounting the excessive brilliance of the end, one may report that conductor and orchestra seemed perfectly attuned to the poetry and awesome mystery of the Debussyan music. Here—as in performance of other works by Debussy and Ravel—one forgets the presence of Dr. Koussevitzky or of his players; one forgets that musicians are imprisoned in a network of staves and notes and bar-lines—especially bar-lines!

* * *

After this the performance of the Beethoven Symphony was a letdown. No doubt, Dr. Koussevitzky was himself profoundly moved by the music and likewise urged the players to extraordinarily excited performance. Unfortunately the resultant excitement was often more nearly hysterical than related to the noble humanitarian drama that we may legitimately associate with Beethoven's masterful score.

One might assent to the vigorous assault on the lower strings that began the Trio of the Scherzo. But when the attack remained undiminished in force so that the poor violas could scarcely be heard at all at their entrance, the excitement began to resemble noise. Of a different nature, but equally objectionable, was the entire treatment of the bridge section from the Scherzo to the Finale, and of the Finale itself. And at the very beginning of the symphony the unrestrained intensity of the attack on the four-note motto gave it more the character of a scream of terror than of a rude, powerful protest.

* * *

The orchestra and conductor—to return to pleasanter matters—were in midseason form. What a magnificent body of musicians we are privileged to listen to! In texture the orchestra is almost exactly the same as last year. The one notable exception is the first horn player, who is now Gottfried Freiberg, until recently of the Vienna State Opera, to replace Mr. Boettcher, resigned. The program did not offer sufficient opportunity to assay the newcomer's merits; a single concert is inconclusive anyhow. Two other players in the wind section, previously performers in the orchestra at irregular intervals, are now dignified by inclusion in the official list—B. Valkenier, French horn (son of Willem Valkenier, who has been a member of the section these many years) and V. Smith, trombone.

The audience was very large. Official word has it that the Hall is almost sold out for Friday afternoons, and that subscriptions for both matinee and evening concerts considerably surpass in number those of last year. In character the audience has not changed much. It was a little more cordiad to the performers yesterday than customarily.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
UNION

OCT 12 1936

Gerome Brush, author and illustrator of "The Boston Symphony Orchestra," is a ~~resident of Dublin~~ and a former secretary of Gov. Robert P. Bass during the latter's term as chief executive. The attractive book consists of 110 charcoal sketches of the entire personnel of the orchestra and a brief biography of each musician.

Splendid Ovation Given To Conductor Koussevitzky

10/36

By ELEANOR FREEMAN

OPENING ITS FIFTY-SIXTH season yesterday afternoon, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first program before a capacity audience in Symphony Hall. When Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the beloved conductor, made his entrance the entire audience from the first row to the topmost gallery gave him a standing ovation, applauding joyfully for several minutes. The welcome which the orchestra received at this first concert was especially impressive, since the majority of patrons found the program and the way it was played entirely to their liking.

The program opened with the "Symphony in B-flat" by Haydn, and was followed by the mystical and enchanting orchestral sketches "Le Mer," by Debussy. The final number was the ever stirring "Symphony No. 5 in C minor," by Beethoven, which seemed even more inspiring than usual.

Large Number of Socialites Attend

Patrons of the Friday concerts are perenially distinguished, and yesterday there seemed to be a greater number of socialites attending than we remembered at last year's opening. Mrs. Edward A. Taft, whose husband is a trustee of the orchestra, was among the enthusiasts. She wore an attractive pottery red ensemble.

Mrs. Allan Forbes was accompanied by her daughter, Miss Phyllis Forbes, and during the intermission she chatted with her sister, Mrs. Daniel A. de Menocal. Mrs. Forbes wore a frock of mustard and brown, and a brown hat trimmed with a chartreuse feather. Mrs. Dudley L. Pickman, Jr., wearing a black cape costume and an Empire hat trimmed with an ostrich plume, came down from the North Shore with Mrs. Louis A. Shaw, who had pinned a gardenia on her oxford gray tailleur.

Others were Mrs. Stephen Van R. Crosby, Mrs. Robert Treat Paine, Mrs. Francis W. Bird, Mrs. Albert C. Burrage, Jr., with her daughter, Miss Nancy Burrage, Mr. Edward J. Holmes, the Rev. Arthur Lee Kinsolving, Mrs. Russell Burrage, Mrs. Alfred McIntyre, who wore a crisp white blouse with her black tailleur, Mrs. Henry Endicott, Mrs. Guy Warren Walker, several jaunty feathers trimming her smart beret, Mrs. Halfdan Lee, Mrs. A. L. West Movius, Mrs. Alden Megrew, Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Rimmer, Mrs. Alvin F. Sortwell and her mother, Mrs. A. Wilder Pollard, and Mrs. Stanwood G. Wellington.

Miss Caroline Hunnewell and Miss Lucile Swift wore two of the choicest costumes of the afternoon. The former chose a black gown belted in dark red and a black hat crested with matching red feathers. Miss Swift wore a black costume and a long square-shouldered military cape lined with fine black and white checks. Miss Katharine Tweed also looked attractive in a blue princess coat, trimmed with braid, and an Alpine hat.

We glimpsed among others, Mrs. Freeman Hinckley and her daughter, Miss Eleanor McClurg, Mrs. Robert Terry, who topped her fetching blue coat with a novel felt pillbox—half of matching blue and the front of a rich red; Mrs. Charles Collens, Mrs. W. Russell MacAusland, Mrs. Roland G. Hopkins, Mrs. Howard Turner, her daughter, Miss Constance Turner and her son, Mr. Howard R. Turner; Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs, Mrs. Jaffray deH. Bell, Mrs. Charles S. French, Mrs. Francis J. Capper, Mrs. Paul F. Clark, who was accompanied by Miss Ann Mason (Miss Jane Cowl's rival in "First Lady"); Mrs. Malcolm B. French, Mrs. Moses Williams, Mrs. Moses Williams, Jr., and Miss Eleanor Williams.

Still others were Mrs. William Dexter, Mrs. Hugh Bancroft, Mrs. Harrison G. Reynolds accompanied by Mrs. Henry K. White, who wore a sleek black gown with a heavy gold necklace as the only ornament; Miss Margaret Fish, Mrs. Philip Wrenn, Jr., whose black frock was diagonally striped with red, green and blue; Mrs. Morgan Harris, Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, Mrs. Horace Morison, Mrs. Frank H. Stewart, Mrs. William G. Rantoul, Miss Harriet Rantoul, Mrs. Harold D. Hodgkinson, Mrs. Alexander Steinert, Mrs. Samuel J. Newman, Mrs. Adolf Leeds, Miss Gertrude Sands, Mrs. Carl Dreyfus, Mrs. Edward Hamlin, Jr., Mrs. William H. Coburn, Mrs. Joe V. Meigs, Mrs. J. Lewis Bremer and her daughter, Miss Barbara Bremer who was sitting with Mrs. Marshal Fabyan, Jr.

Among the members of the young married set were Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, whose black gown was trimmed around the neck and down the front by a fringe of royal blue worsted; Mrs. Frederick G. Crocker, Mrs. Hobart Spalding, Mrs. C. Bertram Currier, Mrs. Charles Kinkade, Mrs. Edwin H. B. Pratt (Aileen Kelly), whose frock was of Dubonnet velveteen; Mrs. Frank Lyman, Jr. (Jeanne Sargent), Mrs. William Rothwell, 2nd (Faith Ware), Mrs. Gibbs W. Sherrill with Mrs. Edward Wendell, Mrs. Robert Saltonstall, Jr., Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike, Jr., Mrs. Charles Devens sitting with Mrs. Francis S. Hill, Mrs. Amor Hollingsworth, Jr., and Mrs. Howard Slayman.

Miss Nancy Wellington, whose engagement to Mr. Nicholas W. Danforth of New York, was announced a week ago, was swamped with the best wishes of her friends. She wore a black suit and a corsage of gardenias. Still others were Miss Mary Dewart, Miss Celina Robbins, Miss Nancy Ames, Miss Rosamond Gardiner, Miss Peggy Blake, Miss Eleanor Eustis, Miss Arria Morison, Miss Katharine Peabody, Miss Sally Ross, Miss Lucy Stone, Miss Ellen Bottomley with her mother, Mrs. John Bottomley, Miss Lewis Watson, Miss Jane Megrew, Miss Gretchen Thompson, Miss Rebecca Ames, Miss Harriette Blake, Miss May Bryant, Miss Eleanor Coolidge, and Miss Mary Derby.

Oct. 10/36 Monitor

What's Going On in th

Symphony Season Opens

UNDER inspiriting conditions, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifty-sixth season was opened in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky beginning his thirteenth year as its director.

The orchestra was in fine form, the audience, which filled the hall, was enthusiastic and the management was happy in the knowledge that subscriptions for this season substantially surpass those of recent years. For the Friday afternoon series, the hall is virtually sold out, and the demand is heavy for the other series.

The growing inclination of the management to make a little closer contact with the general public was evidenced by the admittance of news photographers to take pictures of the audience greeting orchestra and conductor. For the first time in history, flashlights flared at a Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In fact one of them flared a little late, just as Dr. Koussevitzky was about to begin the first number of his program. The conductor lowered his arms and waited for the resulting buzz to subside before starting.

The only important change in the personnel of the orchestra this year is the replacement of Mr. Böttcher, the first horn, by G. Freiberg, who has been solo horn of the Vienna Staatsoper and Philharmonic, and at the Bayreuth festivals. That rapprochement between conductor and orchestra which comes of long association was evident in the quality of the performance.

The first program of the season was made up of Haydn's Symphony in B flat, No. 102 (No. 9 of the London series); Debussy's "La Mer," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The Haydn symphony was an interesting revival. It had not been heard here since Oct. 10, 1930, when Sir George Henschel, inaugurating the fiftieth season, repeated substantially his program for the orchestra's first concert, on Oct. 21, 1881, including this symphony of Haydn's.

It is a work that deserves to be kept in the active list for more than sentimental reasons. The charm of the opening Largo, the melodic loveliness of the Adagio and the ingenuity and wit of the quicker movements delight the listener today as they must have delighted Londoners of the last decade of the eighteenth century, and Bostonians at the beginning of the eighteen eighties; more, no doubt, for certainly neither those Londoners nor those former Bostonians ever heard such a performance of this work as we heard yesterday. So far as technique is concerned, it is hardly possible to conceive of more subtly revealing playing; and the interpretation was very sympathetic, except for the characteristic tendency of Dr. Koussevitzky to "lay on" a little too much in this type of music. This tendency was especially noticeable yesterday in the heavy emphasis on the Allegro vivace which follows the opening Largo.

"La Mer," of course, is one of Dr. Koussevitzky's best accomplishments. To hear it after Haydn, however, is to wonder if Debussy will sound as well in 2045 as Haydn does today. Recognize Debussy's virtues: his harmonic and coloristic innovaof poetry, his power mood, his re-cally and color sub-of a some-self-break long shout of exuberance, even at the cost of good form. Perhaps this is only a reviewer's mood. L. A. S.

Symphony Orchestra's Performance Is Rich

By RUTH MARSTERS

Oct 10

A representative audience of capacity proportions and cordial spirit gathered in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon for the opening concert of the 56th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

As Dr. Serge Koussevitzky came upon the platform, to begin the eleventh year of his regime as conductor, the audience rose to its feet in the customary gesture of greeting.

With the first silver tones emanating from the string choirs in the introductory Largo of Haydn's Symphony in B flat which opened the program one realized that here was to be a performance indeed.

It is not unusual, and quite understandable, that one is called upon to overlook slight technical imperfections in the first performances of a season.

Such, however, was emphatically not the case here. The orchestra seems to have met this year with an even more serious concentration of purpose than ever before.

(The performances at the Berkshire Festival this summer and at the recent Harvard Tercentenary celebration were apparently fortunate in a great many aspects.)

The Haydn Symphony—which is the ninth in the series commissioned by Salomon in Londono—ne of the greatest scores left by that prolifio genius, was given that rare caliber of performance in which perfection of execution is blended with warm, pulsating sponataneity.

The performance of Debussy's "La Mer" appeared moreover nothing short of miraculous—to b put in the category of memorable performances of all time. This music, which can be such a severe test of skill served to display the superb vituosity of the orchestra, while Dr. Koussevitzky molded the whole into incredible and sheerly exquiste poetry.

A sonorous climax was brought about by the closing performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

Music and Musician

29

Oct. 10/36

Symphony Concert

Season's Opening by the Boston Orchestra, With Works By Haydn, Debussy and Beethoven

By Moses Smith

The last thing that is supposed to matter at the opening of the symphonic season is the program. It is an established rule merely that the program contain nothing provocative. Otherwise, the music-making on such an occasion is an excuse for bringing old friends together once more: the conductor with the orchestra, the performers with the public, the members of the public with one another.

As it happens the program for the first concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played yesterday afternoon and to be repeated tonight, indicates considerable care in planning on the part of the conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The Haydn Symphony in B-flat, one of the London series, has not been frequently played by symphony concerts hereabouts, even though it is one of the composer's most delightful works. Debussy's "La Mer," which comes near being his masterpiece in the opinion of some, is second on the program. In its thirty years' existence it has been played more often at the Boston Symphony concerts than has the Haydn Symphony in the orchestra's fifty-five years. It was played as recently as last January, when Dimitri Mitropoulos was the guest conductor. But it can scarcely be placed, as yet, in the category of over-familiar masterpieces.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony has been overplayed, of course, as far as many regular attendants of symphony concerts are concerned. But, at least for this listener, it emerged from another hearing with astonishing freshness. In any event, those who grumble at the lack of music they know on our symphony programs are satisfied by the inclusion of the Fifth on the present program. Others may still exercise their right to leave the concert early.

* * *

There was no doubt of the friendliness that filled the atmosphere yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. When Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, walked on the stage he was cordially applauded by an unusually prompt matinee audience. When a minute or two later the conductor appeared, the orchestra and—according to an almost established custom—the audience rose to greet him. While he acknowledged the greeting and prepared to settle down to the program of the day, newspaper photographers broke ancient custom by taking flashlight photographs, while many in the audience gasped in surprise. The only apparent damage was the disturbance of the conductor's composure when, after he had his arm raised, ready to begin, the belated flash from a single bulb made it necessary for him to go through his preparations all over again.

* * *

The Haydn B-flat Symphony, it is interesting to note, appeared on the opening program of the Boston Orchestra in its first year, 1881, when the late George Henschel was the conductor. And it was last played at the beginning of the orchestra's fiftieth season in 1930, when Sir George was again, by a miracle, on hand to conduct. Yesterday's performance reminded us how lovely music is. We were also reminded the fact that the best known of Haydn's symphonies are not necessarily the most ingratiating. There are others, among the master's huge number of works in this form, that, like the B-flat, may profitably replace any of the two or three that may be hit on when a conductor finds it is time to do "some Haydn." Especially if they are as beautifully played as the B-flat Symphony was yesterday under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction.

The performance of "La Mer," a composition as opposed to Haydn's in mood and style as night is to day, was equally eloquent. Discounting the excessive brilliance of the end, one may report that conductor and orchestra seemed perfectly attuned to the poetry and awesome mystery of the Debussyan music. Here—as in performance of other works by Debussy and Ravel—one forgets the presence of Dr. Koussevitzky or of his players; one forgets that musicians are imprisoned in a network of staves and notes and bar-lines—especially bar-lines!

* * *

After this the performance of the Beethoven Symphony was a letdown. No doubt, Dr. Koussevitzky was himself profoundly moved by the music and likewise urged the players to extraordinarily excited performance. Unfortunately the resultant excitement was often more nearly hysterical than related to the noble humanitarian drama that we may legitimately associate with Beethoven's masterful score.

One might assent to the vigorous assault on the lower strings that began the Trio of the Scherzo. But when the attack remained undiminished in force so that the poor violas could scarcely be heard at all at their entrance, the excitement began to resemble noise. Of a different nature, but equally objectionable, was the entire treatment of the bridge section from the Scherzo to the Finale, and of the Finale itself. And at the very beginning of the symphony the unrestrained intensity of the attack on the four-note motto gave it more the character of a scream of terror than of a rude, powerful protest.

* * *

The orchestra and conductor—to return to pleasanter matters—were in midseason form. What a magnificent body of musicians we are privileged to listen to! In texture the orchestra is almost exactly the same as last year. The one notable exception is the first horn player, who is now Gottfried Freiberg, until recently of the Vienna State Opera, to replace Mr. Boettcher, resigned. The program did not offer sufficient opportunity to assay the newcomer's merits; a single concert is inconclusive anyhow. Two other players in the wind section, previously performers in the orchestra at irregular intervals, are now dignified by inclusion in the official list—B. Valkenier, French horn (son of Willem Valkenier, who has been a member of the section these many years) and V. Smith, trombone.

The audience was very large. Official word has it that the Hall is almost sold out for Friday afternoons, and that subscriptions for both matinee and evening concerts considerably surpass in number those of last year. In character the audience has not changed much. It was a little more cordiad to the performers yesterday than customarily.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
UNION

OCT 12 1936

Gerome Brush, author and illustrator of "The Boston Symphony Orchestra," is a ~~resident of Dublin~~ and a former secretary of Gov. Robert P. Bass during the latter's term as chief executive. The attractive book consists of 110 charcoal sketches of the entire personnel of the orchestra and a brief biography of each musician.

Splendid Ovation Given To Conductor Koussevitzky

Oct 10/36

By ELEANOR FREEMAN

OPENING ITS FIFTY-SIXTH season yesterday afternoon, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first program before a capacity audience in Symphony Hall. When Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the beloved conductor, made his entrance the entire audience from the first row to the topmost gallery gave him a standing ovation, applauding joyfully for several minutes. The welcome which the orchestra received at this first concert was especially impressive, since the majority of patrons found the program and the way it was played entirely to their liking.

The program opened with the "Symphony in B-flat" by Haydn, and was followed by the mystical and enchanting orchestral sketches "Le Mer," by Debussy. The final number was the ever stirring "Symphony No. 5 in C minor," by Beethoven, which seemed even more inspiring than usual.

Large Number of Socialites Attend

Patrons of the Friday concerts are perenially distinguished, and yesterday there seemed to be a greater number of socialites attending than we remembered at last year's opening. Mrs. Edward A. Taft, whose husband is a trustee of the orchestra, was among the enthusiasts. She wore an attractive pottery red ensemble.

Mrs. Allan Forbes was accompanied by her daughter, Miss Phyllis Forbes, and during the intermission she chatted with her sister, Mrs. Daniel A. de Menocal. Mrs. Forbes wore a frock of mustard and brown, and a brown hat trimmed with a chartreuse feather. Mrs. Dudley L. Pickman, Jr., wearing a black cape costume and an Empire hat trimmed with an ostrich plume, came down from the North Shore with Mrs. Louis A. Shaw, who had pinned a gardenia on her oxford gray tailleur.

Others were Mrs. Stephen Van R. Crosby, Mrs. Robert Treat Paine, Mrs. Francis W. Bird, Mrs. Albert C. Burrage, Jr., with her daughter, Miss Nancy Burrage, Mr. Edward J. Holmes, the Rev. Arthur Lee Kinsolving, Mrs. Russell Burrage, Mrs. Alfred McIntyre, who wore a crisp white blouse with her black tailleur, Mrs. Henry Endicott, Mrs. Guy Warren Walker, several jaunty feathers trimming her smart beret, Mrs. Halfdan Lee, Mrs. A. L. West Movius, Mrs. Alden Megrew, Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Rimmer, Mrs. Alvin F. Sortwell and her mother, Mrs. A. Wilder Pollard, and Mrs. Stanwood G. Wellington.

Miss Caroline Hunnewell and Miss Lucile Swift wore two of the choicest costumes of the afternoon. The former chose a black gown belted in dark red and a black hat crested with matching red feathers. Miss Swift wore a black costume and a long square-shouldered military cape lined with fine black and white checks. Miss Katharine Tweed also looked attractive in a blue princess coat, trimmed with braid, and an Alpine hat.

We glimpsed among others, Mrs. Freeman Hinckley and her daughter, Miss Eleanor McClurg, Mrs. Robert Terry, who topped her fetching blue coat with a novel felt pillbox—half of matching blue and the front of a rich red; Mrs. Charles Collens, Mrs. W. Russell MacAusland, Mrs. Roland G. Hopkins, Mrs. Howard Turner, her daughter, Miss Constance Turner and her son, Mr. Howard R. Turner; Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs, Mrs. Jaffray deH. Bell, Mrs. Charles S. French, Mrs. Francis J. Capper, Mrs. Paul F. Clark, who was accompanied by Miss Ann Mason (Miss Jane Cowl's rival in "First Lady"); Mrs. Malcolm B. French, Mrs. Moses Williams, Mrs. Moses Williams, Jr., and Miss Eleanor Williams.

Still others were Mrs. William Dexter, Mrs. Hugh Bancroft, Mrs. Harrison G. Reynolds accompanied by Mrs. Henry K. White, who wore a sleek black gown with a heavy gold necklace as the only ornament; Miss Margaret Fish, Mrs. Philip Wrenn, Jr., whose black frock was diagonally striped with red, green and blue; Mrs. Morgan Harris, Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, Mrs. Horace Morison, Mrs. Frank H. Stewart, Mrs. William G. Rantoul, Miss Harriet Rantoul, Mrs. Harold D. Hodgkinson, Mrs. Alexander Steinert, Mrs. Samuel J. Newman, Mrs. Adolf Leeds, Miss Gertrude Sands, Mrs. Carl Dreyfus, Mrs. Edward Hamlin, Jr., Mrs. William H. Coburn, Mrs. Joe V. Meigs, Mrs. J. Lewis Bremer and her daughter, Miss Barbara Bremer who was sitting with Mrs. Marshal Fabyan, Jr.

Among the members of the young married set were Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, whose black gown was trimmed around the neck and down the front by a fringe of royal blue worsted; Mrs. Frederick G. Crocker, Mrs. Hobart Spalding, Mrs. C. Bertram Currier, Mrs. Charles Kinkade, Mrs. Edwin H. B. Pratt (Aileen Kelly), whose frock was of Dubonnet velveteen; Mrs. Frank Lyman, Jr. (Jeanne Sargent), Mrs. William Rothwell, 2nd (Faith Ware), Mrs. Gibbs W. Sherrill with Mrs. Edward Wendell, Mrs. Robert Saltonstall, Jr., Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike, Jr., Mrs. Charles Devens sitting with Mrs. Francis S. Hill, Mrs. Amor Hollingsworth, Jr., and Mrs. Howard Slayman.

Miss Nancy Wellington, whose engagement to Mr. Nicholas W. Danforth of New York, was announced a week ago, was swamped with the best wishes of her friends. She wore a black suit and a corsage of gardenias. Still others were Miss Mary Dewart, Miss Celina Robbins, Miss Nancy Ames, Miss Rosamond Gardiner, Miss Peggy Blake, Miss Eleanor Eustis, Miss Arria Morison, Miss Katharine Peabody, Miss Sally Ross, Miss Lucy Stone, Miss Ellen Bottomley with her mother, Mrs. John Bottomley, Miss Lewis Watson, Miss Jane Megrew, Miss Gretchen Thompson, Miss Rebecca Ames, Miss Harriette Blake, Miss May Bryant, Miss Eleanor Coolidge, and Miss Mary Derby.

S

Vienna, Oct. 10 (INS)—In two smashing blows of revolutionary import, Dr. Kurt Schuschnigg, who succeeded the assassinated Englebert Dollfuss, today made himself the iron dictator of Austria.

co

for the opening phony Orchestra.

As Dr. Serge Koussevitzky came upon the platform, to begin the eleventh year of his regime as conductor, the audience rose to its feet in the customary gesture of greeting.

With the first silver tones emanating from the string choirs in the introductory Largo of Haydn's Symphony in B flat which opened the program one realized that here was to be a performance indeed.

It is not unusual, and quite understandable, that one is called upon to overlook slight technical imperfections in the first performances of a season.

Such, however, was emphatically not the case here. The orchestra seems to have met this year with an even more serious concentration of purpose than ever before.

(The performances at the Berkshire Festival this summer and at the recent Harvard Tercentenary celebration were apparently fortunate in a great many aspects.)

The Haydn Symphony—which

Oct. 10/36 Monitor

What's Going On in th

Symphony Season Opens

UNDER inspiriting conditions, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifty-sixth season was opened in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky beginning his thirteenth year as its director.

The orchestra was in fine form, the audience, which filled the hall, was enthusiastic and the management was happy in the knowledge that subscriptions for this season substantially surpass those of recent years. For the Friday afternoon series, the hall is virtually sold out, and the demand is heavy for the other series.

The growing inclination of the management to make a little closer contact with the general public was evidenced by the admittance of news photographers to take pictures of the audience greeting orchestra and conductor. For the first time in history, flashlights flared at a Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In fact one of them flared a little late, just as Dr. Koussevitzky was about to begin the first number of his program. The conductor lowered his arms and waited for the resulting buzz to subside before starting.

The only important change in the personnel of the orchestra this year is the replacement of Mr. Böttcher, the first horn, by G. Freiberg, who has been solo horn of the Vienna Staatsoper and Philharmonic, and at the Bayreuth festivals. That rapprochement between conductor and orchestra which comes of long association was evident in the quality of the performance.

The first program of the season was made up of Haydn's Symphony in B flat, No. 102 (No. 9 of the London series); Debussy's "La Mer," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The Haydn symphony was an interesting revival. It had not been heard here since Oct. 10, 1930, when Sir George Henschel, inaugurating the fiftieth season, repeated substantially his program for the orchestra's first concert, on Oct. 21, 1881, including this symphony of Haydn's.

It is a work that deserves to be kept in the active list for more than sentimental reasons. The charm of the opening Largo, the melodic loveliness of the Adagio and the ingenuity and wit of the quicker movements delight the listener today as they must have delighted Londoners of the last decade of the eighteenth century, and Bostonians at the beginning of the eighteen eighties; more, no doubt, for certainly neither those Londoners nor those former Bostonians ever heard such a performance of this work as we heard yesterday. So far as technique is concerned, it is hardly possible to conceive of more subtly revealing playing; and the interpretation was very sympathetic, except for the characteristic tendency of Dr. Koussevitzky to "lay on" a little too much in this type of music. This tendency was especially noticeable yesterday in the heavy emphasis on the Allegro vivace which follows the opening Largo.

"La Mer," of course, is one of Dr. Koussevitzky's best accomplishments. To hear it after Haydn, however, is to wonder if Debussy will sound as well in 2045 as Haydn does today. Recognize Debussy's virtues: his harmonic and coloristic innovations, his sense of poetry, his power to create and sustain a mood, his strong individuality, his Gallic restraint. One cannot subsist musically on harmony and color, on mood and restraint. Under harmony and color we need melodic virility and substantial form; we may tire of a mood, and Gallic restraint sometimes uncomfortably resembles self-consciousness. We want to break out of the pastel shadows. We long for a burst of vitality, for a shout of exuberance, even at the cost of good form. Perhaps this is only a reviewer's mood.

L. A. S.

---

is the ninth in the series commissioned by Salomon in Londono—ne of the greatest scores left by that prolific genius, was given that rare caliber of performance in which perfection of execution is blended with warm, pulsating sponataneity.

The performance of Debussy's "La Mer" appeared moreover nothing short of miraculous—to b put in the category of memorable performances of all time. This music, which can be such a severe test of skill served to display the superb vituosity of the orchestra, while Dr. Koussevitzky molded the whole into incredible and sheerly exquisite poetry.

A sonorous climax was brought about by the closing performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

All Society Turns Out to Greet Symphony Orchestra

Oct. [illegible]/36

By BETTY ALDEN

THE FIRST FRIDAY afternoon concert of the new symphony series was held yesterday . . .

The hall was jammed to the doors and all the regular subscribers were expectantly waiting in their accustomed seats by the time Dr. Koussevitzky appeared to take his stand on the conductor's platform . . .

After a short preliminary ceremony in which the conductor and his orchestra beamed appreciatively in acknowledgment of the warm ovation extended by the audience, while flashlight pictures recorded the scene, the first in the season's series of concerts, which so enrich our musical life, began . . .

RENEE SCHANCK

The intermission was like a big family reunion . . . so many socially prominent people had postponed their return to town until the opening date of the symphony . . . and a great many subscribers who came in from Providence, Worcester and other fairly distant places, found old friends to greet as they milled about the crowded foyer . . .

Nancy Wellington, whose engagement to Nicholas Danforth of New York, has just been announced, was kissed and hugged and offered all sorts of best wishes by a number of good friends . . . she looked as radiant as a prospective bride should with a dark oxford gray suit and hat enhancing her blondeness . . . and the little corsage of white roses and bouvardia on her shoulder looked like a miniature bridal bouquet . . .

Mrs. John Wiggins (Jean Lee Sargeant), just back from her honeymoon, wore a snappy sport suit of rust, beige and brown checks with a rust ascot and hat . . . and Louise Whittemore, who was in coral tweed with a matching hat, managed to squeeze through the crowd to have a chat with Mrs. Howard Slayman . . .

You could tell by the flash of enjoyment in Nancy Ames' dark eyes that she was particularly delighted wtih the beauty of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony . . . indeed, everyone seemed reluctant to go home after the beauty and richness of the afternoon's program . . .

A list of those present would read like the social register . . . and just a few in particular were Mrs. Albert C. Burrage, Jr., with her attractive sub-deb daughter, Nancy . . . Mrs. Eliot Guild, in an attractive little turban adorned with a stiffened veil . . . Mrs. Alvan Fuller and Mrs. Franklin Hobbs discussing the approaching concert of their violinist friend, Ruth Posselt, which is to take place on November 9 for the benefit of the West Newton Community Service Club . . . The Fullers, the Hobbses, Mr. and Mrs. Sinclair Weeks, Mrs. Henry I. Harriman and Rev. and Mrs. Herbert Hitchens are just a few of the patrons and patronesses for the occasion . . .

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The second regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in A major (K. 201)	Mozart
"Les Offrandes oubliees"	Messiaen
"Don Juan," Tone poem	Strauss
Symphony No. 5 in E flat major	Sibelius

There is a perfect mine of symphonies by Mozart and Haydn which is hardly ever touched in the regular repertory of our orchestras. Here is this enchanting and ingenious work, for instance. All the Mozart scholars have singled it out as a particularly felicitous example of Mozart's early music; and yet it is almost never played, as Mr. Burk's program notes only too well prove. Such symphonies should be revived with greater regularity, for they fit perfectly into almost any program. This particular one in A major, with its lovely andante and its captivating finale, was beautifully played yesterday by a small orchestra.

It was followed on the program by a new work, introducing the best known of the group of four called "la jeune France." Moreover "Les Offrandes oubliees" was a good choice. Messiaen is evidently a deeply sincere composer and one who has some original ideas about composition. He is an organist, and his latest work is in the form of nine meditations, called "La Nativite du Seigneur," for that instrument. In this he employs a curious system of three transposable modes. Whether this earlier work has something of the same basis is hard to say, because the system as described in the Revue Musicale sounds decidedly complicated.

As usual in compositions which set out to contrast good and evil, the latter wins for immediate interest. "Paradise Lost" holds the reader's attention more easily than "Paradise Regained." Only Cesar Franck in his "Beatitudes" was unable to give his wicked characters much juice. Mr. Messiaen's sin, however, must have been exciting while it lasted; but happily there is no anti-climax when the piece ends in quietest simplicity. The work is more straightforward rhythmically than the constant changes in time signature would lead one to suppose. The composer has something to say, and he does so effectively and concisely.

Dr. Koussevitzky then led an exciting performance of Strauss's "Don Juan," perhaps the best of the tone poems and certainly "teacher's pet" as far as conductors are concerned. The performance of Sibelius' Fifth Symphony seemed to us exceptionally eloquent. We feel that the third movement is not Sibelius at his best. It gives us the tricks of his very individual style, but in such a way that they annoy rather than astonish or delight. On the other hand the first two are remarkable, and the finale loses none of its majesty.

This concert, which was an exceedingly good one, will be repeated tonight. Next week Wagner's "Faust" overture and Liszt's "Faust" symphony will be played.

LOWELL, MASS.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM

Oct. 18/36

MONDAY CONCERT TO OPEN TOMORROW

Next Monday, in Symphony hall 8.15, Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the opening concert of the series of six Monday evenings by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The programme will include: Haydn's Symphony in B flat No. 102, and the 9th in the London series: Debussy's "The Sea," three orchestral sketches; and the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius in E flat.

The remaining concerts of this series, for which subscriptions are still available, will take place on November 30, January 18, February 8, February 22, and April 12. Soloists for the season are Harold Bauer, pianist, and Gaspar Cassado, 'cellist. Dimitri Mitropoulos will conduct one of the concerts.

The Tuesday afternoon series of six will open in Symphony hall on November 3. This series is devoted, for the season to come, to the foremost composers of the 19th century.

...rts in Pr...

Trans. Oct. 15/36

Introducing a New Composer And His Work

The latest grouping of composers about a common principal is not a "Six" or a "Five," but a "Four." Called "La Jeune France," it will have its first American representation at the Boston Symphony concerts of this week when Dr. Koussevitzky performs "Les Offrandes Oubliees" by Olivier Messiaen. The purpose of this group is best explained by the manifesto published in the program of its first concert, last June 3:

"The conditions of life becoming harder and harder, mechanical and impersonal, music owes it to itself to bring, without respite to those who love it, its spiritual strength and its courageous reactions. 'La Jeune France,' resuming the title once created by Berlioz, pursues the way upon which the master once firmly strode: A friendly group of four young French composers, Olivier Messiaen, Daniel-Lesur, Andre Jolivet and Yves Baudrier, 'La Jeune France' proposes the diffusion of young, free works as much estranged from trite revolutionism as from trite academism. . . .

"It also hopes to encourage the young French school which is being allowed to die by the indifference or the penury of official powers, and faithfully to continue the work of those great elders who made French music in this century one of the pure jewels of civilization."

Although Daniel-Lesur has received mention as the composer of the "Five Interludes for Four Horns" to be heard at Bernard Zighera's first chamber concert this winter, Olivier Messiaen has the initial opportunity of bearing the olive branch to Boston. Born in Avignon in 1908, he has studied with Paul Dukas and Marcel Dupre at the Paris Conservatory. Whether the name "Messiaen" has been chosen for its obvious resemblance to "la Messie" as well as to our adjective "messianic" does not appear, but at any rate the music of this young Messiah seeks to express "the truths of the Catholic faith with the greatest possible emotion and sincerity."

The present work bears the complete title "The Forgotten Offerings: The Cross, The Sin, The Eucharist," and is explained by the following text:

"Arms outstretched, sorrowful unto death, on the tree of the Cross, you shed your blood. You love us, sweet Jesus, we had forgotten it.

"Driven by folly and the serpent's sting upon a breathless, a frantic a ceaseless race, we were descending into sin as into the tomb.

"Here is the table pure, the spring of charity, the banquet of the poor; here is adorable Mercy offering the bread of Life and of Love. You love us, sweet Jesus, we had forgotten it."

Each of these three sections is given individual music in this "Symphonic Meditation." A slow introductory section — "Presque lent, douloureux, profondement triste"—is followed by the main movement —"Vif, feroce." The third part recalls the mood of the first; the ending is beatific. Published in 1931, the work has been performed in Paris, Lyon and Monte-Carlo. It is scored for a large modern orchestra.

It is said that Messiaen's music is based upon two main means of expression. One of these is a system of chromatic modes such that their possibility of transposition is peculiarly limited. Used harmonically, these modes, or scales, have a strange color resulting from their few possible transpositions. The other deals with augmented rhythms; rhythms immediately proceeded or followed by their augmentation, with the occasional addition of a brief value. Thus a four-four measure may be followed by a plus four-four one-eighth measure, in which the last quarter note will be dotted. The signatures rival Stravinsky in their irregularity, seven-eight, nine-eight, eleven-eight and four-four constituting a normal succession.

Although one tends to feel that these procedures result in an idiom with which Stravinsky is not unfamiliar, closer acquaintance with Messiaen's work may prove their innovative value. There is a calm, static quality about the slow sections of this score that arrests the attention quite as much as the hastening desolation and despair of the middle section. If "La Jeune France" has succeeded in synthesizing the power and insight of Berlioz and Wagner and the intensity and conviction of Honegger and Stravinsky, its advent will not be unwelcome.

Scarcely less of a novelty is the Mozart Symphony in A major (K.201) that opens this program which also contains Richard Strauss' early tone-poem "Don Juan" and the monumental Fifth Symphony of Sibelius. Mozart composed his symphony in the early months of 1774 in Salzburg under the direct influence of a symphony in the same key by Michel Haydn who, we should remember, would have had a far more significant place in music history had his fame not been absorbed by his brother Joseph.

It is strange that this work stands for the first time upon a Boston Symphony program, for not only is it important as the climax of the first broad section of Mozart's life, but as the most perfect of all the works he produced before his journey to Paris and Mannheim in 1777, when he was profoundly influenced by the advanced orchestral technique of the Mannheim school.

The first pressure of the "gallant" style, that was sweeping Europe in 1773, upon his work is manifested in the general breadth of treatment and in the use of three distinct themes in the Allegro as opposed to the usual elaboration of two or oftener one subject. The symphony is notable also for the long and intricate codas to the movements and the care with which the development of the first movement is welded to the exposition.

The approaching "gallant" style merely gives breadth to the "serious" style of the work. A descending octave skip from which the first theme derives its impetus becomes a motto for the other movements; it appears in the deeply refined Andante, the energetic Minuet, and the extraordinarily rich Finale. Mozart, at eighteen, had reached the masterful heights of what Wyzewa and De Saint-Foix are pleased to term his "Romantic" period. In the eighteen more years that were given to him he was to pass quickly through his "gallant" period and return to the "grand" style in such magnificent creations as the great symphonies of 1788.

G. H. L. S.

...ospect ===

Oliver Messiaen

...hose Orchestral Work, "Les ...ffrandes Oubliees," Will Be Pre...nted at the Boston Symphony ...oncerts Tomorrow Afternoon and Saturday Evening

---

TROY, N. Y.

TIMES RECORD

OCT 22 1936

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY AT STOCKBRIDGE AGAIN NEXT YEAR

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, will return to Stockbridge Mass., next August, under the sponsorship of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., for six concerts over two week-ends. This announcement was made yesterday at the annual meeting of the festival organization.

80

Globe MUSIC Oct. 17/36

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first part of the new Symphony season has been vigorously planned. This week Dr Koussevitzky has assembled an exceptionally contrasted program—half of it unfamiliar music; he proposes for the third set of concerts, a week hence, nothing less than the massive "Faust" Symphony of Franz Liszt. Once again are we reassured before a season is barely under way of the enviable distinction of the Boston concerts.

The "new" composers of yesterday afternoon and this evening are Olivier Messiaen, a 29-year-old Frenchman, and Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, who, if he were living, would be 180. Messiaen's "The Forgotten Offerings" was given its first American performance; an A major Symphony (K 201) by Mozart was played for the first time by the Boston Symphony.

Mozart was 18, back in Salzburg from his youthful travels and fretting under the cold disdain of a new ruling Archbishop, when he composed this dainty and altogether charming work. It was a busy year for him, in 1774, for he turned out, among other things, a comic opera called "La finta giardiniera" which in the following January was to swell his fame as composer at the Bavarian court in Munich.

It is plain in this Symphony that Mozart had absorbed the Italian musical spirit in his three trips south of the Alps. And yet the style is as plainly Mozartean in its nimble flow and refinement. The first movement races off with a definite theme, without delay of a conventional introduction. The slow movement is among the most tender that Mozart ever wrote, songful, meditative, lacking any trace of superficiality. Since but a pair each of oboes and horns are required in addition to strings, Dr Koussevitzky followed his usual shrewd practice with early Mozart and Haydn and reduced his number of stringed instruments.

A new group of four Frenchmen has succeeded the once eminent "six" whose doings in Paris furnished many a lively bit of chronicling just after the war. Messiaen is one of these four who call themselves "Young France." Their affirmation of artistic faith binds them to sincere and generous promotion of the music of their countrymen. Evidently that is their sole purpose, and their ideas are not constricted by fanatic adherence to esthetic formulas.

In "The Forgotten Offerings" Messiaen renews tonal expression of his Roman Catholic beliefs which—according to the program book—has characterized his earlier work. The composer gives no sanction for description of his five-year-old score, beyond a literary quotation referring to the dying Savior on the cross, the sin into which the world was sinking, the office of the Eucharist, and a last humble admission: "You love us, gentle Jesus, we had forgotten it."

The music has, however, been arbitrarily divided into three sections, "The Cross," "The Sin" and "The Eucharist." The first and last are profoundly contemplative, austere, touched with a degree of mystic rapture. The writing is compact, clear, free from the confusion which has touched so many modern scores. By the nature of its spiritual basis "The Forgotten Offerings" bears no touch of the shallow trifling which one has, unfortunately, come to expect of present-day Paris.

M Messiaen's depiction of sin is less engaging. He follows too closely the pagan abandon of Stravinsky's pre-historic creatures in "The Rite of Spring." The rhythms, the unyielding orchestral texture are obviously derived from that amazing creation of Igor the Great. If the finer portions of "The Forgotten Offerings" may be taken as criterion Messiaen is one of the most gifted composers now in France. More of his music ought to be heard here.

Dr Koussevitzky's reading and the orchestra's performance of Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," were a marvel of color and verve. The tone was no less than glorious, the interpretation could not have been more intense. Doubly gratifying it was that this should be wrought upon "Don Juan" of all the tone poems least marred by commonness or vulgarity.

The Fifth Symphony of Sibelius, which ended the afternoon, has made its way into the hearts of most symphony-goers. An outpouring from the composer's heart, tempered by the self-questioning that has put a seal of integrity upon the best of Sibelius' music, the Fifth is less cryptic than the Fourth Symphony, but it is more warming. This sort of uncompromising art demands a serious and a receptive listener. It cannot be taken so quickly as music that exists upon the surface of thought and emotion. We are lucky that Dr Koussevitzky exhibits particular fondness, not to speak of his re-creative genius, for Sibelius. Another superb playing of the Fifth again asserted its greatness.

C. W. D.

All Society Turns Out to Greet Symphony Orchestra

By BETTY ALDEN

THE FIRST FRIDAY afternoon concert of the new symphony series was held yesterday . . .

The hall was jammed to the doors and all the regular subscribers were expectantly waiting in their accustomed seats by the time Dr. Koussevitsky appeared to take his stand on the conductor's platform . . .

After a short preliminary ceremony in which the conductor and his orchestra beamed appreciatively in acknowledgment of the warm ovation extended by the audience, while flashlight pictures recorded the scene, the first in the season's series of concerts, which so enrich our musical life, began . . .

RENEE SCHANCK

The intermission was like a big family reunion . . . so many socially prominent people had postponed their return to town until the opening date of the symphony . . . and a great many subscribers who came in from Providence, Worcester and other fairly distant places, found old friends to greet as they milled about the crowded foyer . . .

Nancy Wellington, whose engagement to Nicholas Danforth of New York, has just been announced, was kissed and hugged and offered all sorts of best wishes by a number of good friends . . . she looked as radiant as a prospective bride should with a dark oxford gray suit and hat enhancing her blondeness . . . and the little corsage of white roses and bouvardia on her shoulder looked like a miniature bridal bouquet . . .

Mrs. John Wiggins (Jean Lee Sargeant), just back from her honeymoon, wore a snappy sport suit of rust, beige and brown checks with a rust ascot and hat . . . and Louise Whittemore, who was in coral tweed with a matching hat, managed to squeeze through the crowd to have a chat with Mrs. Howard Slayman . . .

You could tell by the flash of enjoyment in Nancy Ames' dark eyes that she was particularly delighted wtih the beauty of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony . . . indeed, everyone seemed reluctant to go home after the beauty and richness of the afternoon's program . . .

A list of those present would read like the social register . . . and just a few in particular were Mrs. Albert C. Burrage, Jr., with her attractive sub-deb daughter, Nancy . . . Mrs. Eliot Guild, in an attractive little turban adorned with a stiffened veil . . . Mrs. Alvan Fuller and Mrs. Franklin Hobbs discussing the approaching concert of their violinist friend, Ruth Posselt, which is to take place on November 9 for the benefit of the West Newton Community Service Club . . . The Fullers, the Hobbses, Mr. and Mrs. Sinclair Weeks, Mrs. Henry I. Harriman and Rev. and Mrs. Herbert Hitchens are just a few of the patrons and patronesses for the occasion . . .

---

rts in Pr

Trans. Oct. 15/36

Introducing a New Composer And His Work

The latest grouping of composers about a common principal is not a "Six" or a "Five," but a "Four." Called "La Jeune France," it will have its first American representation at the Boston Symphony concerts of this week when Dr. Koussevitzky performs "Les Offrandes Oubliees" by Olivier Messiaen. The purpose of this group is best explained by the manifesto published in the program of its first concert, last June 3:

"The conditions of life becoming harder and harder, mechanical and impersonal, music owes it to itself to bring, without respite to those who love it, its spiritual strength and its courageous reactions. 'La Jeune France,' resuming the title once created by Berlioz, pursues the way upon which the master once firmly strode: A friendly group of four young French composers, Olivier Messiaen, Daniel-Lesur, Andre Jolivet and Yves Baudrier, 'La Jeune France' proposes the diffusion of young, free works as much estranged from trite revolutionism as from trite academism. . . .

"It also hopes to encourage the young French school which is being allowed to die by the indifference or the penury of official powers, and faithfully to continue the work of those great elders who made French music in this century one of the pure jewels of civilization."

Although Daniel-Lesur has received mention as the composer of the "Five Interludes for Four Horns" to be heard at Bernard Zighera's first chamber concert this winter, Olivier Messiaen has the initial opportunity of bearing the olive branch to Boston. Born in Avignon in 1908, he has studied with Paul Dukas and Marcel Dupre at the Paris Conservatory. Whether the name "Messiaen" has been chosen for its obvious resemblance to "la Messie" as well as to our adjective "messianic" does not appear, but at any rate the music of this young Messiah seeks to express "the truths of the Catholic faith with the greatest possible emotion and sincerity."

The present work bears the complete title "The Forgotten Offerings: The Cross, The Sin, The Eucharist," and is explained by the following text:

"Arms outstretched, sorrowful unto death, on the tree of the Cross, you shed your blood. You love us, sweet Jesus, we had forgotten it.

"Driven by folly and the serpent's sting upon a breathless, a frantic a ceaseless race, we were descending into sin as into the tomb.

"Here is the table pure, the spring of charity, the banquet of the poor; here is adorable Mercy offering the bread of Life and of Love. You love us, sweet Jesus, we had forgotten it."

Each of these three sections is given individual music in this "Symphonic Meditation." A slow introductory section — "Presque lent, douloureux, profondement triste"—is followed by the main movement —"Vif, feroce." The third part recalls the mood of the first; the ending is beatific. Published in 1931, the work has been performed in Paris, Lyon and Monte-Carlo. It is scored for a large modern orchestra.

It is said that Messiaen's music is based upon two main means of expression. One of these is a system of chromatic modes such that their possibility of transposition is peculiarly limited. Used harmonically, these modes, or scales, have a strange color resulting from their few possible transpositions. The other deals with augmented rhythms; rhythms immediately proceeded or followed by their augmentation, with the occasional addition of a brief value. Thus a four-four measure may be followed by a plus four-four one-eighth measure, in which the last quarter note will be dotted. The signatures rival Stravinsky in their irregularity, seven-eight, nine-eight, eleven-eight and four-four constituting a normal succession.

Although one tends to feel that these procedures result in an idiom with which Stravinsky is not unfamiliar, closer acquaintance with Messiaen's work may prove their innovative value. There is a calm, static quality about the slow sections of this score that arrests the attention quite as much as the hastening desolation and despair of the middle section. If "La Jeune France" has succeeded in synthesizing the power and insight of Berlioz and Wagner and the intensity and conviction of Honegger and Stravinsky, its advent will not be unwelcome.

Scarcely less of a novelty is the Mozart Symphony in A major (K.201) that opens this program which also contains Richard Strauss' early tone-poem "Don Juan" and the monumental Fifth Symphony of Sibelius. Mozart composed his symphony in the early months of 1774 in Salzburg under the direct influence of a symphony in the same key by Michel Haydn who, we should remember, would have had a far more significant place in music history had his fame not been absorbed by his brother Joseph.

It is strange that this work stands for the first time upon a Boston Symphony program, for not only is it important as the climax of the first broad section of Mozart's life, but as the most perfect of all the works he produced before his journey to Paris and Mannheim in 1777, when he was profoundly influenced by the advanced orchestral technique of the Mannheim school.

The first pressure of the "gallant" style, that was sweeping Europe in 1773, upon his work is manifested in the general breadth of treatment and in the use of three distinct themes in the Allegro as opposed to the usual elaboration of two or oftener one subject. The symphony is notable also for the long and intricate codas to the movements and the care with which the development of the first movement is welded to the exposition.

The approaching "gallant" style merely gives breadth to the "serious" style of the work. A descending octave skip from which the first theme derives its impetus becomes a motto for the other movements; it appears in the deeply refined Andante, the energetic Minuet, and the extraordinarily rich Finale. Mozart, at eighteen, had reached the masterful heights of what Wyzewa and De Saint-Foix are pleased to term his "Romantic" period. In the eighteen more years that were given to him he was to pass quickly through his "gallant" period and return to the "grand" style in such magnificent creations as the great symphonies of 1788.

G. H. L. S.

ospect ===

Oliver Messiaen

Whose Orchestral Work, "Les Offrandes Oubliees," Will Be Presented at the Boston Symphony Concerts Tomorrow Afternoon and Saturday Evening

---

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The second regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in A major (K. 201) . . . . Mozart
"Les Offrandes oubliees" . . . . Messiaen
"Don Juan," Tone poem . . . . Strauss
Symphony No. 5 in E flat major . . . Sibelius

There is a perfect mine of symphonies by Mozart and Haydn which is hardly ever touched in the regular repertory of our orchestras. Here is this enchanting and ingenious work, for instance. All the Mozart scholars have singled it out as a particularly felicitous example of Mozart's early music; and yet it is almost never played, as Mr. Burk's program notes only too well prove. Such symphonies should be revived with greater regularity, for they fit perfectly into almost any program. This particular one in A major, with its lovely andante and its captivating finale, was beautifully played yesterday by a small orchestra.

It was followed on the program by a new work, introducing the best known of the group of four called "la jeune France." Moreover "Les Offrandes oubliees" was a good choice. Messiaen is evidently a deeply sincere composer and one who has some original ideas about composition. He is an organist, and his latest work is in the form of nine meditations, called "La Nativite du Seigneur," for that instrument. In this he employs a curious system of three transposable modes. Whether this earlier work has something of the same basis is hard to say, because the system as described in the Revue Musicale sounds decidedly complicated.

As usual in compositions which set out to contrast good and evil, the latter wins for immediate interest. "Paradise Lost" holds the reader's attention more easily than "Paradise Regained." Only Cesar Franck in his "Beatitudes" was unable to give his wicked characters much juice. Mr. Messiaen's sin, however, must have been exciting while it lasted; but happily there is no anti-climax when the piece ends in quietest simplicity. The work is more straightforward rhythmically than the constant changes in time signature would lead one to suppose. The composer has something to say, and he does so effectively and concisely.

Dr. Koussevitzky then led an exciting performance of Strauss's "Don Juan," perhaps the best of the tone poems and certainly "teacher's pet" as far as conductors are concerned. The performance of Sibelius' Fifth Symphony seemed to us exceptionally eloquent. We feel that the third movement is not Sibelius at his best. It gives us the tricks of his very individual style, but in such a way that they annoy rather than astonish or delight. On the other hand the first two are remarkable, and the finale loses none of its majesty.

This concert, which was an exceedingly good one, will be repeated tonight. Next week Wagner's "Faust" overture and Liszt's "Faust" symphony will be played.

LOWELL, MASS.

DAY TELEGRAM

AY CONCERT TO OPEN TOMO

xt Monday, in Symphon .15, Serge Koussevitzk duct the opening concert ries of six Monday evenin e Boston Symphony orc The programme will ir Haydn's Symphony in B fl 102, and the 9th in the Londc ies: Debussy's "The Sea," thi chestral sketches; and the Symphony of Sibelius in E flat

The remaining concerts o series, for which subscriptions are still available, will take place on November 30, January 18, February 8, February 22, and April 12. Soloists for the season are Harold Bauer, pianist, and Gaspar Cassado, 'cellist. Dimitri Mitropoulos will conduct one of the concerts.

The Tuesday afternoon series of six will open in Symphony hall on November 3. This series is devoted, for the season to come, to the foremost composers of the 19th century.

TROY, N. Y.

TIMES RECORD

OCT 22 1936

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY AT STOCKBRIDGE AGAIN NEXT YEAR

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, will return to Stockbridge Mass., next August, under the sponsorship of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., for six concerts over two week-ends. This announcement was made yesterday at the annual meeting of the festival organization.

Globe Oct. 17/36

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first part of the new Symphony season has been vigorously planned. This week Dr Koussevitzky has assembled an exceptionally contrasted program—half of it unfamiliar music; he proposes for the third set of concerts, a week hence, nothing less than the massive "Faust" Symphony of Franz Liszt. Once again are we reassured before a season is barely under way of the enviable distinction of the Boston concerts.

The "new" composers of yesterday afternoon and this evening are Olivier Messiaen, a 29-year-old Frenchman, and Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, who, if he were living, would be 180. Messiaen's "The Forgotten Offerings" was given its first American performance; an A major Symphony (K 201) by Mozart was played for the first time by the Boston Symphony.

Mozart was 18, back in Salzburg from his youthful travels and fretting under the cold disdain of a new ruling Archbishop, when he composed this dainty and altogether charming work. It was a busy year for him, in 1774, for he turned out, among other things, a comic opera called "La finta giardiniera" which in the following January was to swell his fame as composer at the Bavarian court in Munich.

It is plain in this Symphony that Mozart had absorbed the Italian musical spirit in his three trips south of the Alps. And yet the style is as plainly Mozartean in its nimble flow and refinement. The first movement races off with a definite theme, without delay of a conventional introduction. The slow movement is among the most tender that Mozart ever wrote, songful, meditative, lacking any trace of superficiality. Since but a pair each of oboes and horns are required in addition to strings, Dr Koussevitzky followed his usual shrewd practice with early Mozart and Haydn and reduced his number of stringed instruments.

A new group of four Frenchmen has succeeded the once eminent "six" whose doings in Paris furnished many a lively bit of chronicling just after the war. Messiaen is one of these four who call themselves "Young France." Their affirmation of artistic faith binds them to sincere and generous promotion of the music of their countrymen. Evidently that is their sole purpose, and their ideas are not constricted by fanatic adherence to esthetic formulas.

In "The Forgotten Offerings" Messiaen renews tonal expression of his Roman Catholic beliefs which—according to the program book—has characterized his earlier work. The composer gives no sanction for description of his five-year-old score, beyond a literary quotation referring to the dying Savior on the cross, the sin into which the world was sinking, the office of the Eucharist, and a last humble admission: "You love us, gentle Jesus, we had forgotten it."

The music has, however, been arbitrarily divided into three sections, "The Cross," "The Sin" and "The Eucharist." The first and last are profoundly contemplative, austere, touched with a degree of mystic rapture. The writing is compact, clear, free from the confusion which has touched so many modern scores. By the nature of its spiritual basis "The Forgotten Offerings" bears no touch of the shallow trifling which one has, unfortunately, come to expect of present-day Paris.

M Messiaen's depiction of sin is less engaging. He follows too closely the pagan abandon of Stravinsky's pre-historic creatures in "The Rite of Spring." The rhythms, the unyielding orchestral texture are obviously derived from that amazing creation of Igor the Great. If the finer portions of "The Forgotten Offerings" may be taken as criterion Messiaen is one of the most gifted composers now in France. More of his music ought to be heard here.

Dr Koussevitzky's reading and the orchestra's performance of Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," were a marvel of color and verve. The tone was no less than glorious, the interpretation could not have been more intense. Doubly gratifying it was that this should be wrought upon "Don Juan" of all the tone poems least marred by commonness or vulgarity.

The Fifth Symphony of Sibelius, which ended the afternoon, has made its way into the hearts of most symphony-goers. An outpouring from the composer's heart, tempered by the self-questioning that has put a seal of integrity upon the best of Sibelius' music, the Fifth is less cryptic than the Fourth Symphony, but it is more warming. This sort of uncompromising art demands a serious and a receptive listener. It cannot be taken so quickly as music that exists upon the surface of thought and emotion. We are lucky that Dr Koussevitzky exhibits particular fondness, not to speak of his re-creative genius, for Sibelius. Another superb playing of the Fifth again asserted its greatness.

C. W. D.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Program Aptly Selected, Performers at Their Peak

31.

Dr. Koussevitzky and Orchestra Present Music by Mozart, Messiaen, Strauss and Sibelius

By Moses Smith

Outside of Boston Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is generally greeted as a masterful program-builder. It is true that in the home city of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the conductor is occasionally likely to regard the entire programs of the year as a unit, so that an individual program may seem to lack proportion. But the program for this week's concerts, heard yesterday afternoon and to be replayed this evening, is an illustration of the conductor's most happy flair for selecting an engrossing list.

Mozart's Symphony in A major (K. 201), which begins the program, serves the manifold purpose of a light, spirited beginning; of an offset to the storm and stress, the problems and perplexities of the music of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries that followed; and of a quasi-novelty. For, strange as it may seem, this delightful A major Symphony had not previously been played at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The more aggressive novelty followed immediately—"Les Offrandes oubliees" by Olivier Messiaen, containing music that could not have been written in any century (and very likely in any decade) but ours. With all its complexities this music had at least the intention of simplicity, as compared with other compositions of the post-War era. Therefore M. Messiaen's work was not so sharply contrasted with the music of an earlier century as to violate the listener's sensibilities.

On the other hand it had sufficient harmonic astringency, rhythmic diversity and orchestral color to serve as a bridge to Strauss's "Don Juan," which, a million miles removed from the music of Mozart in style and emotional effect, would have been altogether too violent a contrast with the little Symphony if it had been made to follow it immediately.

Now "Don Juan" is so richly and lushly scored, so sensuous in its melodic and harmonic appeal, that it might have seemed dangerous for Dr. Koussevitzky to place after it the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius, the only other number on the program. But the conductor must have been shrewdly counting on several factors; the intermission, which gave us listeners a chance to cool off after an exciting performance of the Strauss tone-poem; the intensities of this very Fifth Symphony of Sibelius and the almost hypnotic effect of its reiterated motives; and, finally, the magnificent performance it received.

* * *

It was clear at yesterday's concert that it is difficult to separate Dr. Koussevitzky the conductor from himself as program-maker. Or to separate either from the superb Boston Symphony Orchestra at his disposal. We have not had such uniformly beautiful, precise, invigorating, "inspiried" playing by the orchestra since—well, since the last similar occasion, which was probably no further away than last season. But at the time of listening the occurrence seems like a miracle.

The Mozart Symphony was played with a delicious style. The unfamiliar work by Messiaen seemed to be getting the most favorable treatment possible, far more favorable, it is probably safe to hazard, than it received at any of its Parisian performances. The playing of it abounds in difficulties, principally rhythmic; but the listener did not detect the slightest hitch.

The presentation of the Strauss tone-poem, as I have already suggested, was something out of the ordinary. The strings had the gorgeous beauty of tone that Strauss asks but does not always get from other orchestras. The brass choir, which has had its off days in the past, sounded magnificently yesterday. Especially was this true of the quintessential horns, which, on the basis of two concerts, seem rejuvenated this season.

Instead of straining for more superlatives to characterize the performance of the Sibelius Symphony it will be better to state simply that the playing seemed to be ideal. Almost certainly it surpassed Dr. Koussevitzky's and the Orchestra's previous splendid essays with this Symphony. There was all the wondrous perfection of detail and ensemble and none of the excessive breadth which has slightly marred the Koussevitzkyan presentations of this composition in the past.

* * *

It was good to hear the Mozart Symphony and a pity we have not heard it before. The Symphony was written when Mozart was only eighteen years old, but it exhibits the hand of a genius—and of a master as well. Consider only the development section of the first movement—short, rudimentary in form, but not so short as to prevent Mozart from introducing a stroke as bold as lightning, an idea that comes as fresh as the most elaborately contrived surprises of Beethoven. In a few months a mere boy turned out four such symphonies, not to mention other music. Wonderful boy, indeed!

The "offering" of M. Messiaen was too generous to be dismissed with condescension and not ample enough to justify its imposing auspices. This young man (he is twenty-eight, according to the program-book) boldly proclaims himself one of the four members constituting "La Jeune France," with the customary sweeping manifesto issued a little while ago. Terms of the manifesto are, it is true, general and rather vague. But by implication they lead us to expect, at the least, a Berlioz, in whose name the four presume to speak.

Messiaen, unfortunately, is no Berlioz. It is, of course, unfair to demand that he be either a Berlioz or even that now despised Saint-Saens, who once had something to say on the subject of purity in French art. But the composer of "Les Offrandes oubliees" is obviously a competent, talented and stimulating musician. In this work, which by the way, was written at least five years before the formal pronouncement of "La Jeune France," he has selected an excellent subject for musical setting—a trinity of the Cross, Sin and the Eucharist.

The score is necessarily in three-part form. I did not, at first hearing, agree with the opinion of no less eminent a musician than Florent Schmitt that the main section, devoted to Sin, is considerably superior to the other parts. Of course, it is obviously the most exciting; it would have to be in order to represent Sin at all well. But I found considerable interest in the cool, almost contemplative quality of the first offering; and in the peaceful (if again obvious) epilogue that purports to suggest the Eucharist.

Divers Music At Symphony

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

IT WOULD be difficult to imagine a greater study in contrasts than that presented by the two works given their first Boston performances at the regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

The first, a Mozart Symphony in A major—a gem of a work which Dr. Koussevitzky happened upon in Europe this summer—was first performed in this country in 1897 at a New York concert of the American Symphony Orchestra, and again in 1931 by the Philharmonic, Toscanini conducting. There is no record of any other performance of the Symphony in this country, and it appears to have known a like neglect in Europe.

The second, "Les Offrandes Oubliees (The Forgotten Sacrifice). Meditation Symphonique" by Messiaen, though given its first performance in the United States on this occasion, is not altogether new, the score having been published in 1931.

* * *

OLIVIER MESSIAEN, a composer little known in this country, is one of those in the vanguard of modern French music who have grouped themselves together under the name "La Jeune France." To quote from the admirable program notes of John Burke he "aims primarily to express with the utmost possible of emotion and sincerity the truths of the Catholic faith."

The composer's singleness of purpose is evidenced by the long list of works from his pen inspired by the New Testament.

"Les Offrandes Oubliees" is written in three sections, which bear the titles: "La Croix, Le Peche, L'Eucharistie."

It opens with distinctly eerie threads of harmony in the violins; the rhythm becomes ever more insistent until the climax is reached in a torrential outburst where the music suddenly breaks off. A mysterious passage follows which develops into a movement of poignant beauty.

It is eminently sincere music—a strange blend of mysticism and cacaphony.

It was performed with a moving intensity—The audience appeared to approve the work, as it did the Mozart Symphony which opened the program.

* * *

IT IS almost unbelievable that the latter was written in 1774 by a child of eighteen. The clarity of thought, the unfaltering sureness of structural design, proclaim it to be a mature work. Its youthful qualities, are those that Mozart was never to lose. The extravagance of melody, the gracious patterns of movement and harmony, are everywhere expressive of a pure, blithe spirit that no amount of bitter experience could touch or tarnish.

The first half of the program was brought to a close with Strauss' Tone Poem, "Don Juan." Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of this score was the essence of dramatic poetry. The orchestra was in top form in its performance.

* * *

FINALLY, one heard Sibelius Fifth Symphony. Here is a work so greatly sincere, so filled with meaning, so rich in vitality and abundance of joy, that, had it been the only work of the composer, it would be sufficient to have established his towering stature. It was magnificently performed.

At the concerts of the coming Friday and Saturday Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Liszt's "Faust" Symphony. The Harvard Glee Club will assist in the performance of the work. Rulon Robison to be the tenor soloist. The program will open with Wagner's "A Faust Overture."

OCTOBER 17, 1936

Mon

What'

Boston Symphony Orchestra

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second Friday concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the following program: Mozart, Symphony in A major (K. 201); Messiaen, "Les Offrandes Oubliées" ("The Forgotten Sacrifice"), a Meditation Symphonique; Strauss, "Don Juan," and Sibelius, Symphony No. 5, in E flat.

The Mozart is especially grateful and gracious music, and while it does not reveal the mature ideas which may be discovered in his later works (the young composer is credited with having produced this symphony when only 18 years old) it is unmistakably Mozartean and altogether refreshing. The program said that this was the first performance at these concerts. We hope it may not be the last. It undeniably served a double purpose—of revealing the young genius of the eighteenth century and of throwing into relief the work of another youth of the twentieth century.

We are informed that Olivier Messiaen's "Les Offrandes Oubliées" was published in 1931, when the composer was 23 years old. This young man is affiliated with a group which calls itself "La Jeune France." Germaine Tailleferre has also chosen to associate herself with this group, a circumstance which should at once establish in the mind of the initiated the type of music which may be forthcoming. The group realizes that "as conditions of life become more and more hard, mechanical and impersonal, music must bring ceaselessly to those who love it its spiritual violence and its courageous reactions."

The group is pledged to "create and to promote a living music," but whereas the young Mozart mirrors the elegance of his period, plus that attribute commonly termed "spirituality," the young Messiaen seems to reflect our mechanical age minus that quality, unless it be found in the final measures of his work. A good portrait painter penetrates the outer self of his subject; so also should a composer owning to the tenets which are those of "La Jeune France" reveal more of that "inner fire."

To his credit it may be written that M. Messiaen's piece has the virtue of brevity, that its statements are succinct and very easy to comprehend and that there are mildly exciting moments during the middle section. There was cordial applause for the work upon the conclusion of this, the first performance in the United States.

A superb performance of the Sibelius item left the listener more impressed than ever with the creative ability of this composer. The work also revealed again to the fullest extent in the finale the development possibilities of what may be termed a thoroughly genuine, classical, "swing music" theme. Motion and majesty are the component parts of this impressive movement.

G. M. S.

Arlin

OCT

Boston Symphony's Matinees To Start Tuesday Afternoo

A concert season of unique d tinction opens Tuesday at th o'clock in Symphony Hall, Bost
For this will be the opening the annual series of six symph ic matinees in which the Bos Symphony Orchestra plays w might be termed programs wit plot, under the leadership of world-famous conductor, Se Koussevitzky. He does the p ting, and always is able to something new. The music of year's matinees was assemb nation by nation. This time plot of the season will be m drawn from the masters of nineteenth century, who are kno as "the romantic school." T made great advances in the art writing for orchestra, besides fusing their work with great peal to the emotions and the agination.

To hear the characteristic wo of the nineteenth century maste as Koussevitzky will group th at the Tuesday matinees at proximately monthly interv will be to range over some of most glorious music of the wo
The composers will include B thoven, Weber, Schubert, Berl
Mendelssohn, Schumann, Li
Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovs
Debussy and Sibelius.

Although the entire strength the Boston Symphony, 109 play is heard in the Tuesday mati these concerts are looked on many as a bargain symphony
ies. Due simply to there b only six concerts, whereas t are twenty-four on Fridays Saturdays, reserved season tic are inexpensive. Also, the starting time, three o'clock, peals to out-of-towners.

On Tuesday, November 3, programme is scheduled to clude: the Fifth Symphony Beethoven, Berlioz's "Roman nival" Overture, and the "U ished" Symphony of Schuber

NE
W Liszt

BY W THIS sub Concerts Week" Week." memory performa phony"
Saturday than pra ignored, again th endeavor tangle o
Thirty could w
. . .
that, in Liszt ch cally."
much t vented the way ultimate
Of the Preludes current served popular the once sodies showy member
The tw effectiv where third " tunately
Two the "Fa Sonata
tentious
Of the such as abiding Forg abashed bast th music a markab
The " pates law Wa Elsewh even of only L of ever day — Saint-S caused that of century stood t
Whe last pr occasio of the the 12
of Lis and th came orchest movem and R before taced Wagne

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
OCT 18 1936

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME ON FRIDAY AND SATURDAY

Serge Koussevitzky announces Listz's "Faust" Symphony for the third programme of the Boston Symphony orchestra to be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This important work of Listz, which consists of three sections, "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles," concludes with a "chorus mysticus" in which the words of Goethe, deifying womanhood, are sung by a male chorus and tenor solo. The Harvard Glee club, and Rulon Robison will sing these parts. Wagner's "Faust" Overture will precede the performance of the Symphony.

The "Faust" Symphony is of special interest at this time in that this year marks the 50th anniversary of the composer's death—July 31, 1886. It also happens that he was born just 125 years ago—October 22, 1811.

Rare Musical Treats Fill Symphony's Program

By RUTH MARSTERS

A large and enthusiastic audience gathered in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, in a program admirably designed and superbly performed.

For the opening work Dr. Koussevitzky surprised his audience with a Mozart Symphony which had hitherto not been performed in Boston. The records at hand show only two previous performances of it in this country, the first in 1897 at a concert of the American Symphony Orchestra in New York, and again in New York at a concert of the Philharmonic, Toscanini conducting, in 1931.

Dr. Koussevitzky happened upon the work last summer in Europe where it has apparently lain in obscurity for many years.

The Symphony is in A major, and scored for the usual strings with two oboes and two horns. It was written in 1774. Mozart was eighteen at the time and serving as concert master at the court of the Archbishop Hieronymous von Collaredo in Salzburg.

It is utterly delightful music, with the wealth of melody that Mozart expended so freely, the irresistible sparkle, and charm, which were so singularly his.

The maturity of the work is no more incredible, considering his tender years, than almost any other fact of his remarkable career.

Another work new to Boston was Messiaen's "Les Offrandes Oubliees (The Forgotten Sacrifice), Meditation Symphonique."

Olivier Messiaen, one of the four modern French composers grouped together under the name "La Jeune France," habitually bases his compositions on subjects taken from the New Testament.

In "Les Offrandes Oubliees" one finds intensity of emotional expression which is often beautiful. The work is built in a pyramid design in which an overwhelming peak is reached.

Strauss' Tone Poem, "Don Juan," and Sibelius Fifth Symphony comprised the remainder of the program. Both were magnificently performed. At the close of the Sibelius Symphony, which followed the intermission, and definitely climaxed the afternoon's performance, it was difficult to remember anything else—all other thoughts being swept away by the power of that towering giant.

The same program will be presented at this evening's concert in Symphony Hall.

936

ny's
Start Afternoo of unique d day at th Hall, Bost

e opening six symph h the Bos plays w grams wit ership of uctor, Se pes the p able to music of s assem his time will be m asters of ho are kn chool." T in the ar a, besides ith great s and the cteristic w ntury mast l group t tinees at ly inter r some of of the w include ubert, Be mann, I Tchaikov

s. re strengt y, 109 pla esday mat looked on ymphony there b whereas t
Fridays season ti lso, the e o'clock, ers.
ember 3, eduled to ymphony
"Roman d the "U Schube

NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Liszt Chided Oftener Than Praised

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

THIS present should be, for the subscribers to the Symphony Concerts, "Give a Thought to Liszt Week" or, better, "Be Kind to Liszt Week." For the composer whose memory will be honored through a performance of his "Faust Symphony" at the concerts of Friday and Saturdays is nowadays oftener chided than praised. Worse, he is apt to be ignored, save when some writer tells again the tale of his many amours or endeavors to straighten out the tangle of his personality.

Thirty years ago Lawrence Gilman could write: "In any final analysis . . . one is constrained to admit that, in Matthew Arnold's phrase, Liszt chiefly counts to us historically." If that was true then, how much truer is it today. Liszt invented the symphonic poem, paving the way for Richard Strauss, who ultimately swept him from the field. Of the dozen tone-poems only "Les Preludes" has a secure place in the current repertory, and even it is reserved for concerts of a distinctly popular cast. Pianists seldom play the once inevitable Hungarian Rhapsodies or the infinitely clever and showy transcriptions. Singers remember two or three of the songs. The two-piano concertos, models of effectiveness, survive of course, but where are the choral works? The third "Love Dream" will, unfortunately, always be with us.

Two masterpieces Lizt did create, the "Faust Symphony" and the Piano Sonata in B minor, and a less pretentious third, the "Mephisto Waltz." Of the smaller piano pieces a few, such as the F minor Study, have abiding charm.

Forget for a moment the unabashed sentimentality and the bombast that so often disfigure Liszt's music and remember the man's remarkable originality as a harmonist. The "Ricordanza" of 1839 anticipates the chromaticism of Son-in-law Wagner's "Tristan" by 20 years. Elsewhere there are foreshadowings even of Debussy. And it was not only Liszt's unfailing championship of every bold musical spirit of his day — Wagner, Smetana, Grieg, Saint-Saens, the Russian Five—that caused Carl Engel to say so truly that of all the composers of the 19th century Liszt only would have understood the music of the 20th.

When the "Faust Symphony" was last presented at Symphony Hall the occasion was the 100th anniversary of the death of Goethe. Now it is the 125th anniversary of the birth of Liszt, which falls on Thursday, and the 50th of his death, which came July 31 last. As before, the orchestra will be assisted in the final movement by the Harvard Glee Club and Rulon Robison, tenor. Also as before the Symphony will be prefaced by the "Faust Overture" of Wagner.

* * * *

To the two Voisins, father and son, the official register of the Symphony Orchestra now adds another such pair, the two Valkeniers of the horns, the younger of whom, an occasional participant last season, is now a full-fledged member of the octet. It is in this important section also that the only new face in the orchestra may be seen, that of Gottfried Freiberg, who replaces Mr. Boettcher as leader of the first quartet. Mr. Freiberg graduated from the Academy of Music in his native city of Vienna, having studied both horn and piano, and since 1928, when he was 20, he has been a member of the Philharmonic Orchestra of that city and solo horn-player at the State Opera. He has also played in the Festival Orchestra at Bayreuth, and in Vienna he has conducted chamber concerts and there organized the Freiberg Horn Quintet. Already he has proved himself a notable addition to our orchestra.

* * * *

Singing in part for the benefit of the Committee for the Home Care of Children with Heart Disease, under the auspices of the Massachusetts General Hospital, Roland Hayes will offer two departures from his usual custom a week hence at Symphony Hall. The first will be his singing of two excerpts from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," Walther's song before the Master Guild and the more familiar "Prize Song." The second

---

DAY, OCTOBER 17, 1936

AN EARLIER MOZART BY SYMPHONY

Effort of 1774 Heard; Strauss' "Don Juan"

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Was it by accident or by design that the first three pieces to be heard in the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon were all works written before their respective composers had reached the age of 25? Beside the youthful Mozart, Messiaen and Strauss thus assembled, the 50-year-old Sibelius of the Fifth Symphony seemed a positive graybeard.

MOZART'S CHARM AND GRACE

The pieces by Mozart and Messiaen were played yesterday for the first time in Boston. The one is a Symphony in A major, one of four written at Salzburg in 1774; the other a "Symphonic Meditation," "The Forgotten Sacrifice," by one of a quartet of composers who collectively style themselves "Young France." Strauss, as the knowing might deduce, was represented by "Don Juan."

No doubt to the 18-year-old Mozart this Symphony in A major—his 29th, by the way—was a serious affair. To us of today it is primarily a work of charm and grace, like other of Mozart's early symphonies more suggestive of his comic operas than of the three great symphonies of 1788. It has been hoped for some time that Dr. Koussevitzky would turn his attention to these earlier if less important works, and give the G-minor, E-flat and "Jupiter" a much needed rest. Of the performance of this delightful symphony by the strings suitably reduced, paired oboes and horns, it is enough to say that it matched the music.

Messiaen's Pieces

It was, perhaps, more of a feather in Dr. Koussevitzky's cap to have rediscovered this youthful Mozart than to have introduced to this country the not unprepossessing but scarcely impressive work of Olivier Messiaen. Of its three divisions, entitled respectively, "The Cross," "The Sin" and "The Eucharist," the first and third seemed best suited musically to their subject matter, although it was apparently the stormy, agitated second division which most pleased the eminent Florent Schmitt when this "Meditation Symphonique" was first played in Paris in 1931. At least M. Messiaen has written here in all sincerity and with no little show of feeling. For this, in these days, much thanks.

The reception accorded this music yesterday was, however, distinctly half-hearted.

Strauss at Stride

Of these three composers only Strauss achieved in this case a masterpiece, writing with a technical mastery and ripened individuality that are no proper part of youth. The performance, yesterday by Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra missed none of the music's proud vitality, driving energy, sensuous glow or final emptiness. At the end enthusiasm now ran high.

When Mr. Monteux first gave us Sibelius's Fifth Symphony in 1922, the conductor admitted privately that he had no great liking for the piece, and Georges Longy, oboeist of blessed memory, remarked—also privately—that for him the symphony was devoid of melody, harmony, form and orchestral color. No one today could say these things of it, yet this particular Symphony has a Spartan simplicity which makes it less directly appealing than the First, Second and Fourth, save in the climactic close of the first and of the final movement. . . . Here again a masterly performance and a stirred audience may be recorded.

SYMPHONY IN FIRST OF MONDAY CONCERTS

The series of Monday symphony concerts for the current season began auspiciously last evening with full attendance and marked enthusiasm. The programme chosen by Dr. Koussevitzky for this occasion consisted wholly of music already heard at the two pairs of regular subscription concerts, and for that reason need not now be discussed in detail. The evening opening number was Haydn's Symphony in B flat major, No. 102, and the final item was the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius, while between them stood Debussy's "La Mer." In their sympathetic exposition of the music and in their general brilliance of effect, the performances were repetitions of those so recently given.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
Oct 19 MERCURY 36

We Contribute to Boston Symphony

Gundersen, Violin; Valerio, Clarinet, Born in New Bedford

Writing in the Atlantic Monthly of the recent publication "Boston Symphony Orchestra," Edward Weeks says: "Mr. Gerome Brush has performed a public service. . . . With the strokes of his crayon and the sympathy of his pen he has brought to light the individuality of the one hundred and nine members of the Boston Symphony."

We in New Bedford are proud to have contributed two players to the famous band of artists. Out of these portraits now on exhibit in the first balcony foyer of Symphony Hall, it is found that Robert Gundersen has been vividly recorded. Mr. Brush writes in part:

"To Mr. Robert A. Gundersen, the seating of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has meant a steady progression. Beginning at the age of eighteen, in the back row of the second violins, he is now within one of having to duck the conductor's baton in the livelier passages.

"Most people think in terms of whale oil when they think of New Bedford, but Mr. Gundersen was born there in 1895."

Some suggestion of the fine brow of clarinetist Manuel Carreiro Valerio, Mr. Brush has caught in his session with that young musician. Of him the compiler says:

"Mr. Valerio was born in New Bedford, Massachusetts, but so far as his temperament is concerned he might just as well have been born in the Azores, which is the birthplace of his father, his mother, and his wife. When he plays the clarinet, it is like the classic Horn of Plenty—a musical outpouring of the many flowers of St. Michael. He has never played anything but the clarinet and is perfectly happy to nestle down in a large orchestra, sounding the right note at the right time in a symphonic landscape."

Note: If Mr. Valerio has never played any other instrument he worked in an organ factory to earn the money for his clarinet lessons, practicing by night.

A. C. P.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

ANOTHER DISCOVERER

Dr. Koussevitzky has discovered New England. Every year until this one the eminent conductor of the Boston Symphony has gone abroad for relaxation after his strenuous season. This year he came back early to conduct those out-of-door performances in the Berkshires and afterward travelled through New England.

He thinks that it is wonderful. Seldom has he tasted such air. Never has he seen such roads, which make all beauty spots so readily accessible. Above all he is delighted with the way New England allows its natural beauty to speak for itself.

In Europe it is all so painfully cared for—cleaned, scoured, patted down with the palm of the hand, worked over, so that the traveller becomes unconsciously aware of the vast human effort behind it. Dr. Koussevitzky, who is a great walker, has had the time of his life here in the mountains and at the shore.

Well, some of us could have told him all this, of course. As a matter of fact, some of us have been telling him so all of the time he has been here and in no uncertain terms.

But it is like everything else. A fellow has to discover these things for himself. The rest of America is a great deal like Dr. Koussevitzky in this. Here it has been ever since the Revolution! Americans have heard of the beauty of New England all their lives, but it is comparatively recently that they have begun to show any real appreciation of it.

UESDAY, OCTOBER 20, 19

mlet' at

MUSIC

MONDAY SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the first concert of the season of the Monday evening series last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Haydn—Symphony in B-flat, No. 102
Debussy—"La Mer," Three Orchestral Sketches
Sibelius—Symphony No. 5, in E-flat, Op. 82

The current concert season bids fair to fulfill the promises of its auspicious beginnings. An audience larger than any we have ever had the pleasure of seeing at this concert series was present last night at the first of the Monday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra. What is more, growth of enthusiasm has kept pace with numerical increase. The applause last night represented far more than the cordiality to be expected at the opening of a new season. The program was one to inspire enthusiasm. The symphony in B-flat (No. 9 of the "London Symphonies") is proclaimed one of Haydn's "three greatest instrumental works" by no less an authority on such matters than Prof. Donald Tovey. Debussy's "La Mer," whether listened to as descriptive or pure music, cannot but be enjoyed by any one who has a receptive imagination. And Bostonians may well consider themselves fortunate in having the privilege of hearing Dr. Koussevitzky's inimitable reading of the Sibelius Fifth Symphony.

Unfortunately we must make certain reservations concerning the interpretation of the Haydn Symphony. The tuttis of the first movement were emphasized to such an extent that they became a series of dramatic effects. Haydn would undoubtedly have used such effects upon occasion, and sparingly. But it is unthinkable that he could have intended such violent and brutal shocks every time the tutti alternates with the concertino. The over-emphasis last night was, of course, partially due to the use of such a large body of instruments. When the orchestra is reduced, as Dr. Koussevitzky himself proved at one of the Harvard tercentenary concerts, such difficulties are entirely obviated in the performance of Haydn's orchestral works. The Finale of the symphony was also exaggerated last night, this time in respect to tempo. An excessive rate of speed caused the melodic detail to become indistinct, and made the anacrustic figure of the principal theme sound like a short glissando rather than three separate notes.

Whatever contestable elements may have been present in the Haydn slmphony were more than compensated by the superb playing of the orchestra during the entire remainder of the program. No Debussyian subtlety escaped the masterful players or the discerning conductor. As for the Sibelius symphony, none but superlative epithets could be applied to last night's eloquent performance.

P. C. A.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

With a program selective of the best of the two foregoing weekends, the Monday series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra got under way last night. Three unquestionably accepted names—Haydn, Debussy, Sibelius—added the hint of staidness one has come to expect of this particular sequence of Symphony concerts. The Monday audiences are among the most appreciative the Orchestra faces: and well they might be, for seldom does this organization fail to exhibit for this particular gathering a splendid summation of its talents.

The telling compactness of Haydn's B-flat symphony (No. 102, the ninth of the London series), staying much within the strict bounds of classicism, was an excellent contrast to the far-flung, huge-canvas apostrophe Debussy dedicated to the sea. Dr Koussevitzky is consummately shrewd in these deliberate program arrangements. All of "La Mer" received the performance that a great orchestra and great conductor can give it; but in the last of the trypitch—"Dialogue of Wind and Waves"—Dr Koussevitzky outdid even his customary self.

Then, after intermission, the conductor's equally prudent placement of Sibelius' fifth Symphony. The Finnish composer should be in everlasting debt to Dr Koussevitzky that he found a conductor who so intimately understood and appreciated his works, and was able so consistently and faithfully to give them to the public. Last night, Dr Koussevitzky gave a fine reading of this noble work. The splendid declamation of the final measures leaves an impression that will not soon be forgotten.

What's Going

Monday
Oct. 20 1936

Monday Symphony

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra's current series of Monday evening concerts opened last night at Symphony Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky, who was greeted with the customary warmth, had built an attractive program for the occasion out of Haydn's B flat Symphony, No. 102 (the ninth of the London symphonies), Debussy's "La Mer," and Sibelius's Fifth Symphony, in E flat. A certain impersonality, a decided absence of romantic self-pity or of egotistic preoccupation in general, undoubtedly gave unity to this program. Orchestra and conductor were at the height of their form.

Criticism and performance of Haydn have long been vitiated by the idea that the composer's dominant traits were rustic jollity and a predilection for practical jokes. Critics are beginning to shake off this obsession and acknowledge other qualities—grace and a warm, serious beauty, harmonic daring for other than jocular ends, and a formal subtlety and originality that are still embarrassing the pedants. But the picture of the hearty clodhopper and village cut-up still lingers in the minds of performers. Even Dr. Koussevitzky, last night, led the first Allegro with over-boisterous élan, trampling underfoot many a graceful phrase that deserved more tender treatment. But both the smoothly-flowing Adagio (avoiding the fate of the introductory Largo, which had been drawn out intolerably) and the really humorous—but not bucolic—Finale were played with a sensitiveness that could hardly have been improved.

Explicitly descriptive music is, with the swing of the pendulum, in bad odor today, but such delicate and miraculously imaginative tours de force as the three sketches that comprise Debussy's "La Mer" will not soon disappear from our programs. Rubber-stamp clichés have sent much program music to remote shelves. But this is painted from direct observation and in a medium of the painter's own devising. It was performed with brilliance and imaginative power.

The suggestion of natural forces is not absent from Sibelius's Fifth Symphony, but implicitly at the most, coloring mysteriously the purely musical synthesis of purely musical matters that preoccupies the composer. The work formed part also of the orchestra's Friday and Saturday programs, and need not be further discussed now, except perhaps to invite attention to a curious trait that often characterizes genius (Beethoven and Stravinsky both have it): a kind of fanatical and thoroughly conscious insistence upon banalities, where these, for all their unimpressiveness, happen to fit into the composer's scheme. Lesser composers feel the need of being impressive continuously—and tiresomely.

Symphony Gives Monday Concert

The first of the Monday evening series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, opened in Symphony Hall last night before an audience that appeared even larger and more enthusiastic than any that attended last season's Monday group. It was almost a capacity gathering. The program presented was a combination of the works heard at the last two Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts and included Haydn's Symphony in B flat, No. 102 (the ninth of the London series), Debussy's "La Mer," three orchestral sketches and the Sibelius Symphony No. 5 in E flat major.

Such a group of selections was ideally suited to the occasion. The Haydn had not been played in this series for a number of years, the Debussy could stand up under any quantity of performances, becoming increasingly effective after each repetition, and finally there was the Sibelius Fifth interpreted in inimitable fashion by Dr. Koussevitzky, and the orchestra. All three have been described in some detail the past few weeks. Yet so high was the calibre of the playing that one was again tempted to launch into superlatives. The lovely adagio of the Haydn symphony, the bright, shimmering beauty of the strings in Debussy's orchestral sketches "La Mer," these were things not soon to be forgotten.

And, of course, that statement should be applied even more emphatically to the Sibelius. Dr. Koussevitzky has long excelled as a conductor of Sibelius and last night he brought out all the grandeur and force of this particular masterwork. In the tremendous finale, as Prof. Tovey suggested, it was as if indeed Thor swung his hammer and drove the cantabile into "full form and glory" until the symphony ended "with the finality of a work that knew from the outset exactly when its last note was due." The audience, always more responsive than on Friday afternoon, gave conductor and orchestra an ovation at the close. The next Monday concert will be given Nov. 30.

33

[illegible] 10/17/36

Symphony Concert

Program Aptly Selected, Performers at Their Peak

Dr. Koussevitzky and Orchestra Present Music by Mozart, Messiaen, Strauss and Sibelius

By Moses Smith

Outside of Boston Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is generally greeted as a masterful program-builder. It is true that in the home city of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the conductor is occasionally likely to regard the entire programs of the year as a unit, so that an individual program may seem to lack proportion. But the program for this week's concerts, heard yesterday afternoon and to be replayed this evening, is an illustration of the conductor's most happy flair for selecting an engrossing list.

Mozart's Symphony in A major (K. 201), which begins the program, serves the manifold purpose of a light, spirited beginning; of an offset to the storm and stress; the problems and perplexities of the music of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries that followed; and of a quasi-novelty. For, strange as it may seem, this delightful A major Symphony had not previously been played at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The more aggressive novelty followed immediately—"Les Offrandes oubliees" by Olivier Messiaen, containing music that could not have been written in any century (and very likely in any decade) but ours. With all its complexities this music had at least the intention of simplicity, as compared with other compositions of the post-War era. Therefore M. Messiaen's work was not so sharply contrasted with the music of an earlier century as to violate the listener's sensibilities.

On the other hand it had sufficient harmonic astringency, rhythmic diversity and orchestral color to serve as a bridge to Strauss's "Don Juan," which, a million miles removed from the music of Mozart in style and emotional effect, would have been altogether too violent a contrast with the little Symphony if it had been made to follow it immediately.

Now "Don Juan" is so richly and lushly scored, so sensuous in its melodic and harmonic appeal, that it might have seemed dangerous for Dr. Koussevitzky to place after it the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius, the only other number on the program. But the conductor must have been shrewdly counting on several factors; the intermission, which gave us listeners a chance to cool off after an exciting performance of the Strauss tone-poem; the intensities of this very Fifth Symphony of Sibelius and the almost hypnotic effect of its reiterated motives; and, finally, the magnificent performance it received.

* * *

It was clear at yesterday's concert that it is difficult to separate Dr. Koussevitzky the conductor from himself as program-maker. Or to separate either from the superb Boston Symphony Orchestra at his disposal. We have not had such uniformly beautiful, precise, invigorating, "inspiried" playing by the orchestra since—well, since the last similar occasion, which was probably no further away than last season. But at the time of listening the occurrence seems like a miracle.

The Mozart Symphony was played with a delicious style. The unfamiliar work by Messiaen seemed to be getting the most favorable treatment possible, far more favorable, it is probably safe to hazard, than it received at any of its Parisian performances. The playing of it abounds in difficulties, principally rhythmic; but the listener did not detect the slightest hitch.

The presentation of the Strauss tone-poem, as I have already suggested, was something out of the ordinary. The strings had the gorgeous beauty of tone that Strauss asks but does not always get from other orchestras. The brass choir, which has had its off days in the past, sounded magnificently yesterday. Especially was this true of the quintessential horns, which, on the basis of two concerts, seem rejuvenated this season.

Instead of straining for more superlatives to characterize the performance of the Sibelius Symphony it will be better to state simply that the playing seemed to be ideal. Almost certainly it surpassed Dr. Koussevitzky's and the Orchestra's previous splendid essays with this Symphony. There was all the wondrous perfection of detail and ensemble and none of the excessive breadth which has slightly marred the Koussevitzkyan presentations of this composition in the past.

* * *

It was good to hear the Mozart Symphony and a pity we have not heard it before. The Symphony was written when Mozart was only eighteen years old, but it exhibits the hand of a genius—and of a master as well. Consider only the development section of the first movement—short, rudimentary in form, but not so short as to prevent Mozart from introducing a stroke as bold as lightning, an idea that comes as fresh as the most elaborately contrived surprises of Beethoven. In a few months a mere boy turned out four such symphonies, not to mention other music. Wonderful boy, indeed!

The "offering" of M. Messiaen was too generous to be dismissed with condescension and not ample enough to justify its imposing auspices. This young man (he is twenty-eight, according to the program-book) boldly proclaims himself one of the four members constituting "La Jeune France," with the customary sweeping manifesto issued a little while ago. Terms of the manifesto are, it is true, general and rather vague. But by implication they lead us to expect, at the least, a Berlioz, in whose name the four presume to speak.

Messiaen, unfortunately, is no Berlioz. It is, of course, unfair to demand that he be either a Berlioz or even that now despised Saint-Saens, who once had something to say on the subject of purity in French art. But the composer of "Les Offrandes oubliees" is obviously a competent, talented and stimulating musician. In this work, which by the way, was written at least five years before the formal pronouncement of "La Jeune France," he has selected an excellent subject for musical setting—a trinity of the Cross, Sin and the Eucharist.

The score is necessarily in three-part form. I did not, at first hearing, agree with the opinion of no less eminent a musician than Florent Schmitt that the main section, devoted to Sin, is considerably superior to the other parts. Of course, it is obviously the most exciting; it would have to be in order to represent Sin at all well. But I found considerable interest in the cool, almost contemplative quality of the first offering; and in the peaceful (if again obvious) epilogue that purports to suggest the Eucharist.

Programs and Prospects for Concert Halls

Liszt's Anniversaries to Be Marked by Playing of "Faust" Symphony

The program for the symphony concerts on Friday and Saturday of next week will be made up of Wagner's "Faust" Overture and the Liszt "Faust" Symphony. The selection of the Liszt work at this time is occasioned by the current commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of Liszt's death and the 125th of his birth. He was born on Oct. 22, 1811.

The Harvard Glee Club and Rulon Robison, tenor, will participate in the performance of the Symphony.

At the symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday, Oct. 30 and 31, Ruth Posselt, the talented Boston violinist, will be the soloist in the Dvorak Concerto. And the following week, on Nov. 6 and 7, Mahler's "Lied von der Erde" will be presented.

The program for the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Monday evening series will consist of Haydn's Symphony in B-flat, No. 102, Debussy's "La Mer" and the Fifth Symphony by Sibelius.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 22 1936

Liszt's "Faust Symphony" and Wagner's "Faust Overture" to be Played by Boston Symphony Orchestra Here Tuesday.—Harvard Glee Club, Rulon Robison, to Assist

By G. Y. Loveridge.

An evening devoted to the legend of Faust, as dealt with by Wagner and Liszt, is announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its first concert of the season here in Metropolitan Theatre next Tuesday.

Wagner's "Faust Overture" will be played, and Liszt's "Faust Symphony." The symphony requires a male chorus and a tenor soloist, in this case the Harvard Glee Club and Rulon Robison; it takes about an hour and one-quarter to perform, and it and the Dante Symphony are accounted Liszt's finest works.

Is Seldom Heard

The symphony, which is seldom heard, is now being performed by the Boston orchestra in commemoration of the 125th anniversary of the birth of Liszt and the 50th of his death. He was born Oct. 22, 1811, and died July 31, 1886. There is a sort of family angle to Tuesday night's program, also, since Wagner was Liszt's son-in-law.

To deal with the compositions chronologically, Wagner's was composed in January, 1840, at a time when neither his musical state nor his economic state was high. The importance of this work as a turning point in his career is related in his autobiography. He had been living in Paris for some time and had been wasting his talents in efforts to imitate the works of inferior but more successful composers.

Speaking of his attendance at rehearsals of the Conservatoire orchestra, Wagner says that they "to my surprise, made such an unexpected impression on me in other ways that they exercised a decisive influence in the crisis of my artistic development.

"This was due to the fact that I listened repeatedly to Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which, by dint of untiring practice, received such a marvelous interpretation at the hands of this celebrated orchestra that the picture I had had of it in my mind in the enthusiastic days of my youth now stood before me almost tangibly, in brilliant colors undimmed, as though it had never been effaced by the Leipsic orchestra who had slaughtered it under Pohlenz's baton."

Abyss of Shame

Wagner's whole period of deterioration of musical taste now "sank down as if into an abyss of shame and remorse" and he longed to compose something that would give him a "feeling of satisfaction" similar to that he had experienced in rediscovering Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

"In this mood," he continues, "I sketched an overture to Faust which according to my original scheme was only to form the first part of a whole Faust Symphony as I had already got the Gretchen idea in my head for the second movement."

The rest of the symphony, however, never was written. Fifteen years later, at the behest of Liszt, much of the overture was rewritten.

"I had forgotten all about it, and I owed its reconstruction to the advice of Liszt, who gave me many valuable hints," Wagner says.

In the beginning he had hoped the Conservatoire orchestra would give the overture a hearing, but he was told the orchestra believed that enough had been done for him and "hoped to be rid of me for some time." He himself was "not quite confident" of the overture because of its "zephyr-like ending."

Wife Disliked It

Wagner's first wife, Wilhelmina Planer, the actress, did not like the overture, but Wagner speaks of it as a composition "which had been the means of so important a change in my musical ideas." It remains the oldest of his works in the modern repertoire.

Liszt was another of the numerous composers stirred to present the Faust legend in music. He began his symphony in 1853 and completed it in 1854. The choral epilogue was added subsequently. The symphony was dedicated to Berlioz. It consists of three "character pictures," of Faust, Marguerite and Mephistopheles.

The symphony is not only one of Liszt's most ambitious works, but also one of the most original, in the view of commentators, The first theme suggests the state of mind of Faust, his disillusionment and perplexity, the doubts and chaotic thoughts engendered by his long and fruitless study. This is followed by a theme portraying or indicating the yearning of Faust to triumph over his apparent destiny, then a section, allegro agitato, suggestive of his efforts to rise above fate.

The movement devoted to the young woman evokes "a sweet and innocent maiden," with the chief theme sung by oboe with solo viola.

The Mephistopheles movement is considered original and strong, in that it does not employ a new theme for this sinister person, but depicts him by parodies of the themes associated with Faust in the first movement. This was perhaps suggested by the line in Goethe's poem in which Mephistopheles describes himself: "I am the spirit that ever denies."

In the final movement there comes a gradual dispelling of the influences of darkness, and chorus and soloist join in a triumphant and stirring close.

Chicago Organist to Be Heard at Symphony Hall

Proter Heaps, Chicago, organist, will give a recital at Symphony Hall on Friday evening, beginning at 8.15. The program will consist of Parker's Concert Piece in B major; Bach's "Have Mercy Upon Me, O Lord," "Le Prologue de Jesu" and Toccata and Fugue in D minor; "The Swan" by Saint-Saens; "The Brook" by Dethier; the Pilgrims' Chorus from "Tannhauser;" "Four Casual Brevities" by Leach; Ravel's Bolero" and Mulet's Toccata, "Thou Art the Rock." In the course of the recital Mr. Heaps will discourse on the resources of the new Hammond organ, which he will be employing. Free tickets are obtainable at Symphony Hall or at M. Steinert and Sons Company, 162 Boylston street, Boston.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Liszt's Faust Will Be Given by Orchestra

FOR its first concert here this season in the Metropolitan Theatre Tuesday night, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will offer Liszt's "Faust" Symphony by way of paying tribute to that composer, this year being the 125th anniversary of his birth and the 50th of his death.

This week is marked also by the opening of the Providence Symphony Orchestra's annual membership drive, to be inaugurated with a musical and tea at the home of Mrs. Arthur M. Allen, 184 Upton avenue, tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock.

The "Faust" Symphony is divided into three parts descriptive of and titled after the Goethe characters, Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles. The conclusion is a choral setting of the "chorus mysticus," which ends the second part of Goethe's poem. This will be sung by the Harvard Glee Club, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, and the tenor solo by Rulon Robison.

The symphony will form the second half of the program. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has chosen Mozart's Symphony in A-major for the first part. The concert is scheduled to begin at 8:15 o'clock.

DAY, OCTOBER 24,

"FAUST" OF LISZT BY SYMPHONY

Orchestral Masterpiece Given With Marvels of Tone

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The second and third concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have more than made up for any lack of outstanding interest in the first. Yesterday, as climax of this eighth of a season, there came a performance of the "Faust Symphony" of Liszt. As when this imposing work was last heard in Symphony Hall four years ago, the orchestra was assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and Rulon Y. Robison, tenor. Also as before, the Symphony, almost a concert in itself, was preceded by the "Faust Overture" of Wagner.

LISZT'S MASTERPIECE

In view of its dimensions it is not surprising that the "Faust Symphony" has been heard at only nine pairs of symphony concerts. The present pretext for its appearance is the fact that this year of 1936 marks both the 125th anniversary of the birth of Liszt and the 50th of his death; while in 1932 the occasion was the centennial of the death of Goethe. The last-named anniversary might have been marked in many ways; the present double anniversary could not have been more fitly observed. For this symphony is Liszt's masterpiece and monument, a work in which the flaws in his musical armor are least in evidence and the one in which all of his virtues shine most clearly.

The Gretchen Music

More than that, it contains in the second of its three "character pictures," that of Gretchen, music without precise parallel anywhere. Sensuous this music undoubtedly is, but it is no more the sensuousness of Gounod than it is that of Wagner. Could Goethe have lived to hear it, and have come to understand it, he would surely have felt that here his heroine had been reborn in tone. And if Faust is less recognizably characterized, and if this first movement is not without its touches of Lisztian grandiosity, rhetoric and pose, the limning of Mephistopheles in terms of parody of the Faust themes was a master stroke, executed with unerring mastery.

Fost most listeners, however, the high point of the symphony, even the moment long and anixously awaited, will be the final chorus, in whioh the "eternal feminine" is mystically glorified both by Goethe and by Liszt. A symphony of dramatic contrasts, this, of which the most dramatic is the passage from the orchestral brimstone of the finale to the rapture of this once uncomprehended epilogue.

Beauties of Tone

Three times now has Dr. Koussevitzky given us this symphony and each time he—and his orchestra—have presented it with a deeper insight into both its musical and its spiritual, or psychological, significance. Moreover, sheer beauty of orchestral tone could hardly go farther than yesterday; it went in the yearning, questioning introduction to the Faust movement in the "love theme," in the whole of the Gretchen movement and in the epilogue. One after another the various soloists of the orchestra reminded us of their perfections. Did space permit, it would be a pleasure to list player and passage.

Nor did chorus and tenor fail composer and conductor when their opportunity came. In the applause heaped upon the end these received their due as did Mr. Woodworth, who had prepared this collegiate choir.

Wagner's Overture

In its place at the beginning of the concert the necessarily lesser effort of Wagner nevertheless made its due impression. The task for the conductor here is not an easy one. Composed and almost unbelievably, when Wagner was virtually in his "Rienzi" days, this overture, which itself was to have been the first movement of a "Faust Symphony," is a curious mixture of prophesies both of the immediately approaching "Flying Dutchman" and of the far distant "Ring."

Despite Wagner's later revisions, the piece remains a mixture of styles. It is greatly to Dr. Koussevitzky's credit that yesterday we felt this to be the case less than ever before.

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1936

and Musicians --- News of th

Liszt "Faust" Symphony for Commemoration

With a Note About Wagner's Overture to Be Played By Boston Orchestra

Today is the one hundred and twenty-fifth birthday of Franz Liszt. Since he died in Bayreuth, "chez Wagner," as he would have said, fifty years ago, we are able to celebrate anniversaries both of his birth and death. The great Symphony after Goethe's "Faust," which is being given at the Boston Symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday, is the inevitable choice, for it not only exhibits Liszt thinking and composing at the height of his powers, but avoids the virtuoso Liszt whose love of shallow magnificence has seriously disfigured the reputation of his truly fine works.

This score, unquestionably his masterpiece, reflects the dual nature of a man who was constantly torn between the loftiest idealism and mysticism on the one hand and the most intense desire for the social pleasures of the world on the other. Since Mr. Ernest Newman has so glibly unfrocked L'Abbe Liszt, it is not surprising to discover an equally aphoristic allusion: "If it may be said that Liszt was a finer pianist than composer, it is no less true that he was a better lover than either." There is no need to expose the fallacies involved; rather is it valuable to accept the implications, for the composer shows himself in his two principal characters in this work.

First he is the "philosophical musician" of whom we have heard before, and second he is the man of the world whose wit could bite, whose irony could sting as it stings in the Mephistopheles movement of the Symphony. This man of the world also understood the gentler arts of his civilization and from this knowledge he has created a musical Gretchen of extraordinary imagination, a Gretchen exquisite at once in her simplicity and in her tender charm. It was only a step with Goethe for the loftiest Liszt to make her into a symbolic ideal of womanhood and divine love.

The second movement shows us Gretchen and her meeting with Faust, her love. The third depicts Mephistopheles as Goethe's spirit of denial. There is no new music, but all of Faust's music from the first movement of this symphony of character pictures is cruelly parodied, wantonly tortured into a fire of irony. This devil only exists as antagonism to Faust—his character is to have no character, but to be eternal mischief. Only the music of Gretchen leaves him powerless; before divine love his wiles are of no avail. The transition from this malicious witchery to the final chorus on the last lines from the second part of "Faust," "the eternal womanly draws us on," is a stroke of dramatic genius consummated in 1857 when Liszt revised the score which had been completed in 1854. It shows us Liszt, the mystic, at his best, just as the first movement defines the philosopher.

* * *

There could be no more fitting prelude to the "Faust" Symphony than the "Faust" Overture of Wagner which will precede it at these performances. Written in 1839 in Paris where Wagner, with Minna, was tasting his most profound miseries, and composing ballads and vaudeville music to eke out the barest existence, it points the way for his later achievements. There can be no doubt that he felt himself in much the same position as the Faust of the opening of Goethe's poem.

Always deeply moved by the plight of the Medieval magician who became Goethe's most significant character, Wagner heard a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony under Habeneck at the Conservatoire which so fired his mind with what he considered its Faustian implications, that he set to work immediately upon a "Faust" Symphony of his own. The first movement alone was completed, and since it depicted Faust only in the loneliness of his study, it was called an "Overture to the First Part of Goethe's 'Faust'." The title was changed with the subsequent revisions.

Twilight Radiance

Franz Liszt

Born 125 Years Ago Today, Died Fifty Years Ago. The Reproduction Above Is from a Photograph Made in Paris Shortly Before the Composer's Death.

In the Overture we see a tormented and solitary scholar in his dark sanctuary, weary of books and learning, athirst for the greater knowledge and experience of the world. Restless, tortured with visions of life at its fullest, with illusory passions and desires, we see this Faust who must find the world anew through activity. "Faust in der Einsamkeit" looms from this score, Faust in the restless introspection that is to drive him into the world through which Liszt leads him. G. H. L. S.

Salute to Liszt's Memor

Fellow-Hungarian Recalls the Virtues of Liszt

Testimonial from Bela Bartok On the Occasion of the Double Anniversary

To what extent does this generation understand the works of Liszt, which of his works does the public prefer, and which does it appreciate less?

The answer to the first part of this question is simple; the average musician, like the average layman, sees but the external form and never the depth.

If the form is pleasant, the layman accepts and, indeed, pardons its imperfections, but often he does not even perceive them. It is much more difficult to answer the second part of our question, to learn why most people remain such strangers to Liszt's most important compositions. In order to reply to this, we must examine these compositions from the aesthetic point of view as well as from that of a criticism of the style.

If we compare Franz Liszt as a composer with his predecessors and contemporaries, we are at once struck—in the whole of his work—by a singular phenomenon which we will not find in their cases. We are convinced, indeed, that no one of the great composers who lived before Liszt's epoch or during it gave himself up, as much as he, to the most diverse, varied and heterogeneous influences.

Even the greatest composer has an already extant point of departure. The innovator comes gradually to regions which but barely recall this point, while another type—great by synthesis—develope a style neither seen nor imagined by those whose styles were his point of departure. Liszt, on the other hand, has no precise departing point, and he has not founded several similar styles upon it. He has submitted himself to the most contradictory and disparate influences.

* * *

Continued above Right

Let us examine these influences. Among his contemporaries Chopin's is especially marked in certain of the piano works. Traces of the Italian "bel canto" style of the beginning of the last century are discernible in almost all his compositions. It seems superfluous to mention how much he has devoted himself to the influence of what we call Hungarian Gypsy music.

The influence of the semi-popular and rather sentimental music of the rhapsody still in manuscript. In his last works, mainly religious, a Gregorian influence is revealed. It is growing more difficult to shed light on his relation with Wagner; a special study based on chronological data must determine which of the "Wagnerian" elements in his works owe their priority to Liszt, and which are really due to Wagner.

We must state immediately, however, that everything that has been taken over has been entirely recast.

Whether it be a Hungarian melody or popular song, or an Italian tune, each of his works carries the stamp of his personality in a way such that it actually becomes his property. What he has created from these foreign elements has become Lisztian music that one cannot fail to recognize. The elements born from his own personality, which find themselves associated with exotic ones, are so numerous that the grandeur of his creative power could not be doubted in any of his compositions. He was almost an eclectic in the best sense of the word, an eclectic who receives a great deal from others but who adds still more of his own.

Under these conditions, it is only too natural that his style should admit some ruptures; but they are insignificant beside the mass of beauties which constitute its essence. However, the average layman probably clings to these infelicities, he neither sees nor comprehends the great beauties; since he does not receive in return dazzling passages, very rare in works like "The Dance of Death" (and indeed, what will become of Saint-Saens?), he rejects all his work.

Another unfavorable circumstance consists—I believe, at least—in the perhaps excessive length of Liszt's great scores. The frequent repetitions of certain important passages often seem superfluous to people of our day, who are habituated to a more rapid life. But I feel that that is not an essential reason. It is in his boldness and in his novelty that we must seek the fundamental qualities of his works. These are the qualities which raise Liszt among the great composers. It is because of them that we love his works just upon the development of music is greater than that of Wagner." And today I still maintain what I have written. I don't mean that Liszt was a greater composer than Wagner. For in Wagner we find a great-richer gam- more homo- ll that, the ore fertile ation than deceived er imi- which Wagner solves his problems—both in the whole and in the details—is such that, if it were possible to imitate him servilely, one could certainly not receive the necessary inspiration for a greater improvement from him.

Fifty Years Afterward, the Influence of the Weimar Master Is Traced

Now all imitation is a sterile and dead thing. Liszt, on the other hand, has shown in his compositions such a variety of new possibilities, which, moreover, he himself has not exhausted, that we have been able to receive from him a far greater inspiration than from Wagner.

* * *

We will give some examples of the influence of Liszt on his successors. Richard Strauss's first compositions, otherwise quite barren, recall Brahms in their form, but the creative power of Brahms is lacking. There is a noticeable progress in Richard Strauss only when, under the influence of Wagner, and still more of Liszt, he sets himself to the cultivation of the symphonic poem. We are struck by the astonishing relationship which exists between many passages of certain compositions of Liszt, such as "Years of Pilgrimage" and "Poetic and Religious Harmonies," and many works of the two greatest figures of modern French music, Debussy and Ravel. It is my firm conviction that without the "Fountains of the Villa d'Este" and other similar works of Liszt, certain compositions of Debussy and Ravel which express an analogous spirit would be scarcely imaginable.

The heritage of Liszt betrays itself in indisputable fashion in almost all works of modern Hungarian music. But there is a composer who moves outside the sphere of Liszt's attraction less frequently than all the others. This composer, an ardent propagator of Liszt's art, is Ferruccio Busoni, the greatest disciple of the Lisztian tradition.

The point of departure manifestly due to Liszt and the new paths pursued directly after the data of Liszt are, in the case of an artistic phenomenon like that of Busoni, worthy of some attention even if the composer has not, or at least rarely, attained the expected perfection and the integral realization of his art.

(Reprinted from "La Revue Musicale"; translated by G. H. L. S.)

Trans. Oct 28

Stravinsky's music for the ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fee," will be presented for the first time in the main series of subscription concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday and Saturday. The piece was played, it will be recalled, the season before last at a Sanders Theater concert of the Orchestra, when the composer conducted. The success of the piece prompted Dr. Koussevitzky at that time to intimate that he would present it at a pair of concerts later in the season. But for some reason the plan was abandoned.

In addition next week's program will include Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor and Dvorak's Violin Concerto, in which the soloist will be Ruth Posselt, who has previously appeared in a Monday evening concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

In connection with the Liszt anniversaries, Symphony Hall, where the occasion is being marked by performances of the "Faust" Symphony this afternoon and tomorrow evening, is presenting an exhibition of Lisztiana, considerable pains having been expended in assembling the collection.

Of especial interest is an original Liszt manuscript, the work in question being one of the three "Sonnetti del Petrarca" for piano solo. The score, which is in black ink with corrections in red ink, consists of four pages (two leaves), torn—so the story goes—from a notebook by Liszt's landlady. It seems that that worthy dame realized the value of the notebook which had come into her possession, and peddled it piecemeal. Eventually the part that is on exhibition came into the hands of Mr. Wilfrid Trembly, who has lent it to Symphony Hall.

Trans, MUSIC Oct. 28/36

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The "Faust" Symphony of Franz Liszt is revived at the Symphony concerts this week in observance of the 125th anniversary of the composer's birth. Liszt was born Oct 22, 1811. Since this formidable score takes more than an hour to play, Dr Koussevitzky prefaced it only with Richard Wagner's "A Faust Overture." There is no intermission.

The "mystical" chorus" at the end of the Symphony, on the text which forms conclusion to the second part of Goethe's "Faust," is sung by the Harvard Glee Club; the accompanying tenor solo is taken by Rulon Robison. These assisting gentlemen also participated when the work was last given by the Boston Symphony, in 1932.

The piano Sonata in B minor and the "Faust" Symphony may yet be regarded as Liszt's greatest masterpieces. Both are long, massively designed, pretentious in what they are intended to communicate. Both reflect the peculiar cast of Liszt's mind, the genius of lofty thought who dabbled at mystic philosophy, and the worldly man with a touch of vulgarity. Yet the superficial side of Liszt is less conspicuous in the Symphony than in the Sonata. While the charlatan is betrayed in the perorative sections of the "Faust" movement, "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles" are noble art.

Particularly since the war, the 20th century has disowned the 19th. Sentiment unrestrained is no longer considered in good taste by many; idealism is regarded as contemptible naivete; rhetoric in music and literature has been damned to extinction. An inevitable—and fallacious—conclusion to all this upheaval is that because our world differs from that of 80 years ago, it is necessarily better.

Some individuals, hampered by this type of intellectual paralysis, have condemned all of Liszt, who was less a genius than Wagner, and they have to an extent derided the weakest pages of Wagner himself.

No style of musical expression can be rationalized beyond the mere fact of the amount of genius essential to its fabrication. Even the hardest-bitten modern will no doubt concede the technical skill of Liszt in the "Faust" Symphony. Otherwise it is a matter for the heart and not the brain to decide. The 19th century believed in the native genius of the people, and in the fundamental goodness of man. They also recognized man's imperfect state. But—and here is a point of difference between ourselves and our ancestors—they thought that man, with constant application of ideal principles, might lift himself, bootstraps and all, to the gates of Heaven.

Liszt portrayed Faust the philosopher, Faust the emotionally starved seeking woman's love; he also depicted Gretchen as the essence of womanly grace, purity, and the instrument of man's redemption. His Mephistopheles was picturesque rather than vicious, a spirit who sought merely to cancel man's virtues. All of this no doubt was a living reality to Liszt and his poetic contemporaries.

As a tonal artist Liszt succeeded in characterizing the three central figures of Goethe's poem. Faust and Gretchen probably gave him less of a problem than Mephistopheles. His score is a treasury of melody; his harmonies remain of striking beauty, even if subsequent imitation by other composers has robbed them of freshness. The orchestral texture of the "Faust" Symphony is not all of a piece. Liszt palpably learned from Wagner, but he did have his own points of originality. The style of the "Mephistopheles" section indubitably came from Berlioz; more than once does it echo salient parts of "The Damnation of Faust."

The performance yesterday was remarkably vital. Dr Koussevitzky's interpretive gifts are well suited to 19th century music.

The tone of the orchestra was again superlatively lustrous except that the horns seemed to be experiencing difficulty. The Harvard young men sang more sonorously than has been the case these past few seasons. Perhaps a new crop of voices has caused the improvement. Mr Robinson acquitted himself well with music trying to his vocal range and volume.

The program next week will be: Stravinsky: Suite from "The Fairy's Kiss"; Dvorak: Violin Concerto (Ruth Posselt, soloist); Schumann: Symphony in D minor. C. W. D.

HERALD

Eve'g H- Mass.

Of interest especially to Bostonians is Philip Hale's "Boston Symphony Programme Notes" published last year in book form. The book includes comments on ninety separate works by some forty composers. The chapter on each composer begins with something of the history of the man followed by a comparison of his compositions and a complete annotation of his important works with a description of the circumstances in which they were written and the background from which they sprang. A very informative book for

and Musicians --- News of th

Liszt "Faust" Symphony for Commemoration

With a Note About Wagner's Overture to Be Played By Boston Orchestra

Today is the one hundred and twenty-fifth birthday of Franz Liszt. Since he died in Bayreuth, "chez Wagner," as he would have said, fifty years ago, we are able to celebrate anniversaries both of his birth and death. The great Symphony after Goethe's "Faust," which is being given at the Boston Symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday, is the inevitable choice, for it not only exhibits Liszt thinking and composing at the height of his powers, but avoids the virtuoso Liszt whose love of shallow magnificence has seriously disfigured the reputation of his truly fine works.

This score, unquestionably his masterpiece, reflects the dual nature of a man who was constantly torn between the loftiest idealism and mysticism on the one hand and the most intense desire for the social pleasures of the world on the other. Since Mr. Ernest Newman has so glibly unfrocked L'Abbe Liszt, it is not surprising to discover an equally aphoristic allusion: "If it may be said that Liszt was a finer pianist than composer, it is no less true that he was a better lover than either." There is no need to expose the fallacies involved; rather is it valuable to accept the implications, for the composer shows himself in his two principal characters in this work.

First he is the "philosophical musician" of whom we have heard before, and second he is the man of the world whose wit could bite, whose irony could sting as it stings in the Mephistopheles movement of the Symphony. This man of the world also understood the gentler arts of his civilization and from this knowledge he has created a musical Gretchen of extraordinary imagination, a Gretchen exquisit at once in her simplicity a tender charm. It w with Goethe f make h w

G Fa Me der rit of music, but sic from the first of this symphony of character pictures is cruelly parodied, wantonly tortured into a fire of irony. This devil only exists as antagonism to Faust—his character is to have no character, but to be eternal mischief. Only the music of Gretchen leaves him powerless; before divine love his wiles are of no avail. The transition from this malicious witchery to the final chorus on the last lines from the second part of "Faust," "the eternal womanly draws us on," is a stroke of dramatic genius consummated in 1857 when Liszt revised the score which had been completed in 1854. It shows us Liszt, the mystic, at his best, just as the first movement defines the philosopher.

* * *

There could be no more fitting prelude to the "Faust" Symphony than the "Faust" Overture of Wagner which will precede it at these performances. Written in 1839 in Paris where Wagner, with Minna, was tasting his most profound miseries, and composing ballads and vaudeville music to eke out the barest existence, it points the way for his later achievements. There can be no doubt that he felt himself in much the same position as the Faust of the opening of Goethe' poem.

Always deeply moved by the pligh of the Medieval magician who became Goethe's most significant char acter, Wagner heard a performance o Beethoven's Ninth Symphony unde Habeneck at the Conservatoir which so fired his mind with wha he considered its Faustian implica tions, that he set to work immediately upon a "Faust" Symphony of hi own. The first movement alone wa completed, and since it depicte Faust only in the loneliness of hi study, it was called an "Overture t the First Part of Goethe's 'Faust' The title was changed with the subsequent revisions,

Twilight Radiance

Franz Liszt

Born 125 Years Ago Today, Died Fifty Years Ago. The Reproduction Above Is from a Photograph Made in Paris Shortly Before the Composer's Death.

In the Overture we see a tormente and solitary scholar in his dar sanctuary, weary of books and learning, athirst for the greater knowledge and experience of the world. Restless, tortured with visions of life at its fullest, with illusory passions and desires, we see this Faust who must find the world anew through activity. "Faust in der Einsamkeit" looms from this score, Faust in the restless introspection that is to drive him into the world through which Liszt leads him. G. H. L. S.

---

ridge Auction
l Begin Monday

ques and modern home fur-ings from the estate of Maybelle
Newton Center will be sold

Wi Sa'

Fifteen-Year-Old C

Only Two Years' Voice Training Precedes Leap to

---

rom Bela Bartok the Occasion of the Double Anniversary

To what extent does this generation understand the works of Liszt, which of his works does the public prefer, and which does it appreciate less?

The answer to the first part of this question is simple; the average musician, like the average layman, sees but the external form and never the depth.

If the form is pleasant, the layman accepts and, indeed, pardons its imperfections, but often he does not even perceive them. It is much more difficult to answer the second part of our question, to learn why most people remain such strangers to Liszt's most important compositions. In order to reply to this, we must examine these compositions from the aesthetic point of view as well as from that of a criticism of the style.

If we compare Franz Liszt as a composer with his predecessors and contemporaries, we are at once struck—in the whole of his work—by a singular phenomenon which we will not find in their cases. We are convinced, indeed, that no one of the great composers who lived before Liszt's epoch or during it gave himself up, as much as he, to the most diverse, varied and heterogeneous influences.

Even the greatest composer has an already extant point of departure. The innovator comes gradually to regions which but barely recall this point, while another type—great by synthesis—develope a style neither seen nor imagined by those whose styles were his point of departure. Liszt, on the other hand, has no precise departing point, and he has not founded several similar styles upon it. He has submitted himself to the most contradictory and disparate influences.

* * *

Let us examine these influences. Among his contemporaries Chopin's is especially marked in certain of the piano works. Traces of the Italian "bel canto" style of the beginning of the last century are discernible in almost all his compositions. It seems superfluous to mention how much he has devoted himself to the influence of what we call Hungarian Gypsy music.

The influence of the semi-popular and rather sentimental music of the Italians, totally opposed to the Gypsy music, is equally noticeable in his scores, as is proved by those touching upon Italian subjects. He has remained no more indifferent to popular Spanish music, as his Spanish Rhapsody shows. Few people know that he has also left us a Roumanian Rhapsody still in manuscript. In his last works, mainly religious, a Gregorian influence is revealed. It is growing more difficult to shed light on his relation with Wagner; a special study based on chronological data must determine which of the "Wagnerian" elements in his works owe their priority to Liszt, and which are really due to Wagner.

We must state immediately, however, that everything that has been taken over has been entirely recast.

Whether it be a Hungarian melody or popular song, or an Italian tune, each of his works carries the stamp of his personality in a way such that it actually becomes his property. What he has created from these foreign elements has become Lisztian music that one cannot fail to recognize. The elements born from his own personality, which find themselves associated with exotic ones, are so numerous that the grandeur of his creative power could not be doubted in any of his compositions. He was almost an eclectic in the best sense of the word, an eclectic who receives a great deal from others but who adds still more of his own.

Under these conditions, it is only too natural that his style should admit some ruptures; but they are insignificant beside the mass of beauties which constitute its essence. However, the average layman probably clings to these infelicities, he neither sees nor comprehends the great beauties; since he does not receive in return dazzling passages, very rare in works like "The Dance of Death" (and indeed, what will become of Saint-Saens?), he rejects all his work.

Another unfavorable circumstance consists—I believe, at least—in the perhaps excessive length of Liszt's great scores. The frequent repetitions of certain important passages often seem superfluous to people of our day, who are habituated to a more rapid life. But I feel that that is not an essential reason. It is in his boldness and in his novelty that we must seek the fundamental qualities of his works. These are the qualities which raise Liszt among the great composers. It is because of them that we love his works just as they are, with their imperfections. I say, "with their imperfections," because perhaps no one of his scores contains from the beginning to the end that character of perfection that we admire so much in the compositions of the great classics.

Continued above Right

* * *

What was the influence of this music upon the subsequent evolution of music art?

Fifty Years Afterward, the Influence of the Weimar Master Is Traced

I have written somewhere: "It is my impression that Liszt's influence upon the development of music is greater than that of Wagner." And today I still maintain what I have written. I don't mean that Liszt was a greater composer than Wagner. For in Wagner we find a greater perception of form, a richer gammut of expression, and a more homogeneous style. But for all that, the works of Liszt have been more fertile for the succeeding generation than Wagner's. Let no one be deceived by the great crowd of Wagner imitators! The perfection with which Wagner solves his problems—both in the whole and in the details—is such that, if it were possible to imitate him servilely, one could certainly not receive the necessary inspiration for a greater improvement from him.

Now all imitation is a sterile and dead thing. Liszt, on the other hand, has shown in his compositions such a variety of new possibilities, which, moreover, he himself has not exhausted, that we have been able to receive from him a far greater inspiration than from Wagner.

* * *

We will give some examples of the influence of Liszt on his successors. Richard Strauss's first compositions, otherwise quite barren, recall Brahms in their form, but the creative power of Brahms is lacking. There is a noticeable progress in Richard Strauss only when, under the influence of Wagner, and still more of Liszt, he sets himself to the cultivation of the symphonic poem. We are struck by the astonishing relationship which exists between many passages of certain compositions of Liszt, such as "Years of Pilgrimage" and "Poetic and Religious Harmonies," and many works of the two greatest figures of modern French music, Debussy and Ravel. It is my firm conviction that without the "Fountains of the Villa d'Este" and other similar works of Liszt, certain compositions of Debussy and Ravel which express an analogous spirit would be scarcely imaginable.

The heritage of Liszt betrays itself in indisputable fashion in almost all works of modern Hungarian music. But there is a composer who moves outside the sphere of Liszt's attraction less frequently than all the others. This composer, an ardent propagator of Liszt's art, is Ferruccio Busoni, the greatest disciple of the Lisztian tradition.

The point of departure manifestly due to Liszt and the new paths pursued directly after the data of Liszt are, in the case of an artistic phenomenon like that of Busoni, worthy of some attention even if the composer has not, or at least rarely, attained the expected perfection and the integral realization of his art.

(Reprinted from "La Revue Musicale"; translated by G. H. L. S.)

Trans. Oct 23

Stravinsky's music for the ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fee," will be presented for the first time in the main series of subscription concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday and Saturday. The piece was played, it will be recalled, the season before last at a Sanders Theater concert of the Orchestra, when the composer conducted. The success of the piece prompted Dr. Koussevitzky at that time to intimate that he would present it at a pair of concerts later in the season. But for some reason the plan was abandoned.

In addition next week's program will include Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor and Dvorak's Violin Concerto, in which the soloist will be Ruth Posselt, who has previously appeared in a Monday eve-

---

Trans. MUSIC Oct. 23/36

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The "Faust" Symphony of Franz Liszt is revived at the Symphony concerts this week in observance of the 125th anniversary of the composer's birth. Liszt was born Oct 22, 1811. Since this formidable score takes more than an hour to play, Dr Koussevitzky prefaced it only with Richard Wagner's "A Faust Overture." There is no intermission.

The "mystical" chorus" at the end of the Symphony, on the text which forms conclusion to the second part of Goethe's "Faust," is sung by the Harvard Glee Club; the accompanying tenor solo is taken by Rulon Robison. These assisting gentlemen also participated when the work was last given by the Boston Symphony, in 1932.

The piano Sonata in B minor and the "Faust" Symphony may yet be regarded as Liszt's greatest masterpieces. Both are long, massively designed, pretentious in what they are intended to communicate. Both reflect the peculiar cast of Liszt's mind, the genius of lofty thought who dabbled at mystic philosophy, and the worldly man with a touch of vulgarity. Yet the superficial side of Liszt is less conspicuous in the Symphony than in the Sonata. While the charlatan is betrayed in the perorative sections of the "Faust" movement, "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles" are noble art.

Particularly since the war, the 20th century has disowned the 19th. Sentiment unrestrained is no longer considered in good taste by many; idealism is regarded as contemptible naivete; rhetoric in music and literature has been damned to extinction. An inevitable—and fallacious—conclusion to all this upheaval is that because our world differs from that of 80 years ago, it is necessarily better.

Some individuals, hampered by this type of intellectual paralysis, have condemned all of Liszt, who was less a genius than Wagner, and they have to an extent derided the weakest pages of Wagner himself.

No style of musical expression can be rationalized beyond the mere fact of the amount of genius essential to its fabrication. Even the hardest-bitten modern will no doubt concede the technical skill of Liszt in the "Faust" Symphony. Otherwise it is a matter for the heart and not the brain to decide. The 19th century believed in the native genius of the people, and in the fundamental goodness of man. They also recognized man's imperfect state. But—and here is a point of difference between ourselves and our ancestors — they thought that man, with constant application of ideal principles, might lift himself, bootstraps and all, to the gates of Heaven.

Liszt portrayed Faust the philosopher, Faust the emotionally starved seeking woman's love; he also depicted Gretchen as the essence of womanly grace, purity, and the instrument of man's redemption. His Mephistopheles was picturesque rather than vicious, a spirit who sought merely to cancel man's virtues. All of this no doubt was a living reality to Liszt and his poetic contemporaries.

As a tonal artist Liszt succeeded in characterizing the three central figures of Goethe's poem. Faust and Gretchen probably gave him less of a problem than Mephistopheles. His score is a treasury of melody; his harmonies remain of striking beauty, even if subsequent imitation by other composers has robbed them of freshness. The orchestral texture of the "Faust" Symphony is not all of a piece. Liszt palpably learned from Wagner, but he did have his own points of originality. The style of the "Mephistopheles" section indubitably came from Berlioz; more than once does it echo salient parts of "The Damnation of Faust."

The performance yesterday was remarkably vital. Dr Koussevitzky's interpretive gifts are well suited to 19th century music.

The tone of the orchestra was again superlatively lustrous except that the horns seemed to be experiencing difficulty. The Harvard young men sang more sonorously than has been the case these past few seasons. Perhaps a new crop of voices has caused the improvement. Mr Robinson acquitted himself well with music trying to his vocal range and volume.

The program next week will be: Stravinsky: Suite from "The Fairy's Kiss"; Dvorak: Violin Concerto (Ruth Posselt, soloist); Schumann: Symphony in D minor. C. W. D.

HERALD

Everett - Mass.

Of interest especially to Bostonians is Philip Hale's "Boston Symphony Programme Notes" published last year in book form. The book includes comments on ninety separate works by some forty composers. The chapter on each composer begins with something of the history of the man followed by a comparison of his compositions and a complete annotation of his important works with a description of the circumstances in which they were written and the background from which they sprang. A very informative book for [illegible] 35.

MUSICAL AMERICA for October 10, 1936

MEPHISTO'S
MUSINGS

MEPHISTO'S MUSINGS

Dear Musical America:

That's an Irisher, said I to myself, said I, when I read your editor's remarks about music criticism in the secondary cities, a few weeks ago. If you don't know what I mean by an Irisher, you need only to recall to yourself one of your own favorite stories—the one about the Irishman who asked whether what he saw before him was a private scrap or one that anybody could get in on. It's no surprise to me, therefore, to find in my mail an assortment of clippings, all bearing in some way on that editorial. One or two seemed rather belligerent. Apparently some of our music reviewers didn't like that word "secondary." What amused me most was that in one instance several pokes were taken at Olin Downes for saying his say. The New York Times critic quoted generously and fairly from the editorial, giving your editor due credit. But in elaborating on the theme to make of it a full-length Sunday article he ran afoul of a confrere in Texas—whereupon the free-for-all was on.

So far as I can see, Downes was in agreement with the editorial. He was sympathetic in his attitude toward the reviewer who finds he cannot write in a smaller city in quite the way he would write in a musical metropolis. He notes that "if the local orchestra is not adjudged the equal of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, if the local pianist is not acclaimed as at least an incipient Paderewski and the fiddler who played at Mrs. Jones's is mentioned as less than a Kreisler, harsh things are said of the critics." He admits that this kind of reaction is not wholly unknown in the big cities. But in the smaller community, local influences, financial or social, can make trouble, when a reviewer would be unassailable if he wrote on a large paper in a great city. Moreover, observes Downes, the man who writes about music in a small place is likely to be a youngster. A position which demands exceptional balance, tact and experience must be filled by a fledgling. "It can be hard lines for that young man, as also for his readers!" The fledgling's newspaper aspires to a constructive influence in the community. "To be constructive involves being fearless, but to be fearless it is not necessary to fail to grasp the realities and act upon them." The danger is that the beginner in the critical game, in order to show his independence and his courage, will consider all compromise despicable and flay without mercy. "What he needs is a course in common or dog reporting under a wholly unsympathetic and realistic city editor." When he has learned to adjust himself to the realities, and by tolerance and fair-mindedness has merited the confidence of his readers, he is in a far better position to strike and strike hard in the cause of improvement or extermination.

* * *

But, down in the fair city of Dallas, John Rosenfeld, Jr., regards all this as old-fashioned prattle that only goes to show how far poor, benighted, self-satisfied New York has fallen behind the times. Mr. Downes, avers the Texas commentator in a lengthy article in the Dallas News, is just a decade late in his observations. Back in the early twenties, he informs us, the newspapers of the second and tertiary cities dropped the pulpit-benediction tone and began to report music as a human phenomenon and not as a revelation from on high. The tussle, he continues, was sharp and acrimonious, but quickly settled in favor of the newspaper, its rights and its duties. Mr. Rosenfeld skillfully juggles quotes from both Mr. Downes and your editor, with this coda: "The upshot of these contentions is that the small-town critic should be as patient and tolerant with home talent as he must be with a kindergarten delivery of 'Mary Had a Little Lamb.' We would say that this is only another example of New York's faulty perspective of things provincial."

To tread further with Rosenfeld: "The true difficulty of the inland reviewer is that his tact, tolerance and constructive impulse is not exactly matched by the paying public. The critic usually is far more appreciative of the local symphony, the home recitalists, the annual imported concert course than is the sustaining audience." He contends that the local concertgoer is "deluded by a vicious outgrowth of the provincial inferiority complex." It manifests itself, he says, "in a sort of cultural hoity-toitiness which assumes that nothing good can flourish in the native artistic wilderness."

And then the Dallas reviewer squares off for a whole series of uppercuts at music in New York, speaking of "slovenly and uninspired concerts by Toscanini," "off nights for Metropolitan prima donnas," "seedy backgrounds and perfunctory mise-en-scene," "the nondescript musical debutantes whose recitals are sheer impositions." He draws some more or less specific comparisons in favor of musical events in Dallas, and valiantly asserts that there are at least five pianists in his city who might challenge half the touring piano virtuosi of the day. All this is to back up a contention that criticism in the secondary city should be as severe as it is in the metropolis. "Kindly critical standards, so urgently recommended by Mr. Downes and MUSICAL AMERICA, work to the disadvantage of home talent," argues our dissident. "Tolerance and tact offer no promise of improved provincial music." "The inland music reviewer," he maintains in closing, "must try to write as Mr. Downes does from his eminence, and the performers must try to play and sing as do the subjects of Mr. Downes's essays."

In looking back over Mr. Rosenfeld's article, I find I overlooked something I really should have quoted. It reads: "We can see only one reason why the Dallas Symphony should not be a major orchestra of this continent and that is the belief that it cannot be and need not be." I don't quite know why, but in this connection I find myself thinking about those slovenly performances by Toscanini. Anyway, I was right about t whole discussion being an Irisher. I going to stay out of it.

* * *

CONCORD, N. H.
Monitor & N. H. Patriot

Music Club To Open Program Next Tuesday

Arthur Fiedler Will Speak On Esplanade Concerts

Arthur Fiedler, outstanding Boston musician, will address the Concord Music club at its opening meeting next Tuesday at 3:30 in Memorial Parish House on the subject "A Venture In Popularizing Good Music—The Esplanade Concerts." As conductor of the Boston Symphony "Pops" Mr. Fiedler ~~has~~ established for himself a reputation as an excellent musician and an able executive. He was the moving force behind the project of the Esplanade Concerts which have attained nation-wide attention because of the masses of people who have shown their interest by attending.

Recognizing the popularity of the concert lectures given as a morning course last year, the program committee has engaged George Fior, a young pianist of great ability and wide experience, to present four recitals. Additional interest will attach to these concerts by reason of the fact that they will be given in various homes throughout the city, the hostesses being Mrs. Harold H. Blake, Mrs. Charles H. Dolloff, Mrs. Isaac Hill and Mrs. Donald G. McIvor. The first appearance of Mr. Fior will be on December 2 and the recitals will occur in each of the following three months.

Open to Public

On January 19 in the Auditorium, Winifred Cecil, New York soprano of radio and concert fame, will give a program of songs which will be free to members of the club but will be open to the general public for a nominal fee. Miss Cecil will be remembered for her excellent work as soloist in the production of 'The Messiah' last December and her appearance here is in response to the requests of many who heard her on that occasion.

The Durrell String Quartet, regarded as one of the best women's organizations of this character in the country, will make its appearance on April 14. This group made up of Josephine Burrell, first violin, Edith Roubounde, second violin, Anna Golden, viola, and Mildred Ridley, cello, presents an ensemble developed over a period of years which has met with great success in concerts given in most of the education institutions in New England.

Among the special meetings sponsored by members of the club will be a Christmas concert on December 16, a Liszt program on March 17 commemorating the 50th anniversary of the death of this noted composer, and a garden party on May 19 at the home of Mrs. Mary L. Carleton and Louisa Herbert. This last meeting will be held out of doors and the music will be appropriate to the surroundings.

Light Opera

For the second year the club will present a light opera with "Chimes of Normandy" by Planquette as the current offering on Nov. 23-24 at the Auditorium. While this work is of an entirely different character from "The Mikado" which met with so much success last year, it is filled with pleasing music and the dialogue tells a dramatic and interesting story. Mae Taylor of Boston will again take a larding part and Elsie Belrose Campbell will be heard in one of the leading character parts. Ray Crowell, Harold Cheney, Russell Sawyer and other well-known vocalists will appear in the production.

The executive board of the club has voted a scholarship of $10 each year to that student in the Concord High school who has done most for music during his or her course. This prize will be awarded for the first time next June.

The program for the year has been prepared under the supervision of Mrs. Walter M. May. The other officers of the club are Mrs. Herbert W. Rainie, president, Mrs. Charles H. Dolloff, vice president, Mrs. Ruth Day, secretary, Mrs. N. P. Johnson, treasurer, Mrs. Ernest Dudley, auditor, Mrs. Donald E. Sanborn, librarian, Mrs. Fred S. Sprague, National Federation secretary, Mrs. Benjamin H. Rolfe, chairman of the social committee, Miss Carrie Pearl Underhill, chairman of the philanthropic committee, and Miss Eleanor Vinton, chairman of the press committee.

New York News Week

OCT 3 - 1936

RADIO

ORCHESTRA: Amateur Musicians Get Ensemble Training Via Air

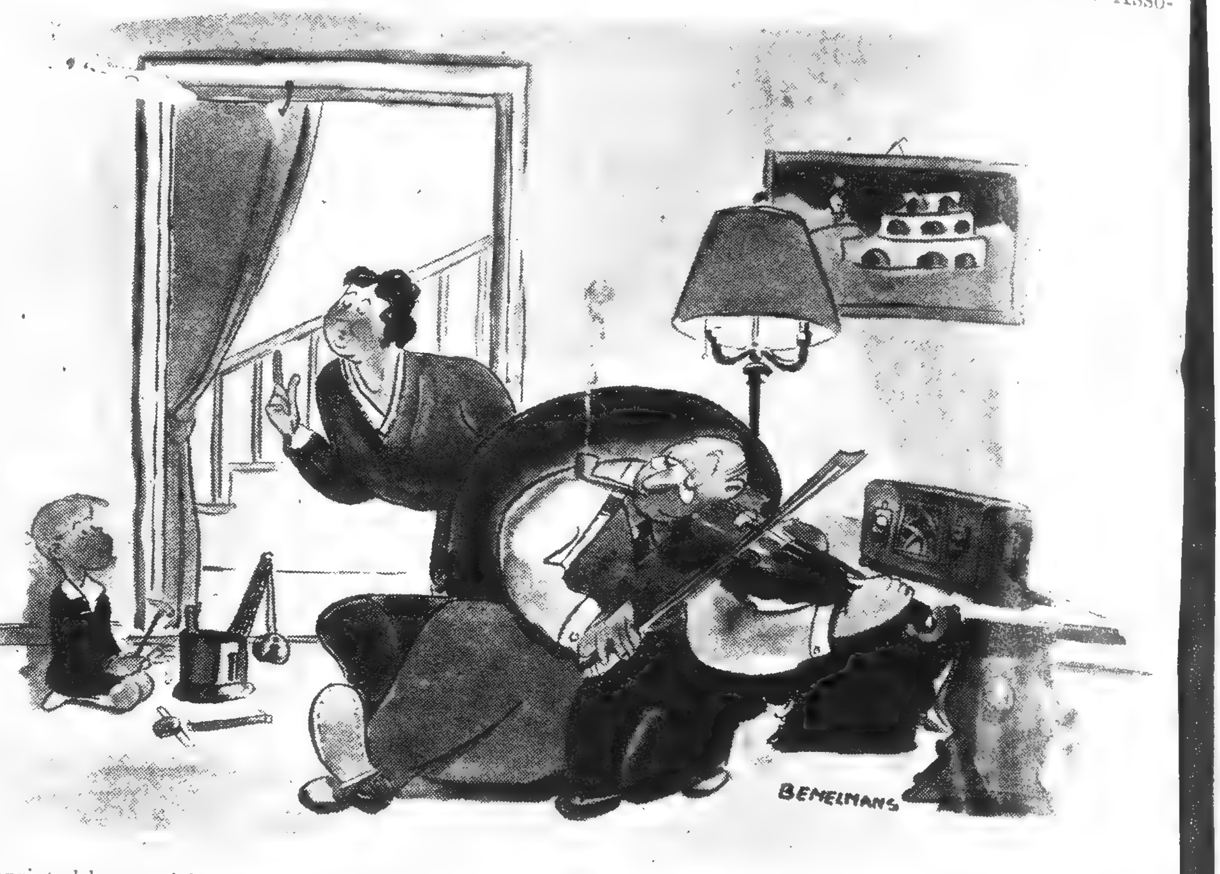
Fact: in 1920, barely a thousand high-school orchestras existed in the United States. By 1936, surveys indicated the presence of more than 35,000.

Fancy: Radio men point out that this amazing musical growth jibes almost exactly with the fifteen-year rise



Reprinted by special permission from The Saturday Evening Post. © 1936 by The Curtis Publish

'Shh—quiet, darling. Daddy's playing with the Boston Symphony'

f broadcasting. Most of the revival f interest in music, they say, is due the influence of the air waves.

Last July CBS started the fad for adio community singing. This week e National Broadcasting Co., using struments instead of voices, will present the "NBC Home Symphony." Two xplanatory broadcasts will be heard ct. 3 and 10 at 6:35 P.M. over the lue network (WJZ). Leopold Stowski, conductor of the Philadelphia ymphony, will act as guest speaker on e first program.

The scheme as conceived four years ago by Ernest La Prade, NBC Concert Orchestra director, retains the simplicity of the community sings. It needs only two elements: a central broadcasting unit and cheap copies of the various scores, readily available to amateur musicians all over the country. For the first, La uses his own 30-piece orchestra. ublishers' conference last Novemb provided the second. Led by Carl Inc., a concert edition of scores ted from the National Schools O ra Association contest list was a quarter of the former cost a local dealers.

Oct. 17, actual practice egins sands of music-minded amate shush the kids and squat befor with flute or bull-fiddle—or other instruments. Before th be a score from Mozart, Schu Beethoven—at 10 cents a copy.

They will tune their instrum a sounding of A-440, then ears for the click of a me One. Two. Three. Play!

RECORDER

Forum Plans 16th. Season

For its sixteenth season the Philadelphia Forum has announced a distinguished program of varied events including the three Theatre Guild dramatic successes of last season, music, ballet, lectures on science, politics, literature, drama economics and education.

The plays which The Forum will present for its members include "Idiot's Delight," the Pulitzer Prize winner, with Alfred Lunt and Lynn Fontanne; "End of Summer," with Ina Claire and Osgood Perkins; and "Call It a Day" with Philip Merivale and the distinguished English actress Gladys Cooper in her first Philadelphia appearance.

The music will include the only Philadelphia concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Curtis Symphony Orchestra with Oskar Shumsky, violinist, as soloist. Kirsten Flagstad, the great Wagnerian soprano of the Metropolitain Opera, which The Forum presented last year in her first Philadelphia appearance, will return in her first Philadelphia appearance this season. Lauritz Melchoir, leading Wagnerian tenor of ~~the~~ Metropolitan, will be heard in his first recital in Philadelphia. Moriz Rosenthal, pianist and last surviving pupil of Frank Liszt, will be heard in a Liszt Anniversary program, and Jose Iturbi, distinguished pianist and conductor, in his first appearance of the season. Olgo Samaroff, pianist and critic, will give three lecture-recitals, Modern Music of the Eighteenth, Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries, assisted by the Philadelphia-Symphony Chamber Orchestra in its first Philadelphia appearance, Marian Anderson, great Philadelphia Negro contralto, and Rosalyn Tureck, pianist.

The Forum will present four distinguished ballets, the Monte Car Ballet Russe; the Jooss Europe Ballet, which The Forum presented last year in its first and Philadelphia appearance; Tra Schoop and her comic ballet, the first time in Philadelphia; and Catherine Littlefield and the Philadelphia Ballet in the first performance in the United States of Tschaikowsky's "The Sleepin Beauty," with the Curtis Symphony Orchestra.

Among the lecturers whom The Forum will present will be E Ludwig, distinguished histor and biographer, in his first appearance in Philadelphia; Hugh Walpole, the well-known British novelist, in his only Philadelphia appearance; Robert M. Hutchin president of the University of Chicago; William Lyon Phelps, in three new talks on worth-while books; John Mason Brown, dramatic critic, on the new plays; Stuart Chase, economist, and Edwar Weeks, editor of the Atlantic Monthly.

The Forum will, as usual, sta the presentation of The Philadelphia Award, and will also presen group of lectures on science, adventure, exploration and travel, each lecture being given for the first time in Philadelphia. Amo those who will appear in this ser will be Burton Holmes, Rev. Bernard R. Hubbard, "the glacier pries Captain John D. Craig, H. C. Bryant of the National Park Servic Julien Bryan, Wendell Chapman, naturalist, Hugh H. Bennett, Chi of the Soil Conservation Service the Department of Agricultu Doctor Arthur A. Allen of Cornell University, and Captain C. W. R. Knight, "the eagle man."

HERALD

OCT 15 1936

Public Library Publicity Department

Do you enjoy listening to a symphony concert? The opportunity to do so and to see the orchestra is now open to you—but of course I don't have to inform you that the Boston Symphony Orchestra began its season last Friday, Oct 9, under the leadership of Dr Serge Koussevitsky.

Is it not ~~true that the~~ enjoyment of an orchestral concert is due to your knowledge of the work? At least that has been my experience. The more familiar I am with the music, the more I enjoy it. For instance, is it not true that if you go to a concert and find that Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" or Tschaikowsky's "Symphony Pathetique" is to be played, you at once settle back in your cushioned seats, ready to take in every note, knowing of the enjoyment in store for you. If, on the other hand, you find on your program "Third Concerto" by Serge Prokofieff, which is to be played this season, you may frown, for you have never heard it and wonder if you will enjoy it. Not only new compositions do you hear, but it is possible that you are not familiar with many of the older ones. Here is where your library may help you.

But before I go any further, I am not written for just those few who attend a symphony concert. Oh no! there are many splendid symphonic programs which may be heard over your radio. In fact, we sometimes do not appreciate what a rare treat is just at our finger tips. Today, millions of people who perhaps would never have heard a symphony orchestra, have the privilege, with no effort on their part. So, the books I shall mention should be helpful to all who love music, whether we hear it at home or with the addition of having the orchestra in sight.

FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL

NEW YORK, Oct. 23.—(A.P.)—For the fifth season, the Boston symphony orchestra is to be heard in a broadcast series beginning November 19. Altogether the schedule calls for 21 concerts, all but three of which are for Thursday nights. The exceptions are Thursday matinee programs.

UTICA, N. Y.
DISPATCH

For the fifth season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be heard in a broadcast series beginning Nov. 19. Altogether the schedule calls for 21 concerts, all but three of which are for Thursday nights. The exceptions are Thursday matinee programs.

35.

MEPHISTO'S MUSINGS

Dear Musical America:

That's an Irisher, said I to myself, said I, when I read your editor's remarks about music criticism in the secondary cities, a few weeks ago. If you don't know what I mean by an Irisher, you need only to recall to yourself one of your own favorite stories—the one about the Irishman who asked whether what he saw before him was a private scrap or one that anybody could get in on. It's no surprise to me, therefore, to find in my mail an assortment of clippings, all bearing in some way on that editorial. One or two seemed rather belligerent. Apparently some of our music reviewers didn't like that word "secondary." What amused me most was that in one instance several pokes were taken at Olin Downes for saying his say. The New York Times critic quoted generously and fairly from the editorial, giving your editor due credit. But in elaborating on the theme to make of it a full-length Sunday article he ran afoul of a confrere in Texas—whereupon the free-for-all was on.

So far as I can see, Downes was in agreement with the editorial. He was sympathetic in his attitude toward the reviewer who finds he cannot write in a smaller city in quite the way he would write in a musical metropolis. He notes that "if the local orchestra is not adjudged the equal of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, if the local pianist is not acclaimed as at least an incipient Paderewski and the fiddler who played at Mrs. Jones's is mentioned as less than a Kreisler, harsh things are said of the critics." He admits that this kind of reaction is not wholly unknown in the big cities. But in the smaller community, local influences, financial or social, can make trouble, when a reviewer would be unassailable if he wrote on a large paper in a great city. Moreover, observes Downes, the man who writes about music in a small place is likely to be a youngster. A position which demands exceptional balance, tact and experience must be filled by a fledgling. "It can be hard lines for that young man, as also for his readers!" The fledgling's newspaper aspires to a constructive influence in the community. "To be constructive involves being fearless, but to be fearless it is not necessary to fail to grasp the realities and act upon them." The danger is that the beginner in the critical game, in order to show his independence and his courage, will consider all compromise despicable and flay without mercy. "What he needs is a course in common or dog reporting under a wholly unsympathetic and realistic city editor." When he has learned to adjust himself to the realities, and by tolerance and fair-mindedness has merited the confidence of his readers, he is in a far better position to strike and strike hard in the cause of improvement or extermination.

* * *

But, down in the fair city of Dallas, John Rosenfeld, Jr., regards all this as old-fashioned prattle that only goes to show how far poor, benighted, self-satisfied New York has fallen behind the times. Mr. Downes, avers the Texas commentator in a lengthy article in the Dallas News, is just a decade late in his observations. Back in the early twenties, he informs us, the newspapers of the second and tertiary cities dropped the pulpit-benediction tone and began to report music as a human phenomenon and not as a revelation from on high. The tussle, he continues, was sharp and acrimonious, but quickly settled in favor of the newspaper, its rights and its duties. Mr. Rosenfeld skillfully juggles quotes from both Mr. Downes and your editor, with this coda: "The upshot of these contentions is that the small-town critic should be as patient and tolerant with home talent as he must be with a kindergarten delivery of 'Mary Had a Little Lamb.' We would say that this is only another example of New York's faulty perspective of things provincial."

To tread further with Rosenfeld: "The true difficulty of the inland reviewer is that his tact, tolerance and constructive impulse is not exactly matched by the paying public. The critic usually is far more appreciative of the local symphony, the home recitalists, the annual imported concert course than is the sustaining audience." He contends that the local concertgoer is "deluded by a vicious outgrowth of the provincial inferiority complex." It manifests itself, he says, "in a sort of cultural hoity-toitiness which assumes that nothing good can flourish in the native artistic wilderness."

And then the Dallas reviewer squares off for a whole series of uppercuts at music in New York, speaking of "slovenly and uninspired concerts by Toscanini," "off nights for Metropolitan prima donnas," "seedy backgrounds and perfunctory mise-en-scene," "the nondescript musical debutantes whose recitals are sheer impositions." He draws some more or less specific comparisons in favor of musical events in Dallas, and valiantly asserts that there are at least five pianists in his city who might challenge half the touring piano virtuosi of the day. All this is to back up a contention that criticism in the secondary city should be as severe as it is in the metropolis. "Kindly critical standards, so urgently recommended by Mr. Downes and MUSICAL AMERICA, work to the disadvantage of home talent," argues our dissident. "Tolerance and tact offer no promise of improved provincial music." "The inland music reviewer," he maintains in closing, "must try to write as Mr. Downes does from his eminence, and the performers must try to play and sing as do the subjects of Mr. Downes's essays."

In looking back over Mr. Rosenfeld's article, I find I overlooked something I really should have quoted. It reads "We can see only one reason why the Dallas Symphony should not be a major orchestra of this continent and that is the belief that it cannot be and need not be." I don't quite know why, but in this connection I find myself thinking about those slovenly performances by Toscanini. Anyway, I was right about whole discussion being an Irisher. going to stay out of it.

* * *

HERALD

Everett-Mass.

OCT 15 1936

Public Library Publicity Department

Do you enjoy listening to a symhony concert? The opportunity to o so and to see the orchestra is now pen to you—but of course I don't ave to inform you that the Boston ymphony Orchestra began its season ast Friday, Oct 9, under the leaderhip of Dr Serge Koussevitsky.

Is it not true that the enjoyment of an orchestral concert is due to your knowledge of the work? At least that has been my experience. The more amiliar I am with the music, the more I enjoy it. For instance, is it not true that if you go to a concert and find that Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" or Tschaikowsky's "Symphony Pathetique" is to be played, you at once settle back in your cushioned seats, ready to take in every note, nowing of the enjoyment in store for ou. If, on the other hand, you find in your program "Third Concerto" by Serge Prokofieff, which is to be played this season, you may frown, for you have never heard it and wonder if you will enjoy it. Not only new compositions do you hear, but it is possible that you are not familiar with nany of the older ones. Here is where your library may help you.

But before I go any further, I am not written for just those few who attend a symphony concert. Oh no! there are many splendid symphonic programs which may be heard over your radio. In fact, we sometimes do not appreciate what a rare treat s just at our finger tips. Today, millions of people who perhaps would never have heard a symphony orchestra, have the privilege, with no effort on their part. So, the books I shall mention should be helpful to all who ove music, whether we hear it at ome or with the addition of having orchestra in sight.

FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL

NEW YORK, Oct. 23.—(A.P.)—For the fifth season, the Boston symphony orchestra is to be heard in a broadcast series beginning November 19. Altogether the schedule calls for 21 concerts, all but three of which are for Thursday nights. The exceptions are Thursday matinee programs.

CONCORD, N. H.
Monitor & N. H. Patriot

OCT 21 1936

Music Club To Open Program Next Tuesday

Arthur Fiedler Will Speak On Esplanade Concerts

Arthur Fiedler, outstanding Boston musician, will address the Concord Music club at its opening meeting next Tuesday at 3:30 in Memorial Parish House on the subject "A Venture In Popularizing Good Music—The Esplanade Concerts." As conductor of the Boston Symphony "Pops" Mr. Fiedler ~~has~~ established for himself a reputation as an excellent musician and an able executive. He was the moving force behind the project of the Esplanade Concerts which have attained nation-wide attention because of the masses of people who have shown their interest by attending.

Recognizing the popularity of the concert lectures given as a morning course last year, the program committee has engaged George Fior, a young pianist of great ability and wide experience, to present four recitals. Additional interest will attach to these concerts by reason of the fact that they will be given in various homes throughout the city, the hostesses being Mrs. Harold H. Blake, Mrs. Charles H. Dolloff, Mrs. Isaac Hill and Mrs. Donald G. McIvor. The first appearance of Mr. Fior will be on December 2 and the recitals will occur in each of the following three months.

Open to Public

On January 19 in the Auditorium, Winifred Cecil, New York soprano of radio and concert fame, will give a program of songs which will be free to members of the club but will be open to the general public for a nominal fee. Miss Cecil will be remembered for her excellent work as soloist in the production of 'The Messiah' last December and her appearance here is in response to the requests of many who heard her on that occasion.

The Durrell String Quartet, regarded as one of the best women's organizations of this character in the country, will make its appearance on April 14. This group made up of Josephine Burrell, first violin, Edith Roubounde, second violin, Anna Golden, viola, and Mildred Ridley, cello, presents an ensemble developed over a period of years which has met with great success in concerts given in most of the education institutions in New England.

Among the special meetings sponsored by members of the club will be a Christmas concert on December 16, a Liszt program on March 17 commemorating the 50th anniversary of the death of this noted composer, and a garden party on May 19 at the home of Mrs. Mary L. Carleton and Louisa Herbert. This last meeting will be held out of doors and the music will be appropriate to the surroundings.

Light Opera

For the second year the club will present a light opera with "Chimes of Normandy" by Planquette as the current offering on Nov. 23-24 at the Auditorium. While this work is of an entirely different character from "The Mikado" which met with so much success last year, it is filled with pleasing music and the dialogue tells a dramatic and interesting story. Mae Taylor of Boston will again take a larding part and Elsie Belrose Campbell will be heard in one of the leading character parts. Ray Crowell, Harold Cheney, Russell Sawyer and other well-known vocalists will appear in the production.

The executive board of the club has voted a scholarship of $10 each year to that student in the Concord High school who has done most for music during his or her course. This prize will be awarded for the first time next June.

The program for the year has been prepared under the supervision of Mrs. Walter M. May. The other officers of the club are Mrs. Herbert W. Rainie, president, Mrs. Charles H. Dolloff, vice president, Mrs. Ruth Day, secretary, Mrs. N. P. Johnson, treasurer, Mrs. Ernest Dudley, auditor, Mrs. Donald E. Sanborn, librarian, Mrs. Fred S. Sprague, National Federation secretary, Mrs. Benjamin H. Rolfe, chairman of the social committee, Miss Carrie Pearl Underhill, chairman of the philanthropic committee, and Miss Eleanor Vinton, chairman of the press committee.

New York News Week

OCT 3 - 1936

RADIO

ORCHESTRA: Amateur Musicians Get Ensemble Training Via Air

Fact: in 1920, barely a thousand high-school orchestras existed in the United States. By 1936, surveys indicated the presence of more than 35,000.

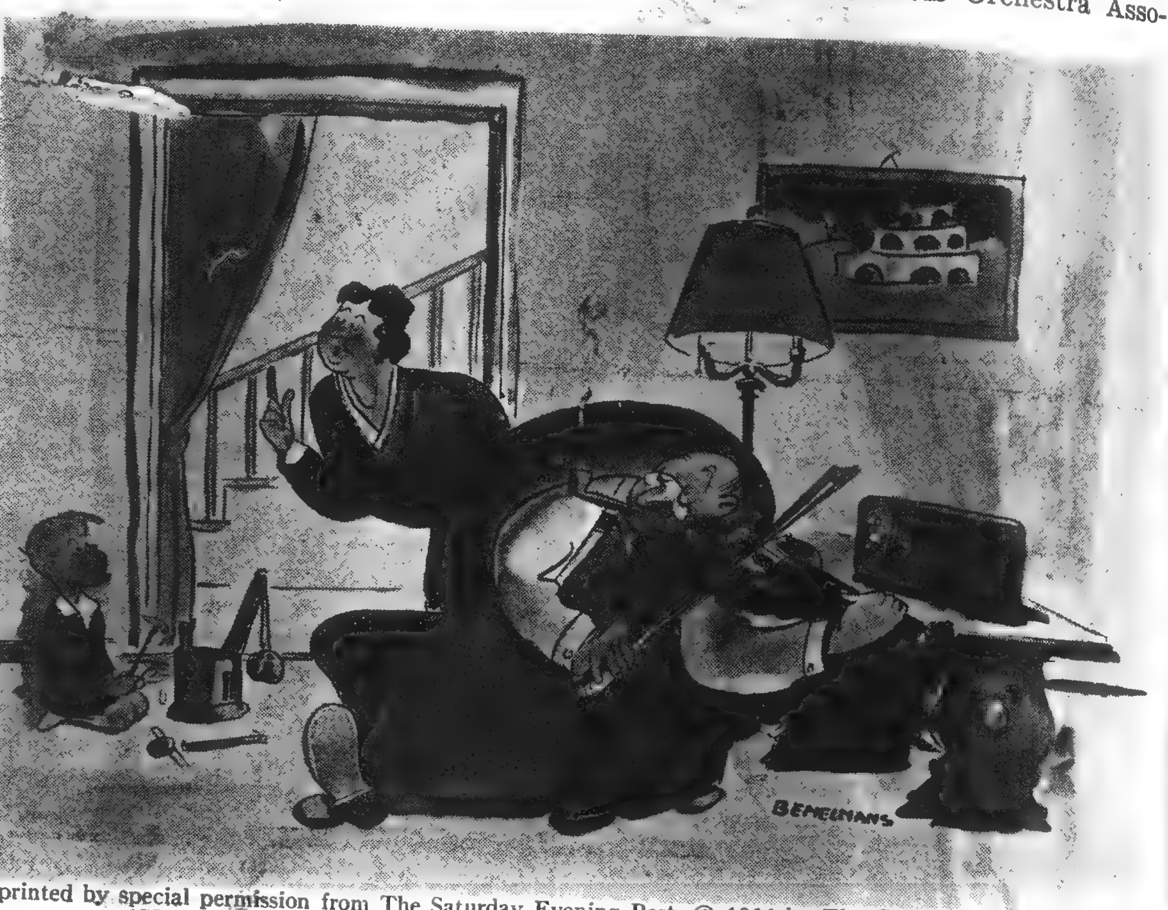
Fancy: Radio men point out that this amazing musical growth jibes almost exactly with the fifteen-year rise f broadcasting. Most of the revival f interest in music, they say, is due the influence of the air waves.

Last July CBS started the fad for adio community singing. This week e National Broadcasting Co., using struments instead of voices, will present the "NBC Home Symphony." Two planatory broadcasts will be heard ct. 3 and 10 at 6:35 P.M. over the lue network (WJZ). Leopold Stowski, conductor of the Philadelphia ymphony, will act as guest speaker on e first program.

The scheme as conceived four years ago by Ernest La Prade, NBC Concert Orchestra director, retains the simplicity of the community sings. It needs only two elements: a central broadcasting unit and cheap copies of the various scores, readily available to amateur musicians all over the country. For the first, La Prade uses his own 30-piece orchestra. A publishers' conference last November provided the second. Led by Carl Fischer, Inc., a concert edition of scores selected from the National Schools Orchestra Association contest list was run off at a quarter of the former cost and sent to local dealers.

Oct. 17, actual practice begins. Thousands of music-minded amateurs will shush the kids and squat before radios with flute or bull-fiddle—or seventeen other instruments. Before them will be a score from Mozart, Schubert, or Beethoven—at 10 cents a copy.

They will tune their instruments to a sounding of A-440, then cock their ears for the click of a metronome. One. Two. Three. Play!



eprinted by special permission from The Saturday Evening Post. © 1936 by The Curtis Publishing Company.
'Shh—quiet, darling, Daddy's playing with the Boston Symphony'

RECORDER

Conshohocken Pa

OCT 16 1936

Forum Plans 16th. Season

For its sixteenth season the Philadelphia Forum has announced a distinguished program of varied events including the three Theatre Guild dramatic successes of last season, music, ballet, lectures on science, politics, literature, drama economics and education.

The plays which The Forum will present for its members include "Idiot's Delight," the Pulitzer Prize winner, with Alfred Lunt and Lynn Fontanne; "End of Summer," with Ina Claire and Osgood Perkins; and "Call It a Day" with Philip Merivale and the distinguished English actress Gladys Cooper in her first Philadelphia appearance.

The music will include the only Philadelphia concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Curtis Symphony Orchestra with Oskar Shumsky, violinist, as soloist. Kirsten Flagstad, the great Wagnerian soprano of the Metropolitain Opera, which The Forum presented last year in her first Philadelphia appearance, will return in her first Philadelphia appearance this season. Lauritz Melchoir, leading Wagnerian tenor of the Metropolitan, will be heard in his first recital in Philadelphia. Moriz Rosenthal, pianist and last surviving pupil of Frank Liszt, will be heard in a Liszt Anniversary program, and Jose Iturbi, distinguished pianist and conductor, in his first appearance of the season. Olgo Samaroff, pianist and critic, will give three lecture-recitals, Modern Music of the Eighteenth, Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries, assisted by the Philadelphia-Symphony Chamber Orchestra in its first Philadelphia appearance, Marian Anderson, great Philadelphia Negro contralto, and Rosalyn Tureck, pianist.

The Forum will present four distinguished ballets, the Monte Carlo Ballet Russe; the Jooss European Ballet, which The Forum presented last year in its first and only Philadelphia appearance; Trudi Schoop and her comic ballet, for the first time in Philadelphia; and Catherine Littlefield and the Philadelphia Ballet in the first performance in the United States of Tschaikowsky's "The Sleeping Beauty," with the Curtis Symphony Orchestra.

Among the lecturers whom The Forum will present will be Emil Ludwig, distinguished historian and biographer, in his first appearance in Philadelphia; Hugh Walpole, the well-known British novelist, in his only Philadelphia appearance; Robert M. Hutchins, president of the University of Chicago; William Lyon Phelps, in three new talks on worth-while books; John Mason Brown, dramatic critic, on the new plays; Stuart Chase, economist, and Edward Weeks, editor, of the Atlantic Monthly.

The Forum will, as usual, stage the presentation of The Philadelphia Award, and will also present a group of lectures on science, adventure, exploration and travel, each lecture being given for the first time in Philadelphia. Among those who will appear in this series will be Burton Holmes, Rev. Bernard R. Hubbard, "the glacier priest," Captain John D. Craig, H. C. Bryant of the National Park Service, Julien Bryan, Wendell Chapman, naturalist, Hugh H. Bennett, Chief of the Soil Conservation Service of the Department of Agriculture, Doctor Arthur A. Allen of Cornell University, and Captain C. W. R. Knight, "the eagle man."

Oct 23/36

UTICA, N. Y.
DISPATCH

For the fifth season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be heard in a broadcast series beginning Nov. 19. Altogether the schedule calls for 21 concerts, all but three of which are for Thursday nights. The exceptions are Thursday matinee programs.

MUSICAL AMERICA for October 10, 1936

MEPHISTO'S MUSINGS

Dear Musical America:

That's an Irisher, said I to myself, said I, when I read your editor's remarks about music criticism in the secondary cities, a few weeks ago. If you don't know what I mean by an Irisher, you need only to recall to yourself one of your own favorite stories—the one about the Irishman who asked whether what he saw before him was a private scrap or one that anybody could get in on. It's no surprise to me, therefore, to find in my mail an assortment of clippings, all bearing in some way on that editorial. One or two seemed rather belligerent. Apparently some of our music reviewers didn't like that word "secondary." What amused me most was that in one instance several pokes were taken at Olin Downes for saying his say. The New York Times critic quoted generously and fairly from the editorial, giving your editor due credit. But in elaborating on the theme to make of it a full-length Sunday article he ran afoul of a confrere in Texas—whereupon the free-for-all was on.

So far as I can see, Downes was in agreement with the editorial. He was sympathetic in his attitude toward the reviewer who finds he cannot write in a smaller city in quite the way he would write in a musical metropolis. He notes that "if the local orchestra is not adjudged the equal of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, if the local pianist is not acclaimed as at least an incipient Paderewski and the fiddler who played at Mrs. Jones's is mentioned as less than a Kreisler, harsh things are said of the critics." He admits that this kind of reaction is not wholly unknown in the big cities. But in the smaller community, local influences, financial or social, can make trouble, when a reviewer would be unassailable if he wrote on a large paper in a great city. Moreover, observes Downes, the man who writes about music in a small place is likely to be a youngster. A position which demands exceptional balance, tact and experience must be filled by a fledgling. "It can be hard lines for that young man, as also for his readers!" The fledgling's newspaper aspires to a constructive influence in the community. "To be constructive involves being fearless, but to be fearless it is not necessary to fail to grasp the realities and act upon them." The danger is that the beginner in the critical game, in order to show his independence and his courage, will consider all compromise despicable and flay without mercy. "What he needs is a course in common or dog reporting under a wholly unsympathetic and realistic city editor." When he has learned to adjust himself to the realities, and by tolerance and fair-mindedness has merited the confidence of his readers, he is in a far better position to strike and strike hard in the cause of improvement or extermination.

* * *

But, down in the fair city of Dallas, John Rosenfeld, Jr., regards all this as old-fashioned prattle that only goes to show how far poor, benighted, self-satisfied New York has fallen behind the times. Mr. Downes, avers the Texas commentator in a lengthy article in the Dallas News, is just a decade late in his observations. Back in the early twenties, he informs us, the newspapers of the second and tertiary cities dropped the pulpit-benediction tone and began to report music as a human phenomenon and not as a revelation from on high. The tussle, he continues, was sharp and acrimonious, but quickly settled in favor of the newspaper, its rights and its duties. Mr. Rosenfeld skillfully juggles quotes from both Mr. Downes and your editor, with this coda: "The upshot of these contentions is that the small-town critic should be as patient and tolerant with home talent as he must be with a kindergarten delivery of 'Mary Had a Little Lamb.' We would say that this is only another example of New York's faulty perspective of things provincial."

To tread further with Rosenfeld: "The true difficulty of the inland reviewer is that his tact, tolerance and constructive impulse is not exactly matched by the paying public. The critic usually is far more appreciative of the local symphony, the home recitalists, the annual imported concert course than is the sustaining audience." He contends that the local concertgoer is "deluded by a vicious outgrowth of the provincial inferiority complex." It manifests itself, he says, "in a sort of cultural hoity-toitiness which assumes that nothing good can flourish in the native artistic wilderness."

And then the Dallas reviewer squares off for a whole series of uppercuts at music in New York, speaking of "slovenly and uninspired concerts by Toscanini," "off nights for Metropolitan prima donnas," "seedy backgrounds and perfunctory mise-en-scene," "the nondescript musical debutantes whose recitals are sheer impositions." He draws some more or less specific comparisons in favor of musical events in Dallas, and valiantly asserts that there are at least five pianists in his city who might challenge half the touring piano virtuosi of the day. All this is to back up a contention that criticism in the secondary city should be as severe as it is in the metropolis. "Kindly critical standards, so urgently recommended by Mr. Downes and MUSICAL AMERICA, work to the disadvantage of home talent," argues our dissident. "Tolerance and tact offer no promise of improved provincial music." "The inland music reviewer," he maintains in closing, "must try to write as Mr. Downes does from his eminence, and the performers must try to play and sing as do the subjects of Mr. Downes's essays."

In looking back over Mr. Rosenfeld's article, I find I overlooked something I really should have quoted. It reads: "We can see only one reason why the Dallas Symphony should not be a major orchestra of this continent and that is the belief that it cannot be and need not be." I don't quite know why, but in this connection I find myself thinking about those slovenly performances by Toscanini. Anyway, I was right about whole discussion being an Irisher. going to stay out of it.

* * *

CONCORD, N. H.
Monitor & N. H. Patriot

OCT 21 1936

Music Club To Open Program Next Tuesday

Arthur Fiedler Will Speak On Esplanade Concerts

Arthur Fiedler, outstanding Boston musician, will address the Concord Music club at its opening meeting next Tuesday at 3:30 in Memorial Parish House on the subject "A Venture In Popularizing Good Music—The Esplanade Concerts." As conducto of the Boston Symphony "Pops" Fiedler has established for himse reputation as an excellent mus and an able executive. He was moving force behind the project c Esplanade Concerts which hav tained nation-wide attention beca the masses of people who have their interest by attending.

Recognizing the popularity c concert -lectures given as a m course last year, the program c mittee has engaged George young pianist of great ability an experience, to present four Additional interest will attach concerts by reason of the f they will be given in various throughout the city, the hoste ing Mrs. Harold H. Blake Charles H. Dolloff, Mrs. Isaac Mrs. Donald G. McIvor. The fi pearance of Mr. Fior will be cember 2 and the recitals will in each of the following three m

Open to Public

On January 19 in the Audito Winifred Cecil, New York sopran radio and concert fame, will gi program of songs which will be to members of the club but will open to the general public for a n inal fee. Miss Cecil will be reme bered for her excellent work as so list in the production of 'The Messia last December and her appearanc here is in response to the requests c many who heard her on that occasion.

The Durrell String Quartet, regarded as one of the best women's organizations of this character in the country, will make its appearance on April 14. This group made up of Josephine Burrell, first violin, Edith Roubounde, second violin, Anna Golden, viola, and Mildred Ridley, cello, presents an ensemble developed over a period of years which has met with great success in concerts given in most of the education institutions in New England.

Among the special meetings sponsored by members of the club will be a Christmas concert on December 16, a Liszt program on March 17 commemorating the 50th anniversary of the death of this noted composer, and a garden party on May 19 at the home of Mrs. Mary L. Carleton and Louisa Herbert. This last meeting will be held out of doors and the music will be appropriate to the surroundings.

Light Opera

For the second year the club will present a light opera with "Chimes of Normandy" by Planquette as the current offering on Nov. 23-24 at the Auditorium. While this work is of an entirely different character from "The Mikado" which met with so much success last year, it is filled with pleasing music and the dialogue tells a dramatic and interesting story. Mae Taylor of Boston will again take a lading part and Elsie Belrose Campbell will be heard in one of the leading character parts. Ray Crowell, Harold Cheney, Russell Sawyer and other well-known vocalists will appear in the production.

The executive board of the club has voted a scholarship of $10 each year to that student in the Concord High school who has done most for music during his or her course. This prize will be awarded for the first time next June.

The program for the year has been prepared under the supervision of Mrs. Walter M. May. The other officers of the club are Mrs. Herbert W. Rainie, president, Mrs. Charles H. Dolloff, vice president, Mrs. Ruth Day, secretary, Mrs. N. P. Johnson, treasurer, Mrs. Ernest Dudley, auditor, Mrs. Donald E. Sanborn, librarian, Mrs. Fred S. Sprague, National Federation secretary, Mrs. Benjamin H. Rolfe, chairman of the social committee, Miss Carrie Pearl Underhill, chairman of the philanthropic committee, and Miss Eleanor Vinton, chairman of the press committee.

New York News Week

OCT 3 - 1936

RADIO

ORCHESTRA: Amateur Musicians Get Ensemble Training Via Air

Fact: in 1920, barely a thousand high-school orchestras existed in the United States. By 1936, surveys indicated the presence of more than 35,000.

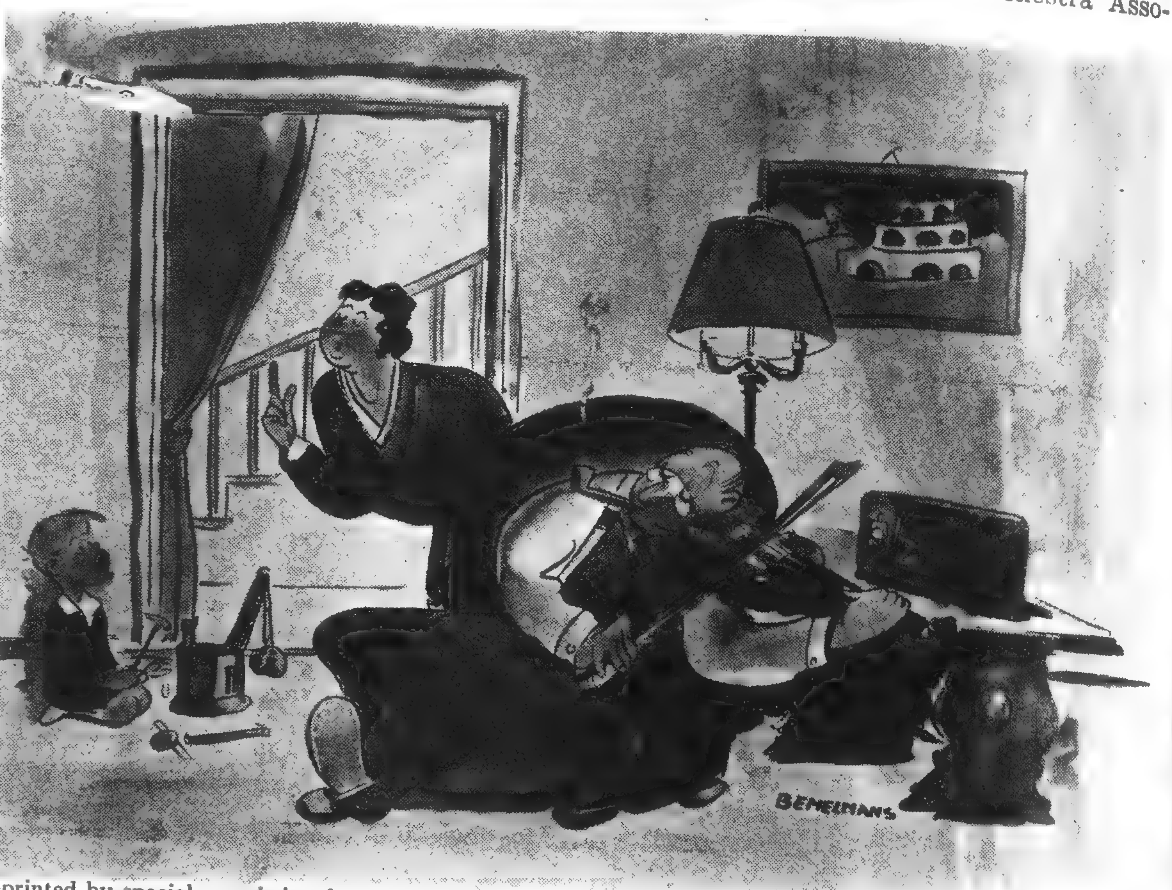
Fancy: Radio men point out that this amazing musical growth jibes almost exactly with the fifteen-year rise of broadcasting. Most of the revival of interest in music, they say, is due to the influence of the air waves.

Last July CBS started the fad for radio community singing. This week the National Broadcasting Co., using instruments instead of voices, will present the "NBC Home Symphony." Two explanatory broadcasts will be heard Oct. 3 and 10 at 6:35 P.M. over the Blue network (WJZ). Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony, will act as guest speaker on the first program.

The scheme as conceived four years ago by Ernest La Prade, NBC Concert Orchestra director, retains the simplicity of the community sings. It needs only two elements: a central broadcasting unit and cheap copies of the various scores, readily available to amateur musicians all over the country. For the first, La Prade uses his own 30-piece orchestra. A publishers' conference last November provided the second. Led by Carl Fischer, Inc., a concert edition of scores selected from the National Schools Orchestra Association contest list was run off at a quarter of the former cost and sent to local dealers.

Oct. 17, actual practice begins. Thousands of music-minded amateurs will shush the kids and squat before radios with flute or bull-fiddle—or seventeen other instruments. Before them will be a score from Mozart, Schubert, or Beethoven—at 10 cents a copy.

They will tune their instruments to a sounding of A-440, then cock their ears for the click of a metronome. One. Two. Three. Play!



Reprinted by special permission from The Saturday Evening Post. © 1936 by The Curtis Publishing Company.
'Shh—quiet, darling, Daddy's playing with the Boston Symphony'

RECORDER
Conshohocken. Pa

OCT 16 1936

Forum Plans 16th. Season

For its sixteenth season the Philadelphia Forum has announced a distinguished program of varied events including the three Theatre Guild dramatic successes of last season, music, ballet, lectures on science, politics, literature, drama economics and education.

The plays which The Forum will present for its members include "Idiot's Delight," the Pulitzer Prize winner, with Alfred Lunt and Lynn Fontanne; "End of Summer," with Ina Claire and Osgood Perkins; and "Call It a Day" with Philip Merivale and the distinguished English actress Gladys Cooper in her first Philadelphia appearance.

The music will include the only Philadelphia concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Curtis Symphony Orchestra with Oskar Shumsky, violinist, as soloist. Kirsten Flagstad, the great Wagnerian soprano of the Metropolitain Opera, which The Forum presented last year in her first Philadelphia appearance, will return in her first Philadelphia appearance this season. Lauritz Melchoir, leading Wagnerian tenor of the Metropolitan, will be heard in his first recital in Philadelphia. Moriz Rosenthal, pianist and last surviving pupil of Frank Liszt, will be heard in a Liszt Anniversary program, and Jose Iturbi, distinguished pianist and conductor, in his first appearance of the season. Olgo Samaroff, pianist and critic, will give three lecture-recitals, Modern Music of the Eighteenth, Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries, assisted by the Philadelphia-Symphony Chamber Orchestra in its first Philadelphia appearance, Marian Anderson, great Philadelphia Negro contralto, and Rosalyn Tureck, pianist.

The Forum will present four distinguished ballets, the Monte Carlo Ballet Russe; the Jooss European Ballet, which The Forum presented last year in its first and only Philadelphia appearance; Trudi Schoop and her comic ballet, for the first time in Philadelphia; and Catherine Littlefield and the Philadelphia Ballet in the first performance in the United States of Tschaikowsky's "The Sleeping Beauty," with the Curtis Symphony Orchestra.

Among the lecturers whom The Forum will present will be Emil Ludwig, distinguished historian and biographer, in his first appearance in Philadelphia; Hugh Walpole, the well-known British novelist, in his only Philadelphia appearance; Robert M. Hutchins, president of the University of Chicago; William Lyon Phelps, in three new talks on worth-while books; John Mason Brown, dramatic critic, on the new plays; Stuart Chase, economist, and Edward Weeks, editor, of the Atlantic Monthly.

The Forum will, as usual, stage the presentation of The Philadelphia Award, and will also present a group of lectures on science, adventure, exploration and travel, each lecture being given for the first time in Philadelphia. Among those who will appear in this series will be Burton Holmes, Rev. Bernard R. Hubbard, "the glacier priest," Captain John D. Craig, H. C. Bryant of the National Park Service, Julien Bryan, Wendell Chapman, naturalist, Hugh H. Bennett, Chief of the Soil Conservation Service of the Department of Agriculture, Doctor Arthur A. Allen of Cornell University, and Captain C. W. R. Knight, "the eagle man."

UTICA, N. Y.
DISPATCH
Oct 23/36

For the fifth season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be heard in a broadcast series beginning Nov. 19. Altogether the schedule calls for 21 concerts, all but three of which are for Thursday nights. The exceptions are Thursday matinee programs.

HERALD
Everett-Mass.

OCT 15 1936

Public Library Publicity Department

Do you enjoy listening to a symhony concert? The opportunity to o so and to see the orchestra is now pen to you—but of course I don't ave to inform you that the Boston ymphony Orchestra began its season ast Friday, Oct 9, under the leaderhip of Dr Serge Koussevitsky.

Is it not true [illegible] enjoyment of an orchestral concert is due to your knowledge of the work? At least that as been my experience. The more amiliar I am with the music, the more I enjoy it. For instance, is it not true hat if you go to a concert and find hat Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" or Tschaikowsky's "Symphony Pathetique" is to be played, you at once settle back in your cushioned eats, ready to take in every note, nowing of the enjoyment in store for ou. If, on the other hand, you find n your program "Third Concerto" by Serge Prokofieff, which is to be played this season, you may frown, for you have never heard it and wonder if ou will enjoy it. Not only new compositions do you hear, but it is possible that you are not familiar with nany of the older ones. Here is where your library may help you.

But before I go any further, I am not written for just those few who attend a symphony concert. Oh no! there are many splendid symphonic programs which may be heard over your radio. In fact, we sometimes do not appreciate what a rare treat s just at our finger tips. Today, millions of people who perhaps would never have heard a symphony orchestra, have the privilege, with no effort on their part. So, the books I shall mention should be helpful to all who ove music, whether we hear it at ome or with the addition of having orchestra in sight.

FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL

NEW YORK, Oct. 23.—(A.P.)—For the fifth season, the Boston symphony orchestra is to be heard in a broadcast series beginning November 19. Altogether the schedule calls for 21 concerts, all but three of which are for Thursday nights. The exceptions are Thursday matinee programs.

NEWS LETTER
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

OCT 24 1936

●

Ernst Bacon is the conductor for Tuesday night's W.P.A. Federal Symphony Orchestra concert at the Veterans' Auditorium, and Alfred Keller, former concertmaster of the Portland Symphony, is soloist. Keller will play the Brahms Violin Concerto in D Major; Bacon will conduct Beethoven's First Symphony and the dramatic "Coriolanus" Overture.

Monday evening the regular weekly Chamber Music concert at the California Women's Club will feature works by Weber, Spohr and the Russian modernist Prokofieff.

●

San Franciscans, who will soon be thinking of ways to pay tribute to their symphony orchestra's Silver Jubilee, should find interesting and stimulating the book that Gerome Brush has put together for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Brush has sketched in charcoal the orchestra's leader Koussevitsky and all of the musicians, and added a brief biographical sketch to each drawing. The result is cause for rejoicing and delight. The artist has drawn his subjects with such reverent and thoughtful appreciation that the mere fact of a man blowing on a tuba or fondling a fiddle becomes a thing of sensitive, permanent beauty. And the biographies are gems of succinct statement and quiet, charming humor.

The book is printed by Boston's Merrymount Press.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 2 1936

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL PLANS 1937 SEASON

Return of Koussevitsky Depends on Building of Music Shed, Officers Are Told.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass., Oct. 21.—Announcement was made today at the annual meeting of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., held at the home of Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, will return next August for six concerts over two week-ends, if the festival association provides a music shed. Miss Smith and other officers were re-elected as follows: vice presidents, Mrs. Carlos M. de Heredia and Norval H. Busey; treasurer, John C. Lynch; secretary, George W. Edman.

The annual House of Mercy Hospital bazaar will be held tomorrow at the Bishop Memorial Building, with the Pittsfield Junior League in charge of the luncheon. Among those directing the fête are Mrs. Fred T. Francis, Mrs. Lewis M. Underwood, Mrs. Albert Bliss, Mrs. C. Kenneth Fuller, Mrs. Edward von P. Renouf and Mrs. John F. Noxon. Twelve Currier & Ives prints will be reproduced in tableux.

Mrs. Charles Rockhill entertained at luncheon today at Cranehill, Great Barrington.

NEWS LETTER
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

OCT 24 1936

●

Ernst Bacon is the conductor for Tuesday night's W.P.A. Federal Symphony Orchestra concert at the Veterans' Auditorium, and Alfred Keller, former concertmaster of the Portland Symphony, is soloist. Keller will play the Brahms Violin Concerto in D Major; Bacon will conduct Beethoven's First Symphony and the dramatic "Coriolanus" Overture.

Monday evening the regular weekly Chamber Music concert at the California Women's Club will feature works by Weber, Spohr and the Russian modernist Prokofieff.

●

San Franciscans, who will soon be thinking of ways to pay tribute to their symphony orchestra's Silver Jubilee, should find interesting and stimulating the book that Gerome Brush has put together for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Brush has sketched in charcoal the orchestra's leader Koussevitsky and all of the musicians, and added a brief biographical sketch to each drawing. The result is cause for rejoicing and delight. The artist has drawn his subjects with such reverent and thoughtful appreciation that the mere fact of a man blowing on a tuba or fondling a fiddle becomes a thing of sensitive, permanent beauty. And the biographies are gems of succinct statement and quiet, charming humor.

The book is printed by Boston's Merrymount Press.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 22 1936

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL PLANS 1937 SEASON

Return of Koussevitsky Depends on Building of Music Shed, Officers Are Told.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass., Oct. 21.—Announcement was made today at the annual meeting of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., held at the home of Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, will return next August for six concerts over two week-ends, if the festival association provides a music shed. Miss Smith and other officers were re-elected as follows: vice presidents, Mrs. Carlos M. de Heredia and Norval H. Busey; treasurer, John C. Lynch; secretary, George W. Edman.

The annual House of Mercy Hospital bazaar will be held tomorrow at the Bishop Memorial Building, with the Pittsfield Junior League in charge of the luncheon. Among those directing the fête are Mrs. Fred T. Francis, Mrs. Lewis M. Underwood, Mrs. Albert Bliss, Mrs. C. Kenneth Fuller, Mrs. Edward von P. Renouf and Mrs. John F. Noxon. Twelve Currier & Ives prints will be reproduced in tableaux.

Mrs. Charles Rockhill entertained at luncheon today at Cranehill, Great Barrington.

ved four years
NBC Concert ins the sim-ty sings. It ts: a central heap copies of y available to ver the coun-
Prade uses his
A publishers' provided the scher, Inc., a selected from chestra Asso-ng Company.

off at a d sent to ns. Thou-urs will re radios seventeen hem will bert, or ents to ck their tronome.

=== News of Music

Trans. Oct. 17/36

Roland Hayes Who Will Give a Recital in Symphony Hall on Sunday Afternoon, Oct. 25

Roland Hayes and Wagner's Walther

Incident in the Life of the Negro Tenor Paralleling One in the Opera

Departing from his customary style of program in seasons of the immediate past, Roland Hayes will include two excerpts from Wagnerian drama in his recital in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Oct, 25. These will be "Walther Before the Master Guild" and the "Prize Song."

Circumstances have never hitherto led Roland Hayes, the Lieder singer, into Wagnerian paths. Recently, however, he has made a particular study of that peak of musical lyricism which lies in the part of Walther von Stolzung in "Die Meistersinger." The two excerpts that Mr. Hayes will sing are, in the opinion of the Negro tenor, not operatic arias at all, but "Lieder," for the young Minnesinger sets forth these two numbers in an attempt to fix the song form itself.

The first, sung before the solemn conclave of Mastersingers in Act I, as formative, improvisatory. The youthful knight is finding himself, but he is not relying on guild authority to do it. Evolving music, he needs no prompting from the book, for he is drawing directly upon the ardor of young love, the life which flows abundantly in his veins. The impulses of melody and of love thus merged crystallize into perfect formal expression in the "Prize Song," which is the climax of the opera.

Mr. Hayes finds that the lyrical style of this music is not inseparable from the dramatic stage, and that its concept, as described above, is quite implicit in the music, and not wholly dependent upon the theatrical spectacle.

Two episodes in the life of Mr. Hayes place him in very close sympathy with the character of Walther as he meets his two tests in "Die Meistersinger." The tenor also faced two tests of song at a turning point in his career.

After a venturesome and weary journey, largely by foot, Hayes as a youth made his way, with an introduction, to the head of the music department of a Negro college. He found this faculty member to be a woman of demeanor as severe, and disposition as hard to move, as Wagner's hero encountered in the guild of mastersingers. He spoke of his eager desire to enter the school and study both singing and other educational subjects. His appearance, apparently, was against him. He was just a youth who had strayed from a farm, and belonged back there. Seeing that he was about to be dismissed, young Hayes pleaded so urgently to be allowed to show what he could do that the lady reluctantly sat down at the piano. Looking over several pieces of dog-eared music offered by the youth, she began the accompaniment of "Beyond the Gates of Paradise." Roland sang his heart out. The instructor still revealed no emotion. But she did invite him to sing "Forgotten." Still imperturbable, she told him to return in a few days, but was noncommittal as to what for.

On Roland's return, the instructor said she herself could do nothing for the lad, but she gave him a note and told him to take it to the principal. That dignitary informed the young man that he would be taken on probation.

For several weeks the supposedly unimpressionable head of the music department gave Hayes invaluable coaching for his second test—a striking parallel to the assistance rendered Walther by Hans Sachs. Then the singer received a summons to appear before the entire faculty and the assembled student body. He sang "Beyond the Gates of Paradise." This time he conquered all reserve, as he could see and hear from faculty and student body. The gate swung in to him, for he became a regular student. Wagner's Walther, in winning Eva with his song, knew no greater joy.

R. L. H.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

WITH OTHER ENSEMBLES

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, last week, Serge Koussevitzky played for the first time in this country an orchestral score by a composer from the Parisian group, "La Jeune France." This composition was "Les Offrandes Oubliées," by Olivier Messiaen. The work was played last June in Paris at the first concert of the group, which in addition to Messaien includes three other composers: Daniel-Lesur, André Jolivet and Yves Baudrier. Mr. Koussevitzky happened to attend this inaugural concert in Paris and considered the music he heard by the group the most striking and interesting emanating from Paris today. He said he was amazed to find that these young Frenchmen broke away from the general course embraced for the past twenty-five years by the younger generation and found inspiration instead from the earlier source, the pure evolution to be traced from Bach to Wagner.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

OCT 21 1936

Bost a Programs.

In commemoration of the double anniversary of Liszt's birth and death the Boston Symphony in its regular programs this week Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will feature the composer's "Faust" Symphony in which the Harvard Glee Club and Rulon Robison, tenor, will assist. The symphony will be preceded by Wagner's colorful "Faust" Overture.

The Monday evening supplementary series by the orchestra opened this week with a large attendance.

MUSIC

By G. Y. Loveridge

Splendid Performance of Liszt's "Faust" Symphony Given by Boston Symphony Orchestra, Harvard Singers, Led by Dr. Koussevitzky

As individuals and as a band, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night displayed its unexcelled abilities in a memorable concert in Metropolitan Theatre. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The Harvard Glee Club and Rulon Y. Robison, tenor soloist, took part.

It was a social as well as a musical event. Furs, jewels and other finery made the audience a bright spectacle, and the streets were cluttered with the customary limousines and taxicabs. There was a good-sized and cordial audience, but there were likewise many vacant places. Twenty-five thousand persons will gather to see Penn trample Brown, but when Mozart and Liszt make first down for art and civilization, there are still some seats left among 3400. Even one of the best orchestras in the world, with the Harvard Glee Club thrown in, cannot alter that.

The program comprized Mozart's Symphony in A major and Liszt's Faust Symphony. A contrast there, indeed. Mozart's symphony was composed when he was but 18. Liszt's when he was more than 40. Mozart contents himself with strings, two oboes and two horns. Liszt calls upon the great modern orchestra, with chorus besides.

It might be thought that Mozart would fare poorly against such competition, but not so. At least, it did not seem so to those of us musical cave-dwellers who still like Mozart. Under Dr. Koussevitzky's graceful and compelling hands, the symphony took shape as something exquisite and rare, the sometimes gay and sometimes languorous creation of a boy who did not know that already half his life was done, or that he was an immortal. After writing that line, we pause to consider how distressed we should be if somebody were to show, presently, that Mozart didn't compose the symphony. Such things have happened. But no, it must have been Mozart. Nobody else had such ease and artful artlessness.

Here one heard to finest advantage the orchestra's famed strings, brilliant, mellow or spirited as Dr. Koussevitzky desired, showing the most exact shadings and dynamic refinements. We had rather watch such bowing than watch the West Point cadets march. And as for the fingering, even the trills were perfectly matched and executed.

This was a work that did not burden the hearer with evidence of deep thought or strivings of the soul. It was like a flower in a storm compared to some of what was to follow.

Lizst's Faust symphony, although considered one of his best works, is seldom played. The current popularity of it is due to a double anniversary this year, the 125th of his birth and the 50th of his death.

The symphony proved of strong interest. Although more than an hour was required to perform it, and there were passages that seemed dull and digressive, it held the earnest attention of the audience. The Faust legend, which has prompted creative efforts by so many writers, musicians and painters, plainly had stirred Liszt sincerely. Dr. Koussevitzky, coaxing his men, lashing them into a tonal fury, smiling, scowling, wrung from this score every drop of meaning, it seemed. For different persons there are different meanings. Liszt has merely designated the three "character pictures" as Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles, and one must search out the qualities and significance one's self.

The numerous solo passages gave opportunity to enjoy the work of many of the orchestra's virtuosi separately. Oboe, viola, horn, the flute so often admired in the "Afternoon of a Faun," all had their individual moments and took the stage with confidence and authority. And there was a headlong pizzicatto passage for the double-basses that was admirably performed.

In the Faust movement five themes are discerned. Dr. Koussevitzky brought them out in clear statement and joined them smoothly. At the beginning of the movement one found Faust in thoughtful mood, sometimes perplexed and melancholy, brooding on the futility of his life. Then he becomes romantic (according to the oboe), and is led from one turn of mind to another, until finally there is a triumphant swing and surging in the brasses, which seems to signify some sort of triumph. Dr. Koussevitzky spun out this web with masterly hand, and dyed it with all the tone colors at his command. Precision of attack, beauty of tone, fluent technique were all in evidence. In spite of the somewhat episodic character of this movement, and the conflicting moods it evokes, Dr. Koussevitzky gave it unity and solid impact.

The Gretchen movement, built upon two songful themes, was performed with the same consistent artistry. The Gretchen revealed in this movement, as has been discovered and announced a long time ago, is the innocent and lovely girl of Faust's early acquaintance, and does not depict her in the prison phase of her existence. Again one heard the oboe at its best.

In the final movement, devoted to Mephistopheles, the themes associated with Faust are burlesqued and battered about from one section of the orchestra to another. The strings that had sung so pleasantly now growl and whine. Faust is mocked at every turn, and only now and then do the unchanged themes of the Gretchen movement lighten, and emphasize the gloom.

The chorus and Mr. Robison singing with the orchestra, brought the piece to a solemn impressive hopeful conclusion. The young men sang earnestly and feelingly, with commendable diction, and Mr. Robison's fine tenor, floating above the orchestral accompaniment, was truly moving. Only once was there evidence of the strain occasioned by singing the difficult part.

Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled several times by insistent applause, which he shared with soloist, orchestra and chorus.

Between the two symphonies, Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe spoke briefly about the festival of Brahms chamber music to take place next month in the School of Design Museum.

Favorable Beginning Of Monday Concerts

If the concert in Symphony Hall last evening represented a true sample of what is to come, listeners may look forward to musical enjoyment of a decidedly substantial character in the remaining programs of the Monday series just begun. Program, audience, conductor and performance all seemed to express a new solidity and confidence. The applause which greeted Dr. Koussevitzky grew from a gratifying cordiality to open enthusiasm. Just before intermission, the conductor was thrice recalled to the stage and the players were brought to their feet in acknowledgment of a long period of clapping.

The program repeated the substance and pattern of the season's regular concerts a week ago Friday, with the important exception of the substitution of the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius for the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven. Since many consider Sibelius to be the Beethoven of today, there was no change in balance. The other two pieces were, as before, Haydn's Symphony in B-flat, ninth of the London series, and Debussy's "La Mer."

By comparison with later alertness, the first three movements of Haydn's Symphony seemed almost too facile, even casual. Dr. Koussevitzky emphasized the mysterious character of the introductory largo and the undulating languidness of the adagio. Otherwise, these earlier movements appeared merely as necessary preparation for the alternating piquancy and forcefulness, the sudden sharp thrusts, the unexpected fleetness and humorous touches of the finale. At the close, one felt a sense of pleasure upon renewing acquaintance with music of Haydn which has a freshness seemingly lacking in the more familiar symphonies.

Dr. Koussevitzky transmitted the symphony of Sibelius with the understanding and conviction which he has gained through a long and ardent pioneer service in bringing the music of this composer to the attention of the American public. In virtuosity, however, the orchestra excelled in the three orchestral sketches of Debussy. The performance here, revealed a depth of senusuos imagery—almost a third dimension in sound—which is much less characteristic of Debussy's other compositions, and brought the most enthusiastic applause of the evening.

N. M. J.

36.

Symphony Gives Faust Legend

Trav. Oct. 23/36

By WILLIAM T. CHASE, Jr.

The Faust legend occupied the en-tire third program of the Bosto Symphony orchestra. Dr. Serg Koussevitzky conducting, in Symphony Hall yesterday afteroon. Th program consisted of Wagner's "A Faust Overture" and Liszt's "A Faus Symphony in Three Character Pictures" (after Goethe). Assisting with the symphony were the Harvard Glee Club (G. Wallace Woodworth), conductor) and Rulon Y Robison, tenor soloist. For obviou reasons the "Faust" of Goethe' poem appealed to a number of grea composers and the subject attracte the imagination of both Liszt an his son-in-law, Richard Wagne along with Berlioz, Schumann an others. Wagner revised his overture within three months' of Liszt' completion of the symphony, thu making their inclusion on the sam program the more appropriate.

The real reason for the performance of the symphony, however was the fact that Thursday, Oct. 22 marked the 125th anniversary o Liszt's birth and the past summe the 50th anniversary of his death Thus the occasion was in the natur of a double remembrance. With this in mind Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave of their very best permitting us to hear exciting and beautiful interpretations of the two works. Liszt's "A Faust Symphony," had not been played here since 1932 The program was given without the customary intermission as the symphony lasted for an hour and 20 o 25 minutes. A page or perhaps a little more was cut, and that was all

Strictly speaking, the Liszt composition was not a symphony, being rather three portraits respectivel of "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles." To a certain degree, too, it revealed some of the composer's characteristics, for a Ernest Newman pointed out in hi study of "The Man Liszt," "There is no musician whose music so closely resembles his life, and whose life is so manifestly his music made flesh, as Liszt." In him, as Schering says, there was a constant oscillation between "the religious," "the idyllic," "the heroic" and "the erotic."

And that realization, more than anything else, led Raabe to write that "the brooding protagonist whom he has drawn with such uncanny certainty in this first movement, the ardent lover, the aspirant towards the ideal, who again and again sinks back into darkness when victory seems at hard, is Liszt himself." And later on: "And who has ever known better than Liszt that there is a power that falsifies and disintegrates everything that is great and noble? So he shows us, in the Methistopheles finale, the themes of the Faust movement in a horrible distortion. Not only the first but the second and third movements are thus pictures of the Faust that was in the soul of Liszt."

Yesterday the Mephistopheles movement brought out all the "milagnant growls, the sulphurous vapors" of the score and seemed the most interesting to listen to; this in spite of the lovely simplicity of the Gretchen movement with its charming woodwind duet. The Harvard Glee Club sang the closing measures with great effectivenes and Mr. Robison's voice conveyed th rather mystical qualities of the line admirably. Certainly the ovation a the close was fully deserved. Wag ner's "A Faust Overture" was equal well set forth. This concert will b repeated tonight.

HERALD

FTH BROADCAST SERI OR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Schedule of 21 Concerts On Thursdays Starts on November 19

ROOSEVELT TODAY

By The Associated Press

New York, Oct. 23. — For the fifth season, the Boston symphony orchestra is to be heard in a broadcast series beginning Nov. 19. Altogether the schedule calls for 21 concerts, all but three of which are for Thursday nighths. The exceptions are Thursday matinee programs.

37.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

OCT 24 1936

The New Records

Koussevitzky's 'Unfinished'—A Valuable Book on Recording—Lighter Matters.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

Although the record buyer previously had his choice of eleven versions of Schubert's "Unfinished," Victor this month places a twelfth in the catalogues. To a list of conductors already including the names of Stokowski, Wood, Kleiber, Sokoloff, Schalk, Von Schillings, Melichar, Blech, Pruewer and Goossens is now added Serge Koussevitzky's. The orchestra, of course, is the Boston Symphony.

It was to be expected that the recording would give this version precedence over any of the existing ones, and, with slight reservations, that expectation has been fulfilled. Those who had regarded with trepidation the possible effects of Koussevitzky's personality on the simplicity of the music may be relieved to learn that the interpretation is individual without being eccentric. It is scarcely so overwhelming a conception as his performance of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony; however, we are also spared the distortions that marred the Mozart G minor.

Dramatic Schubert.

It has been the conductor's choice to emphasize the drama in the contrasting characters of the first and second themes of the first movement, but he has done so within the limits of reason and good taste. There will be some who would prefer a greater freedom and flow in the statement of the second theme; however, Mr. Koussevitzky's restraint is preferable to the too loving touch generally bestowed on this motive. The pace throughout is brisker than conventional, but consistent with the conductor's conception.

Fine clarity and excellent tone are the particular virtues of the recording. Unfortunately the first (and important) entrance of the oboe has been poorly handled, and the final chords of the allegro reverberate too plainly through the hall. These are minor blemishes, however. By reason of Mr. Koussevitzky's animated tempo, and by compressing nearly five minutes of recording onto the second side of the first record, Victor has been able to present the whole of the opening movement on one disk. This not only spares the listener an additional interruption, but permits the odd side of the final record to be used for the G major ballet music from "Rosamunde," beautifully played.

What They're Selling.

Center Music Shop—

"Easy to Love"	V
"You Came to My Rescue"	B

Gramophone Shop—

"Easy to Love"	B
"De-Lovely"	V

Haynes-Griffin—

"De-Lovely"	V
"Easy to Love"	B

New York Band—

"Pennies From Heaven"	V
"I Can't Escape From You"	D

Performances are appraised in this column purely on a basis of phonographic reproduction, without regard to concert hall achievements of the artists. These records were played on an RCA-Victor combination, and Burmese Color Needles were used. The editor welcomes queries on records, machines, needles, or accessories.

All About Recording.

Pure chance recently put into these hands the best book yet written about the technical side of recording. The "pure chance" was its presence on the shelves of the Fifty-eighth Street Music Library, for it is written by an Englishman and bears the imprint of Ernest Benn, Ltd., of London. The author is H. Courtney Bryson, who calls his exhaustive treatise of nearly three hundred pages (with true British reserve) merely "The Gramophone Record." With the aid of one hundred and thirty-odd photographs, drawings and graphs Mr. Bryson has traced the development of recorded sound from its earliest days to the present, discoursing with rare erudition on every problem from microphone placing to best method of polishing the finished disk. Much of the discussion is necessarily in the scientific jargon of the craft, but the basic information is available to any one of reasonable patience. Certainly it will be enormously illuminating to persons with a curiosity about recording technic and contribute much to an understanding of the medium's problems. Perhaps he will be encouraged to write a similar volume on reproducing instruments.

Lighter Matters.

Another effort to exploit the current enthusiasm for the now legendary Bix Beiderbecke is represented in the re-issue of Paul Whiteman's several-years-old recording of "Washboard Blues" (Victor 36186). This is labeled as "featuring Bix Beiderbecke," but it consists almost wholly of a lengthy monologue by Hoagy Carmichael, with little orchestral playing of any sort and even less of Beiderbecke. On the reverse you may hear Bing Crosby of pre-Hollywood days in "High Water," a pseudo Negro spiritual. It's really not much fun.

Much more listenable is another of the Red Norvo-Mildred Bailey couplings (Brunswick 7744), this one "A Porter's Love Song to a Chambermaid." The lyric pokes some excellent fun at all the imitators of Gilbert's "Thou the willow, I the stream," ably abetted by Miss Bailey's lusty vocalizing. It is backed by a breathless careen through "I Know That You Know" with Red's dazzling xylophone in the lead. No vocal on this one.

DEMOCRAT

[illegible]

OCT 22 1936

Lawrence Tibbett To Open Rutgers Concert Program.

Lawrence Tibbett, baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company and star of concert stage and screen, will open the Rutgers University Concert Course this year, with a program of concert music in the Rutgers Gymnasium, on Friday evening, October 30.

A number of local music lovers are expected to attend the concert.

Other guest artists who will appear in the Rutgers series this year are Dalies Franz, pianist, and Helen Jepson, prima donna with the Metropolitan, December 8; Ethel Bartlett and Rae Robertson, pianists, January 14; the Vienna Choir Boys, February 25; and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, March 30.

Mr. Tibbett is one of the finest artists ever to appear in the Rutgers Concert Course. As star of the Metropolitan Opera, he has played with equal success the leading male role in Aida, Tosca, Traviata, Die Meistersinger and Pagliacci.

On the screen he has scored hits in the Rogue Song, The Pagan Love Song and Metropolitan.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

OCT 23 1936

Hoffman to Conduct For Houston Concert

Special to The News.

HOUSTON, Texas, Oct. 22.—Ernst Hoffman, formerly of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged the opening program of the Houston Symphony Orchestra, to be given Nov. 9, and will conduct at that time. Tito Schipa, tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will be guest artist.

DURHAM, N. C.
SUN

OCT 23 1936

YORK, Oct. 23.—(AP)—For the fifth season, the Boston symphony orchestra is to be heard in a broadcast series beginning Nov. 19. Altogether the schedule calls for 21 concerts, all but three of which are for Thursday nights. The exceptions are Thursday matinee programs.

RDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1936

Honor Liszt At Friday Symphony

By RUTH MARSTERS

An eminently satisfactory performance of Liszt's "Faust Symphony" at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky yesterday afternoon, roused the usual large Symphony audience to clamorous approval.

The Harvard Glee Club (G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor) contributed its best efforts in the performance of the final Andante mistico.

Rulon Robison, singing the tenor solo, gave a beautiful performance. It was one distinguished by a sensitive musicanship—the skillful control of a voice that while not exceptionally large is of rare quality.

* * *

The program was designed in commemoration of the 125th anniversary of Liszt's birth and also memorialized the 50th anniversary of his death. (Liszt was born at Raiding, Hungary, on October 22, 1811, and died at Bayreuth July 31, 1886.)

Wagner's "Faust Overture" was performed as the opening work.

Liszt's close association with Wagner, the fact that the two "Faust" works were produced at practically the same time and that Wagner's Overture in its present state is the result of revisions made at the instigation of Liszt, made the choice of the opening work particularly apt.

The larger work of Liszt, formally titled "A Faust Symphony in Three Character Pictures (after Goethe)" in addition to being the more ambitious work, is the more important in every aspect.

* * *

The first of the three pictures, "Faust," is written: Lento assai, Allegro impetusso, and Allegro agitatoed appassionato assai—depicting the character in romantic, philosophic, and strident mood, while a gloom foreboding of evil is subtly introduced.

The second, "Gretchen," Andante soave, contains music of beauty and tenderness though the movement is a little long.

The Allegro vivace ironico of the "Mephistopheles" picture is a clever piece of writing. No new themes are introduced but the Faust theme is twisted and distorted for the most diabolical affect imaginable. The last Andante mistico, in which the male chorus is introduced, is solemnly beautiful exalting the "eternal feminine."

Liszt's "transformation of themes" idea, which he used instead of thematic development, is particularly well suited to music of a descriptive character. Certainly Liszt's is one of the most successful musical depictions of the characters so variously immortalized.

—VOTE AMERICAN—

Resident Artists Will Be Heard Here

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

EXPLAIN it how you will, the fact remains that it has been far easier for the resident composer to obtain a hearing at Symphony Hall than for the resident performer to appear as soloist at the Symphony Concerts, particularly at those of the regular series. This year, however, two Bostonians are to be featured as assisting artists at the concerts of Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, one the violinist, Ruth Posselt, the other the pianist, Howard Goding. Miss Posselt, who made her debut in recital at Symphony Hall as a child prodigy, and who has played at a Monday evening Symphony Concert, will be heard at the end of this week in the Concerto of Dvorak.

By a curious coincidence, if coincidence it is, when Gregor Piatgorsky, the Russian 'cellist, already an established favorite in Boston, plays with the orchestra later in the year his piece will be Dvorak's 'cello concerto. Two pieces by Dvorak in a single Boston Symphony season—or the performance of any piece other than the "New World" Symphony—is a matter for comment in these later days, in which the Bohemian composer's music has fallen from its position of popularity. In some instances the conductorial thumbs have been turned down too soon, and perhaps Dvorak's is a case in point.

What's G

[illegible] Oct. 24/36

Boston Symphony Orchestra

AN EMOTIONAL afternoon was provided by the third Friday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was made up of Wagner's "Faust Overture" and the "Faust Symphony" of Liszt. The occasion was the one hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of Liszt's birth and the fiftieth of his passing. The orchestra was assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, of which G. Wallace Woodworth is conductor, and by Rulon Y. Robison as tenor soloist.

The choice of works was appropriate. This symphony is acknowledged, even by his enemies, as one of Liszt's greatest works, probably his greatest. And the "Faust Overture" recalls the close relationship of the two composers and the importance of the influence of Liszt upon Wagner. The "Faust" theme is well suited to the temperaments of both men.

A vast deal of ink and temper has been expended upon the question of Liszt's place in the history of music. There is no question of the greatness of his gift to music, even though this gift was received by the world mainly through Wagner. There is grave question of his taste; or rather it would be more accurate to say that he was distressingly wanting in taste. He was one of the prophets of a tasteless age, the age of Byron and of Berlioz, an age of posing and of romantic frenzies.

Liszt was one of the leading showmen of the time. A great virtuoso as well as a romantic sensualist, he had the world at his feet. He was unfortunately not big enough to withstand the adulation of the fashionable crowd. He was too often content with tawdry effects and easy victories, in composition as well as in piano playing.

The worst of his defects are evident in the first and the last movements of this symphony. The last one, which attempts to be diabolically ironic at the expense of the first, is no funnier today than the thing it parodies. It is difficult to say which is most absurd, the posturings of Faust, the snarling of Mephistopheles or the apothesis. The best music of the symphony is in the second movement where Liszt forgot his public and wrote some sincere and lovely measures. It is a pity that these constitute only an interlude.

There is a well-sponsored movement in England today to revive the reputations of Liszt and of Berlioz. Prominent musicians and critics there contend that these composers have been badly underrated of late years because of their faults. Perhaps we shall have more to say on this problem on a later occasion.

Dr. Koussevitzky strove with energy and devotion to present the music at hand in the best light. The orchestra returned him a superb performance, and he must have been grateful too for the support lent by the glee club and by Mr. Robison.

L. A. S.

HANOVER, PA.
SUN

OCT 23 1936

DIAL TWISTS

Boston Symphony Radio Plans

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, will be heard on the air twelve times during the coming season over the National Broadcasting Company's blue network, beginning Thursday evening, November 19. Four of the concerts will be broadcast here from Carnegie Hall; three from Saunders Theater, Cambridge, Mass.; one from the Brooklyn Academy of Music, and three from Symphony Hall in Boston. Except for the three programs played in Boston, all these broadcasts will be Thursday nights. Nine concerts of the orchestra's spring "Pop" series will also be broadcast on Thursday evenings.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
Oct. 24/36 POST

BOSTON SYMPHONY RETURNS

The Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will return to the WJZ network for its fifth consecutive season Nov. 19 at 8:30 p. m. The "Pop" Concerts will be heard every Thursday, at that hour, instead of Saturday nights this winter.

Symphony Gives Faust Legend

By WILLIAM T. CHASE, Jr.

The Faust legend occupied the entire third program of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, in Symphony Hall yesterday afteroon. The program consisted of Wagner's "A Faust Overture" and Liszt's "A Faust Symphony in Three Character Pictures" (after Goethe). Assisting with the symphony were the Harvard Glee Club (G. Wallace Woodworth), conductor) and Rulon Y. Robison, tenor soloist. For obvious reasons the "Faust" of Goethe's poem appealed to a number of great composers and the subject attracted the imagination of both Liszt and his son-in-law, Richard Wagner, along with Berlioz, Schumann and others. Wagner revised his overture within three months' of Liszt's completion of the symphony, thus making their inclusion on the same program the more appropriate.

The real reason for the performance of the symphony, however, was the fact that Thursday, Oct. 22, marked the 125th anniversary of Liszt's birth and the past summer the 50th anniversary of his death. Thus the occasion was in the nature of a double remembrance: With this in mind Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave of their very best, permitting us to hear exciting and beautiful interpretations of the two works. Liszt's "A Faust Symphony," had not been played here since 1932. The program was given without the customary intermission as the symphony lasted for an hour and 20 or 25 minutes. A page or perhaps a little more was cut, and that was all.

Strictly speaking, the Liszt composition was not a symphony, being rather three portraits respectively of "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles." To a certain degree, too, it revealed some of the composer's characteristics, for as Ernest Newman pointed out in his study of "The Man Liszt," "There is no musician whose music so closely resembles his life, and whose life is so manifestly his music made flesh, as Liszt." In him, as Schering says, there was a constant oscillation between "the religious," "the idyllic," "the heroic" and "the erotic."

And that realization, more than anything else, led Raabe to write that "the brooding protagonist whom he has drawn with such uncanny certainty in this first movement, the ardent lover, the aspirant towards the ideal, who again and again sinks back into darkness when victory seems at hand, is Liszt himself." And later on: "And who has ever known better than Liszt that there is a power that falsifies and disintegrates everything that is great and noble? So he shows us, in the Methistopheles finale, the themes of the Faust movement in a horrible distortion. Not only the first but the second and third movements are thus pictures of the Faust that was in the soul of Liszt."

Yesterday the Mephistopheles movement brought out all the "milagnant growls, the sulphurous vapors" of the score and seemed the most interesting to listen to: this in spite of the lovely simplicity of the Gretchen movement with its charming woodwind duet. The Harvard Glee Club sang the closing measures with great effectiveness and Mr. Robison's voice conveyed the rather mystical qualities of the lines admirably. Certainly the ovation at the close was fully deserved. Wagner's "A Faust Overture" was equally well set forth. This concert will be repeated tonight.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the fourth program of its regular series in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Serge Koussetitzky will then give the first Boston performance of the orchestral suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fairy's Kiss." This music from the ballet of 1928 was performed, it will be remembered, by this orchestra in Sanders theater, Cambridge, under the direction of the composer when he visited this country two seasons ago. The ballet bears the subtitle—"Inspired by the muse of Tchaikovsky," and Stravinsky uses themes from Tchaikovsky to his own purposes.

Ruth Posselt will appear as soloist with the orchestra in the violin concerto of Dvorak, which has not been heard at these concerts for a number of years. Miss Posselt, who was born in Medford, Mass., made her first public appearances when she was still a child. In recent seasons, she has given concerts in many parts of Europe, appearing with the principal orchestras in Paris and Amsterdam. She has also appeared with the orchestras of Chicago and Detroit, as well as with this orchestra (in the Monday evening series). The closing number will be Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor.

Liszt Anniversaries

Symphonic Matinee to Honor A Composer Now Neglected

Engrossing Performance by Koussevitzky and Boston Orchestra; Wagner for Prelude

By Moses Smith

The music world has become temporarily Liszt-conscious because of the coincidence of the double anniversary this year: It is fifty years since Liszt died, 125 years since he was born. In contrast, for the better part of a quarter of a century his music has steadily fallen out of the symphonic repertory because, in the minds of those who determine our programs, the composer of numerous rhapsodies and symphonic poems had "dated."

Those who believe that the music of a neglected composer is not yet dead have nowadays the solace of looking forward to anniversaries. For as studious as contemporary program-makers are to allow a given composer to pass into forgetfulness, equally certain are they to perk up at the mention of a centennial celebration and hasten to prepare a memorial performance of that composer's work. A Faure has already passed into such a category; a d'Indy is probably approaching it; and Ravel's turn, very likely, will come next.

* * *

In selecting Liszt's "Faust" Symphony for performance at this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky was no doubt motivated by such considerations. But the choice was dictated by more. For without the promptings of a specific occasion he had already produced the "Faust" Symphony at two pairs of concerts during his Boston tenure. And not much more than a year ago he directed a performance of the work at a concert of the B. B. C. Orchestra in London.

Clearly the production was as well a labor of love on his part. The caliber of yesterday's performance in Symphony Hall was evidence toward this conclusion. From start to finish the music-making, under the alert, insistent and impassioned direction of the conductor, was taut or plastic, vigorous or gentle, rude or poetic, according to the requirements of the composer. Not for a moment did the conductor lapse into mere routine. And so far as he could vouchsafe, there was not a dull moment in the performance.

The orchestral playing was of the quality disclosed at last week's concerts—which is high praise. The Harvard Glee Club, trained by its own conductor, G. Wallace Woodworth, sang well the music alloted them in the third movement, though on occasion the young voices were strained to produce a volume that more experienced vocalists could have yielded readily. Rulon Y. Robison, the tenor chosen for the solo in that same movement, sang the difficult part conscientiously and intelligently; but his vocal resources, at best, were not enough.

With a slight reservation, then, the "Faust" Symphony was heard yesterday under most favoring circumstances. If the listener found the score something less than an unalloyed masterpiece, the fault was clearly Liszt's. Yesterday I found myself doubting the validity of a passage that on previous hearing had been compelling. A section that on another occasion had been exciting now seemed to contain little but the fustian of some of the less worthy of Liszt's symphonic poems.

* * *

The most interesting thing, for the present writer, was that yesterday's performance resulted in a re-allocation of values. In the past I have found the savage, ironic music of the first part of the last movement the best of the Symphony. It still possessed bite yesterday, much of it, at least. But some of the cavortings of this Mephistopheles began to look stagey. The Lisztian irony was evidently taking itself seriously.

The Gretchen music in the second part, on the other hand, music which has often seemed pallid in the past, took on substance yesterday (perhaps because of the beautiful, not over-sentimentalized performance). The dictum of Newman on the subject, quoted in the program-book of these concerts, furnished a pithy summary for this point of view: "Almost the whole Margaret is there, with her curious blend of sweetness, timidity and passion; while Faust's interpositions are exceedingly noble."

There are some beautiful passages in the Faust sketch that constitutes the opening movement. But there are some cheap ones, too. The content is not only mixed but it is also too heavy. The movement is too long for its substance. It has the dimensions of the B minor Piano Sonata, but not the same proportions, somehow. Yet it contains some of the best of Liszt's music. Whether it is really Liszt's or Wagner's is the subject of a considerable discourse in the current program-book. I vote for Liszt. But it is only a guess.

The most remarkable resemblance to Wagner, probably, is the cadences leading to the slow section of the finale. The likeness is so startling, on each hearing, that it seems one has but to look up at the stage to see Wotan and Brunnhilde preparing for their farewell at the end of "Die Walkure." And at the end of the Symphony one hears "Parsifal." What have the Wagnerians to say here?

A good deal has been made of the dualism of this Symphony and its parallel with the character of Liszt himself. The point was stressed in an article printed in these columns on Thursday and is emphasized in the program book. The parallel was, of course, apparent again at yesterday's performance. But this time the kindly, sentimental Liszt seemed to excel his satirical half.

* * *

The concert began appropriately, perhaps, with Wagner's "Faust" Overture. At least, the literary program was carried out consistently. The Overture is still an astonishing work, whether or not it is a masterpiece. It was presented by conductor and orchestra yesterday with remarkable conviction and intensity.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

OCT

The Boston Symphony orchestra will open the series of concerts in the Springfield auditorium on November 10. Serge Koussevitsky will conduct the orchestra. This series of concerts which is given by the Community Concert association of Springfield, is sponsored by the Springfield Junior league.

Of particular interest on this opening program is the Mozart Symphony in A Major, No. 29, which will open the concert. At a recent program by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Symphony hall in Boston, this work was played in this country for the first time and received the enthusiastic comment of the critics. This ancient, but little known work will thus have its second American performance before the Springfield audience.

Also of interest will be the 2nd Symphony of Brahm which will bring the concert to a close. Of the four symphonies of the great German composer the second is one of the most melodious. It has not been played in Springfield or nearby places in several years.

Richard Strauss, German composer who has for many years been the subject for critical comment, will be represented by an early tone poem, Don Juan. Gabriel Faure, 19th century French composer, will be represented by an "Eligie" for a cello solo and orchestra. There has been a particular call for a cello player and the Elegie is the finest thing of its kind for this special attraction on the program.

The complete program is losted as follows:

Mozart—Symphony in A major No. 29
Faure—"Eligie" for violoncello and orchestra
Strauss—"Don Juan," Tone Poem (after Lenau), Op. 20
Intermission
Brahm—Second Symphony
Soloist, Jean Bedetti

COURIER

REALM OF MUSIC

by Gladys St. Clair Heistad

One of the most fascinating books I have seen came to me last week—bearing the title of "Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1936," it consists of charcoal drawings and biographical sketches of the members, by Gerome Brush. It was printed by The Merrymount Press, Boston, and is most certainly a work of art. Edward Weeks in appreciation says: "It is well occasionally to be reminded of the design with which Mr. Henry Lee Higginson founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His plans of 1831 called for an orchestra of seventy selected musicians; for concerts which should be short rather than long, and for a conductor who 'was to have the sole artistic direction of everything.' His ideas were so good that they grew: the orchestra today is half again as big as the original, it has survived the threat of war, strikes, and hard times.

Mr. Gerome Brush has performed a public service. He has singled out the black and white keys of one of the greatest instruments in the world. With the strokes of his crayon and the sympathy of his pen he has brought to light the individuality of the 109 members of the Boston Symphony. Each musician sat for him in the little room that houses the Casadesus Collection; each played for him a solo in order to banish the last vestige of self-consciousness, and from each he has drawn comments, bits of personal history, and the gleam of aspirations which are characteristic . . . These men have not lived in ivory towers. Many of them are veterans of the World War; a smaller handful escaped from the disruption of the Russian Revolution; others are, if you like, voluntary absentees from dictatorship. Is not this harmony of 109 musicians singularly representative of our democracy as we should like to keep it? The citizen by adoption, and the home-bred artist have joined forces and, under leadership as nearly 'permanent' as Major Higginson could have wished, are making music that is history.

* * * *

The sketches are done in such a fascinating way, too, that I wish space permitted giving several verbatim. It can't be done of course, but here is that of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor:

"Ruskin gave architecture seven lamps. The lamps of orchestral music, however, are numbered by the few great conductors living at the time. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is one of the greatest of these lamps. When he stands before his orchestra, everyone seems to reflect the everburning light of his personality. The dress suit that fits so perfectly across the shoulder, the bent left elbow, the bird-like alertness, the Niagara crescendos—everybody liked him. He has been here for twelve years—everybody loves him."

* * * *

All through the book are bits like this—speaking of Eugene Adam, tuba player—"he has the presence—that bright, undisillusioned look—of a Boutet de Monvel French schoolboy. His friends make fun of him because of his slow movement and speech, but they don't seem to realize that he is a classic statue. When he plays the tuba, he spreads a beautiful thick, velvet carpet of sound, upon which the higher notes dance." Of Minot Alfred Beale, born in Rockland, Mass.,—"this does not imply that he can hoe a row of corn as well as he can 'hoe it down' on the violin, but he does like country places, and sunrises, and baked beans on Sunday mornings. If he is not playing the violin, give him a fountain pen or a sharp pencil and he can fix up a tune for any instrument or number of instruments." Of Jean Bedetti, violoncellist, "he does not put on his pajamas and tuck himself in bed until his 'cello has been properly put away." Of Richard Burgin, concert master: "At the age of twelve he was soloist before a glittering and critical Russian audience. By them he was considered the 'boy wonder'; by himself, the 'wondering boy.'

* * * *

If any of the readers of this column has a special "pet" in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, let me know, and I'll tell you what Gerome Brush has to say of him.

* * * *

One of the finest musical attractions in this part of Maine will be the offering by the Eastern Maine Music Festival in Bangor Oct. 29—the Russian Symphonic Choir. Basile Kibalchich, conductor of the Choir, has a long musical history of illustrious achievements behind him. He was born in Tchernigoff in southern Russia, in the center of the region rich in folklore, folk-song and choral singing. He showed musical talent at an early age, and when only 12 was called upon to lead a vocal choir of large numbers. Later he studied in the class of Rimsky-Korsakov, and perfected himself in cello, although choral conducting still occupied his mind. In 1906 he was invited to lead the most famous of Russia's choral organizations, the Archangel Sky Choir of Petrograd.

Six years later he made a two years' tour to Russia as conductor of the choir of the Petrograd Conservatory of Music, thus gaining a national reputation. In 1912 Mr. Kibalchich accepted the position as choir conductor of the Russian cathedral of Geneva, Switzerland, and soon after became choir conductor of the Russian cathedral in Paris. It was at this period of his life that he organized the first Russian symphonic choir, so called because he built it on the same lines as a symphony orchestra. His present choir represents his supreme achievement in applying his principles of choral singing. The voices are used like so many wind instruments, and the singing of the chorus resemble some ideal sort of organ whose widely varied qualities he attends to with an exquisite delicacy of registration.

The Choir consists of nine men and nine women, and they appear in colorful Russian costume.

From the pen of Mrs. Alice Strong of Medford Hillside, a consistent reader of this column, comes these charming lines:

CLARKSBURG, W. VA.
TELEGRAM

In pre-war days Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was both conductor and financial backer of his own symphony orchestra in Russia.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

OCT 27 1936

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in the first of its five concerts in Providence tonight at the Metropolitan Theater, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

MUSIC 38

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The third regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Rulon Y. Robison, tenor, and the Harvard Glee Club assisted in the final chorus of the Liszt symphony. The program was as follows:

Wagner................A Faust Overture
Liszt................A Faust Symphony

Hardly a composer of the middle 19th century failed to be inspired by Goethe's "Faust" to some definite and usually important act of creation. It is curious they almost all left the second part of "Faust" untouched. Liszt, as an afterthought, used the final lines for his symphony. Schumann was the only one to take passages from the second part and weave them into a great musical work. This is the more strange in that one would think that the greater poetry and far-flung imagination of the second part would have appealed to the romantic composers. Schumann's oratorio is never performed, perhaps because of the number of soloists that are reuireqd; and yet there are some to say that it is a masterpiece and the finest music to be inspired by Goethe's "Faust."

Liszt's work has not earned respect easily, because there are always those who are mentally convinced that a virtuoso pianist can not be a great composer. That Bach, Mozart, Beethoven and others were virtuosos of the keyboard does not seem to occur to them. It is also true that we hear far too much of Liszt's lesser pieces and too little of his good piano and orchestral music. There will not be many to deny the beautiful and remarkable pages in the score of the Faust symphony after listening to it yesterday. The best counsel in discussing this work lies in Pope's lines:

"Survey the whole, nor seek slight faults to find,
Where nature moves and rapture
warms the mind."

Such advice is excellent, no doubt, but it is hard to apply it conscientiously during the whole of the hour and twenty minutes that the Faust symphony requires in performance. Dr. Koussevitzky cut a couple of pages in the first movement, pages that were merely repetitions of what had been completely stated before. If there is one large fault with this work it is surely just this, that it is excessively repetitious. Over and over again we hear the themes sounded, so that the Mephistopheles movement is not only an intentionally ingenious, but sometimes a hollow mockery.

Most critics, and among them Philip Hale, find the Gretchen movement to be the crowning glory of the symphony. Yet for us its sustained, idyllic mood palls before Liszt has finished with it. In addition, Dr. Koussevitzky chose to take a very slow tempo, one that was actually dragging. Otherwise the performance was excellent. The brilliant Mephistopheles movement was given a superb interpretation. brought out the dmaratic quality of brought out the dramatic uality of the movement to perfection. Mr. Robison sang the high tenor solo of the finale admirably. The Harvard Glee Club did its part most capably. Since this was a Liszt anniversary and not a commemoration of "Faust," some other work of his might possibly have been offered. As it was we heard a dramatic reading of Wagner's "Faust Overture."

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Ruth Posselt will be the soloist in Dvork's violin concerto. The concert will begin with Stravinsky's excerpts from "Le Baiser de la Fee" and end with Schumann's symphony No. 4 in D minor.

NEWS

OCT 24 1936

RADIO

Day by Day

By C. E. Butterfield

New York, Oct. 24.—For the fifth season, the Boston symphony orchestra is to be heard in a broadcast series. Altogether, the schedule calls for 21 concerts, all but three of which are for Thursday nights. The exceptions are Thursday matinee programs.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct, the programs to begin November 19. The night concerts will go from 8:30 to 9:30. Last year the orchestra was presented on Saturday nights. The network is that of WJZ-NBC.

Liszt Anniversaries

Symphonic Matinee to Honor A Composer Now Neglected

Engrossing Performance by Koussevitzky and Boston Orchestra; Wagner for Prelude

Trans. Oct. 24/36

By Moses Smith

The music world has become temporarily Liszt-conscious because of the coincidence of the double anniversary this year: It is fifty years since Liszt died, 125 years since he was born. In contrast, for the better part of a quarter of a century his music has steadily fallen out of the symphonic repertory because, in the minds of those who determine our programs, the composer of numerous rhapsodies and symphonic poems had "dated."

Those who believe that the music of a neglected composer is not yet dead have nowadays the solace of looking forward to anniversaries. For as studious as contemporary program-makers are to allow a given composer to pass into forgetfulness, equally certain are they to perk up at the mention of a centennial celebration and hasten to prepare a memorial performance of that composer's work. A Faure has already passed into such a category; a d'Indy is probably approaching it; and Ravel's turn, very likely, will come next.

* * *

In selecting Liszt's "Faust" Symphony for performance at this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky was no doubt motivated by such considerations. But the choice was dictated by more. For without the promptings of a specific occasion he had already produced the "Faust" Symphony at two pairs of concerts during his Boston tenure. And not much more than a year ago he directed a performance of the work at a concert of the B. B. C. Orchestra in London.

Clearly the production was as well a labor of love on his part. The caliber of yesterday's performance in Symphony Hall was evidence toward this conclusion. From start to finish the music-making, under the alert, insistent and impassioned direction of the conductor, was taut or plastic, vigorous or gentle, rude or poetic, according to the requirements of the composer. Not for a moment did the conductor lapse into mere routine. And so far as he could vouchsafe, there was not a dull moment in the performance.

The orchestral playing was of the quality disclosed at last week's concerts—which is high praise. The Harvard Glee Club, trained by its own conductor, G. Wallace Woodworth, sang well the music alloted them in the third movement, though on occasion the young voices were strained to produce a volume that more experienced vocalists could have yielded readily. Rulon Y. Robison, the tenor chosen for the solo in that same movement, sang the difficult part conscientiously and intelligently; but his vocal resources, at best, were not enough.

With a slight reservation, then, the "Faust" Symphony was heard yesterday under most favoring circumstances. If the listener found the score something less than an unalloyed masterpiece, the fault was clearly Liszt's. Yesterday I found myself doubting the validity of a passage that on previous hearing had been compelling. A section that on another occasion had been exciting now seemed to contain little but the fustian of some of the less worthy of Liszt's symphonic poems.

* * *

The most interesting thing, for the present writer, was that yesterday's performance resulted in a re-allocation of values. In the past I have found the savage, ironic music of the first part of the last movement the best of the Symphony. It still possessed bite yesterday, much of it, at least. But some of the cavortings of this Mephistopheles began to look stagey. The Lisztian irony was evidently taking itself seriously.

The Gretchen music in the second part, on the other hand, music which has often seemed pallid in the past, took on substance yesterday (perhaps because of the beautiful, not over-sentimentalized performance). The dictum of Newman on the subject, quoted in the program-book of these concerts, furnished a pithy summary for this point of view: "Almost the whole Margaret is there, with her curious blend of sweetness, timidity and passion; while Faust's interpositions are exceedingly noble."

There are some beautiful passages in the Faust sketch that constitutes the opening movement. But there are some cheap ones, too. The content is not only mixed but it is also too heavy. The movement is too long for its substance. It has the dimensions of the B minor Piano Sonata, but not the same proportions, somehow. Yet it contains some of the best of Liszt's music. Whether it is really Liszt's or Wagner's is the subject of a considerable discourse in the current program-book. I vote for Liszt. But it is only a guess.

The most remarkable resemblance to Wagner, probably, is the cadences leading to the slow section of the finale. The likeness is so startling, on each hearing, that it seems one has but to look up at the stage to see Wotan and Brunnhilde preparing for their farewell at the end of "Die Walkure." And at the end of the Symphony one hears "Parsifal." What have the Wagnerians to say here?

A good deal has been made of the dualism of this Symphony and its parallel with the character of Liszt himself. The point was stressed in an article printed in these columns on Thursday and is emphasized in the program book. The parallel was, of course, apparent again at yesterday's performance. But this time the kindly, sentimental Liszt seemed to excel his satirical half.

* * *

The concert began appropriately, perhaps, with Wagner's "Faust" Overture. At least, the literary program was carried out consistently. The Overture is still an astonishing work, whether or not it is a masterpiece. It was presented by conductor and orchestra yesterday with remarkable conviction and intensity.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

OCT 2 2 1936

The Boston Symphony orchestra will open the series of concerts in the Springfield auditorium on November 10. Serge Koussevitsky will conduct the orchestra. This series of concerts which is given by the Community Concert association of Springfield, is sponsored by the Springfield Junior league.

Of particular interest on this opening program is the Mozart Symphony in A Major, No. 29, which will open the concert. At a recent program by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Symphony hall in Boston, this work was played in this country for the first time and received the enthusiastic comment of the critics. This ancient, but little known work will thus have its second American performance before the Springfield audience.

Also of interest will be the 2nd Symphony of Brahm which will bring the concert to a close. Of the four symphonies of the great German composer the second is one of the most melodious. It has not been played in Springfield or nearby places in several years.

Richard Strauss, German composer who has for many years been the subject for critical comment, will be represented by an early tone poem, Don Juan. Gabriel Faure, 19th century French composer, will be represented by an "Eligie" for a cello solo and orchestra. There has been a particular call for a cello player and the Elegie is the finest thing of its kind for this special attraction on the program.

The complete program is losted as follows:

Mozart—Symphony in A major No. 29
Faure—"Eligie" for violoncello and orchestra
Strauss—"Don Juan," Tone Poem (after Lenau), Op. 20
Intermission
Brahm—Second Symphony
Soloist, Jean Bedetti

COURIER
Rockland, Me
10/26/36

REALM OF MUSIC

by Gladys St. Clair Heistad

One of the most fascinating books I have seen came to me last week—bearing the title of "Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1936," it consists of charcoal drawings and biographical sketches of the members, by Gerome Brush. It was printed by The Merrymount Press, Boston, and is most certainly a work of art. Edward Weeks in appreciation says: "It is well occasionally to be reminded of the design with which Mr. Henry Lee Higginson founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His plans of 1881 called for an orchestra of seventy selected musicians; for concerts which should be short rather than long, and for a conductor who 'was to have the sole artistic direction of everything.' His ideas were so good that they grew: the orchestra today is half again as big as the original, it has survived the threat of war, strikes, and hard times.

Mr. Gerome Brush has performed a public service. He has singled out the black and white keys of one of the greatest instruments in the world. With the strokes of his crayon and the sympathy of his pen he has brought to light the individuality of the 109 members of the Boston Symphony. Each musician sat for him in the little room that houses the Casadesus Collection; each played for him a solo in order to banish the last vestige of self-consciousness, and from each he has drawn comments, bits of personal history, and the gleam of aspirations which are characteristic . . . These men have not lived in ivory towers. Many of them are veterans of the World War; a smaller handful escaped from the disruption of the Russian Revolution; others are, if you like, voluntary absentees from dictatorship. Is not this harmony of 109 musicians singularly representative of our democracy as we should like to keep it? The citizen by adoption, and the home-bred artist have joined forces and, under leadership as nearly 'permanent' as Major Higginson could have wished, are making music that is history.

* * * *

The sketches are done in such a fascinating way, too, that I wish space permitted giving several verbatim. It can't be done of course, but here is that of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor:

"Ruskin gave architecture seven lamps. The lamps of orchestral music, however, are numbered by the few great conductors living at the time. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is one of the greatest of these lamps. When he stands before his orchestra, everyone seems to reflect the everburning light of his personality. The dress suit that fits so perfectly across the shoulder, the bent left elbow, the bird-like alertness, the Niagara crescendos—everybody liked him. He has been here for twelve years—everybody loves him."

* * * *

All through the book are bits like this—speaking of Eugene Adam, tuba player—"he has the presence—that bright, undisillusioned look—of a Boutet de Monvel French schoolboy. His friends make fun of him because of his slow movement and speech, but they don't seem to realize that he is a classic statue. When he plays the tuba, he spreads a beautiful thick, velvet carpet of sound, upon which the higher notes dance." Of Minot Alfred Beale, born in Rockland, Mass.,—"this does not imply that he can hoe a row of corn as well as he can 'hoe it down' on the violin, but he does like country places, and sunrises, and baked beans on Sunday mornings. If he is not playing the violin, give him a fountain pen or a sharp pencil and he can fix up a tune for any instrument or number of instruments." Of Jean Bedetti, violoncellist, "he does not put on his pajamas and tuck himself in bed until his 'cello has been properly put away." Of Richard Burgin, concert master: "At the age of twelve he was soloist before a glittering and critical Russian audience. By them he was considered the 'boy wonder'; by himself, the 'wondering boy.'

* * * *

If any of the readers of this column has a special "pet" in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, let me know, and I'll tell you what Gerome Brush has to say of him.

* * * *

One of the finest musical attractions in this part of Maine will be the offering by the Eastern Maine Music Festival in Bangor Oct. 29—the Russian Symphonic Choir. Basile Kibalchich, conductor of the Choir, has a long musical history of illustrious achievements behind him. He was born in Tchernigoff in southern Russia, in the center of the region rich in folklore, folk-song and choral singing. He showed musical talent at an early age, and when only 12 was called upon to lead a vocal choir of large numbers. Later he studied in the class of Rimsky-Korsakov, and perfected himself in cello, although choral conducting still occupied his mind. In 1906 he was invited to lead the most famous of Russia's choral organizations, the Archangel Sky Choir of Petrograd.

Six years later he made a two years' tour to Russia as conductor of the choir of the Petrograd Conservatory of Music, thus gaining a national reputation. In 1912 Mr. Kibalchich accepted the position as choir conductor of the Russian cathedral of Geneva, Switzerland, and soon after became choir conductor of the Russian cathedral in Paris. It was at this period of his life that he organized the first Russian symphonic choir, so called because he built it on the same lines as a symphony orchestra. His present choir represents his supreme achievement in applying his principles of choral singing. The voices are used like so many wind instruments, and the singing of the chorus resemble some ideal sort of organ whose widely varied qualities he attends to with an exquisite delicacy of registration.

The Choir consists of nine men and nine women, and they appear in colorful Russian costume.

From the pen of Mrs. Alice Strong of Medford Hillside, a consistent reader of this column, comes these charming lines:

CLARKSBURG, W. VA.
Oct. TELEGRAM 26/36

In pre-war days Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was both conductor and financial backer of his own symphony orchestra in Russia.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

OCT 2 7 1936

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in the first of its five concerts in Providence tonight at the Metropolitan Theater, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

Oct. 24/36

MUSIC

38

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The third regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Rulon Y. Robison, tenor, and the Harvard Glee Club assisted in the final chorus of the Liszt symphony. The program was as follows:

Wagner..................A Faust Overture
Liszt..................A Faust Symphony

Hardly a composer of the middle 19th century failed to be inspired by Goethe's "Faust" to some definite and usually important act of creation. It is curious they almost all left the second part of "Faust" untouched. Liszt, as an afterthought, used the final lines for his symphony. Schumann was the only one to take passages from the second part and weave them into a great musical work. This is the more strange in that one would think that the greater poetry and far-flung imagination of the second part would have appealed to the romantic composers. Schumann's oratorio is never performed, perhaps because of the number of soloists that are reuireqd; and yet there are some to say that it is a masterpiece and the finest music to be inspired by Goethe's "Faust."

Liszt's work has not earned respect easily, because there are always those who are mentally convinced that a virtuoso pianist can not be a great composer. That Bach, Mozart, Beethoven and others were virtuosos of the keyboard does not seem to occur to them. It is also true that we hear far too much of Liszt's lesser pieces and too little of his good piano and orchestral music. There will not be many to deny the beautiful and remarkable pages in the score of the Faust symphony after listening to it yesterday. The best counsel in discussing this work lies in Pope's lines:

> "Survey the whole, nor seek slight > faults to find,
> Where nature moves and rapture
> warms the mind."

Such advice is excellent, no doubt, but it is hard to apply it conscientiously during the whole of the hour and twenty minutes that the Faust symphony requires in performance. Dr. Koussevitzky cut a couple of pages in the first movement, pages that were merely repetitions of what had been completely stated before. If there is one large fault with this work it is surely just this, that it is excessively repetitious. Over and over again we hear the themes sounded, so that the Mephistopheles movement is not only an intentionally ingenious, but sometimes a hollow mockery.

Most critics, and among them Philip Hale, find the Gretchen movement to be the crowning glory of the symphony. Yet for us its sustained, idyllic mood palls before Liszt has finished with it. In addition, Dr. Koussevitzky chose to take a very slow tempo, one that was actually dragging. Otherwise the performance was excellent. The brilliant Mephistopheles movement was given a superb interpretation. brought out the dmaratic quality of brought out the dramatic uality of the movement to perfection. Mr. Robison sang the high tenor solo of the finale admirably. The Harvard Glee Club did its part most capably. Since this was a Liszt anniversary and not a commemoration of "Faust," some other work of his might possibly have been offered. As it was we heard a dramatic reading of Wagner's "Faust Overture."

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Ruth Posselt will be the soloist in Dvork's violin concerto. The concert will begin with Stravinsky's excerpts from "Le Baiser de la Fee", and end with Schumann's symphony No. 4 in D minor.

NEWS
Brunswick, Me

OCT 2 4 1936

RADIO

Day by Day

By C. E. Butterfield

New York, Oct. 24.—For the fifth season, the Boston symphony orchestra is to be heard in a broadcast series. Altogether, the schedule calls for 21 concerts, all but three of which are for Thursday nights. The exceptions are Thursday matinee programs.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct, the programs to begin November 19. The night concerts will go from 8:30 to 9:30. Last year the orchestra was presented on Saturday nights. The network is that of WJZ-NBC.

39.

Ruth Posselt Boston Violinist, Who Will Be Soloist at the Boston Symphony Concerts Next Friday Afternoon and Saturday Evening

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE
Oct. 24/36

Many Social Functions Planned for Hallowe'en; Symphony Season to Open

Musicale and Tea Will Launch Providence Orchestra's Year and Boston Group Will Give First Concert; Drama Groups Plan Presentations.

By ELIZABETH L. WILLIAMS

The tang of fall pervading the atmosphere and the rich harvest of autumn colors will add to the environment of numerous affairs planned for Hallowe'en, which are included in events of the week, when witches will cast their spell at many festivities.

Friends of music will be seen at the musical and tea on Monday at the home of Mrs. Arthur M. Allen on Upton avenue which launches the season of the Providence Symphony Orchestra, and at the initial concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra scheduled for Tuesday night at the Metropolitan Theatre. Two of the local drama groups, The Players, and the Blackfriars Guild, will give several presentations during the week, the social calendar of which lists a large number of diversified social activities.

STAMFORD, CONN.
Oct. 24/36 ADVOCATE

Taking the Ether with tedyudain
RADI

VANDENBERG VIA WICC

Millions of people who never even thought of lending an ear to this or that politician, will fall all over themselves to get near the loudspeaker, after a radio chain decided to "cut" the speaker from the etheroute, for one reason or another. It's always been that way. What you don't have — you want. That's why there's so much interest in the interrupted talk of Senator Vandenberg. That's why WICC is going to bring you the speech.

The WICChannels will carry Senator Arthur Vandenberg's speech at 9, Monday night. Telling why they're putting the GOParty mogul on to repeat his now famous Chicago speech, they say: "The sole reason offered by the officials of CBS for their action in cutting the Vandenberg program, during which the recorded voice of President Roosevelt was heard, was that it was a violation of the CBS policy to broadcast recorded, or transcribed programs over the network.

The WICChin-gang further points out: "As a breach of policy is the only reason offered by CBS for their action in cutting Senator Vandenberg's speech from the air, and in view of the fact that it has always been the policy of WICC to allow the broadcast of transcribed programs, there is no reason to deny the New England citizen the opportunity of hearing the speech."

The voice of the President, heard in conjunction with the Senator Vandenberg speech, is from recordings of various speeches made by Mr. Roosevelt following his nomination in 1932.

'Round the Dials.

A grandma, Mrs. Anna Mandy, who's made her living by hanging by the teeth from the tops of circus tents and performing other feats of strength, has been added to the cast of "strong woman" night on the Bob Ripley show, tomorrow eve...Lois McFee, the husky bouncer in Leon and Eddie's, and Martha Smith, a woman blacksmith, complete the cast...The world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will return to NBC for its fifth season as an exclusive NBC feature, Nov. 19.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 24 1936

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO OFFER "FAUST"

Liszt's Score Will Open Concert Season Tuesday Night at Metropolitan.

Liszt's masterly score, the "Faust" Symphony, three character pictures after Goethe, will be the event of the opening concert of the season in Providence by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in the Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday evening. The symphony is being performed by Serge Koussevitzky this season in observance of the double anniversary of Franz Liszt, the 125th anniversary of whose birth took place on Thursday. The 50th anniversary of his death took place last July.

The performance of the symphony will be preceded by Mozart's Symphony in A-major, K. No. 201. This symphony was written in 1774 when Mozart was a boy of 18. Its recent performances by Serge Koussevitzky in Symphony Hall were probably the first in Boston.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Plans a Faustian Festival

The "Faust" symphony is divided into three parts, entitled Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles. The first part is a full length portrait of the solitary Faust. The second, which corresponds to the slow movement of the symphony, is an idyllic portrait of Gretchen. The music of Mephistopheles mocks in fiendish accents the themes of Faust. The conclusion is a choral setting of the "chorus mysticus," which ends the second part of Goethe's poem. It is the deification of womanhood ("the eternal feminine draws us ever onward"). The moving verses are sung by a male chorus, with tenor solo. The choral part will be by the Harvard Glee Club, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, and the tenor solo by Rulon Robison.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

OCT 24 1936

'FAUST' SYMPHONY'S OPENING NUMBER

Serge Koussevitzky announces Liszt's "Faust" Symphony for the first program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Metropolitan Theatre, next Tuesday evening—the opening of the orchestra's Providence season of five concerts. This important work of Liszt, which consists of three sections, "Faust," "Gretchen," and "Mephistopheles," concludes with a "chorus mysticus" in which the words of Goethe, defying womanhood, are sung by a male chorus and tenor solo. The Harvard Glee Club, and Rulon Robison will sing these parts.

The performance of the Symphony will be preceded by Mozart's Symphony in A major, K. No. 2101. This symphony was written in 1774 when Mozart was a boy of 18. Its recent performances by Serge Koussevitzky in Symphony Hall were probably the first in Boston.

The "Faust" Symphony is of special interest as this year marks the 50th anniversary of the composer's death—July 31, 1886. It also happens that he was born just 125 years ago—Oct. 22, 1811.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
GLOBE-DEMOCRAT
Oct. 25/36

First Symphony Concerts to Be Given This Week

Beethoven's 'Eroica' Will Feature Opening Programs.

FIRST concerts of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra's fifty-seventh season will be given Thursday evening at 8:30 o'clock and Friday afternoon at 2:30 o'clock in the Opera House of the Municipal Auditorium. Vladimir Golschmann, who returned to St. Louis Tuesday after a summer in Europe, will be director of the musical institution for his sixth consecutive year.

The 87 members of the orchestra will assemble tomorrow for rehearsals. Symphony-goers will see a number of new faces in the personnel this season. Edward Murphy, former member of the symphony, returns to replace James Stagliano, who now is with the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra as head of the horn section. Oscar G. Zimmerman, who has been with the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra for the last seven years, will head the bass section, and Samuel Krauss comes from the National Symphony Orchestra at Washington to be the first trumpet player.

A new stage setting, designed after the modern and improved acoustical backgrounds used by the Boston, Philadelphia and New York symphony orchestras, has been built for the local orchestra from plans designed by Leopold Stokowski, famous conductor.

Golschmann has announced one of the most extensive and varied repertoires in the orchestra's history. The opening concerts will feature Beethoven's great "Eroica" symphony and the first St. Louis presentation of Albert Roussel's Sinfonietta for String Orchestra, which was played for the first time in this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last [redacted]

The second pair of concerts, November 6 and 7, will introduce the season's first soloist, Jascha Heifetz, world-renowned violinist, who will be heard in Brahms' violin concerto. Other instrumentalists appearing during the season are Serge Rachmaninoff, Alexandre Tansman, 12-year-old Ruth Slenczynski, Dalies Frantz, Serge Prokofieff, Cot[illegible] Frederick and Vladimir Horowitz, pianists; Scipione Guidi and Albert Spalding, violinists, and Gregor Piatigorsky, violoncellist.

Rose Bampton, mezzo-soprano; Pa[redacted] tenor, and Chase Baromeo, bass-barytone, all stars of the Metropolitan Opera and concert stage, will be soloists at the orchestra's presentation of Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" with the chorus on November 20-21. Arthur Fear, noted English barytone, will be solo vocalist at the first St. Louis performance of William Walton's choral piece, "Belshazzar's Feast," for orchestra and chorus, on March 5-6.

Eighteen pairs of concerts will be given during the 1936-37 season, with the final pair on March 19 and 20. The usual series of five student concerts will be held on November 12, December 10, January 14, February 11 and March 11. Four high school concerts under auspices of Board of Education will be given on November 4, December 2, January 6 and March 17. Tours will be conducted in January, February and after the close of the season in March and April, covering 28 Middle Western and Southern cities. Col. W. de Basil's Ballet Russe will make its annual appearance with orchestra the first of the year.

Season tickets at reduction prices will be withdrawn after the concert next Saturday night, when seats for all remaining concerts will be sold at regular single ticket prices only. Season reservations now may be made at the orchestra's offices on the fourth floor of the Municipal Auditorium.

Details of the opening program are:

Prelude to "Lohengrin" — Wagner
Sinfonietta, Op. 52 (for string orchestra)— Albert Roussel
1. Allegro.
2. Andante.
3. Finale.
(Played without pause.)
Symphonic poem, "Fontane di Roma" ("The Fountains of Rome")— Ottorino Respighi
1. The Fountain of Valle Giulia (Dawn).
2. The Triton Fountain (Morning).
3. The Fountain of Trevi (Noon).
4. The Villa Medici Fountain (Sunset).
Symphony No. 3 in E flat Major, "Eroica" Op. 55 — Beethoven
1. Allegro con brio.
2. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai.
3. Scherzo: Allegro vivace.
4. Finale: Allegro molto.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

Tender Puritans

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. By Gerome Brush. Boston.

Here is a new departure in books that is unusual in its method of presentation and doubly notable in that its author-illustrator has been a resident of nearby Dublin for the past 40 years.

Briefly, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra" consists of 110 charcoal sketches of the complete personnel of the noted orchestra and a brief biographical and intimate article about each musician. The story behind the book is an interesting one.

Publication of the attractive guide for Boston symphony devotees was prompted by an exhibition of Mr. Brush's drawings that Madame Koussevitzky, wife of the orchestra's conductor, had had him sketch for her. The portraits of these Bostonians of another era so attracted the management that they arranged to have him draw the entire personnel of the orchestra.

Mr. Brush, who was living in Dublin at the time, "went to Peterborough and got a haircut, took off my wooly underwear, went down to Symphony hall in Boston and drew every member of the orchestra" when he received word that he had been seelcted for the tremendous task.

His work occupied him for the months of April and May. The sittings for the 110 portraits averaged about 40 minutes apiece, although some took less than 10 minutes. One day he completed six sketches. The biographies occupied him during June and July.

Mr. Brush was born 48 years ago in New York City, the son of George DeForest Brush, the celebrated American painter. While still a infant he was taken to France and spent most of his childhood in Europe. In 1908 he went to Messina after the earthquake and spent considerable time rebuilding the town of Reggio Calabria.

In 1913, Mr. Brush returned to this country, met Miss Lewise Seymour, then playing in "Romance" at the Maxine Elliott theatre in New York and married her. Through a singular coincidence, their daughter Rosemary, appearing at the same theatre in "The Children's Hour" last winter, also met her husband, Don C. Davis, there.

Referring to his position as secretary to Gov. Robert P. Bass during the latter's administration, Mr. Brush likes to recall that "I did my job more eagerly and enthusiastically and more inefficiently than anything else I ever did," and adds: "I was a source of amusement to the governor's friends and an agony to him."

Although Mr. Brush informs readers of his highly interesting guide to the Boston Symphony orchestra that "New Englanders are scions of Puritanism, the scorners of music, "he reconciles, in his own mind, the traditional New England outlook with the Symphony orchestra with the words:

"Puritanism when brought into the arts well, is always attractive; it has the quality of an Italian Primitive. We are too apt to think of a New England artist as austere, but a real puritan can surprise you. Like Mr. Bryant, he can be tender."

MEDFORD, MASS.
Oct. MERCURY 27/36

Ruth Posselt In Concert At Newtonville

Miss Ruth Posselt of this city, internationally known famous violinist, will present a concert under the auspices of the Community Service club of West Newton, at the Newton High school auditorium, walnut st, Newtonville, Monday evening, Nov. 9th.

Mary Pumphrey Tower, will be Pro Arte Symphonic ensemble of the accompanist, assisted by the the Boston Symphony orchestra, comprised of Norbert Lauga, violin; Hubart Sauvlet, violin; Boaz Piller, cello; Charles van Wynbergan, viola; Gaston Dufrensne, bass and Reginald Boardman, 40.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 2 5 1936

INFORMAL POSE OF SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opening their current season with first concert at the Metropolitan theatre, Tuesday night.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

36

New York Music Letter:

Famous Indoor Sport Again Comparing Kreisler, Heifetz

BY PIERRE V. R. KEY,

Special Correspon

NEW YORK, Oct. 24.—Every so often one is beset with arguments concerning two artists. Whether one is better than the other. As if it mattered—providing each is truly an artist. And yet, quite a few persons continue to indulge their disputatious moods. They have been letting off steam for several days now, over the relative merits of Fritz Kreisler and Jascha Heifetz. Jascha appeared on the Carnegie Hall stage first. Fritz made his appearance some sixty hours later, on the same platform. Each had a huge audience. Kreisler's was the larger because he permitted seats to be placed on the stage. Heifetz chose an intimate setting, with several decorative plants serving as a background. My preference was for the latter arrangement; I have grown to dislike this dividing of an assemblage . . . though I must admit that it pays dividends to the musician who can bring such a thing about.

The programs of these supreme violinists were as dissimilar as their respective resources. Each was admirably suited to its purpose and I doubt if two more thoroughly enjoyable recitals of their kind have been heard so close together in recent times.

The question of superiority, however, could scarcely have entered the mind of the discerning listener because the music and the art of each performer was so highly individual as to make any comparison rather out of place. The dazzling Heifetz technique, superb musicianship and pure tone were again in evidence. The tonal warmth which Kreisler draws from his fiddle never touched the sense more completely; never have his poise, authoritativeness and gracious manner of these great artists been more compelling.

Each has something not possessed by the other; and so it becomes largely a matter (in speaking of these two) of being fortunate enough to hear and see them both. I doubt if either will have a successor, wherefore we should rejoice that they are still with us and hope that their professional departures will be long delayed.

Little Music-Makers.

Like tiny birds, which are ever eager to test their wings in a first flight, this current music season promises to be a record-breaker for youthful first appearances. The Town Hall has few open dates that are now available, and all the other lesser auditoriums seem to be almost equally in demand. Singers, pianists and violinists form the major portion of this fledgling contingent. With lamentably few exceptions these young men and women will be heard and seen and as quickly forgotten.

It is all quite sad, when you ponder the situation. Still, so far as I am aware, nothing can be done about it. Such a thing as squelching ambition (regardless of the lack of justification for parading it) seems next to impossible. The root of the matter appears to lie in the American insistence in getting an early start, regardless of the individual's preparedness to play or sing well enough to merit discriminating approval.

The expense of giving a Town Hall recital ranges from $500 to $800—according to the amount of newspaper advertising which is deemed necessary to remind the public that Mr. A or Miss B is to give a recital. It costs less to appear less pretentiously. The real expense, however, is generally paid by the candidate for professional consideration in the heartaches that follow, when, meeting truth face to face, it becomes apparent that a big time effort was made some time before the singer's or instrumentalist's resources warranted it.

First Orchestra Gun.

Time was when the Philadelphia Orchestra was nothing very much. That was years ago, before Leopold Stokowski's magic laid hold of the organization which was proceeding mildly along its quiet course. Nowadays the City of Brotherly Love spends something like a million a season for the maintenance of what its supporters contend is the first symphonic organization extant. Once again that is, of course, a question of opinion. But it is indisputably one of the first three we know; the New York Philharmonic and Boston Orchestras being the other two.

The Philadelphians led off in New York's symphony schedule the other evening, with Eugene Ormandy conducting. Moving from a radio post to that of leader of the Minneapolis Symphony, Mr. Ormandy has gone on and up to a pre-eminent place in one of the most difficult and trying of all music fields. He is a gifted musician, and his conducting talent is now thoroughly proven.

His customary poise must have been tried though, when a goodly portion of Philadelphia's Academy of Music walked out on the playing of a symphony writen by an English composer named William Turner Walton. It seems the piece was considered so ultramodern as to confuse some of the sophisticated Philadelphia music listeners. At any rate, some of them took a walk.

Nothing of that sort happened at the New York concert; but the Walton composition did bear down rather hard upon the hearing of some of us. As for the orchestra, it was tonally beautiful, and technically the marvelous unit it has been for lo these many years.

Oct. LOWELL, MASS. 25/36
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give the fourth programme of its regular series in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Serge Koussevitzky will give the first Boston performance of the orchestral suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fairy's Kiss." This music from the ballet of 1928 was performed, it will be remembered, by this orchestra in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, under the direction of the composer when he visited this country two seasons ago. The suite was also performed in Chicago at that time. The ballet bears the subtitle "Inspired by the muse of Tchaikovsky," and Stravinsky uses themes from Tchaikovsky to his own purposes.

Ruth Posselt will appear as soloist with the orchestra in the Violin Concerto of Dvorak, which has not been heard at these concerts for a number of years. Miss Posselt, who was born in Medford, Mass., made her first public appearances when she was still a child. In recent seasons, she has given concerts in many parts of Europe, appearing with the principal orchestras in Paris and Amsterdam. She has also appeared with the orchestras of Chicago and Detroit, as well as with this orchestra (in the Monday evening series). The closing number will be Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

OCT 24 1936

Portraits of Musicians, by Gerome Brush.

APROPOS of the opening of the concert season in Washington and elsewhere, mention may be made of a series of portrait drawings by Gerome Brush of the 109 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, because of their clever rendering and excellent likeness, have been incorporated in a book—full-page illustrations, each faced by a biographical sketch written by the artist. "Mr. Gerome Brush," says Edward Weeks in his introduction, "has performed a public service. He has singled out the black and white keys of one of the greatest instruments in the world. With the strokes of his crayon and the sympathy of his pen he has brought to light the individuality of the members of the Boston Symphony. Each musician sat for him in the little room that houses the Casadesus Collection; each played for him a solo in order to banish the last vestige of self-consciousness, and from each he has drawn comments, bits of personal history, and the gleam of aspirations which are characteristic." Each man is shown playing an instrument, the only exception being the one man who makes no sound—the librarian—who is pictured smoking a pipe. They are sketched in charcoal, loosely, but with evident sympathy and understanding. The note of personality is dominant. "Today, unnoticed, waiting for a traffic light to turn green, hesitate unassuming men, for the safest moment to cross the street and get into the tuning room of Symphony Hall," writes Mr. Brush in his foreword, adding, "I have had the good fortune to be allowed in this tuning room, and here they are." Not only is this an excellent idea, but a publication of lasting worth artistically.

Gerome Brush is the son of George de Forest Brush, one of our American painters to whom the appellation "great" may appropriately be given—the painter of the "Mother and Child" in the Corcoran Gallery of Art and other distinguished canvases. Young Brush studied under his father and other masters and has not only, as in this instance, proved himself a capable and gifted draftsman, but has produced works in sculpture of significant merit.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

OCT 2 193

Enrollment Asked For Berkshires' 1937 Festival

Tentative Plans Call for Six Boston Symphony Concerts Next August

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., which has drawn up preliminary plans for the 1937 festival next August at Stockbridge, Mass., has asked in a recent statement from its president, Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, that those intending to become patrons or members for next summer's festival should do so as soon as possible, as word as to whether the expanded plans contemplated for 1937 can be carried out must be given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by next Sunday.

According to the conditions asked by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony for their return to the Berkshires next summer, six concerts are to be given instead of three, as last August, and a shed is to be built to replace the tent used in the 1936 festival. Both the festival committee and Dr. Koussevitzky have agreed that a permanent home must be found and a long-range plan adopted in order to make the Berkshire region a noted festival center.

Miss Robinson Smith has pointed out that a large and early enrollment of patrons and members is necessary to assure the return of the Boston Symphony next summer and the development of these long-range plans. Sustaining members pay $5 apiece for one or two tickets, depending upon the location, for three concerts, and patrons pay $75 for a box seating six, for three concerts. If there are six concerts, members and patrons may buy tickets for the others at the same rates.

Inquiries and enrollments for membership can be addressed to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival at Stockbridge, Mass.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL
Oct. 27/36

Kedroff Four Hear Cheers For Concerts

"The most wonderful phenomenon of the vocal world today!"

Thus Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, characterizes the Kedroff male quartet, which makes its third Columbus appearance in Mees Hall on the Capital University campus Nov. 4 and 5.

Six or seven years ago this Russian vocal ensemble revealed to a small but amazed assemblage of Columbus music lovers and critics the beauties of vocal music cast in the chamber music style.

A year later the Kedroffs fulfilled a demanded return engagement in Memorial Hall. Upon their return to America after an absence of four years, the Capital Concert Series management promptly booked them for concerts on the Mees Hall musical menu.

This unique organization, founded by its leader, Professor N. N. Kedroff, formerly of the Imperial Conservatory of Petrograd, has for 40 years, with but one change in its personnel, been presenting notable concerts of Russian church and folk music for enthusiastic audiences in Europe and America.

According to Charles Isaacson of The New York Times the Kedroffs have accomplished with the human voice what the famous Flonzaleys did for chamber music with stringed instruments.

Tickets for the Kedroffs concerts Nov. 4 and 5 may be had at Heaton's and at the Capital conservatory box office.

* * *

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

Mrs. Barrett Has Meeting For Festival

Opinion of Summer Residents Sought for Future Symphonic Event

NORTH EGREMONT, Oct. 27.—Mr. and Mrs. William Felton Barrett of Sky Farm entertained a group of about 50 summer residents yesterday to discuss the future of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. The meeting was arranged to help the business men's committee of which W. A. Whittlesey of Pittsfield is chairman, to secure a frank expression of opinion on plans for the future of the Festival.

Mrs. Barrett who is a member of the Festival board introduced Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, the Festival president, who told of plans for the future advanced by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Those who spoke included Mrs. Barrett, Mrs. Carlos M. deHeredia of Lenox, vice president of the Festival; Miss Mabel Choate of Stockbridge, Mrs. Thomas H. Blodgett of Great Barrington, Mrs. Elizabeth Hotchkiss of Great Barrington, Mrs. Theodore Lyman of Egremont, Laurence R. Connor, Mr. Whittlesey, Lawrence K. Miller and George W. Edman of Pittsfield; John C. Lynch, Bernard Hoffmann and Mrs. Carl A. deGersdorff of Stockbridge, and Professor Philip Marshall Brown of Williamstown.

There will be a meeting of the Festival executive committee Saturday at which time action will be taken on Dr. Koussevitzky's proposal. The action to be taken by the committee will be governed by the findings of the committee of which Mr. Whittlesey is chairman.

Hollywood Reporter
Oct, HOLLYWOOD, CAL. 27/36

Chase & Sanborn's Good Will Court will be ribbed by Hal Roach's Our Gang kids in a coming picture . . . Phillips Lord will revive his Seth Parker character for NBC's anniversary programs . . . Boston Symphony, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, the announcer's friend, is on its fifth season as an exclusive NBC feature . . . San Francisco's Golden Gate Park band concerts, a tradition since Barbary Coast days, will go on NBC's blue net as a twice weekly feature starting Sunday.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 25 1936

INFORMAL POSE OF SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opening their current season with first concert at the Metropolitan theatre, Tuesday night.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

OCT 25 1936

New York Music Letter:

Famous Indoor Sport Again Comparing Kreisler, Heifetz

—BY PIERRE V. R. KEY,
Special Correspon

NEW YORK, Oct. 24.—Every so often one is beset with arguments concerning two artists. Whether one is better than the other. As if it mattered—providing each is truly an artist. And yet, quite a few persons continue to indulge their disputatious moods. They have been letting off steam for several days now, over the relative merits of Fritz Kreisler and Jascha Heifetz. Jascha appeared on the Carnegie Hall stage first. Fritz made his appearance some sixty hours later, on the same platform. Each had a huge audience. Kreisler's was the larger because he permitted seats to be placed on the stage. Heifetz chose an intimate setting, with several decorative plants serving as a background. My preference was for the latter arrangement; I have grown to dislike this dividing of an assemblage . . . though I must admit that it pays dividends to the musician who can bring such a thing about.

The programs of these supreme violinists were as dissimilar as their respective resources. Each was admirably suited to its purpose and I doubt if two more thoroughly enjoyable recitals of their kind have been heard so close together in recent times.

The question of superiority, however, could scarcely have entered the mind of the discerning listener because the music and the art of each performer was so highly individual as to make any comparison rather out of place. The dazzling Heifetz technique, superb musicianship and pure tone were again in evidence. The tonal warmth which Kreisler draws from his fiddle never touched the sense more completely; never have his poise, authoritativeness and gracious manner of these great artists been more compelling.

Each has something not possessed by the other; and so it becomes largely a matter (in speaking of these two) of being fortunate enough to hear and see them both. I doubt if either will have a successor, wherefore we should rejoice that they are still with us and hope that their professional departures will be long delayed.

Little Music-Makers.

Like tiny birds, which are ever-eager to test their wings in a first flight, this current music season promises to be a record-breaker for youthful first appearances. The Town Hall has few open dates that are now available, and all the other lesser auditoriums seem to be almost equally in demand. Singers, pianists and violinists form the major portion of this fledgling contingent. With lamentably few exceptions these young men and women will be heard and seen and as quickly forgotten.

It is all quite sad, when you ponder the situation. Still, so far as I am aware, nothing can be done about it. Such a thing as squelching ambition (regardless of the lack of justification for parading it) seems next to impossible. The root of the matter appears to lie in the American insistence in getting an early start, regardless of the individual's preparedness to play or sing well enough to merit discriminating approval.

The expense of giving a Town Hall recital ranges from $500 to $800—according to the amount of newspaper advertising which is deemed necessary to remind the public that Mr. A or Miss B is to give a recital. It costs less to appear less pretentiously. The real expense, however, is generally paid by the candidate for professional consideration in the heartaches that follow, when, meeting truth face to face, it becomes apparent that a big time effort was made some time before the singer's or instrumentalist's resources warranted it.

◆

First Orchestra Gun.

Time was when the Philadelphia Orchestra was nothing very much. That was years ago, before Leopold Stokowski's magic laid hold of the organization which was proceeding mildly along its quiet course. Nowadays the City of Brotherly Love spends something like a million a season for the maintenance of what its supporters contend is the first symphonic organization extant. Once again that is, of course, a question of opinion. But it is indisputably one of the first three we know; the New York Philharmonic and Boston Orchestras being the other two.

The Philadelphians led off in New York's symphony schedule the other evening, with Eugene Ormandy conducting. Moving from a radio post to that of leader of the Minneapolis Symphony, Mr. Ormandy has gone on and up to a pre-eminent place in one of the most difficult and trying of all music fields. He is a gifted musician, and his conducting talent is now thoroughly proven.

His customary poise must have been tried though, when a goodly portion of Philadelphia's Academy of Music walked out on the playing of a symphony writen by an English composer named William Turner Walton. It seems the piece was considered so ultramodern as to confuse some of the sophisticated Philadelphia music listeners. At any rate, some of them took a walk.

Nothing of that sort happened at the New York concert; but the Walton composition did bear down rather hard upon the hearing of some of us. As for the orchestra, it was tonally beautiful, and technically the marvelous unit it has been for lo these many years.

Oct. LOWELL, MASS. 25/36
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give the fourth programme of its regular series in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Serge Koussevitzky will give the first Boston performance of the orchestral suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fairy's Kiss." This music from the ballet of 1928 was performed, it will be remembered, by this orchestra in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, under the direction of the composer when he visited this country two seasons ago. The suite was also performed in Chicago at that time. The ballet bears the subtitle "Inspired by the muse of Tchaikovsky," and Stravinsky uses themes from Tchaikovsky to his own purposes.

Ruth Posselt will appear as soloist with the orchestra in the Violin Concerto of Dvorak, which has not been heard at these concerts for a number of years. Miss Posselt, who was born in Medford, Mass., made her first public appearances when she was still a child. In recent seasons, she has given concerts in many parts of Europe, appearing with the principal orchestras in Paris and Amsterdam. She has also appeared with the orchestras of Chicago and Detroit, as well as with this orchestra (in the Monday evening series). The closing number will be Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

OCT 24 1936

Portraits of Musicians, by Gerome Brush

APROPOS of the opening of the concert season in Washington and elsewhere, mention may be made of a series of portrait drawings by Gerome Brush of the 109 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, because of their clever rendering and excellent likeness, have been incorporated in a book—full-page illustrations, each faced by a biographical sketch written by the artist. "Mr. Gerome Brush," says Edward Weeks in his introduction, "has performed a public service. He has singled out the black and white keys of one of the greatest instruments in the world. With the strokes of his crayon and the sympathy of his pen he has brought to light the individuality of the members of the Boston Symphony. Each musician sat for him in the little room that houses the Casadesus Collection; each played for him a solo in order to banish the last vestige of self-consciousness, and from each he has drawn comments, bits of personal history, and the gleam of aspirations which are characteristic." Each man is shown playing an instrument, the only exception being the one man who makes no sound—the librarian—who is pictured smoking a pipe. They are sketched in charcoal, loosely, but with evident sympathy and understanding. The note of personality is dominant. "Today, unnoticed, waiting for a traffic light to turn green, hesitate unassuming men, for the safest moment to cross the street and get into the tuning room of Symphony Hall," writes Mr. Brush in his foreword, adding, "I have had the good fortune to be allowed in this tuning room, and here they are." Not only is this an excellent idea, but a publication of lasting worth artistically.

Gerome Brush is the son of George de Forest Brush, one of our American painters to whom the appellation "great" may appropriately be given—the painter of the "Mother and Child" in the Corcoran Gallery of Art and other distinguished canvases. Young Brush studied under his father and other masters and has not only, as in this instance, proved himself a capable and gifted draftsman, but has produced works in sculpture of significant merit.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

OCT 25 1936

Enrollment Asked For Berkshires' 1937 Festival

Tentative Plans Call for Six Boston Symphony Concerts Next August

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., which has drawn up preliminary plans for the 1937 festival next August at Stockbridge, Mass., has asked in a recent statement from its president, Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, that those intending to become patrons or members for next summer's festival should do so as soon as possible, as word as to whether the expanded plans contemplated for 1937 can be carried out must be given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by next Sunday.

According to the conditions asked by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony for their return to the Berkshires next summer, six concerts are to be given instead of three, as last August, and a shed is to be built to replace the tent used in the 1936 festival. Both the festival committee and Dr. Koussevitzky have agreed that a permanent home must be found and a long-range plan adopted in order to make the Berkshire region a noted festival center.

Miss Robinson Smith has pointed out that a large and early enrollment of patrons and members is necessary to assure the return of the Boston Symphony next summer and the development of these long-range plans. Sustaining members pay $5 apiece for one or two tickets, depending upon the location, for three concerts, and patrons pay $75 for a box seating six for three concerts. If there are six concerts, members and patrons may buy tickets for the others at the same rates.

Inquiries and enrollments for membership can be addressed to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival at Stockbridge, Mass.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL
Oct. 27/36.

Kedroff Four Hear Cheers For Concerts

"The most wonderful phenomenon of the vocal world today!"

Thus Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, characterizes the Kedroff male quartet, which makes its third Columbus appearance in Mees Hall on the Capital University campus Nov. 4 and 5.

Six or seven years ago this Russian vocal ensemble revealed to a small but amazed assemblage of Columbus music lovers and critics the beauties of vocal music cast in the chamber music style.

A year later the Kedroffs fulfilled a demanded return engagement in Memorial Hall. Upon their return to America after an absence of four years, the Capital Concert Series management promptly booked them for concerts on the Mees Hall musical menu.

This unique organization, founded by its leader, Professor N. N. Kedroff, formerly of the Imperial Conservatory of Petrograd, has for 40 years, with but one change in its personnel, been presenting notable concerts of Russian church and folk music for enthusiastic audiences in Europe and America.

According to Charles Isaacson of The New York Times the Kedroffs have accomplished with the human voice what the famous Flonzaleys did for chamber music with stringed instruments.

Tickets for the Kedroffs concerts Nov. 4 and 5 may be had at Heaton's and at the Capital conservatory box office.

* * *

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE 27/36

Mrs. Barrett Has Meeting For Festival

Opinion of Summer Residents Sought for Future Symphonic Event

NORTH EGREMONT, Oct. 27.—Mr. and Mrs. William Felton Barrett of Sky Farm entertained a group of about 50 summer residents yesterday to discuss the future of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. The meeting was arranged to help the business men's committee of which W. A. Whittlesey of Pittsfield is chairman, to secure a frank expression of opinion on plans for the future of the Festival.

Mrs. Barrett who is a member of the Festival board introduced Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, the Festival president, who told of plans for the future advanced by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Those who spoke included Mrs. Barrett, Mrs. Carlos M. de-Heredia of Lenox, vice president of the Festival; Miss Mabel Choate of Stockbridge, Mrs. Thomas H. Blodgett of Great Barrington, Mrs. Elizabeth Hotchkiss of Great Barrington, Mrs. Theodore Lyman of Egremont, Laurence R. Connor, Mr. Whittlesey, Lawrence K. Miller and George W. Edman of Pittsfield; John C. Lynch, Bernard Hoffmann and Mrs. Carl A. deGersdorff of Stockbridge, and Professor Philip Marshall Brown of Williamstown.

There will be a meeting of the Festival executive committee Saturday at which time action will be taken on Dr. Koussevitzky's proposal. The action to be taken by the committee will be governed by the findings of the committee of which Mr. Whittlesey is chairman.

Hollywood Reporter
Oct, HOLLYWOOD, CAL. 27/36

Chase & Sanborn's Good Will Court will be ribbed by Hal Roach's Our Gang kids in a coming picture . . . Phillips Lord will revive his Seth Parker character for NBC's anniversary programs . . . Boston Symphony, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, the announcer's friend, is on its fifth season as an exclusive NBC feature . . . San Francisco's Golden Gate Park band concerts, a tradition since Barbary Coast days, will go on NBC's blue net as a twice weekly feature starting Sunday.

●

41.

ELYRIA, O.
Chronicle Telegram

OCT 26 1936

First Concert Under Auspices Of Civic Music Association To Be Given November 9th

ON MONDAY EVENING, November 9th, at 8:15 the first concert in a series of three under the auspices of the Elyria Civic Music Association will be given.

The first artist to be presented is Hortense Monath, pianist. The second concert will be given on January 11th and the third some time in March. All concerts will be held in the First Congregational church.

Miss Monath is a young American pianist who in recent years has consistently interested both audiences and critics alike with the originality of her programs, the large grasp of her music and the independence of her style.

She first studied with her mother, then with Ernest Hutcheson in New York and finally went to Berlin to work under Artur Schnable. Following her debut in Hamburg she gave concerts in Rome, Florence, Bologna and Milan and made solo appearances with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, with Fritz Busch conducting and was soloist at the Festspiele in Salzburg.

In this country she has appeared as solo artist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Koussevitsky and also with the Newark Symphony Orchestra, the National Symphony Orchestra, and in recital throughout the east, middle west and south.

The Civic Music Association will present Jacqueline Salomons, violinist on January 11th and a tenor, Attilio Baggiore, will be the artist on the March program.

More than two hundred Elyria music lovers hold memberships in the association.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH
Oct. 25/36

Chopin's Piano In London Broadcast.

THE time for the broadcast from Londin in which the "Broadwood" piano used by Chopin in his tour of England in 1848 will be played has been set for 12:30 noon today on the CBS network. Frank Mannheimer, an American pianist, will play the Minuet, Larghetto and Presto movements from Chopin's seldom performed First Sonata.

* * *

The Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo's opening in the Metropolitan Opera House will be broadcast for half an hour on the WJZ network at 7:30 Thursday night. "Aurora's Wedding" from Tschaikowsky's "Sleeping Beauty" is programmed for that period.

Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be broadcast on the WJZ network, begining Thursday night, Nov. 19. Instead of broadcasting the orchestra's entire series from Boston as in past seasons, the network will pick up four of its Carnegie Hall concerts in New York, three in the Sanders Theaters at Harvard University, three in Symphony Hall in Boston and one in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. All these broadcasts will be on Thursday evenings except three from Boston on Thursday afternoons. In addition, the same network will carry the orchestra's "pop" concerts in Boston on nine consecutive Thursday nights, beginning May 6.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
Oct. 24/36

G[illegible] Club Will Sing wi[illegible] lub Symphony

Serge Koussevitzky announces Liszt's "Faust" Symphony for the first program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Metropolitan theatre, next Tuesday evening—opening the orchestra's Providence season of five concerts. This important work of Liszt, which consists of three sections, "Faust," "Gretchen," and "Mephistopheles," concludes with a "chorus mysticus" in which the words of Goethe, deifying womanhood, are sung by a male chorus and tenor solo. The Harvard Glee Club and Bulon Robinson will sing these parts.

The performance of the symphony will be preceded by Mozart's Symphony in A major, K. No. 201. This symphony was written in 1774 when Mozart was a boy of 18. Its recent performances by Serge Koussevitzky in Symphony Hall were probably the first in Boston.

The "Faust" symphony is of special interest at this time in that this year marks the 50th anniversary of the composer's death—July 31, 1886. It also happens that he was born just 125 years ago—[illegible] 22, 1811.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE
Oct. 28/36

-:- MUSIC -:-

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, returned to Providence after an absence of six months last night to give one of the most unusual concerts in which it has been ever heard here. The program included but two works, a Mozart Symphony in A major, (K. 201) and the Liszt Faust Symphony.

Mozart was first; a brief, formal, melodic gem in four movements, more like a string quartette than a symphony, the high points of which were the lovely Andante on muted strings and the crisp Minuet with its abrupt ending in the middle of a phrase. Although the technical demands of this symphony were nothing to tax the orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky let his players loose with all their velocity in the finale which was close to breath-taking.

The Faust Symphony began with a sinister and ominous theme that gradually developed into an intensely dramatic situation. The first of the three character sketches in its composition, devoted to Faust, was by far the most interesting, perhaps because it followed the stylistic Mozart. It leaped headlong in its series of chromatic ascents and descents with periodic pauses for dialogues between given sections of the wood winds and brass. A bass saxophone figured prominently in these conversations. The dynamic Allegro agitato was frequently too noisy with its thundering tympany and crashing cymbals, but it was 27 minutes of impressive experience nontheless.

The second sketch, shorter and more subdued, was entitled Gretchen. A theme of churchly dignity was enunciated in the woodwinds and developed with great deliberation. It was a breathing spell before the finale, Mephistopheles, where once again the themes of the opening movement were heard in an amazing confusion of sound with profuse syncopation. This wild foray led to the Andante mistico where the Harvard Glee Club and Rulon Y. Robison, tenor soloist, joined the orchestra to bring the strange symphony to a close. Joining of the voices was not such an unhappy wedding as might have been expected, yet it was unconvincing and seemed unreasonable. The symphony needed no program to be appreciated, and it needed no voices, good as they were, to bring it to its end.

So absorbing was this Liszt composition that it seemed hardly possible it had required an hour and 15 minutes to play. The orchestra was in fine fettle for its task and played faultlessly with one exception. The violas in their several appearances with pizzicato statements had repeated difficulty in keeping together. The ragged impression was not too pleasant to hear. The Boston Symphony returns for its second concert at the Metropolitan on Nov. 24.

T. A. M.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

Miss Wakefield Bringing Artists For Her Concert

Elizabeth Wakefield, well known Hartford violinist, will include works of seven composers on the program she will present in the Colonial Room of the Bushnell Memorial Nov. 6 at 8:30 p. m.

The selections scheduled are "Sonata in A Major," Op. 13, Faure; "Fantaise", Op. 124, for violin and harp, Saint-Saens; "Scherzo-Valse," Chabrier-Loeffler; "Canto", from Concerto No. 2, Ciler-Corti; "Three Humoresques," No. III, Kolar; "Hebrew Folksong and Dance," Brown; and "Tango" Op. 6 No. 3, Fernandez-Arbos.

Miss Artiss de Volt, who teaches harp at the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston and at the Salzburg Mozarteum Academy in Vienna in the summer, will be the harpist at the recital. Carl Feldman, Boston pianist who plays for many of the Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians, will be at the piano.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
Oct. 28/36

Music

Splendid Performance of Liszt's "Faust" Symphony Given by Boston Symphony Orchestra and Harvard Glee Club, Led by Dr. Koussevitzky

By G. Y. Loveridge

As individuals and as a band, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night displayed its unexcelled abilities in a memorable concert in Metropolitan Theatre. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The Harvard Glee Club and Rulon Y. Robison, tenor soloist, took part.

It was a social as well as a musical event. Furs, jewels and other finery made the audience a bright spectacle, and the streets were cluttered with the customary limousines and taxicabs. There was a good-sized and cordial audience, but there were likewise many vacant places. Twenty-five thousand persons will gather to see Penn trample Brown, but when Mozart and Liszt make first down for art and civilization, there are still some seats left among 3400. Even one of the best orchestras in the world, with the Harvard Glee Club thrown in, cannot alter that.

The program comprized Mozart's Symphony in A major and Liszt's Faust Symphony. A contrast there, indeed. Mozart's symphony was composed when he was but 18, Liszt's when he was more than 40. Mozart contents himself with strings, two oboes and two horns. Liszt calls upon the great modern orchestra, with chorus besides.

It might be thought that Mozart would fare poorly against such competition, but not so. At least, it did not seem so to those of us musical cave-dwellers who still like Mozart. Under Dr. Koussevitzky's graceful and compelling hands, the symphony took shape as something exquisite and rare, the sometimes gay and sometimes languorous creation of a boy who did not know that already half his life was done, or that he was an immortal. After writing that line, we pause to consider how distressed we should be if somebody were to show, presently, that Mozart didn't compose the symphony. Such things have happened. But no, it must have been Mozart. Nobody else had such ease and artful artlessness.

Here one heard to finest advantage the orchestra's famed strings, brilliant, mellow or spirited as Dr. Koussevitzky desired, showing the most exact shadings and dynamic refinements. We had rather watch such bowing than watch the West Point cadets march. And as for the fingering, even the trills were perfectly matched and executed.

This was a work that did not burden the hearer with evidence of deep thought or strivings of the soul. It was like a flower in a storm compared to some of what was to follow.

Lizst's Faust symphony, although considered one of his best works, is seldom played. The current popularity of it is due to a double anniversary this year, the 125th of his birth and the 50th of his death.

The symphony proved of strong interest. Although more than an hour was required to perform it, and there were passages that seemed dull and digressive, it held the earnest attention of the audience. The Faust legend, which has prompted creative efforts by so many writers, musicians and painters, plainly had stirred Liszt sincerely. Dr. Koussevitzky, coaxing his men, lashing them into a tonal fury, smiling, scowling, wrung from this score every drop of meaning, it seemed. For different persons there are different meanings. Liszt has merely designated the three "character pictures" as Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles, and one must search out the qualities and significance oneself.

The numerous solo passages gave opportunity to enjoy the work of many of the orchestra's virtuosi separately. Oboe, viola, horn, the flute so often admired in the "Afternoon of a Faun," all had their individual moments and took the stage with confidence and authority. And there was a headlong pizzicatto passage for the double-basses that was admirably performed.

In the Faust movement five themes are discerned. Dr. Koussevitzky brought them out in clear statement and joined them smoothly. At the beginning of the movement one found Faust in thoughtful mood, sometimes perplexed and melancholy, brooding on the futility of his life. Then he becomes romantic (according to the oboe), and is led from one turn of mind to another, until finally there is a triumphant swing and surging in the brasses, which seems to signify some sort of triumph. Dr. Koussevitzky spun out this web with masterly hand, and dyed it with all the tone colors at his command. Precision of attack, beauty of tone, fluent technique were all in evidence. In spite of the somewhat episodic character of this movement, and the conflicting moods it evokes, Dr. Koussevitzky gave it unity and solid impact.

The Gretchen movement, built upon two songful themes, was performed with the same consistent artistry. The Gretchen revealed in this movement, as has been discovered and announced a long time ago, is the innocent and lovely girl of Faust's early acquaintance, and does not depict her in the prison phase of her existence. Again one heard the oboe at its best.

In the final movement, devoted to Mephistopheles, the themes associated with Faust are burlesqued and battered about from one section of the orchestra to another. The strings that had sung so pleasantly now growl and whine. Faust is mocked at every turn, and only now and then do the unchanged themes of the Gretchen movement lighten, and emphasize the gloom.

The chorus and Mr. Robison singing with the orchestra, brought the piece to a solemn impressive hopeful conclusion. The young men sang earnestly and feelingly, with commendable diction, and Mr. Robison's fine tenor, floating above the orchestral accompaniment, was truly moving. Only once was there evidence of the strain occasioned by singing the difficult part.

Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled several times by insistent applause, which he shared with soloist, orchestra and chorus.

Between the two symphonies, Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe spoke briefly about the festival of Brahms chamber music to take place next month in the School of Design Museum.

WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE

OCT 29 1936

Select Ushers For November Ninth Concert

Mrs. John A. Paine of 19 Exeter street, West Newton, has been chosen chairman of the ushers for the cconcert to be presented by Ruth Posselt, assisted by the Pro Arte Symphonic Ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Newton High School auditorium, Monday evening, November 9, at 8:30. The Community Service Club of West Newton, of which Mrs. George S. Fuller is president, is sponsoring the concert to aid the philanthropic fund of the club.

Miss Posselt, a violinist of international fame, plans to leave for another concert tour of Europe soon after this concert, at which she will be accompanied by Mary Humphrey Tower. Boaz Piller, who directs the ensemble, will be the cellist, and the other artists will be Morbert Laugha, violin; Hubert Sauvlet, violin; Charles van Wynbrgen, viola; Gaston Dufresne, bass; Louis Speyer, oboe, and Reginald Boardman, piano.

The names of the young ladies who are to assist Mrs. Paine as ushers include Miss Katharine Allen, Miss Jeanne Bachrach, Miss Polly Paine, Miss Priscilla Ballou, Miss Peggy Wilcox, Miss Frances Lee Weeks, Miss Margaret Spencer, Miss Nancy Ireland, Miss Doris Benson, Miss Eleanor Bingham, Miss Katherine Bolster, Miss Lois Cate, Miss Dorothy Chandler, Miss Ruth Chase, Miss Margaret Esson, Miss Jeanne Fisher, Miss Marguerite Fuller, Miss Barbara Glidden and Miss Marion Hutchinson.

Mrs. A. Shirley Ladd of 80 Berkeley street, West Newton, and Mrs. William D. Ireland of 70 Temple street, West Newton, are in charge of reservations.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

OCT 25 1936

THE ART BOOKSHELF

THE modern revival of an interest in drawing is reflected in three recent volumes, "Figure Drawing," by Iain Macnab, (The Studio, How to Do It Series, $3.50); "The Painting and Anatomy of Animals," by W. Frank Calderon (J. B. Lippincott Company $6); and, turning from how to do it to what is done, a unique volume, "Boston Symphony Orchestra," with charcoal drawings of its members and biographical sketches, by Gerome Brush (printed by the Orchestra, $1.50).

Both treatises on drawing are by English contemporaries. W. Frank Calderon founded the School of Animal Painting; while Iain MacNab is principal of the Grosvenor School of Modern Art in London.

"Animal Painting and Anatomy," does for horses, cows and dogs what many other tomes do for the human figure, giving a thorough academic structural basis via bones and muscles, the application of such knowledge to movement in life, and the final use of animals either as subjects in their own right, or as part of a larger composition including landscape and figures. Particularly valuable are the illustrations and diagrams.

SPRINGFIELD ,MASS.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 29 1936

GREAT BARRINGTON

SYMPHONIC FESTIVAL PLANS ARE DISCUSSED

Permanent Arrangement Needed to Secure Return of Boston Symphony

Great Barrington, Oct. 28—The future of the Berkshire Symphonic festival, by now considered an annual event, was discussed by a group of more than 50 summer residents at a specially-called meeting yesterday at Sky farm, the home of Mr and Mrs William Felton Barrett in North Egremont. No definite announcements as to any change in policy were given out, but it was stated that a permanent arrangement must be made, in order to secure the return of Dr Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony orchestra next summer.

Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of the festival company, told the group of recently-formulated plans. Others who spoke were Mrs Barrett, Mrs Carlos M. deHeredia of Lenox, Miss Mable Choate of Stockbridge, Mrs Thomas H. Blodgett of Great Barrington, John C. Lynch, Bernhard Hoffman and Mrs Carl A. deGersdorff of Stockbridge and Prof Philip Marshall Brown of Williamstown.

The festival executive committee will meet Saturday and a definite stand on the future will be outlined.

Marriage intentions were filed yesterday by Miss Angeline Marconi of Van Deusenville road, Great Barrington, and Joseph John Baldauf of Monument Valley road, this town, in the office of the town clerk.

Dr Harold W. Stevens, accompanied by Mrs Stevens, has returned from a motor trip to New Orleans, La., where they attended the annual meeting of the Public Health association.

The funeral of Edward Pekrul was held this afternoon in Sheffield with Rev Ivor S. Williams officiating at the services, which were held at the Congregational church. Burial was in the Center cemetery, Sheffield.

G. W. Harold Dunbar of New York has bought a large farm in South Egremont from the Olde Egremont association, which he will add to his present estate on the Undermountain road. Mr Dunbar's acquisition is of 230 acres, and extends from the base of Jug End mountain on the west to the Sheffield town line on the east. The property includes a large dairy barn, which is situated on Jug End road.

42.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

OCT 27 1936

Olin Downes Writes Second Article About Cincinnati And Its Orchestra

Olin Downes, music critic of the New York Times, visited in Cincinnati and heard the first Saturday night concert. The following comment was written by Mr. Downes and published in the music section of the New York paper last Sunday. This is the second article written by the critic concerning the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra.

BY OLIN DOWNES.

Cincinnati.

WITH the late opening of the season of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra this fall the writer was seized with a desire to find out for himself what other American orchestras and their conductors were doing. Ordinarily those who review music in New York must keep their noses so near the local grindstone as to be completely unaware what is happening in the rest of the country. It is a regrettable circumstance, for two reasons. The first is that the provincialism of an immense city can induce just as limited a habit of mind as the provincialism of a smaller center, and provincialism is an arch-enemy of growth to be fought at every turn of the way. The second is that the time has arrived in the United States when one part of the country can no more remain isolated from other parts in music than it can in laws and trade.

The period when that could be is past. The radio has seen to that, and would have brought about reciprocal musical relations if nothing else had. People today may listen locally to actual performances or hear them "on the air," as they choose. Or they can listen nationally or internationally, as they chose, to performances in the Americas and the countries overseas. Most of them do listen, at times, in all these ways. Musical performances in other places than the one in which the individual finds himself are no longer remote or theoretical matters. With new orchestral conditions before us in New York this winter, it seemed particularly desirable and interesting to go around a little and institute a few comparisons, so far as very limited time for them permits, between instrumental bodies that we know and hear in the metropolis and those which function a plane ride from Broadway.

* * *

This winter in New York we shall hear many conductors, some of them as yet untried, in addition to the visits of Koussevitzky and Stokowski, the two leaders in the East, since Mr. Toscanini departed our shores. It will have been nine days ago, when this article appears, that the writer heard Mr. Stokowski's crack orchestra in Philadelphia under Eugene Ormandy, its new incumbent. The very next evening he heard Eugene Goossens conduct his opening program of the season at the head of the Cincinnati Orchestra. Both conductors have appeared in New York, but as "guest" leaders, not as appointed heads of the organizations they now direct. Immediately a new perspective was supplied by these experiences.

It may be said that both the programs given in the cities mentioned were more interesting than those customarily heard in New York last season. Not only this: if we have in New York an average program and performance that will rank with Cincinnati's opening performances of this season, we will be fortunate. This does not imply at all that Goossens is Toscanini, or that the Cincinnati Orchestra equals in virtuosity and in the quality of man for man the New York Philharmonic-Symphony or the unsurpassed orchestras of Boston and Philadelphia. But it does mean that for musicianly, straightforward and well-conceived interpretations, and for a quality of orchestral playing that maintained very high standards, the Cincinnati performances of a week and more ago would be welcomed in any musical center.

And let us extend the comparison a little further. There would be no comparison between the orchestra here, and, let us say, the far-famed Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, except when it is rehearsed and conducted by Toscanini. The reason for this, the Toscanini magic aside, is simply that the Cincinnati Orchestra is so much the better of the two. There would be a still greater gulf between the orchestral playing here and the wretched instrumental standards that obtained in a "Meistersinger" performance that opened the Munich Summer Music Festival on an afternoon in late July last. One would be more cautious in making comparisons with the Baireuth Orchestra—Baireuth, the one place in Germany where really high standards of performance are maintained, owing to the fortuitous favor in which the Festspielhaus stands now with the Hitler regime.

We must realize that such comparisons are now to be made between orchestras and interpreters in Europe and America. Further comparisons between various American instrumental bodies should prove interesting. Music in our civic centers is developing very rapidly and will grow more rapidly than ever before in the decades that are coming. It is time that we should acquire as much as we can of first-hand information of what the other fellow is doing and where real musical values lie.

Entertaining these ideas, it was interesting to find them warmly favored at Cincinnati. It may be added, without disparagement, that such a cooperative conception is rather a new thing in that city, and for reasons not far to seek. Cincinnati has a proud musical tradition of her own. Her greatest and oldest artistic institution is, of course, the celebrated May Festival, which takes place every two years and which a half-century ago made her one of the greatest American cities in music. She has reason to feel a pride in her level of musical culture. Here is a city of 500,000. It opens its orchestra season with two audiences that add to approximately 6,100 people. That means two full Carnegie Hall audiences. Remember that New York draws for its symphonic audiences from a public of 7,000,000. Of course, these figures are modified by all sorts of factors. New York attends opera as well as symphony, and a multitude of concerts given every day by artists great and small. New York gives an average of three or four orchestra concerts a week by its resident orchestra alone, besides the series given each season by the other two ranking symphonic bodies of the country. Cincinnati, of course, is not devoid of other concerts than those of its Symphony Orchestra, and it has many local musical activities of its own. It would be hard to calculate the fractions and percentages of the business and make any accurate comparison of the musical attendance in the two cities. But on the face of it, and without thought of comparisons, two audiences, each of 3,000 and over, consisting almost entirely of subscribers for the season, and this for a concert without any soloist as a spectacular attraction, are certainly evidence, in a community of 500,000, of a place where music exercises an impressive and vital function.

One of the recent changes in the methods that the propagators of music are adopting to meet the currents of a changing world was the energetic campaign which the new manager of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, Theo F. Gannon, instituted this fall for subscriptions, which brought results of 1,800 new subscribers for the coming season. This project was promoted in many ways, as by allowing more than one person to subscribe for a single seat, by permitting quarterly payments of subscriptions, and doing everything possible to put the seats for the concerts within the reach of even poor people. There were results. Then there was the return to the old home of the orchestra, and the home of the May-Festivals, Music Hall. Unless one talked with a Cincinnatian he could not realize what a chord this decision struck in the public breast.

* * *

The old Music Hall, built for the festivals in 1878, is at the very root of the musical life of the city. It has fine acoustics, though it is neither beautiful within nor modern in design. The stage settings of the orchestra could surely be improved in appearance. But the hall is very spacious, seating between 5,000 and 6,000; the sound carries superbly, and here is the place where the Thomases and Van Der Stuckens and other great musicians of America's formative period held forth and preached the gospel of the tone-world. The people have not forgotten it. They never will. The festival and its home have an ineradicable place in their hearts.

Various experiments in program-making have been tried by Mr. Goossens, and the Cincinnati organization has gone the way of other major orchestras of the Middle West, and also of the East, in adding operas to the symphonic repertory. Four operas, given last year in the concert hall, with stage accessories, are believed to have brought a new public, or part of the public, to the orchestra's support. It is to be remembered that Cincinnati is a city without Winter opera of its own. Four operas will be given this season. They will be "Carmen," "Tosca," "Salome," and "Marriage of Figaro," the latter work to be sung in English, with a cast recruited from one which Mr. Goossens assembled and trained in the work in a previous season in Rochester. Festival plans include Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" and the performance of Berlioz's "Requiem," that colossal conception which only a few of this generation—the remark includes the writer—have heard.

Continued above Right

* * *

Festival or symphony season, the musical situation hinges upon the orchestra. It numbers for the average concert, after reductions consequent upon the depression, 82 players. It needs, particularly, a few more strings for the best effect. Some of the first-desk men have exceptional ability. Among these are the first flute, Ary van Leeuwen; the first clarinet; the first bassoon; an accomplished first oboe, if not a phenomenal one; a highly competent kettledrummer, and a first viola whose tone in the Sibelius "Saga" was a joy to the ear. The names of all these players but the first flute, Mr. van Leeuwen, have been mentioned. The concert master has a good attack and a firm style and is less of a virtuoso than a marshal of the orchestra, as a concert master should be. He is Emil Heerman, son of Hugo Heerman. Mr. Goossens's characteristics as a conductor, his inherited and acquired mastery of orchestra routine, his fluent technic and musicianship are too well known to need description here. He pulled himself through two seasons in Cincinnati—those of 1931 and 1932-33—of very serious illness, when it was doubtful if he could keep his feet, with a pluck and fortitude that the managers and public, who stuck by him, admired. Other conductors, whose mouths watered, sat in the front row and awaited the possible emergency. Some attribute to his physical state at that time a reputed tendency to go easy on the men, who like him, with results that sacrifice the fine edges of performance. Others have found his ease and poise as a conductor to gravitate a little against power, intensity and depth in interpretation. But his following seems to have grown; he makes well-balanced programs and introduces as much of novelty and perhaps more than his audiences welcome; and the concert to which reference has been made was a well-rounded and highly creditable achievement. Mr. Goossens has an ear and a sense of rounded and fused orchestral tone.

SOUTH BEND, IND.
Oct. TRIBUNE 25/36

Barbirolli Has Hardest Job in Music This Side Europe

By Associated Press.

NEW YORK, Oct. 24.—John Barbirolli, poor man, may very well feel like a Galahad among the Gadarene swine, for he has the toughest job of any musician in the western hemisphere. Mr. Barbirolli is succeeding Arturo Toscanini.

One hurdle is that very fact. There can be, in the public mind at least, no replacing the peerless and unique Toscanini, idolized as no conductor ever was.

Item: There is, in a certain composition board locker in Carnegie hall, a hole. The hole was kicked in the locker by Toscanini in a tantrum. The owner of the locker, one of the minor employes of the famous hall, says, "As long as I use the locker the hole never will be repaired."

Job Coveted by Many.

Another hurdle is the fact that practically every conductor in the world aspired to the New York Philharmonic-Symphony society podium, exceptions being Serge Koussevitzky in Boston, Mass.; Leopold Stokowski in Philadelphia, Pa., and Frederick Stock in Chicago.

Item: "Yes indeed," says a certain well known conductor, "I'm sure Mr. Barbirolli is a very capable fellow. Of course, he's very young—"

Another is the fact that many reviewers who will deal with Mr. Barbirolli have fairly set ideas on him before he even makes his debut.

Item: One New York "critic" already has published a somewhat caustic comment on the Philharmonic's decision to hire a conductor nobody knew.

And also there is the matter of Barbirolli's nationality. In spite of his Italian name, he is English.

Item: "Whoever heard of a first rate conductor out of England?" asked a well known pianist the other day.

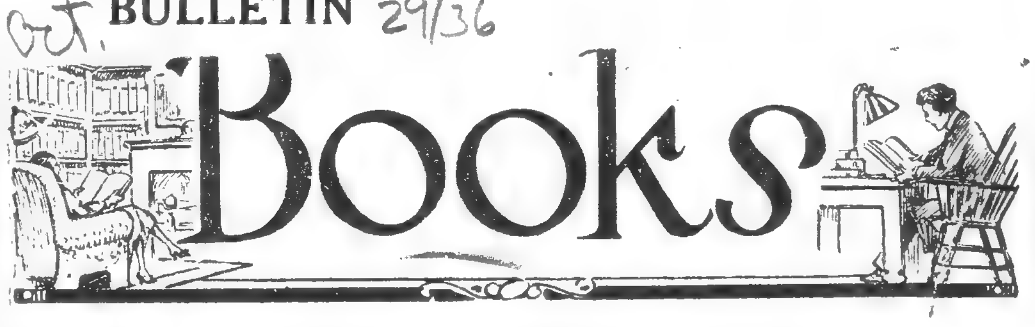
He Announces Novelties.

Just the same Barbirolli has already announced almost as many interesting novelties for his 10-week tenure of office as Toscanini played in the decade he headed the orchestra.

One of them is Vaughan Williams' "Masque for Dancing in Nine Scenes." Others include: Leo Weiner's transcription of Liszt's "Weinen Klagen"; the overture to "Les Deux Aveugles de Toledo" by Mehul; Sibelius' "Pojola's Daughter"; Bax's "The Garden of Fand"; Liadoff's "The Enchanted Lake"; Barbirolli's own concerto for oboe and strings based on themes from Pergolesi; the Purcell-Wood Trumpet Voluntary, and a dance rhapsody of Delius.

And his choices from the standard repertory are as unconventional. One is Schubert's second symphony, which is more than 100 years old, and has never been played by the Philharmonic.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Oct. BULLETIN 29/36



Public Library Offers Books of Help to Students of Music

Some Suggested as Being of Value to Both Player and Listener. — One Discusses Use of Music in Family Life

The books on the shelves of the music department at the Providence Public Library may be of service in contributing to the ideals as well as the musicianship of music students, and, by means of valuable interpretative articles, arouse a desire for more intelligent work. Of value alike to the player and to the listener are descriptive analyses, for both listening and interpretation require a certain technique. Among the handbooks for the pianist may be found such titles as "Descriptive Analyses of Piano Works," by Perry (9099.680); "A Handbook to Chopin's Works," by Jonson (9099.203); "Beethoven's Pianoforte Works," by Marx (9099.510), and "What the Piano Writings of Edward MacDowell Mean to the Piano Student," by Adams (9799.126). And for the violinist there are "Violin Master Works and Their Interpretation," by Auer (9099.652); "Selected Violin Solos and How to Play Them," by Althaus (9099.588); "Analysis and Interpretation of Special Violin Compositions," by Eighteen American Teachers (9099.337).

We learn to hear by listening. As music needs to be heard to be enjoyed, it follows that the ear should be taught to recognize all the material of which music is made. This thought is brought out in many helpful volumes, ready to aid the listener. Recent ones include "The Art of Enjoying Music," by Spaeth (8099.757), planned for those totally inexperienced; "Music to the Listening Ear," by Earhart (9099.738), telling of design in music and its effect on feeling; "Music Appreciation," by Scholes (780.1 S368), concerned with the practices and methods of teaching appreciation; "Music for Everybody" (9099.775), a little book in the Leisure League of America series, telling of the structure of music in its various forms, and adding a list of 22 books on music for the benefit of those sufficiently interested to read further; and "The Layman's Music Book," by Samaroff (780.72 S87), the outgrowth of courses in appreciation conducted by the author in New York and Philadelphia.

Among other helpful guides that have recently appeared are "How to Understand Music," by Thompson (780.072 T47); "A Musical Companion," by Erskine (780.1 E73); Music and How to Enjoy It," by Elliot (780.1 E46); and "Intelligent Listening to Music," by Johnson (780.1 J71).

Listeners at symphony concerts should find helpful the books consisting of program notes, with their historical, critical and descriptive comments. Philip Hale's "Boston Symphony Program Notes" (785.11 H163), Downes's "Symphonic Masterpieces" (785.11 D74sm); and the "Victor Book of the Symphony" (785.11 018) are among those in continual use. Of especial interest at this time is the book which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has published in connection with the opening of another concert season (780.920 B912). It consists of a series of charcoal drawings of its members, in which the concert-goer will recognize many familiar faces. The artist is Gerome Brush, who also comments briefly on each player and adds bits of personal history.

Continued above

Young musicians, with a flair for composing, may obtain best results for this fascinating occupation by a study of some of the volumes on composition. "Elements of the Theory of Music," by Wrightson (9099.456), is a good textbook for the novice. "Composition for Beginners," by Hamilton (9099.497), presupposing no knowledge of harmony, begins with simple forms and continues until the classic Minuet is reached. "How to Compose a Song," by Newton (9099.593); "Song-Writing and Song-making," by Chaffin (9099,493) and "The Song-Writers' Guide," by Wickes (9799.194), offer advice to budding composers. More advanced in scope are "Melody Writing and Ear Training," by Dickey and French (9099.587), which serves as a preparation for the study of harmony; "Harmony and Melody," by Hill (9099.606), explaining their use in the simple forms of music; "Exercises in Melody-Writing," by Goetschius (9099.674), designed chiefly as a course collateral with the study of harmony; and "How to Write a Good Tune," by Patterson (9099.555), which formulates principles by which a work may be judged.

Many pupils are required to perform from memory and are also expected to play or sing at sight. For pianists, "Sight Reading and Memory Lessons," by Tapper (MT175-P.1.4), or "Musical Memory and Its Cultivation," by Shinn (9099.479), should aid; while "Self Instruction in Sight Singing," by Taylor (90902.108) and "The Singer's Compendium," by Carpenter (9992.4) should assist singers in acquiring the ability to read vocal music.

The study of music in general is considered in two volumes by Farnsworth; "The Why and How of Music Study" (9399.7.3) and How to Study Music" (9799.96). The first discusses the application of mental effort to music study; the second shows how to make good use of music in family life.

TRANSCRIPT, TUESDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1936

43.

and Musicians --- Ne

News of Music

Louis Krasner Will Play Berg's Violin Concerto at Symphony Concerts Late in the Season

There will be two notable new violin concertos presented to the audiences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. One by Roger Sessions, with Albert Spalding as soloist, was announced in the preseasonal prospectus. The other will be Alban Berg's, about which these columns have already carried considerable information.

The soloist in the Berg work will be, of course, Louis Krasner, the Boston violinist for whom it was written, and who has never previously appeared with the Boston Orchestra, although he played the Casella Concerto under the composer's direction at a Pops concert some years ago. Mr. Krasner, who played the Berg Concerto with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra on Sunday, announced then to an Associated Press correspondent that the Boston performances would be in April. Inquiry here reveals that the dates now set are Friday and Saturday, April 16 and 17. The performances will, of course, be the first in America. Thus far the performances of the work have been limited to the one at the Barcelona Festival last April, the broadcast by the B. B. C. in London the following month, and at Vienna, day before yesterday. There will be several other European performances, however, before the American premiere.

Boston Symphony's Unique Matinees To Begin Tuesday

Somerville Oct. 29/36

A concert season of unique distinction opens Tuesday at three o'clock in Symphony Hall, Boston. For this will be the opening of the annual series of six symphonic matinees in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays what might be termed programs with a plot, under the leadership of its world famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. He does the plotting, and always is able to find something new. The music of last year's matinees was assembled nation by nation. This time the plot of the season will be music drawn from the masters of the nineteenth century, who are known as "the romantic school." They made great advances in the art of writing for orchestra, besides infusing their work with great approval to the emotions and the imagination.

To hear the characteristic works of the nineteenth century masters as Koussevitzky will group them at the Tuesday matinees at approximately monthly intervals, will be to range over some of the most glorious music of the world. The composers will include Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Liszt, Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Debussy and Sibelius.

Although the entire strength of the Boston Symphony, 109 players, is heard in the Tuesday matinees, these concerts are looked on by many as a bargain symphony series. Due simply to there being only six concerts,

---

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL

OCT 2? 1936

BOSTON SYMPHONY 1936

by

GEROME BRUSH

Reviewed byt Victor Nilsson

GEROME BRUSH, the eminent artist and cartoonist, has accomplished a highly original and amusing work with his "Boston Symphony Orchestra 1936." It is prefaced with an "Appreciation" by Edward Weeks, who reminds one of the design with which Henry Lee Higginson founded the world famous orchestra at the Hub. His plans called for an orchestra of seventy selected musicians; for concerts which should be short rather than long; for a conductor, and for one conductor alone, who would make the orchestra good. "His ideas were so good that they grew; the orchestra today is half again as big as the original, it has survived the threat of war, strikes and hard times, it has established itself as an institution by which one may measure the prowess of Boston."

Then comes a foreword of less than twenty lines by the artist himself of which the last few will be quoted: "Today, unnoticed, waiting for a traffic light to turn green, hesitate unassuming men, for the safest moment to cross the street and get into the tuning up room of Symphony hall. I have had the good fortune to be allowed in this tuning room, and here they are."

Mr. Brush had his artist's paraphernalia when he entered, and his is a "capital" presentment in charcoal drawings of all the orchestra members, headed by the great chief, Serge Koussevitzky, otherwise "beheaded" without regard for age or rank, in alphabetical order with a mouthpiece here or a neck there of an instrument for attribute or identification. Also some biographical data for each. And it is all steeped in artistry, sure observation and good natured humor, without caricature.

LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL

OCT 29 1936

Russian Choir Friday At Brunswick Town Hall

First in a Series of Monthly Concerts Being Sponsored by Bowdoin College

BRUNSWICK, Oct. 29 (Special)—The appearance of the Russian Symphonic Choir in Brunswick Town Hall Friday evening, marks the inauguration of a series of monthly concerts arranged by Prof. Frederic Tillotson, professor of music. Admission to students will be free.

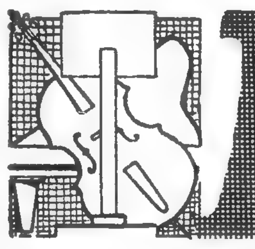
The choir is generally rated as outstanding among Russian choral societies in the world. Its program here will consist mainly of works of Russian composers, including a transcription of Chopin's C Minor Nocturne, especially arranged for the director, Basile Kibalchich.

The choir is limited to 20 members, each a soloist with an important part to play in each number. As a result it has been compared to a string orchestra and critics have emphasized the orchestral effects achieved by it. Besides the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this group was the only one to appear at the Harvard Tercentenary.

Its director had previously gained a distinguished reputation in Europe as leader of the Archangelsky Choir of Petrograd, also as choir conductor at the Russian Cathedral at Geneva, and later at the Russian Cathedral in Paris. At one time he made a two year tour of Russia as conductor of the Choir of the Petrograd Conservatory of Music, during which he was highly praised for his original ideas in scoring his music.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 28 19



MUSIC

By G. Y. Loveridge

Splendid Performance of Liszt's "Faust" Symphony Given by Boston Symphony Orchestra, Harvard Singers, Led by Dr. Koussevitzky

As individuals and as a band, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night displayed its unexcelled abilities in a memorable concert in Metropolitan Theatre. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The Harvard Glee Club and Rulon Y. Robison, tenor soloist, took part.

It was a social as well as a musical event. Furs, jewels and other finery made the audience a bright spectacle, and the streets were cluttered with the customary limousines and taxicabs. There was a good-sized and cordial audience, but there were likewise many vacant places. Twenty-five thousand persons will gather to see Penn trample Brown, but when Mozart and Liszt make first down for art and civilization, there are still some seats left among 3400. Even one of the best orchestras in the world, with the Harvard Glee Club thrown in, cannot alter that.

The program comprized Mozart's Symphony in A major and Liszt's Faust Symphony. A contrast there, indeed. Mozart's symphony was composed when he was but 18, Liszt's when he was more than 40. Mozart contents himself with strings, two oboes and two horns. Liszt calls upon the great modern orchestra, with chorus besides.

It might be thought that Mozart would fare poorly against such competition, but not so. At least, it did not seem so to those of us musical cave-dwellers who still like Mozart. Under Dr. Koussevitzky's graceful and compelling hands, the symphony took shape as something exquisite and rare, the sometimes gay and sometimes languorous creation of a boy who did not know that already half his life was done, or that he was an immortal. After writing that line, we pause to consider how distressed we should be if somebody were to show, presently, that Mozart didn't compose the symphony. Such things have happened. But no, it must have been Mozart. Nobody else had such ease and artful artlessness.

Here one heard to finest advantage the orchestra's famed strings, brilliant, mellow or spirited as Dr. Koussevitzky desired, showing the most exact shadings and dynamic refinements. We had rather watch such bowing than watch the West Point cadets march. And as for the fingering, even the trills were perfectly matched and executed.

This was a work that did not burden the hearer with evidence of deep thought or strivings of the soul. It was like a flower in a storm compared to some of what was to follow.

Lizst's Faust symphony, although considered one of his best works, is seldom played. The current popularity of it is due to a double anniversary this year, the 125th of his birth and the 50th of his death.

The symphony proved of strong interest. Although more than an hour was required to perform it, and there were passages that seemed dull and digressive, it held the earnest attention of the audience. The Faust legend, which has prompted creative efforts by so many writers, musicians and painters, plainly had stirred Liszt sincerely. Dr. Koussevitzky, coaxing his men, lashing them into a tonal fury, smiling, scowling, wrung from this score every drop of meaning, it seemed. For different persons there are different meanings. Liszt has merely designated the three "character pictures" as Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles, and one must search out the qualities and significance oneself.

The numerous solo passages gave opportunity to enjoy the work of many of the orchestra's virtuosi separately. Oboe, viola, horn, the flute so often admired in the "Afternoon of a Faun," all had their individual moments and took the stage with confidence and authority. And there was a headlong pizzicatto passage for the double-basses that was admirably performed.

In the Faust movement five themes are discerned. Dr. Koussevitzky brought them out in clear statement and joined them smoothly. At the beginning of the movement one found Faust in thoughtful mood, sometimes perplexed and melancholy, brooding on the futility of his life. Then he becomes romantic (according to the oboe), and is led from one turn of mind to another, until finally there is a triumphant swing and surging in the brasses, which seems to signify some sort of triumph. Dr. Koussevitzky spun out this web with masterly hand, and dyed it with all the tone colors at his command. Precision of attack, beauty of tone, fluent technique were all in evidence. In spite of the somewhat episodic character of this movement, and the conflicting moods it evokes, Dr. Koussevitzky gave it unity and solid impact.

The Gretchen movement, built upon two songful themes, was performed with the same consistent artistry. The Gretchen revealed in this movement, as has been discovered and announced a long time ago, is the innocent and lovely girl of Faust's early acquaintance, and does not depict her in the prison phase of her existence. Again one heard the oboe at its best.

In the final movement, devoted to Mephistopheles, the themes associated with Faust are burlesqued and battered about from one section of the orchestra to another. The strings that had sung so pleasantly now growl and whine. Faust is mocked at every turn, and only now and then do the unchanged themes of the Gretchen movement lighten, and emphasize the gloom.

The chorus and Mr. Robison singing with the orchestra, brought the piece to a solemn impressive hopeful conclusion. The young men sang earnestly and feelingly, with commendable diction, and Mr. Robison's fine tenor, floating above the orchestral accompaniment, was truly moving. Only once was there evidence of the strain occasioned by singing the difficult part.

Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled several times by insistent applause, which he shared with soloist, orchestra and chorus.

Between the two symphonies, Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe spoke briefly about the festival of Brahms chamber music to take place next month in the School of Design Museum.

TRANSCRIPT

Dedham Mass

?0 1936

Boston Symphony Draws Concertgoers From Dedham

Dedham music lovers are to be found in every audience which congregates at Symphony Hall, Boston, to enjoy the weekly and monthly concerts of that group of world-famed musicians. Dedham subscribers to the Friday and Saturday afternoon 1936-7 series are—Mrs. R. M. Currier, Mrs. John Cutter, Mrs. Robert F. Daley, Miss Isabel Cobb French, Mrs. John Phillip Hartt, Mrs. John Harwood, Jr., Mrs. Fay Miller, Mrs. Alfred H. B. Peabody, Mrs. John C. Rice, Mrs. Leslie Soule, Mrs. Winthrop H. Wade, Miss Margaret Warren, Mrs. W. C. Williams, Mr. Samuel Endicott, Mr. Howard Goding, Mrs. W. G. Nickerson, Mrs. James R. Hooper, and Mr. James R. Hooper, Jr.

At the Monday evening concerts may be noted Miss E. Marguerite Allen, Miss Margaret Boyd, Mrs. Loring Conant, Miss Lucy Ellis Fisher, Miss Carrie Frances Hill, Miss Alice F. Hill, Miss Sophie Hills, Mrs. George E. Kunhardt, Jr., Miss Alice F. Marsh, Mr. Theodore T. Marsh, Mr. Carlisle Neff, and Miss Sybil Rolland.

Regularly attending the monthly Tuesday afternoon concerts are Mrs. A. H. Amory, Miss Frances M. Baker, Mrs. Rebecca C. Birdsall, Miss Mary Cole, Miss Eliza N. Converse, Miss Mary E. Cormerais, Mrs. Walter Dean, Miss Edith Loring, Mrs. R. P. K. Neff, Mrs. Alvan F. Worthington, Mrs. Edward Wright and Mr. George Ellis.

FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD-NEWS

OCT 30 1936

MUSIC

It was chance more than anything else that transformed Harold Bauer from a violinist into one of the world's greatest pianists. Bauer was born in London and at the age of five began his musical career, dividing his enthusiasm between the violin and piano.

A child prodigy, Bauer made his debut as a violinist, and during boyhood he toured England as a violin virtuoso. While going through Russia, his pianist-accompanist once failed to appear, forcing the young violinist to change plans. He filled the program by playing some of the best selections of his repertoire, and was given an ovation by an admiring audience.

At the end of the tour he was aclaimed as a pianist, and Paderewski, hearing him play, predicted a great future for him at the pianoforte.

After three years of diligent study, young Bauer made his debut as a pianist with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, which he followed with a serious of triumphs in the musical capitals of Europe. He played for the first time in America in 1901, appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Since his world tour in 1914, Mr. Bauer has confined appearance to this country.

Edward Johnson, manager of the Metropolitan Opera Association, who last Spring said he would devote much of his time scouting for a potential Caruso for the Metropolitan Company, only recently reported that the opera management would have to get along with its present tenors again this season. Mr. Johnson stated he will resume his search for a tenor of the Caruso type next year.

New singers engaged for the coming season at the Metropolitan are Murial Dickson, Natalia Bodanskaya, Anna Kaskas, Lucielle Browing, Sydney Rainer, Arthur Carron, Nicholas Massue, George Rasely, Wilfred Engleman, Norman Cordon, John Gurney, Mario Chamlee and Armand Tokatyan.

Seven of these but a year ago walked into the audition rooms of the Metropolitan with an inherent desire to some day be singing with the famous opera company. Today their ambition has been gratified.

R. G. de T.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

OCT 30 19

Edward Morris to Give Albany Concert Tonight

Edward Morris, dean of the piano teaching profession of Albany and head of the Morris-Hummel Conservatory of Music tonight makes his first public appearance in a number of years at the Albany Institute of History and Art in that city.

Mr. Morris, who was a child prodigy, began his musical education at a very early age, making his debut on the concert stage when seven years old. He has appeared in the capitals of Europe and throughout the United States. When 17 he was soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He also has been soloist with the New York Philharmonic and Philadelphia Symphony Orchestras. In addition to being a concert pianist, Mr. Morris has also achieved success as teacher and composer. One of his pupils to achieve distinction in the musical world is Stanley Hummel, who recently made his successful debut on the New York concert stage.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 1 - 1936

A large and enthusiastic audience greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Theatre Tuesday evening when the first concert of the season was presented by that group under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

◆ ◆ ◆

Transcript, Oct. 29, 1936

Stravinsky Again

Something About His "Baiser de la Fee," to Be Played at This Week's Symphony Concerts

By Moses Smith

Stravinsky's suite, "Le Baiser de la Fee," which will be given its first Boston performances at the Boston Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, has been played only once before hereabouts—at a concert of the Boston Orchestra in Cambridge on March 14, 1935, when the composer was the conductor. At that time the work was somewhat crowded out of the public interest by the larger, later and more important novelty that was to be given its first American performances on the following days in Symphony Hall—"Persephone."

This was a pity, for of those who heard the performance of "Le Baiser de la Fee" many were fairly delighted with Stravinsky's concoction while most of those who disagreed were at least of the opinion that this Stravinskian experiment was provocative and stimulating. Since the music was written for a ballet of normal dimensions it does not constitute one of Stravinsky's longer scores; nor is it one of his more pretentious ones.

But let us see what the composer himself has to say about the work and the circumstances surrounding its composition. These are described in the admirable "Autobiography," the English translation of which has just been published in America. At the end of 1927, Stravinsky writes, just as he was finishing the music for "Apollo Musagetes," he received a proposal from Ida Rubinstein, the dancer, to compose a ballet for her. "The idea was," he says, "that I should compose something inspired by the music of Tchaikovsky," of whose music Stravinsky has been fond.

Stravinsky chose his story from Hans Christian Andersen, a poet whose "imaginative mind" Stravinsky found akin to that of Tchaikovsky. The story is summarized simply by Stravinsky. "A fairy imprints her magic kiss on a child at birth and parts it from its mother. Twenty years later, when the youth has attained the very zenith of his good fortune, she repeats the fatal kiss and carries him off to live in supreme happiness with her ever afterwards."

"As my object," explains Stravinsky, "was to commemorate the work of Tchaikovsky, this subject seemed to me to be particularly appropriate as an allegory, the muse having similarly branded Tchaikovsky with her fatal kiss, and the magic imprint has made itself felt in all the musical creations of this great artist." This allegorical explanation, it should be noted, is also given on the title page of the score in connection with the dedication of the piece "to the memory of Peter Tchaikovsky," whose Muse "inspired" it.

This ballet was to be, in Stravinsky's mind, classical in presentation, like the preceding "Apollo." The choreography was made by Bronislava Nijinska, bit by bit as the composer sent his parts from his summer house. Stravinsky did not see the piece until shortly before the first performance. Invitably, therefore, he found some of the scenes less worthy of his approval than others. In fact he sets down bluntly that "the choreography of 'Le Baiser de la Fee' left me cold." He also explains his exasperation with the system of substitutes in the orchestra of the opera, where he prepared the first performance.

As to the content of the music and specific references to its quality Stravinsky says little. (The "Autobiography" is principally a factual record.) But he explains his reason for liking to conduct the orchestral suite made the ballet: "because in it suite made from the ballet: "because in it I tried a style of writing and orchestration which was new to me and was one by means of which the music could be appreciated at the first hearing."

In an article that appeared in these columns just before the Sanders Theater performance a couple of years ago and in the review the following day, the present writer said something about the substance of the score. The themes are from Tchaikovsky, for the most part lesser Tchaikovsky. But the present writer recognized at that first hearing not only quotations from the piano pieces and the ballets (Stravinsky, by the way, would not subscribe to a characterization of the latter as minor Tchaikovsky) but also from the Fourth and Fifth Symphonies, among other sources. The quotations are not exact, bearing usually the image of the contemporary master. The same is true of the harmony and orchestration, which are partly Tchaikovskian in flavor, partly Stravinskian.

One can take this music seriously or not. As a joke it makes capital fun in the opinion of some. Others are willing to take Stravinsky at his word, which is to the effect that the music is inspired by his reverend regard for the spirit of Tchaikovsky's music. Among those who insist that the music is neither humorous nor reverent, but that it represents merely another posturing of Stravinsky, is Constant Lambert, who, in his book, "Music Ho," presents a merciless—but plausible and able—dissection of what he calls the "synthetic nature of Stravinsky's neo-classicism."

He regards "Le Baiser de la Fee," "Oedipus Rex" and "Apollo Musagete," as "not so much music as renowned impersonations of music." He thinks that "Le Baiser de la Fee" is "perhaps the most surrealist of his (Stravinsky's) works, combining the nationalist charm of 'L'Oiseau de Feu' with the neo-classical solemnities of his later period. This analysis of charm is not so much a killing of the goose that lays the golden eggs as a dissection of the egg that might have produced another Golden Bird."

From which it may be seen that Igor Stravinsky remains one of the most fruitful subjects for controversy.

* * *

The rest of this week's program consists of Schumann's D minor Symphony and the Dvorak Violin Concerto. The latter, with Ruth Posselt to play the solo part, will be something of a revival, inasmuch as the work has not been heard at a Boston Symphony concert since shortly after the war. The Schumann Symphony has not been entirely neglected by Dr. Koussevitzky, although it does not enlist his affections, evidently, as much as the First Symphony in B-flat major. The Symphony to be heard tomorrow and Saturday will be presented, as customarily, in the revised version. The original version was sketched shortly after the First Symphony; and what are usually called Schumann's Second and Third Symphonies are thus really his Third and Fourth.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

OCT 31 1936

UNIQUE CONCERT SERIES PROMISED

Boston Symphony Matinees, with Plot, to Be Opened Tuesday

BOSTON, Oct. 31.—A concert season of unique distinction opens Tuesday at 3 o'clock in Symphony opening of the annual series of six hall, Boston. For this will be the symphonic matinees in which the Boston Symphony orchestra plays what might be termed programs with a plot, under the leadership of its world-famous conductor, Serge Koussevitsky. He does the plotting, and always is able to find something new. The music of last year's matinees was assembled nation by nation. This time the plot of the season will be music drawn from the masters of the 19th century, who are known as "the romantic school." They made great advances in the art of writing for orchestra, besides infusing their work with great appeal to the emotions and the imagination.

To hear the characteristic works of the 19th century masters, as Koussevitzky will group them at the Tuesday matinees at approximately monthly intervals, will be to range over some of the most glorious music of the world. The composers will include Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Liszt, Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Debussy and Sibelius.

Although the entire strength of the Boston symphony, 109 players, is heard in the Tuesday matinees, these concerts are looked on by many as a bargain symphony series. Due simply to there being only six concerts, whereas there are 24 on Fridays and Saturdays. Reserved season tickets are inexpensive. Also, the late starting time, 3 o'clock, appeals to out-of-towners.

On Tuesday, November 3, the program is scheduled to include: The Fifth Symphony of Beethoven; Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overtyre, and the "Unfinished" Symphony of Schubert.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 29 1936

ON LIBRARY SHELVES

Music Students and Those Wishing to Understand Music Played by Others Are Offered Books to Broaden Their Knowledge

The books on the shelves of the music department at the Providence Public Library may be of service in contributing to the ideals as well as the musicianship of music students, and, by means of valuable interpretative articles, arouse a desire for more intelligent work. Of value alike to the player and to the listener are descriptive analyses, for both listening and interpretation require a certain technique. Among the handbooks for the pianist may be found such titles as "Descriptive Analyses of Piano Works," by Perry (9099.-680); "A Handbook to Chopin's Works," by Jonson (9099.203); "Beethoven's Pianoforte Works," by Marx (9099.510), and "What the Piano Writings of Edward MacDowell Mean to the Piano Student," by Adams (9799.-126). And for the violinist there are "Violin Master Works and Their Interpretation," by Auer (9099.652); "Selected Violin Solos and How to Play Them," by Althaus (9099.588); "Analysis and Interpretation of Special Violin Compositions," by Eighteen American Teachers (9099.-337).

We learn to hear by listening. As music needs to be heard to be enjoyed, it follows that the ear should be taught to recognize all the material of which music is made. This thought is brought out in many helpful volumes, ready to aid the listener. Recent ones include "The Art of Enjoying Music," by Spaeth (8099.757), planned for those totally inexperienced; "Music to the Listening Ear," by Earhart (9099.738), telling of design in music and its effect on feeling; "Music Appreciation," by Scholes (780.1 S368), concerned with the practices and methods of teaching appreciation; "Music for Everybody" (9099.775), a little book in the Leisure League of America series, telling of the structure of music in its various forms, and adding a list of 22 books on music for the benefit of those sufficiently interested to read further; and "The Layman's Music Book," by Samaroff (780.72 S87), the outgrowth of courses in appreciation conducted by the author in New York and Philadelphia.

Among other helpful guides that have recently appeared are "How to Understand Music," by Thompson (780.072 T47); "A Musical Companion," by Erskine (780.1 E73); Music and How to Enjoy It," by Elliot (780.1 E46); and "Intelligent Listening to Music," by Johnson (780.1 J71).

Listeners at symphony concerts should find helpful the books consisting of program notes, with their historical, critical and descriptive comments. Philip Hale's "Boston Symphony Program Notes" (785.11 H165); Downes's "Symphonic Masterpieces" (785.11 D74sm); and the "Victor Book of the Symphony" (785.11 018) are among those in continual use. Of especial interest at this time is the book which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has published in connection with the opening of another concert season (780.920 B912). It consists of a series of charcoal drawings of its members, in which the concert-goer will recognize many familiar faces. The artist is Gerome Brush, who also comments briefly on each player and adds bits of personal history.

Young musicians, with a flair for composing, may obtain best results for this fascinating occupation by a study of some of the volumes on composition. "Elements of the Theory of Music," by Wrightson (9099.456), is a good textbook for the novice. "Composition for Beginners," by Hamilton (9099.497), presupposing no knowledge of harmony, begins with simple forms and continues until the classic Minuet is reached. "How to Compose a Song," by Newton (9099.593); "Song-Writing and Song-making," by Chaffin (9099.493), and "The Song-Wirters' Guide," by Wickes (9799.194), offer advice to budding composers. More advanced in scope are "Melody Writing and Ear Training," by Dickey and French (9099.587), which serves as a preparation for the study of harmony; "Harmony and Melody," by Hill (9099.606), explaining their use in the simple forms of music; "Exercises in Melody-Writing," by Goetschius (9099.674), designed chiefly as a course collateral with the study of harmony; and "How to Write a Good Tune," by Patterson (9099.555), which formulates principles by which a work may be judged.

Many pupils are required to perform from memory and are also expected to play or sing at sight. For pianists, "Sight Reading and Memory Lessons," by Tapper (MT175-P.1.4), or "Musical Memory and Its Cultivation," by Shinn (9099.479), should aid; while "Self Instruction in Sight Singing," by Taylor (90902.-108) and "The Singer's Compendium,"by Carpenter (9'992.4) should assist singers in acquiring the ability to read vocal music.

The study of music in general is considered in two volumes by Farnsworth: "The Why and How of Music Study" (9399.7.3) and How to Study Music" (9799.96). The first discusses the application of mental effort to music study; the second shows how to make good use of music in family life.

WOBURN, MASS.
TIMES

OCT 3 1936

Boston Symphony's Unique Matinees

A concert season of unique distinction opens Tuesday at 3 o'clock in Symphony Hall, Boston. For this will be the opening of the annual series of six symphonic matinees in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays what might be termed programs with a plot, under the leadership of its world-famous conductor, Serge Kossevitzky. He does the plotting, and always is able to find something new. The music of last year's matinees was assembled nation by nation. This time the plot of the season will be music drawn from the masters of the nineteenth century, who are known as "the romantic school." They made great advances in the art of writing for orchestra, besides infusing their work with great appeal to the emotions and the imagination.

To hear the characteristic work of the nineteenth century masters, as Koussevitzky will group them at the Tuesday matinees at approximately monthly intervals, will be range over some of the most glorious music of the world. The composers will include Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Liszt, Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Debussy and Sibelius.

Although the entire strength of the Boston Symphony, 109 players, is heard in the Tuesday matinees, these concerts are looked on by many as a bargain symphony series. Due simply to there being only six concerts, whereas there are twenty-four on Fridays and Saturdays, reserved season tickets are inexpensive. Also, the late starting-time, three o'clock, appeals to out-of-towners.

On Tuesday, November 3, the programme is scheduled to include: the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven; Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture, and the "Unfinishd Symphony" of Schubert.

SYMPHONY AIDED BY SOLOIST

Ruth Posselt, Violinist, Plays Dvorak's Concerto

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is not necessary that the Symphony Concerts should dwell always upon the heights. Between Liszt's "Faust Symphony" of last week and Mahler's "Song of the Earth" of next Dr. Koussevitzky has set for the concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening a pleasant programme consisting of pieces by Stravinsky,—yes, Stravinsky,—Dvorak and Schumann.

"THE FAIRY'S KISS"

The first of these, new to Boston although conducted by the composer in Cambridge in the spring of 1935, was the Divertimento, really a suite, drawn from Stravinsky's intentioned homage to Tchaikovsky, the ballet "The Fairy's Kiss." Dvorak, increasingly rare visitor to Symphony Hall nowadays, was represented by his Concerto for the Violin, last played there in 1919 by Albert Spalding and now performed by Ruth Posselt, who is making her initial appearance at the "regular" concerts. From Schumann came the Symphony that is to be reckoned as No. 2 or as No. 4, according to whether one considers the date of composition or that of publication.

In "The Fairy's Kiss," written for Ida Rubinstein in 1928, Stravinsky has not only used actual quotations from Tchaikovsky but has everywhere striven not to depart too far from the spirit of the elder master.

Ingenious Orchestration

It is easy enough to say that pure Tchaikovsky or unalloyed Stravinsky is preferable to this oddest of musical alliances. Yet the result, if a bit too consciously sweet and tepid, is far from tepid, is far from unagreeable. There are refreshingly lively episodes, and the orchestration is ingenious to a degree. Needless to say, the performance yesterday was marked by verve and finish.

The answering applause was probably heartier than at any other Stravinskian premiere in Symphony Hall, and Messrs. Burgin, Bedetti and Freiberg, first violin, first violoncello and first horn, respectively, were called upon to take soloists' bows.

Miss Posselt's Playing

Composers come and go and one need shed no tears over Dvorak. He had his day, nor is it quite yet done. This Concerto is not devoid of charm, though there was still reason to be thankful that the performance yesterday, from both orchestra and soloist, was one that might be relished for itself alone. As a matter of fact the music was as becoming to Miss Posselt's blond girlishness as was the brilliant red dress which set her off so vividly against the orchestra, and she played it brightly, suavely, with unassuming virtuosity. At least Dvorak could score; his music always sounds, and the orchestral tone yesterday caressed and titillated the ear no less than did that of the young soloist.

Again there was warm applause, and there were many recalls for a Boston girl in an enviable position.

Schumann Vital

After the posing Stravinsky and the fading Dvorak, Schumann, even of this most intimate of symphonies, seemed astonishly vital and robust. Indeed, a little less robustness here and there would have been more in keeping with the nature of the music. Also there are places, particularly in the first movement, where strings and wind are bowing and blowing away on the same notes, in which Dr. Koussevitzky might well follow the example of Mahler and others and silence one of the choirs. But all this is carping and quibbling. The performance as a whole was one for which to be grateful.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 31 1936

* * *

ONE of the real dates of the present musical season is Dec. 8, when Mrs. Zorah B. Berry will bring the world-famous Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The concert will be the fourth in the series under Mrs. Berry's management.

* * *

Transcript, Oct. 29, 1936

Stravinsky Again

Something About His "Baiser de la Fee," to Be Played at This Week's Symphony Concerts

By Moses Smith

Stravinsky's suite, "Le Baiser de la Fee," which will be given its first Boston performances at the Boston Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, has been played only once before hereabouts—at a concert of the Boston Orchestra in Cambridge on March 14, 1935, when the composer was the conductor. At that time the work was somewhat crowded out of the public interest by the larger, later and more important novelty that was to be given its first American performances on the following days in Symphony Hall—"Persephone."

This was a pity, for of those who heard the performance of "Le Baiser de la Fee" many were fairly delighted with Stravinsky's concoction while most of those who disagreed were at least of the opinion that this Stravinskian experiment was provocative and stimulating. Since the music was written for a ballet of normal dimensions it does not constitute one of Stravinsky's longer scores; nor is it one of his more pretentious ones.

But let us see what the composer himself has to say about the work and the circumstances surrounding its composition. These are described in the admirable "Autobiography," the English translation of which has just been published in America. At the end of 1927, Stravinsky writes, just as he was finishing the music for "Apollo Musagetes," he received a proposal from Ida Rubinstein, the dancer, to compose a ballet for her. "The idea was," he says, "that I should compose something inspired by the music of Tchaikovsky," of whose music Stravinsky has been fond.

Stravinsky chose his story from Hans Christian Andersen, a poet whose "imaginative mind" Stravinsky found akin to that of Tchaikovsky. The story is summarized simply by Stravinsky. "A fairy imprints her magic kiss on a child at birth and parts it from its mother. Twenty years later, when the youth has attained the very zenith of his good fortune, she repeats the fatal kiss and carries him off to live in supreme happiness with her ever afterwards."

"As my object," explains Stravinsky, "was to commemorate the work of Tchaikovsky, this subject seemed to me to be particularly appropriate as an allegory, the muse having similarly branded Tchaikovsky with her fatal kiss, and the magic imprint has made itself felt in all the musical creations of this great artist." This allegorical explanation, it should be noted, is also given on the title page of the score in connection with the dedication of the piece "to the memory of Peter Tchaikovsky," whose Muse "inspired" it.

This ballet was to be, in Stravinsky's mind, classical in presentation, like the preceding "Apollo." The choreography was made by Bronislava Nijinska, bit by bit as the composer sent his parts from his summer house. Stravinsky did not see the piece until shortly before the first performance. Invitably, therefore, he found some of the scenes less worthy of his approval than others. In fact he sets down bluntly that "the choreography of 'Le Baiser de la Fee' left me cold." He also explains his exasperation with the system of substitutes in the orchestra of the opera, where he prepared the first performance.

As to the content of the music and specific references to its quality Stravinsky says little. (The "Autobiography" is principally a factual record.) But he explains his reason for liking to conduct the orchestral suite made the ballet: "because in it suite made from the ballet: "because in it I tried a style of writing and orchestration which was new to me and was one by means of which the music could be appreciated at the first hearing."

In an article that appeared in these columns just before the Sanders Theater performance a couple of years ago and in the review the following day, the present writer said something about the substance of the score. The themes are from Tchaikovsky, for the most part lesser Tchaikovsky. But the present writer recognized at that first hearing not only quotations from the piano pieces and the ballets (Stravinsky, by the way, would not subscribe to a characterization of the latter as minor Tchaikovsky) but also from the Fourth and Fifth Symphonies, among other sources. The quotations are not exact, bearing usually the image of the contemporary master. The same is true of the harmony and orchestration, which are partly Tchaikovskian in flavor, partly Stravinskian.

One can take this music seriously or not. As a joke it makes capital fun in the opinion of some. Others are willing to take Stravinsky at his word, which is to the effect that the music is inspired by his reverend regard for the spirit of Tchaikovsky's music. Among those who insist that the music is neither humorous nor reverent, but that it represents merely another posturing of Stravinsky, is Constant Lambert, who, in his book, "Music Ho," presents a merciless—but plausible and able—dissection of what he calls the "synthetic nature of Stravinsky's neoclassicism."

He regards "Le Baiser de la Fee," "Oedipus Rex" and "Apollo Musagete," as "not so much music as renowned impersonations of music." He thinks that "Le Baiser de la Fee" is "perhaps the most surrealist of his (Stravinsky's) works, combining the nationalist charm of 'L'Oiseau de Feu' with the neo-classical solemnities of his later period. This analysis of charm is not so much a killing of the goose that lays the golden eggs as a dissection of the egg that might have produced another Golden Bird."

From which it may be seen that Igor Stravinsky remains one of the most fruitful subjects for controversy.

* * *

The rest of this week's program consists of Schumann's D minor Symphony and the Dvorak Violin Concerto. The latter, with Ruth Posselt to play the solo part, will be something of a revival, inasmuch as the work has not been heard at a Boston Symphony concert since shortly after the war. The Schumann Symphony has not been entirely neglected by Dr. Koussevitzky, although it does not enlist his affections, evidently, as much as the First Symphony in B-flat major. The Symphony to be heard tomorrow and Saturday will be presented, as customarily, in the revised version. The original version was sketched shortly after the First Symphony; and what are usually called Schumann's Second and Third Symphonies are thus really his Third and Fourth.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

OCT 31 1936

UNIQUE CONCERT SERIES PROMISED

Boston Symphony Matinees, with Plot, to Be Opened Tuesday

BOSTON, Oct. 31.—A concert season of unique distinction opens Tuesday at 3 o'clock in Symphony opening of the annual series of six hall, Boston. For this will be the symphonic matinees in which the Boston Symphony orchestra plays what might be termed programs with a plot, under the leadership of its world-famous conductor, Serge Koussevitsky. He does the plotting, and always is able to find something new. The music of last year's matinees was assembled nation by nation. This time the plot of the season will be music drawn from the masters of the 19th century, who are known as "the romantic school." They made great advances in the art of writing for orchestra, besides infusing their work with great appeal to the emotions and the imagination.

To hear the characteristic works of the 19th century masters, as Koussevitzky will group them at the Tuesday matinees at approximately monthly intervals, will be to range over some of the most glorious music of the world. The composers will include Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Liszt, Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Debussy and Sibelius.

Although the entire strength of the Boston symphony, 109 players, is heard in the Tuesday matinees, these concerts are looked on by many as a bargain symphony series. Due simply to there being only six concerts, whereas there are 24 on Fridays and Saturdays. Reserved season tickets are inexpensive. Also, the late starting time, 3 o'clock, appeals to out-of-towners.

On Tuesday, November 3, the program is scheduled to include: The Fifth Symphony of Beethoven; Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overtyre, and the "Unfinished" Symphony of Schubert.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 29 1936

ON LIBRARY SHELVES

Music Students and Those Wishing to Understand Music Played by Others Are Offered Books to Broaden Their Knowledge

The books on the shelves of the music department at the Providence Public Library may be of service in contributing to the ideals as well as the musicianship of music students, and, by means of valuable interpretative articles, arouse a desire for more intelligent work. Of value alike to the player and to the listener are descriptive analyses, for both listening and interpretation require a certain technique. Among the handbooks for the pianist may be found such titles as "Descriptive Analyses of Piano Works," by Perry (9099.680); "A Handbook to Chopin's Works," by Jonson (9099.203); "Beethoven's Pianoforte Works," by Marx (9099.510), and "What the Piano Writings of Edward MacDowell Mean to the Piano Student," by Adams (9799.126). And for the violinist there are "Violin Master Works and Their Interpretation," by Auer (9099.652); "Selected Violin Solos and How to Play Them," by Althaus (9099.588); "Analysis and Interpretation of Special Violin Compositions," by Eighteen American Teachers (9099.337).

We learn to hear by listening. As music needs to be heard to be enjoyed, it follows that the ear should be taught to recognize all the material of which music is made. This thought is brought out in many helpful volumes, ready to aid the listener. Recent ones include "The Art of Enjoying Music," by Spaeth (8099.757), planned for those totally inexperienced; "Music to the Listening Ear," by Earhart (9099.738), telling of design in music and its effect on feeling; "Music Appreciation," by Scholes (780.1 S368), concerned with the practices and methods of teaching appreciation; "Music for Everybody" (9099.775), a little book in the Leisure League of America series, telling of the structure of music in its various forms, and adding a list of 22 books on music for the benefit of those sufficiently interested to read further; and "The Layman's Music Book," by Samaroff (780.72 S87), the outgrowth of courses in appreciation conducted by the author in New York and Philadelphia.

Among other helpful guides that have recently appeared are "How to Understand Music," by Thompson (780.072 T47); "A Musical Companion," by Erskine (780.1 E73); Music and How to Enjoy It," by Elliot (780.1 E46); and "Intelligent Listening to Music," by Johnson (780.1 J71).

Listeners at symphony concerts should find helpful the books consisting of program notes, with their historical, critical and descriptive comments. Philip Hale's "Boston Symphony Program Notes" (785.11 H165); Downes's "Symphonic Masterpieces" (785.11 D74sm); and the "Victor Book of the Symphony" (785.11 018) are among those in continual use. Of especial interest at this time is the book which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has published in connection with the opening of another concert season (780.920 B912). It consists of a series of charcoal drawings of its members, in which the concert-goer will recognize many familiar faces. The artist is Gerome Brush, who also comments briefly on each player and adds bits of personal history.

Young musicians, with a flair for composing, may obtain best results for this fascinating occupation by a study of some of the volumes on composition. "Elements of the Theory of Music," by Wrightson (9099.456), is a good textbook for the novice. "Composition for Beginners," by Hamilton (9099.497), presupposing no knowledge of harmony, begins with simple forms and continues until the Classic Minuet is reached. "How to Compose a Song," by Newton (9099.593); "Song-Writing and Song-making," by Chaffin (9099.493), and "The Song-Wirters' Guide," by Wickes (9799.194), offer advice to budding composers. More advanced in scope are "Melody Writing and Ear Training," by Dickey and French (9099.587), which serves as a preparation for the study of harmony; "Harmony and Melody," by Hill (9099.606), explaining their use in the simple forms of music; "Exercises in Melody-Writing," by Goetschius (9099.674), designed chiefly as a course collateral with the study of harmony; and "How to Write a Good Tune," by Patterson (9099.555), which formulates principles by which a work may be judged.

Many pupils are required to perform from memory and are also expected to play or sing at sight. For pianists, "Sight Reading and Memory Lessons," by Tapper (MT175-P.1.4), or "Musical Memory and Its Cultivation," by Shinn (9099.479), should aid; while "Self Instruction in Sight Singing," by Taylor (90902.108) and "The Singer's Compendium,"by Carpenter (91992.4) should assist singers in acquiring the ability to read vocal music.

The study of music in general is considered in two volumes by Farnsworth; "The Why and How of Music Study" (9399.7.3) and How to Study Music" (9799.96). The first discusses the application of mental effort to music study; the second shows how to make good use of music in family life.

WOBURN, MASS.
TIMES

OCT 30 1936

Boston Symphony's Unique Matinees

A concert season of unique distinction opens Tuesday at 3 o'clock in Symphony Hall, Boston. For this will be the opening of the annual series of six symphonic matinees in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays what might be termed programs with a plot, under the leadership of its world-famous conductor, Serge Kossevitzky. He does the plotting, and always is able to find something new. The music of last year's matinees was assembled nation by nation. This time the plot of the season will be music drawn from the masters of the nineteenth century, who are known as "the romantic school." They made great advances in the art of writing for orchestra, besides infusing their work with great appeal to the emotions and the imagination.

To hear the characteristic work of the nineteenth century masters, a Koussevitzky will group them at th Tuesday matinees at approximatel monthly intervals, will be range ove some of the most glorious music o the world. The composers will include Beethoven, Weber, Schubert Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Liszt, Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Debussy and Sibelius.

Although the entire strength of the Boston Symphony, 109 players, is heard in the Tuesday matinees, these concerts are looked on by many as a bargain symphony series. Due simply to there being only six concerts, whereas there are twenty-four on Fridays and Saturdays, reserved season tickets are inexpensive. Also, the late starting-time, three o'clock, appeals to out-of-towners.

On Tuesday, November 3, the programme is scheduled to include: the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven; Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture, and the "Unfinishd Symphony" of Schubert.

SYMPHONY AIDED BY SOLOIST

44.

Ruth Posselt, Violinist, Plays Dvorak's Concerto

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is not necessary that the Symphony Concerts should dwell always upon the heights. Between Liszt's "Faust Symphony" of last week and Mahler's "Song of the Earth" of next Dr. Koussevitzky has set for the concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening a pleasant programme consisting of pieces by Stravinsky,—yes, Stravinsky,—Dvorak and Schumann.

"THE FAIRY'S KISS"

The first of these, new to Boston although conducted by the composer in Cambridge in the spring of 1935, was the Divertimento, really a suite, drawn from Stravinsky's intentioned homage to Tchaikovsky, the ballet "The Fairy's Kiss." Dvorak, increasingly rare visitor to Symphony Hall nowadays, was represented by his Concerto for the Violin, last played there in 1919 by Albert Spalding and now performed by Ruth Posselt, who is making her initial appearance at the "regular" concerts. From Schumann came the Symphony that is to be reckoned as No. 2 or as No. 4, according to whether one considers the date of composition or that of publication.

In "The Fairy's Kiss," written for Ida Rubinstein in 1928, Stravinsky has not only used actual quotations from Tchaikovsky but has everywhere striven not to depart too far from the spirit of the elder master.

Ingenious Orchestration

It is easy enough to say that pure Tchaikovsky or unalloyed Stravinsky is preferable to this oddest of musical alliances. Yet the result, if a bit too consciously sweet and tepid, is far from tepid, is far from unagreeable. There are refreshingly lively episodes, and the orchestration is ingenious to a degree. Needless to say, the performance yesterday was marked by verve and finish.

The answering applause was probably heartier than at any other Stravinskian premiere in Symphony Hall, and Messrs. Burgin, Bedetti and Freiberg, first violin, first violoncello and first horn, respectively, were called upon to take soloists' bows.

Miss Posselt's Playing

Composers come and go and one need shed no tears over Dvorak. He had his day, nor is it quite yet done. This Concerto is not devoid of charm, though there was still reason to be thankful that the performance yesterday, from both orchestra and soloist, was one that might be relished for itself alone. As a matter of fact the music was as becoming to Miss Posselt's blond girlishness as was the brilliant red dress which set her off so vividly against the orchestra, and she played it brightly, suavely, with unassuming virtuosity. At least Dvorak could score: his music always sounds, and the orchestral tone yesterday caressed and titillated the ear no less than did that of the young soloist.

Again there was warm applause, and there were many recalls for a Boston girl in an enviable position.

Schumann Vital

After the posing Stravinsky and the fading Dvorak, Schumann, even of this most intimate of symphonies, seemed astonishly vital and robust. Indeed, a little less robustness here and there would have been more in keeping with the nature of the music. Also there are places, particularly in the first movement, where strings and wind are bowing and blowing away on the same notes, in which Dr. Koussevitzky might well follow the example of Mahler and others and silence one of the choirs. But all this is carping and quibbling. The performance as a whole was one for which to be grateful.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 31 1936

* * *

ONE of the real dates of the present musical season is Dec. 8, when Mrs. Zorah B. Berry will bring the world-famous Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The concert will be the fourth in the series under Mrs. Berry's management.

* * *

45. BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE

OCT 3 [illegible] 1936

Society Reporters' Gleaning of Items

Praised by Swedish Critics

BEATRICE GRIFFIN-EKSTROEM.

CRITICS IN SWEDEN ACCLAIM BEATRICE GRIFFIN-EKSTROEM

Former Brockton Girl Wins High Praise as Violinist.

Scandinavian music critics with one accord have acclaimed Beatrice Griffin Ekstroem, Brockton's most outstanding gift to the world of music, as one of the foremost violinists of the day, as a result of her recent solo appearance with the Stockholm (Sweden) Symphony orchestra.

Newspaper comments have been received by the Isaac S. Kibricks of 56 Gifford street, longtime friends of Miss Griffin, all of them warm in praise of the American-Swedish virtuoso. Miss Griffin has also recently written the Kibricks of her musical career in her permanent home, Sweden: "I start out on a tour next week which will go through Sweden and then to Norway, whence we will give a recital in Oslo. Then back to Sweden, where we appear in another city before returning to Stockholm. They want me to play solo with the orchestra again in Stockholm this winter, also with other orchestras. There is much radio work sandwiched in between, so it keeps me pretty busy.

"Gunnar and I have the nicest housekeeper who takes care of everything beautifully. I putter around the house arranging the menus, flowers, and organizing the daily routine. She is well trained to take care of Gunnar while I am away."

Continuance of Miss Griffin's musical career since her marriage to a noted Swedish engineer has been learned with delight by hosts of friends in this city, where she made her home for so long. Her home is a large estate near Stockholm. She is fast making a name for herself throughout the Scandinavian peninsula. She began her musical career as a pupil of Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra. She is a native of Randolph.

Following are excerpts from critics' comments in Scandinavian newspapers:

"A new face was presented on the Konsert House platform last evening, the American-Swedish violinist Beatrice Griffin-Ekstroem. She had previously let herself be heard on the radio, but as far as is known has not played from a Stockholm platform before. Now one may hope that it will happen more often, as she possesses a remarkably beautiful, warm tone and plays with an artistic fervour and devotion which gives joy and warmth. She was thanked and recalled several times and received many flowers."

"Beatrice Griffin-Ekstroem has played on the radio before but seems otherwise to be a new acquaintance to our public. Sunday night when we heard her interpret Max Bruch's concerto No. 2, one had to ask oneself why such a brilliant artist has walked around amongst us without letting herself be heard in public more often. That the American stands in a class by herself, there can be no two opinions. In double-stopping passages and other matters of sovereign technic and a great, beautiful and big tone—as glowingly dark red as the gown she wore—she combines a genuine violinist's temperament and performing ability which neither lacks noblesse nor style. She was a great and pleasant surprise and can well match herself with many instrumentalists who are carriers of more known and famous names. Now one can only hope to hear her again."

"Beatrice Griffin-Ekstroem has let herself be heard on the radio a number of times during the past two years and has during that time convinced one about her solid talent. However, that she was so outstanding a violinist as she showed herself in the Konsert House last Sunday night, one had no idea of; that was nothing less than a musical discovery. Her tone had that noble, deep lustre which is the outflow of a personality and which cannot be acquired only through technical skill. The latter was present, too, but one didn't think of it often. And that is also a praise."

"After the opening orchestral number, one got more acquainted with the American violinist, Beatrice Griffin-Ekstroem, whose appearance over the radio had made the listener curious about this confrontation. She is without doubt one of the cleverest woman violinists in this land just now. With her living, warm tone and imaginative playing, she even succeeded in making the sad concerto of Max Bruch enjoyable. That is almost a feat. We want to hear more of her."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

OCT 30 1936

Music of the Day

By B. H. HAGGIN

Paul Stassevitch Conducts Ernst Toch's Suite and Schubert's Fifth Symphony at Concert in Town Hall

Though Paul Stassevitch has been known to me by reputation as a distinguished musician, the orchestral concert that he conducted at Town Hall last night provided me with my first direct contact with him. From this concert, however, I could not tell whether the reputation was justified; for Mr. Stassevitch, though he conducts, is not a conductor, not one of those persons in whose hands a group of players—even a nondescript group such as Mr. Stassvitch had last night—is made into a sensitive instrument for the transmission of musical conceptions. And as though in recognition of this fact, he provided a program of, for the most part, unfamiliar music, to interest an audience that could not be expected to have much interest in performances so lacking in the most elementary qualities of good orchestral playing—precision, beauty of tone, refinement of phrasing. But the trouble was that most of this music proved to be as uninteresting as the performances.

The finest work of the evening came first—the Concerto in D major of Philip Emanuel Bach in the arrangement of Steinberg. This was followed by Schubert's Symphony No. 5 in B flat, a work which sounds like what it is—one of Schubert's youthful attempts to write symphonies modeled exactly after Mozart's. After the intermission came the important novelty of the evening: Ernest Toch's Bunte Suite (Varied Suite), Opus 48; and I must wonder what could have led Mr. Stassevitch to suppose that in playing this he was playing something new and important for an audience to hear. How many times already have we heard this work—to be sure under different names, but always the same work—the same sour counterpoint, the same grotesque orchestration, all to express the same grimacing satirical attitude. It takes enormous skill to write; but who cares? The answer is, last night's audience, which applauded loud and long at the conclusion. But it may have been applauding orchestra and conductor for getting through the difficult work.

The Toch Suite was followed by Busoni's Berceuse Elegiaque, and this by a first performance in New York of Mendelssohn's Scherzo in G minor, Opus 20, which, if I recall correctly, is his orchestration of a movement from the Octet. It is a work of exquisite delicacy in substance and scoring that would be enchanting played by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky, but that lost much of its effectiveness as it was played last night.

The concert ended with Ravel's Valses Nobles et Sentimentales. The audience was moderate-sized and cordial.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Ruth Posselt, the young violinist, who was born in Medford, was soloist at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon in the Concerto of Antonin Dvorak. Dr Koussevitzky began the afternoon with the orchestral suite drawn from Stravinsky's allegorical ballet, "The Fairy's Kiss"; the concluding number was the Fourth Symphony of Robert Schumann.

Since that Sunday evening the Spring of 1923 when Miss Posselt was 11 and gave a Symphony Hall recital, she has toured far and wide, increasing her reputation both in Europe and this country. Though she is still young, she is now an artist of the first rank. Yesterday she played the long and difficult Dvorak Concerto with admirable clarity and poise, producing a delightfully pure tone. Though she seemed to be hampered by a slipping string, her intonation was for the most part exact.

In fact, the vital spirit of her performance may have lent a burnish to Dvorak's now rarely heard work that made it appear more interesting than it is. Miss Posselt was given what is commonly termed an "ovation." It was most enthusiastic, and every moment of it was richly deserved.

Dvorak's music has undergone a sharp decline in popularity since his death 30-odd years ago. Today he is known by some of the Slavonic songs and dances, and that former hardy perennial of the concert hall, the "New World" Symphony. He ought to have condensed his Violin Concerto, for its length is far out of proportion to what he had to say, no matter how beautiful much of it may be. Yesterday a traditional cut was observed in the slow movement.

When Stravinsky decided to pay homage to Tchaikovsky, and to that end used some of Tchaikovsky's well-known if lesser melodies in "The Fairy's Kiss," he practically guaranteed that the ballet would be tuneful. But the amazing and inscrutable Igor went further: he showed that in 1928, after the desiccating change wrought in his style by war days, he could be warmly human.

For "The Fairy's Kiss" is by turn charming and amusing, piquantly but not acidly harmonized, in part orchestrated with a richness worthy of "Petrouchka." The standard repertory should give it unstinted welcome. Yesterday's performance, the first in Boston, seemed more colorful than one remembers Stravinsky to have made his own score when he introduced it to this locality at a Boston Symphony concert in Cambridge a year ago last March.

Dr Koussevitzky's reading of Schumann took little liberties with tempi which, though inconsiderable in themselves, altered the continuity of the music. The exquisite minor melody at the beginning of the slow movement was turned off in a mannered fashion.

The concerts next week will consist of Mahler's "The Song of the Earth," an unfamiliar Mozart Symphony in E-flat, and the "Cimarosiana" of Malipiero.

C. W. D.

GAINESVILLE, TEX.
DAILY REGISTER

OCT 30 1936

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is engaged upon one of the longest seasons ever played by an American orchestra. It has played every month since September, 1935, and will continue the record until August, 1937.

MONTCLAIR, N. J.
TIMES

their living habits.

They will be studied in the class program of nature instruction along with work on plant and animal life

Architecture, art, and music were the subjects of books on fine arts discussed at the third of a series of book talks at the Glen Ridge Public Library, Monday night. Mrs. Herbert W. Dutch, president of the Women's Club of Glen Ridge, Miss Cora Hendee, librarian of the Glen Ridge Public Library, and Osbourne McConathy, author of music books, were the speakers. They were introduced by J. D. Revene, member of the board of trustees of the library.

"Rameses to Rockefeller" by C. H. Whitaker, reviewed by Mrs. Dutch, covers sixty centuries of architecture. Mr. Whitaker is an architect himself so his book is instructive as well as interesting to those curious about architecture.

"The theme follows three strands," Mrs. Dutch explained, "first, critical study; second, a study of social science as an influence on people, and third, admiration for craftsmanship.

"The author is slightly amateurish in his philosophical comments, although his purpose is sincere. He is a better architect than philosopher as his theories of social science go on and are, at times, difficult to follow. He is within his own province when he discusses architecture, but when he becomes a social philosopher and commentator he gets in deep. Again and again throughout his book he lets his feelings overflow. He is sensitive in a personal way to the sorrows and discomforts of the people everywhere, victims of a traditional system based on greed.

Core of Book.

"He realizes the dreams, the ideals, the distant hopes of the race, grope ahead toward some future. As an artisan himself, he sees in the artisans the builders of a new day, and this I believe to be the core of the book, he is of the opinion that the artisans have the future most at heart."

Mrs. Dutch called the illustrations "memorably beautiful," and the photographs, she said, "show a sense of beauty, precision, rightness."

Miss Hendee, in discussing Malvina Hoffman's "Heads and Tales," remarked that it was hard to know whether to classify the book as art, b

Hoffman's adventures on her [illegible] trip taken to study the races. The author is well-known as the sculptor of the bronze statues of racial types in the "Hall of Man" at the Field Museum in Chicago.

The author is a person whom we will hear more about. Miss Hendee believes. "In addition to her travels from country to country, the book gives a vivid picture of her early life at home." Miss Hendee declared. "After her father died, she and her mother lived in Paris and it was there that she determined to study with Rodin. She studied with him a year and after his death helped to arrange a collection of his works.

"The second chapter is the most interesting," Miss Hendee continued. "It tells about the making of a sculptor. The most outstanding highlight of the book is the revelation of Miss Hoffman's humanity, without which she could not have approached the races and been so successful in her work. The book has many beautiful illustrations of art as well as of the countries the author visited."

When Mr. McConathy was asked to review a book on music, he had great difficulty, he revealed, in deciding what one to choose. Knowing that everybody responds to music, there are, therefore, a great variety of interests and reactions. Professional books were barred so his choice was narrowed to books for the music lover. There again the range is vast—from those groping for elementary enlightenment to those with wide cultural backgrounds.

"Music books may be classified in four ways," he said, "under general appreciation, biographical, and descriptive and analytical."

Cites Examples.

Among the examples he mentioned under each classification were the following: general appreciation, Sigmund Spaeth's "Common Sense in Music," and "Art of Enjoying Music," books by Percy Scholes,, Douglas Moore's "Listening to Music," and John Erskine's "Musical Companion;" biographical, John Tasker Howard's "Stephen Foster, America's Troubadour," and "Ethelbert Nevin," and Emil Ludwig's "Three Titans;" historical, Bauer and Peysers "How Music Grew," and "Music Through the Ages," and Mr. Howard's "Our American Music;" descriptive and analytical, Upton's "Standard Operas," and "Standard Operettas," and the "Victor Book of the Symphony."

"Other aids to understanding music are analytical notes on concert programs, and newspaper criticisms," Mr. McConathy said. "America has produced a number of distinguished critics but none whose writings have been more influential than those of Philip Hale, for more than thirty years the author of the program notes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and music critic of the Boston Herald."

Mr. McConathy selected as his book "Philip Hale's Boston Symphony Program Notes" and remarked that out of all the books he had looked at he would admit that he had allowed himself a touch of pleasure in selecting this one. It is edited by John H. Burk and has an introduction by Lawrence Gilman. The book is historical with critical and descriptive comments on music and composers.

Mr. McConathy read a portion of the introduction, and a few quotations from the book, which, he remarked "showed the author's pungency." He called Philip Hale one of the great geniuses of American musical life, and asserted that "his program notes were unique in their clear cut explanatory matter, world of information, and clever, keen, sharp incisiveness of writing."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

Oct. 31/36

ENSEMBLE TO APPEAR AT MEETING OF CLUB

The Philharmonic Ensemble, with Jeanette Veroneau, contralto, will provide the entertainment for the guest day meeting of the Rhode Island Women's Club on Wednesday afternoon at 3 o'clock in Churchill House.

The Philharmonic Ensemble is known as one of Boston's finest musical groups. The personnel of the artists includes Frank MacDonald, violinist, nationally known as a soloist; Ralph Smalley, 'cellist, a former member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has toured the country as a 'cello virtuoso; Verne Powell, flutist, a former member of the Flute Players Club of Boston; Rudolph Toll, clarinetist, for many years a member of the Victor Herbert groups and the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra; William Frank, pianist, who has been conductor of a number of Boston's well known ensembles.

The vocal soloist, Miss Veroneau, leading contralto of the Boston Chamber Opera Company and the Fine Arts Quartet is said by critics to possess a voice rich, warm and lustrous.

BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE

OCT 31 1936

Society Reporters' Gleaning of Items

Praised by Swedish Critics

BEATRICE GRIFFIN-EKSTROEM.

CRITICS IN SWEDEN ACCLAIM BEATRICE GRIFFIN-EKSTROEM

Former Brockton Girl Wins High Praise as Violinist.

Scandinavian music critics with one accord have acclaimed Beatrice Griffin Ekstroem, Brockton's most outstanding gift to the world of music, as one of the foremost violinists of the day, as a result of her recent solo appearance with the Stockholm (Sweden) Symphony orchestra.

Newspaper comments have been received by the Isaac S. Kibricks of 56 Gifford street, longtime friends of Miss Griffin, all of them warm in praise of the American-Swedish virtuoso. Miss Griffin has also recently written the Kibricks of her musical career in her permanent home, Sweden: "I start out on a tour next week which will go through Sweden and then to Norway, whence we will give a recital in Oslo. Then back to Sweden, where we appear in another city before returning to Stockholm. They want me to play solo with the orchestra again in Stockholm this winter, also with other orchestras. There is much radio work sandwiched in between, so it keeps me pretty busy.

"Gunnar and I have the nicest housekeeper who takes care of everything beautifully. I putter around the house arranging the menus, flowers, and organizing the daily routine. She is well trained to take care of Gunnar while I am away."

Continuance of Miss Griffin's musical career since her marriage to a noted Swedish engineer has been learned with delight by hosts of friends in this city, where she made her home for so long. Her home is a large estate near Stockholm. She is fast making a name for herself throughout the Scandinavian peninsula. She began her musical career as a pupil of Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra. She is a native of Randolph.

Following are excerpts from critics' comments in Scandinavian newspapers:

"A new face was presented on the Konsert House platform last evening, the American-Swedish violinist Beatrice Griffin-Ekstroem. She had previously let herself be heard on the radio, but as far as is known has not played from a Stockholm platform before. Now one may hope that it will happen more often, as she possesses a remarkably beautiful, warm, tone and plays with an artistic fervour and devotion which gives joy and warmth. She was thanked and recalled several times and received many flowers."

"Beatrice Griffin-Ekstroem has played on the radio before but seems otherwise to be a new acquaintance to our public. Sunday night when we heard her interpret Max Bruch's concerto No. 2, one had to ask oneself why such a brilliant artist has walked around amongst us without letting herself be heard in public more often. That the American stands in a class by herself, there can be no two opinions. In double-stopping passages and other matters of sovereign technic and a great, beautiful and big tone—as glowingly dark red as the gown she wore—she combines a genuine violinist's temperament and performing ability which neither lacks noblesse nor style. She was a great and pleasant surprise and can well match herself with many instrumentalists who are carriers of more known and famous names. Now one can only hope to hear her again."

"Beatrice Griffin-Ekstroem has let herself be heard on the radio a number of times during the past two years and has during that time convinced one about her solid talent. However, that she was so outstanding a violinist as she showed herself in the Konsert House last Sunday night, one had no idea of; that was nothing less than a musical discovery. Her tone had that noble, deep lustre which is the outflow of a personality and which cannot be acquired only through technical skill. The latter was present, too, but one didn't think of it often. And that is also a praise."

"After the opening orchestral number, one got more acquainted with the American violinist, Beatrice Griffin-Ekstroem, whose appearance over the radio had made the listener curious about this confrontation. She is without doubt one of the cleverest woman violinists in this land just now. With her living, warm tone and imaginative playing, she even succeeded in making the sad concerto of Max Bruch enjoyable. That is almost a feat. We want to hear more of her."

GAINESVILLE, TEX.
DAILY REGISTER

OCT 30 1936

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is engaged upon one of the longest seasons ever played by an American orchestra. It has played every month since September, 1935, and will continue the record until August, 1937.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

OCT 30 1936

Music of the Day

By B. H. HAGGIN

Paul Stassevitch Conducts Ernst Toch's Suite and Schubert's Fifth Symphony at Concert in Town Hall

Though Paul Stassevitch has been known to me by reputation as a distinguished musician, the orchestral concert that he conducted at Town Hall last night provided me with my first direct contact with him. From this concert, however, I could not tell whether the reputation was justified; for Mr. Stassevitch, though he conducts, is not a conductor, not one of those persons in whose hands a group of players—even a nondescript group such as Mr. Stassvitch had last night—is made into a sensitive instrument for the transmission of musical conceptions. And as though in recognition of this fact, he provided a program of, for the most part, unfamiliar music, to interest an audience that could not be expected to have much interest in performances so lacking in the most elementary qualities of good orchestral playing—precision, beauty of tone, refinement of phrasing. But the trouble was that most of this music proved to be as uninteresting as the performances.

The finest work of the evening came first—the Concerto in D major of Philip Emanuel Bach in the arrangement of Steinberg. This was followed by Schubert's Symphony No. 5 in B flat, a work which sounds like what it is—one of Schubert's youthful attempts to write symphonies modeled exactly after Mozart's. After the intermission came the important novelty of the evening: Ernest Toch's Bunte Suite (Varied Suite), Opus 48; and I must wonder what could have led Mr. Stassevitch to suppose that in playing this he was playing something new and important for an audience to hear. How many times already have we heard this work—to be sure under different names, but always the same work—the same sour counterpoint, the same grotesque orchestration, all to express the same grimacing satirical attitude. It takes enormous skill to write; but who cares? The answer is, last night's audience, which applauded loud and long at the conclusion. But it may have been applauding orchestra and conductor for getting through the difficult work.

The Toch Suite was followed by Busoni's Berceuse Elegiaque, and this by a first performance in New York of Mendelssohn's Scherzo in G minor, Opus 20, which, if I recall correctly, is his orchestration of a movement from the Octet. It is a work of exquisite delicacy in substance and scoring that would be enchanting played by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky, but that lost much of its effectiveness as it was played last night.

The concert ended with Ravel's Valses Nobles et Sentimentales. The audience was moderate-sized and cordial.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Ruth Posselt, the young violinist, who was born in Medford, was soloist at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon in the Concerto of Antonin Dvorak. Dr Koussevitzky began the afternoon with the orchestral suite drawn from Stravinsky's allegorical ballet, "The Fairy's Kiss"; the concluding number was the Fourth Symphony of Robert Schumann.

Since that Sunday evening the Spring of 1923 when Miss Posselt was 11 and gave a Symphony Hall recital, she has toured far and wide, increasing her reputation both in Europe and this country. Though she is still young, she is now an artist of the first rank. Yesterday she played the long and difficult Dvorak Concerto with admirable clarity and poise, producing a delightfully pure tone. Though she seemed to be hampered by a slipping string, her intonation was for the most part exact.

In fact, the vital spirit of her performance may have lent a burnish to Dvorak's now rarely heard work that made it appear more interesting than it is. Miss Posselt was given what is commonly termed an "ovation." It was most enthusiastic, and every moment of it was richly deserved.

Dvorak's music has undergone a sharp decline in popularity since his death 30-odd years ago. Today he is known by some of the Slavonic songs and dances, and that former hardy perennial of the concert hall, the "New World" Symphony. He ought to have condensed his Violin Concerto, for its length is far out of proportion to what he had to say, no matter how beautiful much of it may be. Yesterday a traditional cut was observed in the slow movement.

When Stravinsky decided to pay homage to Tchaikovsky, and to that end used some of Tchaikovsky's well-known if lesser melodies in "The Fairy's Kiss," he practically guaranteed that the ballet would be tuneful. But the amazing and inscrutable Igor went further: he showed that in 1928, after the desiccating change wrought in his style by war days, he could be warmly human.

For "The Fairy's Kiss" is by turn charming and amusing, piquantly but not acidly harmonized, in part orchestrated with a richness worthy of "Petrouchka." The standard repertory should give it unstinted welcome. Yesterday's performance, the first in Boston, seemed more colorful than one remembers Stravinsky to have made his own score when he introduced it to this locality at a Boston Symphony concert in Cambridge a year ago last March.

Dr Koussevitzky's reading of Schumann took little liberties with tempi which, though inconsiderable in themselves, altered the continuity of the music. The exquisite minor melody at the beginning of the slow movement was turned off in a mannered fashion.

The concerts next week will consist of Mahler's "The Song of the Earth," an unfamiliar Mozart Symphony in E-flat, and the "Cimarosiana" of Malipiero. C. W. D.

MONTCLAIR, N. J.
TIMES

OCT 30 1936

their living habits.

They will be studied in the class program of nature instruction along with work on plant and animal life

Architecture, art, and music were the subjects of books on fine arts discussed at the third of a series of book talks at the Glen Ridge Public Library, Monday night. Mrs. Herbert W. Dutch, president of the Women's Club of Glen Ridge, Miss Cora Hendee, librarian of the Glen Ridge Public Library, and Osbourne McConathy, author of music books, were the speakers. They were introduced by J. D. Revene, member of the board of trustees of the library.

"Rameses to Rockefeller" by C. H. Whitaker, reviewed by Mrs. Dutch, covers sixty centuries of architecture. Mr. Whitaker is an architect himself so his book is instructive as well as interesting to those curious about architecture.

"The theme follows three strands," Mrs. Dutch explained, "first, critical study; second, a study of social science as an influence on people, and third, admiration for craftsmanship.

"The author is slightly amateurish in his philosophical comments, although his purpose is sincere. He is a better architect than philosopher as his theories of social science go on and are, at times, difficult to follow. He is within his own province when he discusses architecture, but when he becomes a social philosopher and commentator he gets in deep. Again and again throughout his book he lets his feelings overflow. He is sensitive in a personal way to the sorrows and discomforts of the people everywhere, victims of a traditional system based on greed.

Core of Book.

"He realizes the dreams, the ideals, the distant hopes of the race, grope ahead toward some future. As an artisan himself, he sees in the artisans the builders of a new day, and this I believe to be the core of the book, he is of the opinion that the artisans have the future most at heart."

Mrs. Dutch called the illustrations "memorably beautiful," and the photographs, she said, "show a sense of beauty, precision, rightness."

Miss Hendee, in discussing Malvina Hoffman's "Heads and Tales," remarked that it was hard to know whether to classify the book as art, b Hoffman's adventures on her trip taken to study the races. The author is well-known as the sculptor of the bronze statues of racial types in the "Hall of Man" at the Field Museum in Chicago.

The author is a person whom we will hear more about, Miss Hendee believes. "In addition to her travels from country to country, the book gives a vivid picture of her early life at home." Miss Hendee declared. "After her father died, she and her mother lived in Paris and it was there that she determined to study with Rodin. She studied with him a year and after his death helped to arrange a collection of his works.

"The second chapter is the most interesting," Miss Hendee continued. "It tells about the making of a sculptor. The most outstanding highlight of the book is the revelation of Miss Hoffman's humanity, without which she could not have approached the races and been so successful in her work. The book has many beautiful illustrations, of art as well as of the countries the author visited."

When Mr. McConathy was asked to review a book on music, he had great difficulty, he revealed, in deciding what one to choose. Knowing that everybody responds to music, there are, therefore, a great variety of interests and reactions. Professional books were barred so his choice was narrowed to books for the music lover. There again the range is vast—from those groping for elementary enlightenment to those with wide cultural backgrounds.

"Music books may be classified in four ways," he said, "under general appreciation, biographical, and descriptive and analytical."

Cites Examples.

Among the examples he mentioned under each classification were the following: general appreciation, Sigmund Spaeth's "Common Sense in Music," and "Art of Enjoying Music," books by Percy Scholes,, Douglas Moore's "Listening to Music," and John Erskine's "Musical Companion;" biographical, John Tasker Howard's "Stephen Foster, America's Troubadour," and "Ethelbert Nevin," and Emil Ludwig's "Three Titans;" historical, Bauer and Peysers "How Music Grew," and "Music Through the Ages," and Mr. Howard's "Our American Music;" descriptive and analytical, Upton's "Standard Operas," and "Standard Operettas," and the "Victor Book of the Symphony."

"Other aids to understanding music are analytical notes on concert programs, and newspaper criticisms," Mr. McConathy said. "America has produced a number of distinguished critics but none whose writings have been more influential than those of Philip Hale, for more than thirty years the author of the program notes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and music critic of the Boston Herald."

Mr. McConathy selected as his book "Philip Hale's Boston Symphony Program Notes" and remarked that out of all the books he had looked at he would admit that he had allowed himself a touch of pleasure in selecting this one. It is edited by John H. Burk and has an introduction by Lawrence Gilman. The book is historical with critical and descriptive comments on music and composers.

Mr. McConathy read a portion of the introduction, and a few quotations from the book, which, he remarked "showed the author's pungency." He called Philip Hale one of the great geniuses of American musical life, and asserted that "his program notes were unique in their clear cut explanatory matter, world of information, and clever, keen, sharp incisiveness of writing."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

Oct. 31/36

ENSEMBLE TO APPEAR AT MEETING OF CLUB

The Philharmonic Ensemble, with Jeanette Veroneau, contralto, will provide the entertainment for the guest day meeting of the Rhode Island Women's Club on Wednesday afternoon at 3 o'clock in Churchill House.

The Philharmonic Ensemble is known as one of Boston's finest musical groups. The personnel of the artists includes Frank MacDonald, violinist, nationally known as a soloist; Ralph Smalley, 'cellist, a former member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has toured the country as a 'cello virtuoso; Verne Powell, flutist, a former member of the Flute Players Club of Boston; Rudolph Toll, clarinetist, for many years a member of the Victor Herbert groups and the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra; William Frank, pianist, who has been conductor of a number of Boston's well known ensembles.

The vocal soloist, Miss Veroneau, leading contralto of the Boston Chamber Opera Company and the Fine Arts Quartet is said by critics to possess a voice rich, warm and lustrous.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
GLOBE-DEMOCRAT

OCT 31 1936

St. Louis Symphony Improvement Noted by N. Y. Times Critic

Praise of New Home of Orchestra in Auditorium Includes Assertion That It Sounds as Clearly as a String Quartet.

By OLIN DOWNES,
Music Critic of New York Times.

The St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, Vladimir Golschmann conductor, performed its first program of the season yesterday afternoon in its new home, which is extremely spacious and commodious, in the Municipal Auditorium. This is a magnificent edifice, with a somewhat gaudy concert stage, but with advantageous conditions and attractions too numerous here to describe. The auditorium, which seats a little over 3500, had an acoustical problem which has been met by a new stage set devised after suggestions made by Leopold Stokowski, the set involving a "broken" ceiling which appears to collect and to focus orchestral tone.

At any rate, as the acoustic now is the orchestra sounds as clearly as a string quartet, and it gave proof, in a program of many interesting contrasts, of gratifying and conspicuous development since this writer heard it last, three seasons ago.

Proud of Orchestra.

It is interesting to talk about this orchestra with various of its patrons and supporters. They are proud of it, with good reason, and without nonsense. They say, "Our orchestra of course is not a crack orchestra in the sense of the orchestras of Boston, Philadelphia and New York. We haven't as many picked men and celebrated virtuosos on their instruments as you have. We can't achieve the same tonal effect. But we have excellent programs, and we greatly admire our conductor. Whether we always attain them or not, we aim at the highest standards of performance and interpretation, and we think that our orchestra plays with unusual life and effect, and puts this conception over the footlights."

Which is perfectly true. The program yesterday afternoon consisted of the Prelude to "Lohengrin," the first performance in St. Louis of Albert Roussel's "Sinfonietta for String Orchestra," opus. 52; Respighi's symphonic poem, "The Fountains of Rome," and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. The performance, in particular, of Roussel's excellent work, and of Beethoven's Symphony, were inspiring for their clarity, eloquence of detail and substantial musicianship. Also this performance was surcharged with a contagious enthusiasm and sincerity. So that again an audience thrilled to the mighty "Eroica."

Roussel's Score Finds Favor.

Roussel's score, which found such favor when Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra introduced it in New York, does not weaken but grows in significance as acquaintance with it increases. One must take off the hat to the composer who writes with such certainty, style and zest in the modern idiom, without a weak measure, without the suggestion either of uncertainty or affectation. His is a modern technic not of the utmost originality, in the sense that Debussy or d'Indy, the latter one of Roussel's formative influences, are original.

"Sinfonietta" is not a pathbreaker. The style could be called synthetic, being abreast of the best technical discoveries of the period. But it is not mere matter of style. The listener rejoices in the swing and glow of the music, and the good bite of its counterpoint. It is music made in much the same spirit that any good composer of the eighteenth century worked at his trade. Roussel could quote the reply of a great Italian master when a young disciple asked him how he would proceed if he were to compose the setting of a certain situation in an opera libretto. "Oh," said the master ironically, "I would just write a little music." For the glory of his art and his own modest but authoritative part in it, Roussel has written "just a little music."

Triumph of Clean Playing.

The performance of this suite was a triumph of clean playing and conducting. In rhythm, attack, balance of parts, finish of phrase, it was an exhilarating exhibition of what an orchestra, which has consistently developed in five years of steady and excellent training, can do. Mr. Golschmann was especially qualified to do justice to this music because of his long training in France and his feeling for the modern style.

But this last remark is not to be taken as inferring a narrowness of outlook. Mr. Golschmann has always been of an entrprising and eclectic musical mind. He is producing 18 novelties, seven of them by American composers, this season. His feeling for the music of his generation goes hand in hand with what is evidently a steady growth in his grasp of the great classics. We had not heard his "Eroica" before. Perhaps it was always like that. But the impression, when he undertook the interpretation of what is probably the greatest symphony ever written, was of a poise and sense of proportion stronger than we had ever felt these qualities to be in him before.

No Sentimentalizing.

It was a "straight" reading in the sense of its respect for the letter as well as the spirit of the score. There were a few details where the conductor permitted himself a trifle of latitude, but only a latitude consonant with its structure and nature of the music. There was no sentimentalizing. There was always strength, form and a fortunate absence of the attempt to unduly dramatize. The young conductor knew well all that was necessary of drama was inherent in the symphony. Once in a while a phrase could have had a broader curve. The trio of the scherzo was kept up to a rapid, though not a precipitate tempo, and the horns "got away with it," as the saying is, handsomely, with a special treatment of one note. In a very occasional case, as also in measure of the "Lohengrin" Prelude, there was unsatisfactory balance, a thing very natural with the season's first program, and the wholly unaccustomed acoustics of the new stage and hall.

These performances of a classic and a modern work, two compositions of a totally contrasted character, were first class in interpretation and only failed to reach the summit of orchestral excellent when it came to certain qualities of tone, and this with an orchestra not composed as a whole, but only in part, of players inured by years and years of experience to the symphonic style.

More Violinists Needed.

"The orchestra needs more strings—more first and second violins. For these reasons the upper layer of the string tone was sometimes thin and not full, as compared with the richer tone of the lower instruments of this choir. When the brass first entered in the "Lohengrin" Prelude it had a fine mellowness and, though the lower instruments inclined to coarseness at its climax, warmth. The wood-winds, as a whole, made a highly creditable showing.

The writer was glad to hear respect paid to the late Ottorino Respighi with his suite, "The Fountains of Rome," that early and poetical outpouring, instead of the banalities and ostentations sonorities of what we might call Respighi's Mussolini period exemplified in the "Pines of Rome," a virtuoso piece as bad in taste as some recent Italian terminals. We did not entirely agree with Mr. Golschmann's treatment of the "Fountains," which he seemed at moments to desire to whip up and blast to a climax, as though he were playing the more objectionable composition we have mentioned. The four movements known generically as "The Fountains" have a softer color than "The Pines," and nobler sonority and spirit. This music, especially applauded by the audience, delighted by its melodiousness and relative fineness of quality, but it could have had, even at the climax, a grander movement and a finer beauty.

Don't Talk of Deficits.

Here was another season's premiere, by the fourth orchestra heard by your correspondent since he left New York City less than a fortnight ago. The St. Louis Symphony Orchestra is now in a flourishing state, financial and artistic. We asked about the season's deficit. "Do you mean," civilly inquired a representative of the management, "the maintenance fund? We don't talk of deficits. Deficit implies failure somewhere along the line. Our orchestra is a success. We have, through subscriptions and contributions, at the moment, funds ample to cover the expenses of the season. We have a bigger subscription than we ever had before in the history of the orchestra, and we have already more than the amount needed to meet any calculable deficit, guaranteed us by 1246 people, who have already contributed to this maintenance fund in amounts ranging from $1 to $5000." And the visitor was shown the books to prove it.

It is also to be said, for the consideration of whomsoever it may concern about Broadway, that until five seasons ago this orchestra fairly was on the rocks; that in the four seasons before Mr. Golschmann was made permanent conductor, in the season of 1931-1932, they had only guest leaders. When Golschmann was engaged as permanent leader the orchestra began to improve and the public confidence and interest in the band to increase. Mr. Golschmann has gained the support of his orchestra and his public, in a city where for many years the orchestra could not seem to establish itself. The subscription this year is virtually twice what it was five seasons ago. The city is back of the orchestra and its conductor.

MONTREAL, CAN.
GAZETTE

OCT 31 1936

RECORDING OF SCHUBERT

Koussevitzky and Boston Orchestra Heard in "Unfinished"—Other November Discs

By THOMAS ARCHER.

In 1822, a struggling Austrian composer wrote a Symphony in B minor for an amateur musical society in gratitude for being elected an honorary member. He sent it to a friend to give to the secretary of the society. And that was the last heard of the symphony for over 40 years. Apparently the friend forgot it and mislaid it. The friend was Anselm von Huettenbrenner. The composer was Schubert.

In 1865, Johann Herbeck, prominent musical director in Vienna, acquired the symphony and performed it for the first time. It was "Unfinished," consisting only of two complete movements and sketches for a third of the four planned. There is every reason to believe that Schubert was satisfied that he had completed the work. He seems to have felt after these two movements sublimely in contrast, to add anything else would have been to gild the lily.

In confirmation of its perfect form comes the new recording of the Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished," superbly executed by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the list issued for November by RCA-Victor. There has been more than one recording of the work before but duplication is fully justified in this instance.

Apart from the beauties of the technical work on the part of the sound engineers, the set has something new to offer in interpretation. Koussevitzky seems to have seized the fundamental idea of the "Unfinished," namely that it consists in essence of two differing moods, one supremely dramatic, the other supremely lyrical.

In the first movement, the mighty climaxes are stressed and one is given the impression of a tragedy being enacted in terms of music. The performance is essentially structural and dispels a foolish notion that Schubert was not in his own way as great an architect of music as Beethoven. Details to be specially mentioned are the beautiful phrasing of the second theme by the 'cellos, the organ tones of the chords which carry the closing part of the first section and the grand rise of the music in the middle section of the movement.

The second movement of the "Unfinished" has always seemed to the writer the greatest piece of dance music ever composed. And the Boston Symphony plays it like a dance, ever so stately yet full of that color and good cheer without which Schubert would not be Schubert enjoying himself. To be noted here [illegible] the exquisite performance of the solo passages for wind instruments and the conduct of the dancing tune pizzicato in the 'cellos and basses.

If you want a taste of Schubert at his "gemuethlichst" play the reverse side of the third and last record of this set. It is an excerpt from the "Rosamunde" music which, however, well known, will sound as jolly and as fresh as when you first heard it.

46.

Herald Oct. 31/36

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Ruth Posselt, violinist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Stravinsky
Divertimento from "Le Baiser de la Fee"
Dvorak.......Violin Concerto in A minor
Schumann....Symphony No. 4 in D mnior

When Stravinsky conducted this Divertimento in Cambridge two seasons ago, he did so with intense and almost ludicrous solemnity. This was evident not only if you happened to catch a glimpse of his face but in the interpretation itself. Consequently the delicious humor and saucy wit of the score did not make a good effect. Nor does the version which the composer made for violin and piano do justice to the qualities which emerge in such a bright and clear performance as we heard yesterday. The playing by the solo instruments in difficult passages was particularly fine.

It is all very well to argue that this is a work of superficial cleverness, even of decadence. Possibly it is; but it is also ideal for ballet and, as an orchestral diversion, singularly entertaining. The first two movements are the most amusing. After that Stravinsky takes himself and Tchaikovsky more seriously. Perhaps he felt that the ignorant public might suppose that he had intended the piece as an elaborate thumb-nose at poor old Tchaikovsky, and therefore he hastened to reassure his muse of his deep respect. An unfriendly critic might say that it was like signing a malicious letter: "Yours most affectionately"!

Miss Posselt gave a brilliant performance of the Dvorak Concerto, which is just what that work needs. Dr. Koussevitzky was quite right to make a cut in the slow movement, for the finale is the best part. The whole concerto is just the opposite from the symphonic concertos that have been usually written since. Its chief aim is to show off the violin in every possible way. Miss Posselt, having conquered the difficulties, did not overdo the advantage which the concerto offers. She amply deserved the ovation she received.

Schumann's great Symphony is a work that in some ways has not been praised enough, in that there are those who are so taken up by what they call "its muddy orchestration" that they are blind to its qualities. It is the symphonic glory of the remantic period between Beethoven and Brahms. That it is an original work as well as a beautiful is so much the more wonderful to contemplate now and at this distance of time.

The program notes quoted Sir Donald Tovey's reason for the thickness of the orchestration, and there is not much point in beating that dead horse any longer. The point is that a good conductor can make Schumann's symphonies sound magnificently, as the Fourth was played yesterday. Dr. Koussevitzky, happily, has faith in these works, and he knows how to make the lyrical subjects sing and how to bring out the vigor of the rhythms.

Boston Symphony Matinee Monday

A concert season of unique distinction opens Tuesday at 3 o'clock in Symphony hall, Boston. For this will be the opening of the annual series of six symphonic matinees in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays what might be termed programs with a plot, under the leadership of its world-famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. He does the plotting, and always is able to find something new. The music of last year's matinees was assembled nation by nation. This time the plot of the season will be music drawn from the masters of the 19th century, who are known as "the romantic school." They made great advances in the art of writing for orchestra, besides infusing their work with great appeal to the emotions and the imagination.

To hear the characteristic works of the 19th century masters, as Koussevitzky will group them at the Tuesday matinees at approximately monthly intervals, will be to range over some of the most glorious music of the world. The composers will include Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Cchumann, Liszt, Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Debussy and Sibelius.

Although the entire strength of the Boston Symphony, 109 players, is heard in the Tuesday matinee, these concerts are looked on by many as a bargain symphony series. Due simply to there being only six concerts, whereas there are twenty-four on Fridays and Saturdays, reserved season tickets are inexpensive. Also, the late starting time, 3 o'clock, appeals to out-of-towners.

On Tuesday, Nov. 3, the program is scheduled to include: the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven; Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture, and the "Unfinished" Symphony of Schubert.

MESSENGER

OCT 3 0 1936

Boston Symphony Matinee Monday

A concert season of unique distinction opens Tuesday at 3 o'clock in Symphony hall, Boston. For this will be the opening of the annual series of six symphonic matinees in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays what might be termed programs with a plot, under the leadership of its world-famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. He does the plotting, and always is able to find something new. The music of last year's matinees was assembled nation by nation. This time the plot of the season will be music drawn from the masters of the 19th century, who are known as "the romantic school." They made great advances in the art of writing for orchestra, besides infusing their work with great appeal to the emotions and the imagination.

To hear the characteristic works of the 19th century masters, as Koussevitzky will group them at the Tuesday matinees at approximately monthly intervals, will be to range over some of the most glorious music of the world. The composers will include Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Cchumann, Liszt, Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Debussy and Sibelius.

Although the entire strength of the Boston Symphony, 109 players, is heard in the Tuesday matinee, these concerts are looked on by many as a bargain symphony series. Due simply to there being only six concerts, whereas there are twenty-four on Fridays and Saturdays, reserved season tickets are inexpensive. Also, the late starting time, 3 o'clock, appeals to out-of-towners.

On Tuesday, Nov. 3, the program is scheduled to include: the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven; Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture, and the "Unfinished" Symphony of Schubert.

Month of November

1936

PLAINFIELD, N. J.
COURIER-NEWS

OCT 3 1 1936

* * *

Mendelssohn Glee Club Preparing Active Season

UNDER the continued and able leadership of Ifor Jones, the Plainfield Mendelssohn Glee Club is now in active preparation for its third season.

It will be of interest to Plainfield and surrounding communities to note that the club continues to register an active membership of 60 to 70 voices and promises, for its appearances this year, an even higher standard of performance than already set in its previous concerts.

A varied and attractive program is offered for the first concert on Jan. 5. Among the numbers appear several to be heard for the first time in New Jersey and, so far as known, in this country. Among these are the Czecho-Slovak folk song, "Wake thee now, dearest," arranged by Deems Taylor, distinguished American composer; the ever popular old English hunting song "John Peel," as arranged by Mark Andrews, and the stirring part-song "Awake, My Love," by William Gericke, a founder and first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There will also be heard an old Scottish folk-song "The Flower of Dunblane," and Sir Walter Scott's "Gathering Song of Donald the Black," set for men's voices by W. E. Smith; the "Angler's Song," embodying Izaak Walton's words from The Compleat Angler and composed by the famous Henry Lawes in 1669.

In addition the program will include the "Agincourt Song," arranged in broad classical form by Dr. Healy Willan, and celebrative of a victory by Henry V; Schumann's "The Wanderer's Song;" a sea chanty, "Ten Thousand Miles Away;" the well-known "Shadow March" by the late Dr. David Protheroe, and two beautiful settings of "Lonely Woods" and "Fain Would I Change That Note," by the famous French composer Lully, and the eminent British composer Ralph Vaughan Williams, respectively.

Following the concert of Jan. 5, the mid-winter smoker will be given on Feb. 12, and May 4 is the date set for the spring concert.

The club will follow its practice of making no public sale of tickets. Attendance is limited to sustaining and associate members, their guests, and active members and their guests.

Lest this arrangement be misunderstood it should be said that it is the natural desire of the club that its associate membership include all who enjoy the singing of a trained male chorus.

Since it is altogether impossible to discover and invite all such, it is suggested that those desiring to present their names as candidates for associate or sustaining membership, should communicate with an associate or active member or, failing to know any such, with the club's secretary, E. H. Clendenin, 633 Belvidere Avenue, Plainfield.

GRAPHIC

OCT 3 193

Concert Sponsored For Philanthropies

On Thursday, November 5th, at 10 o'clock, the Community Service Club of West Newton will hold the first Sewing Day of the season in the Parish House of the Second Church. Luncheon will be served at a moderate price.

This year Mrs Claude U. Gilson's lectures on Current Events are included in the Club dues. Her first talk will be given in the Parish House of the Second Church at 10:30 a. m. on Friday, November 6th.

On Monday, November 9th, at 8:30 p. m. the Club will sponsor a Concert at the Newton High School, the proceeds of which are to be applied to the Club's philanthropies. Miss Ruth Posselt, Violinist, will be the soloist, and will be accompanied by Mary Pumphrey Tower. The Pro Arte Symphonic Ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra also will play.

The first meeting of the Community Service Club took place on Wednesday, October 21st, at the Second Church, with a reception at 1 o'clock for the officers of the Club, headed by Mrs. George S. Fuller, president. At 1:30 dessert-coffee was served by Miss Elizabeth Kilburn and her committee. Beginning the business meeting, Dr. Boynton Merrill, Minister of the Second Church, welcomed the Club and asked a blessing on its activities throughout the year.

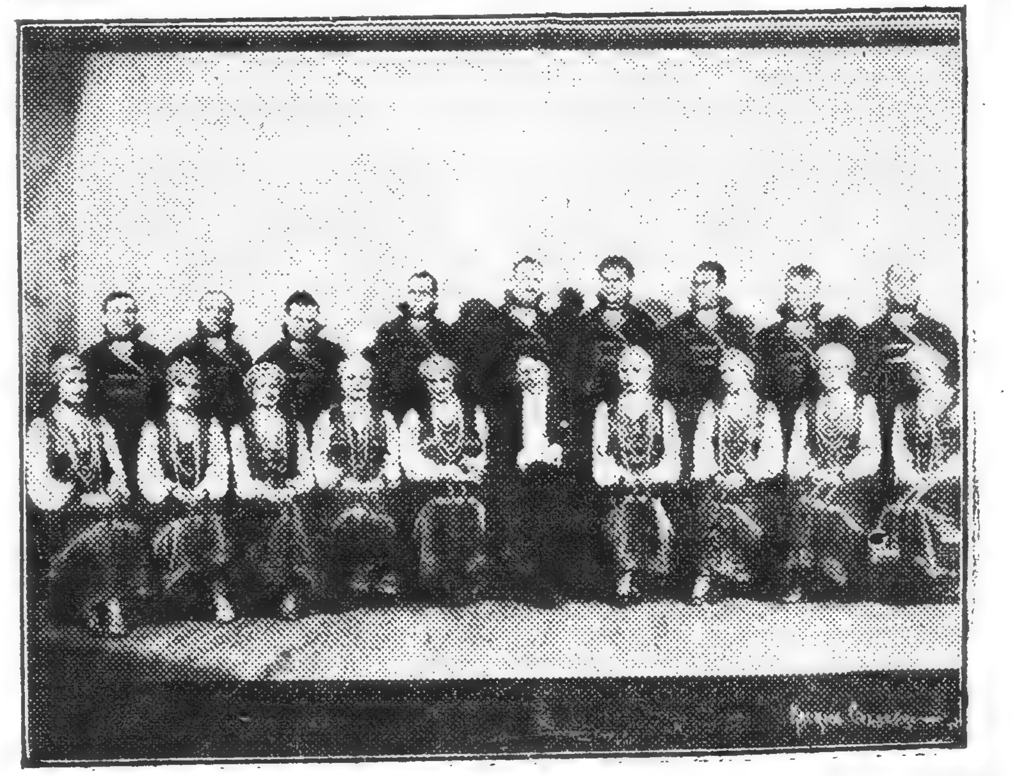
Following the business session, Miss [illegible] Brackett, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. D. Earle Brackett, of West Newton, entertained the audience with [illegible] interpretations in costume. The first was "Pasquinade," the story of a little French coquette; the second, "Frog [illegible]," a study in [illegible]; and the third, Miss Brackett's own creation, portrayed a woman turning back in her thoughts to her childhood and then returning [illegible] to the present. Miss Brackett, who has studied with Miriam Winslow, Ted Shawn and others, delighted the audience with her grace and exquisite technique. She was accompanied by Mary Pumphrey Tower.

Mr. George W. B. Harwell then gave an informal talk, "A Layman Looks at Modern Art," illustrated by reflectoscope projections. He mentioned Whistler's "Portrait of My Mother" as one of the earliest examples of modern art, and pointed out its relation to Japanese art. He also showed the resemblance between "primitive" paintings and those made today by children. His talk was illuminating and was enthusiastically received by the audience.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

OCT 3 193

Russian Symphonic Choir at Andover Monday Night



The Russian Symphonic Choir under their internationally famous leader, Basile Kibalchich, will be heard at George Washington Hall,, Andover, Monday evening, Nov. 2.

The Russian Symphonic Choir which is the second attraction on the Phillips Academy series, at George Washington Hall, Monday evening, Nov. 2, under their internationally famous conductor, Basile Kibalchich, will be heard in the following program:

PART 1.

In the Lord's Name, Old Russian Melody.
The Last Supper ....Lvov
Blessed Be the Man ...Archangelsky
Vesper Prayer ....Rachmaninoff
Psalm 18 .... Archangelsky

PART 2.

Prelude in C Minor ....Chopin
Carnival from the opera "Snowmaiden" ....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Aria of Variag from the opera "Sadko" ....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Church scene from opera "Christmas Eve" ....Rimsky-Korsakoff
The Nightingale ......Tschaikowsky
Song of the Reaper ....Tschaikowsk

PART 3.

Medley of Folk Songs.
The Scythe ....Sokoloff
Ukrainian Lullaby ......Verekeevsky
The Gypsies.
A Lament.
The Sailor's Dance from ballet "Red Poppy" .... Gliere

Boston Symphony.

A concert season of unique distinction opens Tuesday at 3 o'clock in Symphony hall, Boston. For this will be the opening of the annual series of six symphonic matinees in which the Boston Symphony orchestra plays what might be termed programs with a plot, under the leadership of its world-famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. He does the plotting, and always is able to find something new. The music of last year's matinees was assembled nation by nation. This time the plot of the season will be music drawn from the masters of the 19th century, who are known as "the romantic school."

Although the entire strength of the Boston Symphony, 109 players, is heard in the Tuesday matinees, these concerts are looked on by many as a bargain symphony series. Due simply to there being only six concerts, whereas there are 24 on Fridays and Saturdays, reserved season tickets are inexpensive. Also, the late starting time, 3 o'clock, appeals to out-of-towners.

On Tuesday, Nov. 3, the program is scheduled to include: The Fifth Symphony of Beethoven; Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture, and the "Unfinished" Symphony by Schubert.

S. R. F.

Herald - Oct. 31/36

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Ruth Posselt, violinist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Stravinsky
Divertimento from "Le Baiser de la Fee"
Dvorak.......Violin Concerto in A minor
Schumann....Symphony No. 4 in D mnior

When Stravinsky conducted this Divertimento in Cambridge two seasons ago, he did so with intense and almost ludicrous solemnity. This was evident not only if you happened to catch a glimpse of his face but in the interpretation itself. Consequently the delicious humor and saucy wit of the score did not make a good effect. Nor does the version which the composer made for violin and piano do justice to the qualities which emerge in such a bright and clear performance as we heard yesterday. The playing by the solo instruments in difficult passages was particularly fine.

It is all very well to argue that this is a work of superficial cleverness, even of decadence. Possibly it is; but it is also ideal for ballet and, as an orchestral diversion, singularly entertaining. The first two movements are the most amusing. After that Stravinsky takes himself and Tchaikovsky more seriously. Perhaps he felt that the ignorant public might suppose that he had intended the piece as an elaborate thumb-nose at poor old Tchaikovsky, and therefore he hastened to reassure his muse of his deep respect. An unfriendly critic might say that it was like signing a malicious letter: "Yours most affectionately"!

Miss Posselt gave a brilliant performance of the Dvorak Concerto, which is just what that work needs. Dr. Koussevitzky was quite right to make a cut in the slow movement, for the finale is the best part. The whole concerto is just the opposite from the symphonic concertos that have been usually written since. Its chief aim is to show off the violin in every possible way. Miss Posselt, having conquered the difficulties, did not overdo the advantage which the concerto offers. She amply deserved the ovation she received.

Schumann's great Symphony is a work that in some ways has not been praised enough, in that there are those who are so taken up by what they call "its muddy orchestration" that they are blind to its qualities. It is the symphonic glory of the romantic period between Beethoven and Brahms. That it is an original work as well as a beautiful is so much the more wonderful to contemplate now and at this distance of time.

The program notes quoted Sir Donald Tovey's reason for the thickness of the orchestration, and there is not much point in beating that dead horse any longer. The point is that a good conductor can make Schumann's symphonies sound magnificently, as the Fourth was played yesterday. Dr. Koussevitzky, happily, has faith in these works, and he knows how to make the lyrical subjects sing and how to bring out the vigor of the rhythms.

Norwood
Oct. 30/36

Boston Symphony Matinee Monday

A concert season of unique distinction opens Tuesday at 3 o'clock in Symphony hall, Boston. For this will be the opening of the annual series of six symphonic matinees in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays what might be termed programs with a plot, under the leadership of its world-famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. He does the plotting, and always is able to find something new. The music of last year's matinees was assembled nation by nation. This time the plot of the season will be music drawn from the masters of the 19th century, who are known as "the romantic school." They made great advances in the art of writing for orchestra, besides infusing their work with great appeal to the emotions and the imagination.

To hear the characteristic works of the 19th century masters, as Koussevitzky will group them at the Tuesday matinees at approximately monthly intervals, will be to range over some of the most glorious music of the world. The composers will include Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Cchumann, Liszt, Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Debussy and Sibelius.

Although the entire strength of the Boston Symphony, 109 players, is heard in the Tuesday matinee, these concerts are looked on by many as a bargain symphony series. Due simply to there being only six concerts, whereas there are twenty-four on Fridays and Saturdays, reserved season tickets are inexpensive. Also, the late starting time, 3 o'clock, appeals to out-of-towners.

On Tuesday, Nov. 3, the program is scheduled to include: the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven; Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture, and the "Unfinished" Symphony of Schubert.

MESSENGER

Norwood Mass

OCT 30 1936

Boston Symphony Matinee Monday

A concert season of unique distinction opens Tuesday at 3 o'clock in Symphony hall, Boston. For this will be the opening of the annual series of six symphonic matinees in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays what might be termed programs with a plot, under the leadership of its world-famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. He does the plotting, and always is able to find something new. The music of last year's matinees was assembled nation by nation. This time the plot of the season will be music drawn from the masters of the 19th century, who are known as "the romantic school." They made great advances in the art of writing for orchestra, besides infusing their work with great appeal to the emotions and the imagination.

To hear the characteristic works of the 19th century masters, as Koussevitzky will group them at the Tuesday matinees at approximately monthly intervals, will be to range over some of the most glorious music of the world. The composers will include Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Cchumann, Liszt, Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Debussy and Sibelius.

Although the entire strength of the Boston Symphony, 109 players, is heard in the Tuesday matinee, these concerts are looked on by many as a bargain symphony series. Due simply to there being only six concerts, whereas there are twenty-four on Fridays and Saturdays, reserved season tickets are inexpensive. Also, the late starting time, 3 o'clock, appeals to out-of-towners.

On Tuesday, Nov. 3, the program is scheduled to include: the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven; Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture, and the "Unfinished" Symphony of Schubert.

Month of November

1936

PLAINFIELD, N. J.
COURIER-NEWS

OCT 31 1936

* * *

Mendelssohn Glee Club Preparing Active Season

UNDER the continued and able leadership of Ifor Jones, the Plainfield Mendelssohn Glee Club is now in active preparation for its third season.

It will be of interest to Plainfield and surrounding communities to note that the club continues to register an active membership of 60 to 70 voices and promises, for its appearances this year, an even higher standard of performance than already set in its previous concerts.

A varied and attractive program is offered for the first concert on Jan. 5. Among the numbers appear several to be heard for the first time in New Jersey and, so far as known, in this country. Among these are the Czecho-Slovak folk song, "Wake thee now, dearest," arranged by Deems Taylor, distinguished American composer; the ever popular old English hunting song "John Peel," as arranged by Mark Andrews, and the stirring part-song "Awake, My Love," by William Gericke, a founder and first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There will also be heard an old Scottish folk-song "The Flower of Dunblane," and Sir Walter Scott's "Gathering Song of Donald the Black," set for men's voices by W. E. Smith; the "Angler's Song," embodying Izaak Walton's words from The Compleat Angler and composed by the famous Henry Lawes in 1669.

In addition the program will include the "Agincourt Song," arranged in broad classical form by Dr. Healy Willan, and celebrative of a victory by Henry V; Schumann's "The Wanderer's Song;" a sea chanty, "Ten Thousand Miles Away;" the well-known "Shadow March" by the late Dr. David Protheroe, and two beautiful settings of "Lonely Woods" and "Fain Would I Change That Note," by the famous French composer Lully, and the eminent British composer Ralph Vaughan Williams, respectively.

Following the concert of Jan. 5, the mid-winter smoker will be given on Feb. 12, and May 4 is the date set for the spring concert.

The club will follow its practice of making no public sale of tickets. Attendance is limited to sustaining and associate members, their guests, and active members and their guests.

Lest this arrangement be misunderstood it should be said that it is the natural desire of the club that its associate membership include all who enjoy the singing of a trained male chorus.

Since it is altogether impossible to discover and invite all such, it is suggested that those desiring to present their names as candidates for associate or sustaining membership, should communicate with an associate or active member or, failing to know any such, with the club's secretary, E. H. Clendenin, 633 Belvidere Avenue, Plainfield.

GRAPHIC

Newton - Mass

OCT 30 1936

Concert Sponsored For Philanthropies

On Thursday, November 5th, at 10 o'clock, the Community Service Club of West Newton will hold the first Sewing Day of the season in the Parish House of the Second Church. Luncheon will be served at a moderate price.

This year Mrs Claude U. Gilson's lectures on Current Events are included in the Club dues. Her first talk will be given in the Parish House of the Second Church at 10:30 a. m. on Friday, November 6th.

On Monday, November 9th, at 8:30 p. m. the Club will sponsor a Concert at the Newton High School, the proceeds of which are to be applied to the Club's philanthropies. Miss Ruth Posselt, Violinist, will be the soloist, and will be accompanied by Mary Pumphrey Tower. The Pro Arte Symphonic Ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra also will play.

The first meeting of the Community Service Club took place on Wednesday, October 21st, at the Second Church, with a reception at 1 o'clock for the officers of the Club, headed by Mrs. George S. Fuller, president. At 1:30 dessert-coffee was served by Miss Elizabeth Kilburn and her committee. Beginning the business meeting, Dr. Boynton Merrill, Minister of the Second Church, welcomed the Club and asked a blessing on its activities throughout the year.

Following the business session, Miss Dorothy Brackett, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. D. Earle Brackett, of West Newton, entertained the audience with three dance interpretations in costume. The first was "Pasquinade," the story of a little French coquette; the second, "Frojeanne," a study in pure technique; and the third, Miss Brackett's own creation, portrayed a woman turning back in her thoughts to her childhood and then returning serenely to the present. Miss Brackett, who has studied with Miriam Winslow, Ted Shawn and others, delighted the audience with her grace and exquisite technique. She was accompanied by Mary Pumphrey Tower.

Mr. George W. B. Harwell then gave an informal talk, "A Layman Looks at Modern Art," illustrated by reflectoscope projections. He mentioned Whistler's "Portrait of My Mother" as one of the earliest examples of modern art, and pointed out its relation to Japanese art. He also showed the resemblance between "primitive" paintings and those made today by children. His talk was illuminating and was enthusiastically received by the audience.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

OCT 31 1936

Russian Symphonic Choir at Andover Monday Night

The Russian Symphonic Choir under their internationally famous leader, Basile Kibalchich, will be heard at George Washington Hall, Andover, Monday evening, Nov. 2.

The Russian Symphonic Choir which is the second attraction on the Phillips Academy series, at George Washington Hall, Monday evening, Nov. 2, under their internationally famous conductor, Basile Kibalchich, will be heard in the following program:

PART 1.

In the Lord's Name, Old Russian Melody.
The Last Supper ....Lvov
Blessed Be the Man ...Archangelsky
Vesper Prayer ....Rachmaninoff
Psalm 18 .... Archangelsky

PART 2.

Prelude in C Minor ....Chopin
Carnival from the opera "Snowmaiden" ....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Aria of Variag from the opera "Sadko" ....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Church scene from opera "Christmas Eve" ....Rimsky-Korsakoff
The Nightingale .....Tschaikowsky
Song of the Reaper ....Tschaikowsk

PART 3.

Medley of Folk Songs.
The Scythe ....Sokoloff
Ukrainian Lullaby .....Verekeevsky
The Gypsies.
A Lament.
The Sailor's Dance from ballet "Red Poppy" .... Gliere

Boston Symphony.

A concert season of unique distinction opens Tuesday at 3 o'clock in Symphony hall, Boston. For this will be the opening of the annual series of six symphonic matinees in which the Boston Symphony orchestra plays what might be termed programs with a plot, under the leadership of its world-famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. He does the plotting, and always is able to find something new. The music of last year's matinees was assembled nation by nation. This time the plot of the season will be music drawn from the masters of the 19th century, who are known as "the romantic school."

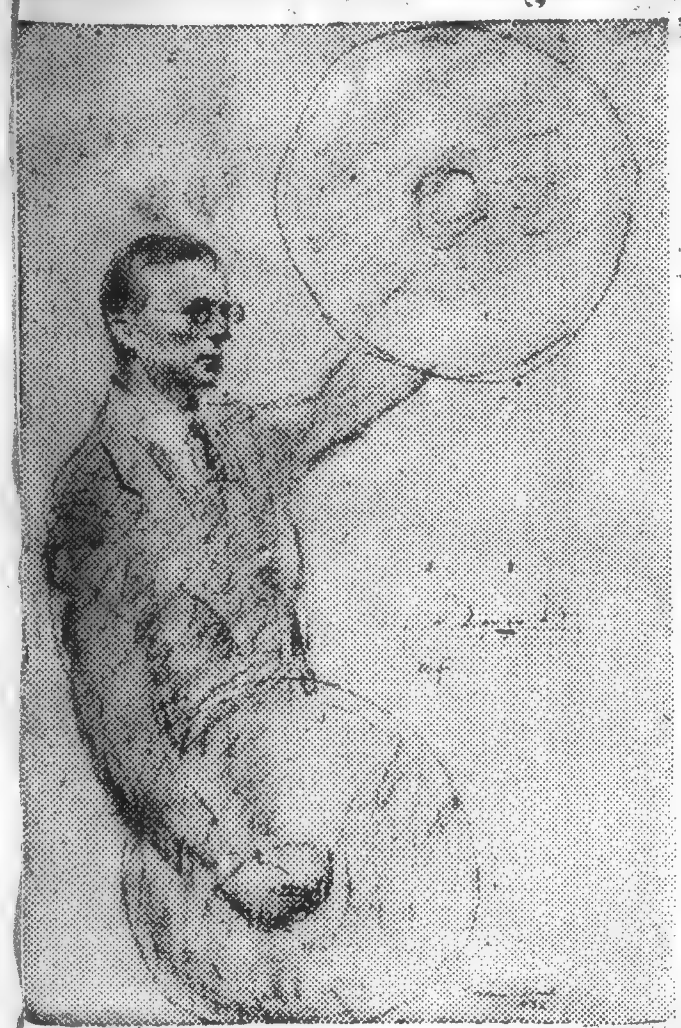
Although the entire strength of the Boston Symphony, 109 players, is heard in the Tuesday matinees, these concerts are looked on by many as a bargain symphony series. Due simply to there being only six concerts, whereas there are 24 on Fridays and Saturdays, reserved season tickets are inexpensive. Also, the late starting time, 3 o'clock, appeals to out-of-towners.

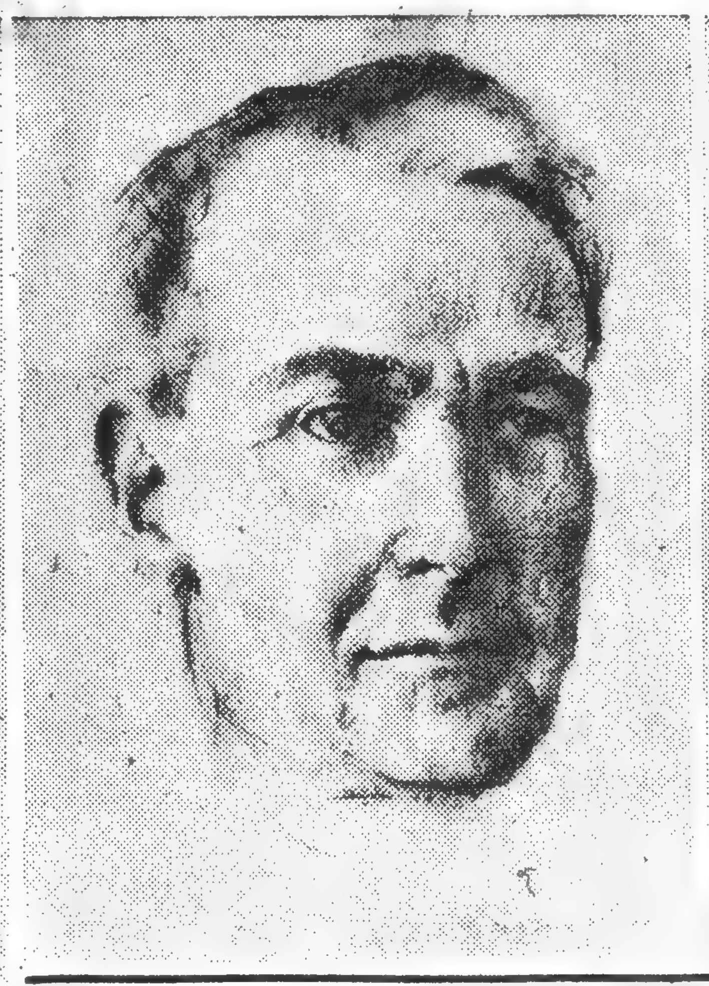
On Tuesday, Nov. 3, the program is scheduled to include: The Fifth Symphony of Beethoven; Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture, and the "Unfinished" Symphony by Schubert.

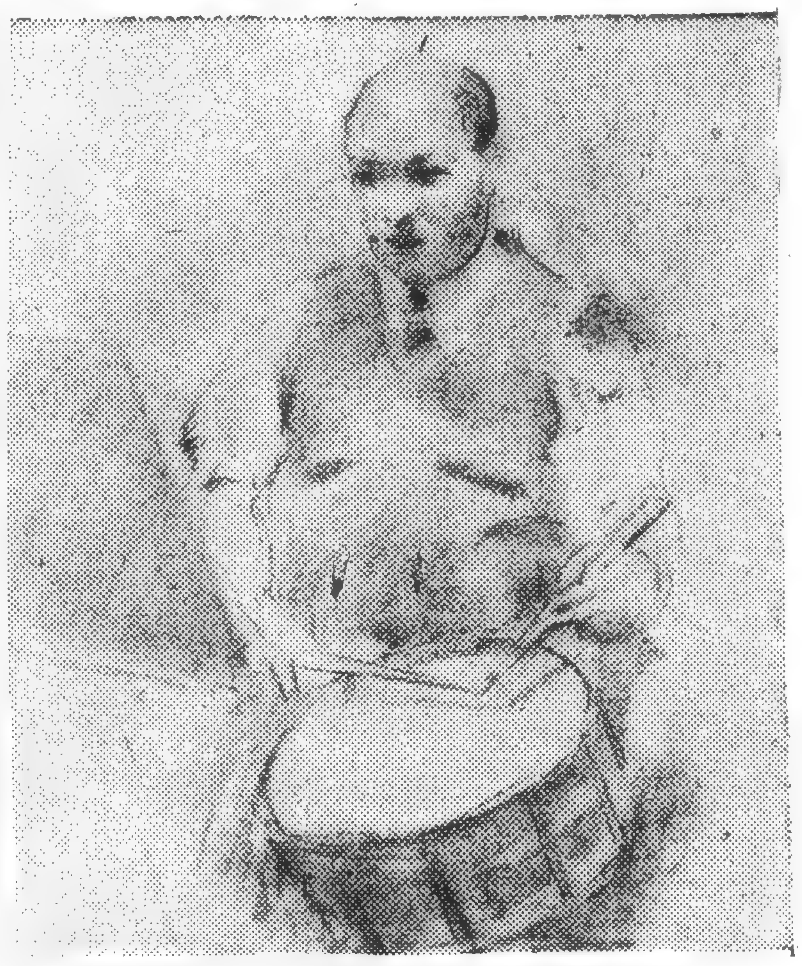
S. R. F.

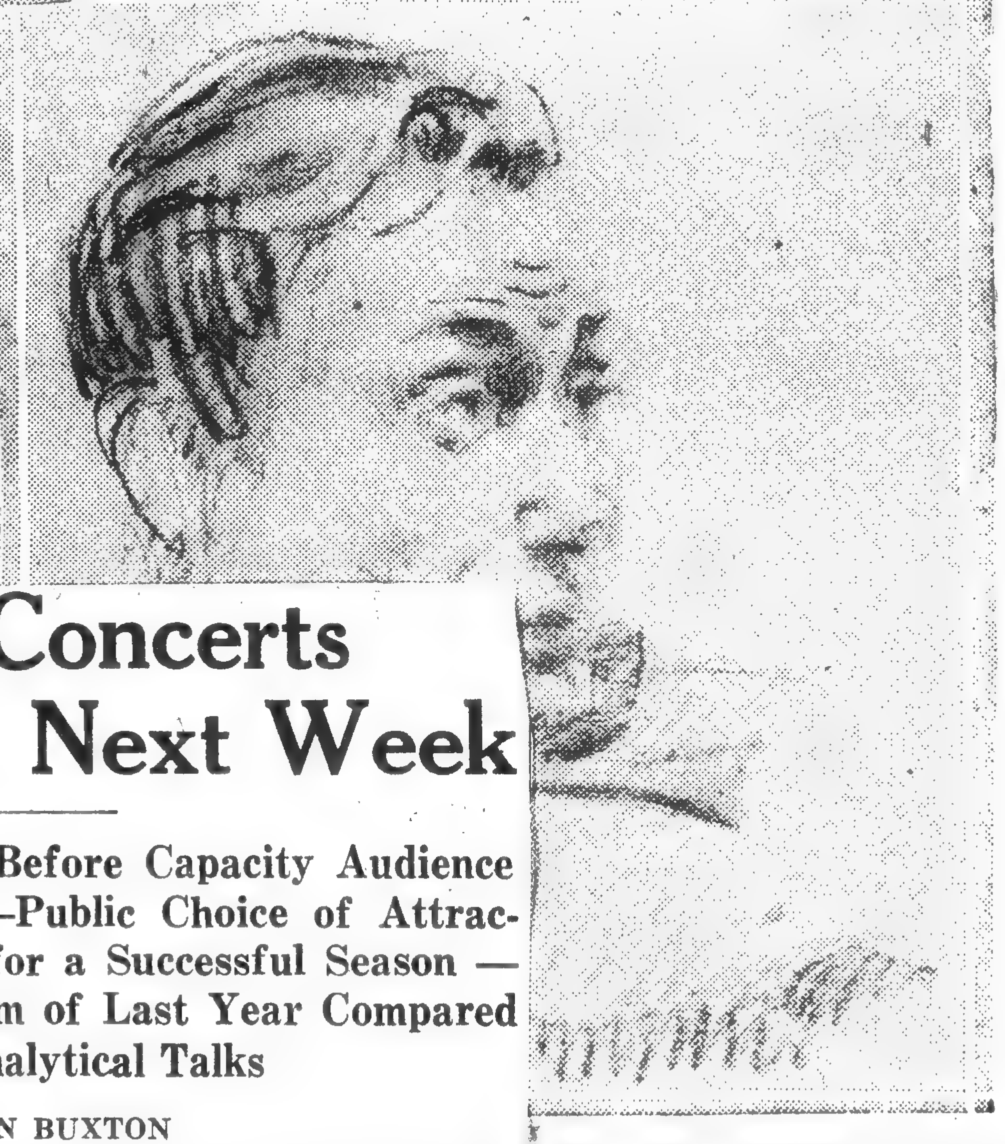
47.

Boston Symphony Leader and Members









Herewith are reproduced a group of charcoal sketches by Jerome Brush of members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, recently published by the orchestra. Above is shown Max Poester, tympanist; top center, Dr Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor; left top, Simon Sternberg, drummer, and bottom, Raphael del Sordo, violinist.

SPRINGFIELD ,MASS.
REPUBLICAN

NOV 1 - 1936

Community Concerts To Open Next Week

Boston Symphony to Play Before Capacity Audience On Tuesday the 10th—Public Choice of Attractions and Possibilities for a Successful Season — the Orchestra's Program of Last Year Compared to the Present One—Analytical Talks

By BENJAMIN BUXTON

THE Boston Symphony orchestra, one of Springfield's most welcome musical visitors, will once more people the stage of the Auditorium on Tuesday night the 10th. This is an important event, because it will open the series of the Springfield Community Concert association and Junior league, whose membership drive last spring, despite flood conditions, was an unprecedented success.

No vacant seats at an Auditorium concert to which admission is charged is a miracle that has come to this city but seldom—never, in fact, in recent years. Sparse audiences have come to be the rule rather than the exception, since therefore the depression, and entrepreneurs with an anxious eye to box office receipts have naturally been timid in attempting to bring first class (therefore expensive) musical attractions.

The Community Concert association, starting up not so many years ago, fared but ill for a number of seasons until the Junior league assumed the major part of the burden. From that time, the social prestige of the league and its efficient management have been instrumental in bringing an increasingly large response. This season there will be no empty seats—an experience that for local concertgoers accustomed to placing their coats on near by vacant chairs, will be strange and exciting.

A filled Auditorium at a concert means that 4000-odd individuals have spent money to hear music. This year, in fact, they have spent more money than in recent memory, and each will sit in his seat hoping to receive from the music what his particular fancy requires. To suit the separate fancies of 4000-odd individuals is obviously an impossibility, so that somehow a safe average must be established. Last season, the Community concert association asked its members for their preferences, which, when received, were carefully tabulated and analyzed. The results are known: Boston Symphony, Jose Iturbi, Jascha Heiftz, and Nelson Eddy.

Thus, the public, through the medium of the association and league committee, selected its course of concerts and expressed its approval in subscribing in large numbers. In this way the public expressed its sincerity in its wish for good music. It must be true, also, that the committee made an earnest effort to select, in so far as possible, the attractions that appeared to be the most popular.

Shows Good Faith

The public has shown good faith and the committee, intelligence. With this harmonious half-cadence, the season begins and the loveliness of the development section is awaited with pleasure. At the end of the season will come the recapitulation and the final progression to the closing chord. The ultimate felicity of the choice, therefore, is still to be proven, though it has indications of success.

At this point the greatest problem must be solved: Giving the public what it wants. Fear that the public, always careless in its disapproval, will fail to register its interest in future seasons is often responsible for the unnecessary sin of condescension on the part of entrepeneurs. The belief that the public "knows what it wants" is an indictment against popular taste. Mass sentiment is curious in that it is violently reactionary when led to unfamiliar ground, yet when that ground becomes familiar it has a pleasant touch. The first step may cause a shock, like a dash of cold water, but if repeated frequently enough will become a necessity too great to be denied.

The public needs adventure in the arts—carefully conducted adventure, to be sure, by safe and discriminating guides, but courageous ones who know from history that courage is immortal and timidity ephemeral. The sporting chance is as admirable in music as it is in mountain climbing. To take a chance, though something may be lost, is to hope that something may be gained.

The program by the Boston symphony given a year ago in the assosiation's series was a direct approach to adventure in music; its program of the 10th is less direct. Last year were played a Haydn symphony, the "Fire Bird" suite of Stravinsky and the Second symphony of Sibelius—classicism and modernism placed together in striking contrast. This program had unity and beauty and was presented magnificently by Dr Koussevitzky and his orchestra. It was a program to be discussed. Whereas Haydn was accepted—without question, the modern Stravinsky could cause a bad moment or two, and the Sibelius, unknown to many in the audience, might be objected to by reason of its length and unfamiliarity.

A Typical Program

Yet each of these composers has a place in the repertoire of great orchestras, and the Boston symphony, especially since the advent of Koussevitzky has become known for its championship of contemporary music. It was Koussevitzky who introduced Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" to America, conducted a cycle of the works of Sibelius, and performed many other courageous deeds in the interests of living composers, and last year was a typical Koussevitzky program.

That to be heard the 10th is also typical of the Russian conductor but of a different variety, composed of works by composers whose works are accepted without question. Mozart, Faure, Richard Strauss and Brahms, are names already classified by critical judgment and popular opinion. They are names of another period whose musical history is well enough known to most individuals and requires no special comment. The design of the program is orthodox in its classicism and conservative in its modernism.

Mozart's Symphony in A-major, No 29, was written when the composer was 18, and will have special interest in that the orchestra introduced it to Boston in its first program of the season this year. Of Mozart's innumerable symphonies, this particular one has found its way to concert programs but seldom, so that its performance here will have the nature of a premiere.

Faure's "Elegie" for cello and orchestra, in which Jean Bedetti will play the solo role is the work of a 19th century composer who lived through the first quarter of this century. His creative output was varied, including operas, works for orchestra, chamber music and solo selections.

"Don Juan," tone poem by Richard Strauss, the only living composer represented on the program, created a furore at its first performance in 1889. It was called "head-long music." Since that time Strauss has written "Don Quixote," a musical delineation of the Cervantes hero; "Also Sprach Zarathustra," which had the philosophical work of Nietsche as its inspiration; the operas "Elektra," "Salome" and "Der Rosenkavalier," to mention only a few. Strauss for many years has been one of the most discussed composers. He is now over 70 and continues to write, although critics have noted a failing vigor in his works.

The Second symphony of Brahms, which has not been heard in these parts for some time, is one of four works written in this form by the great German neo-classicist, and is regarded as the quietest and most melodious of the group.

Commentation on this program will be plentiful. The Community Concert association will offer its members an analytical talk by Werner Josten of the Smith college music faculty on Friday afternoon at 4, at Technical High school. William J. Watkins, music supervisor of the High School of Commerce, will speak over WMAS on the music at a time to be announced later, and the Chromatic club, at its meeting the night before the concert will hear John J. Bishop's analysis of the program. The public in this way will have ample opportunity to acquire an intellectual understanding of the music to be presented and thereby increase its enjoyment of it in many ways.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 1 - 1936

Brahms Festival Concerts Opening Here Friday Night

Musical Art Quartet to Appear at School of Design in First of 10 Concerts.

Symphony Coming Nov. 17

AN unusual series in any season and a major event on November's musical calendar will be the Brahms chamber music festival opening Friday night at the Rhode Island School of Design and consisting of 10 concerts to be played by the Musical Art Quartet of New York, with accompanying soloists.

The month will also be marked by the first of the Providence Symphony Orchestra's series of concerts on Nov. 17. The Monte Carlo Ballet Russe is booked for the 21st and the Boston Symphony will give its second program on the 24th. In Pawtucket the Pawtucket Civic Music Association is opening its season next Sunday, with Jan Smeterlin, pianist, presenting the first of the four concerts scheduled.

Benefit Concert

Hugo Norden, violinist, assisted by Mary Del Deo, soprano, are announced for a benefit concert Wednesday evening in the Broadway M. E. Church, 197 Broadway, at 8:30 o'clock. Their program will be as follows: "La Follia," Corelli-Leonard, Hugo Norden; "Lascia Ch'io Pianga," "Would You Gain the Tender Creature," "Love in Her Eyes Sits Playing," "Let Me Wander Not Unseen," Handel, Mary Del Deo. Sonata in F, opus 24, Beethoven, Allegro, Adagio molto espressivo, Scherzo (Allegro molto), Rondo (Allegro ma non troppo), Hugo Norden. "Ave Maria," "I Think of Thee," "Serenade," "Cradle Song," Schubert, Mary Del Deo. "A Viking Lullaby," Hugo Norden; Menuetto e Gavotta, Veracini; "Tambourin," Leclair, Hugo Norden; Ingeborg Ziegler, accompanist. In charge of the recital are Lucy Del Deo, general chairman; Martha Ahlijian, publicity chairman; Frank Del Deo, business manager. The ushers will be Adolph Lobello, Frank Di Manna, Armando Ricciardi, Romolo Del Deo and Kirkor Ahlijian.

◆ ◆ ◆

Brahms Chamber Programs

The concert of Brahms chamber music on Friday night in the museum of the Rhode Island School of Design will be the first of a group of five to be played on consecutive days. The second group, completing the 10 concerts of the festival, will be played from Nov. 13 to 17 inclusive. The concerts will be in the evening at 8:30 o'clock except those on Sundays, which will begin at 3:30 o'clock and the final one on Tuesday, the 17th, which will also be a matinee.

Works to be played at this week's concerts, on Friday and Saturday evenings, have been announced as follows: Friday—Quintet in G-major, opus 111, for strings (two violins, two violas and 'cello); Sextet in B-flat major, opus 18, for strings (two violins, two violas, two 'cellos). Saturday—Sonata in G-major, opus 78, for violin and piano; Quintet in F-minor, opus 34, for piano and string quartet. Frank Sheridan, pianist, will be the soloist assisting the Musical Art Quartet.

◆ ◆ ◆

Quartet for "Te Deum"

Continuing the Providence Symphony Orchestra's policy of having Rhode Island artists assist at its concerts, Dr. Wassili Leps announces Lucy Marsh Gordon, soprano; Jeanette Lewis Waddington, contralto; George Tinker, tenor, and Ray A. Gardiner, bass, as the quartet which will take part in Bruckner's "Te Deum," to be presented at the orchestra's first program of the season, Tuesday night, Nov. 17, in the Metropolitan Theatre. Like Beethoven, Bruckner wrote nine symphonies but died before the last was completed. The "Te Deum" is often used as the final movement of the unfinished Ninth. It is considered as perhaps the composer's biggest choral work.

◆ ◆ ◆

Pawtucket Orchestra

The newly organized Pawtucket Philharmonic Orchestra will hold its first rehearsal Wednesday night in the Pawtucket Business Men's rooms 251 Main street. A number of instruments are needed to complete the organization which promises to have about 50 members. Oscar Schiller is president, David Buchler, secretary-treasurer, and Harold M. Soutar, conductor.

◆ ◆ ◆

No Guest Cards

Owing to the Federal tax exemption the Pawtucket Civic Music Association is no longer able to extend its customary courtesy to out of town concertgoers of securing guest cards from members prior to each concert. Now, only those who join during the membership campaign may attend the programs. Membership cards may still be used at the concerts in Fall River, Newport and New Bedford though not in Worcester, due to an oversold capacity. Pawtucket's first concert will be given by Jan Smeterlin, pianist, next Sunday afternoon, in the Senior high school at 3:30 o'clock. The doors will be opened half an hour earlier.

◆ ◆ ◆

Oratorio Society

The Providence Oratorio Society, William W. DeRoin, conductor, will sing Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" this evening at 7:30 o'clock in the Mathewson Street Church. The public is invited. The soloists are Armeline Cote, soprano; Jane DeRoin, soprano, and William W. DeRoin, tenor. Medora F. Ladaveze is organist and Charles D. Fiske, pianist.

SYMPHONY IN FIRST TUESDAY

Post Nov. 4 '36

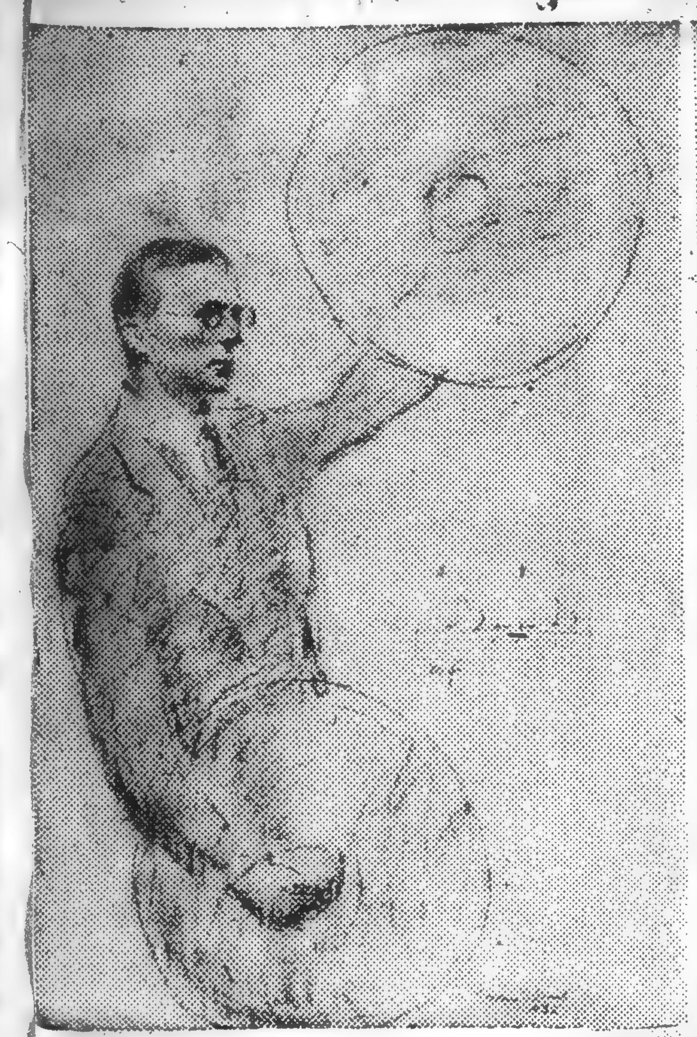
Music of 19th Century Covered in List

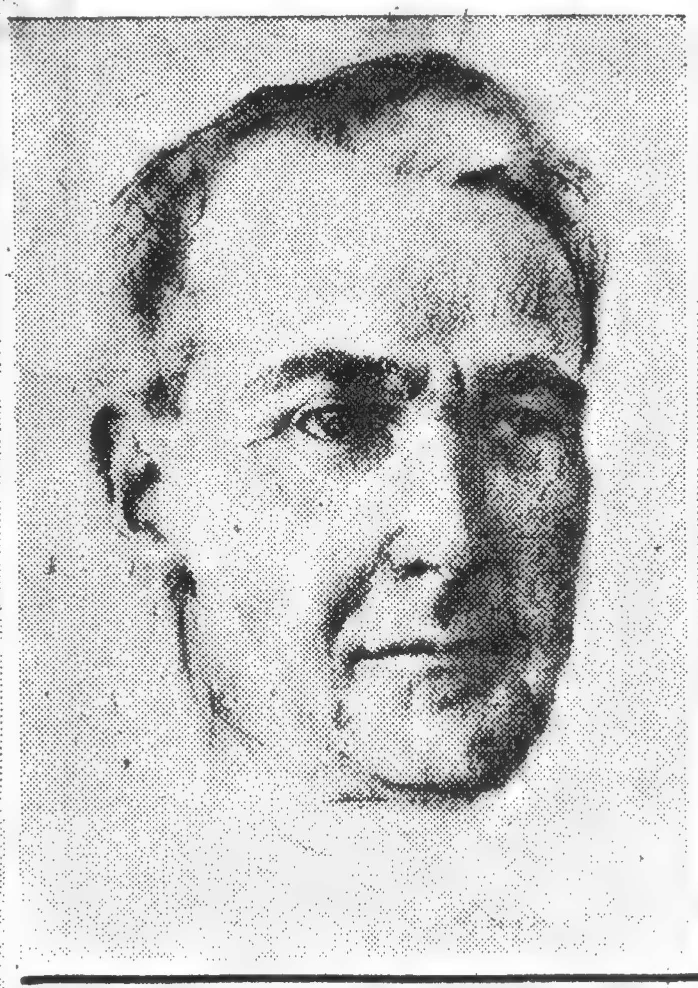
Yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall a large audience sought refuge from the distractions of election day in listening to the first of the current series of six Tuesday afternoon symphony concerts. It is Dr. Koussevitzky's invariable custom to make for this series of Tuesday concerts programmes of a special nature. This year it is his plan to traverse during the half-dozen matinees the significant music of that most interesting of musical centuries, the 19th.

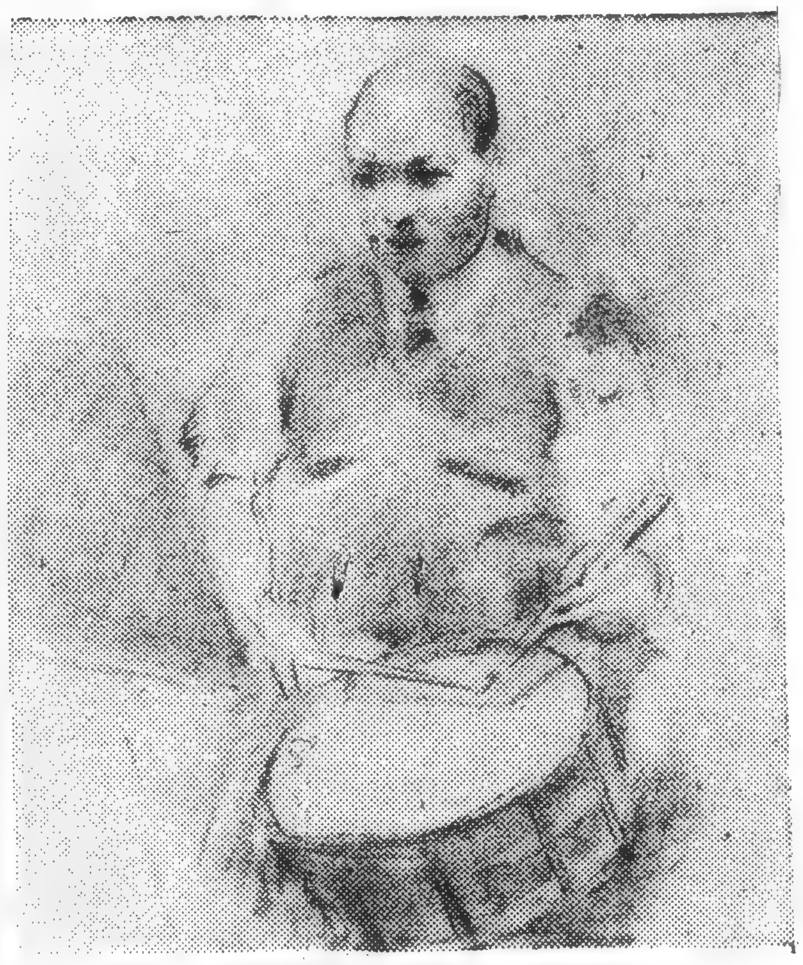
The programme of yesterday covered music composed during the first five decades of that century. For the beginning, in characteristically brilliant performance, there came Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture of 1843. With the next number, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, the clock was turned back to 1822. And Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, completed in 1807 or 1808—we cannot be quite sure which—brought the afternoon to a close. Throughout the concert applause was plentiful.

47.

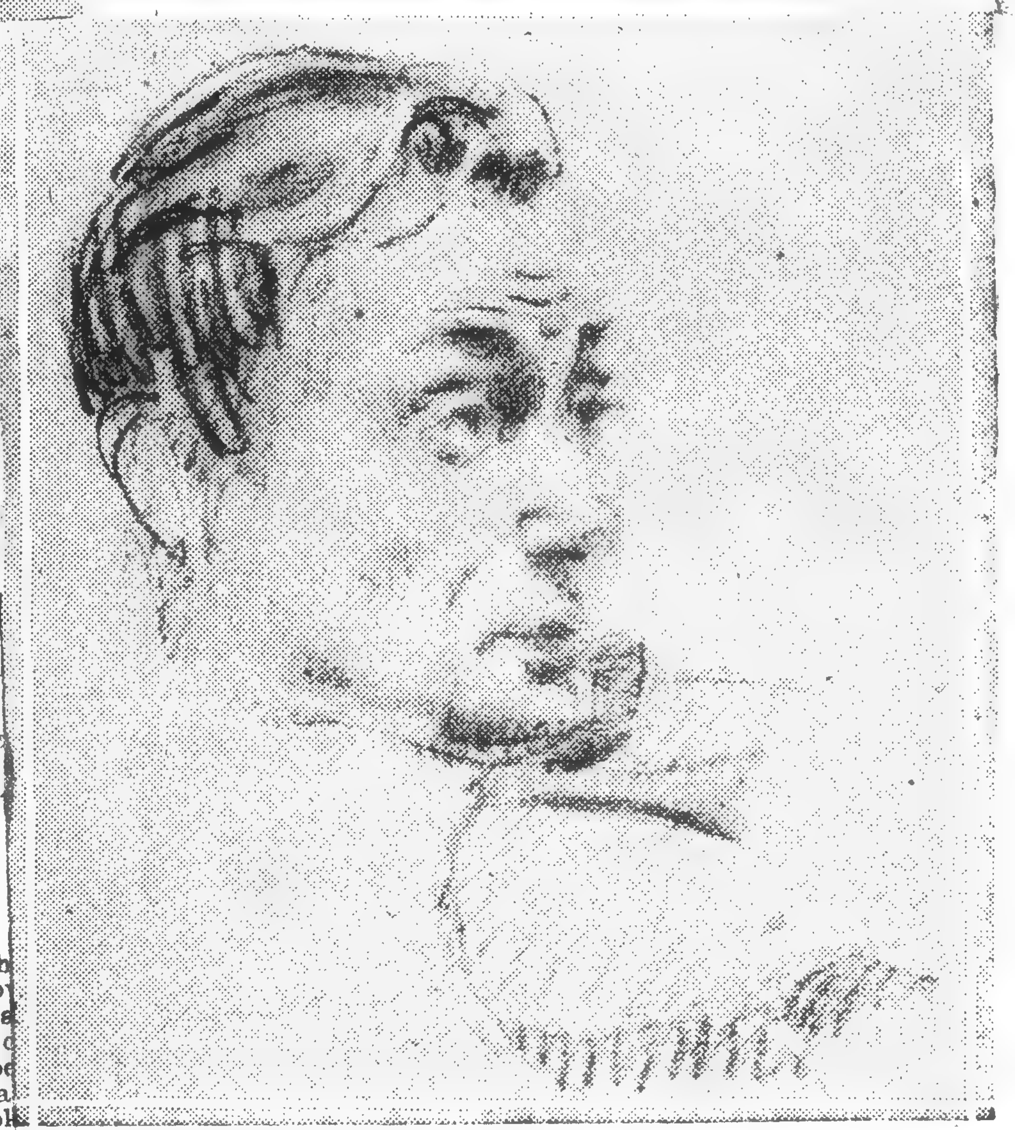
Boston Symphony Leader and Members







Herewith are reproduced a group of charcoal sketches by Jerome Brush of members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, recently published by the orchestra. Above is shown Max Poester, tympanist; top center, Dr Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor; left top, Simon Sternberg, drummer, and bottom, Raphael del Sordo, violinist.



SPRINGFIELD ,MASS.
REPUBLICAN

NOV 1 - 1936

---

nimals in Ju

s by Only Unprotected Pa
—Amateurs Record Rivers
Device On Speeders' Au

B

By E. E. FREE, Ph. D.

decay which such grains contain. Th diet now prescribed at the Mosco institute for patients with rehuma tism allows only seven ounces c bread a day, two ounces of potatoe and less than one ounce of suga to include all the sugar used in cook ing. The patients are allowed mo

---

This Boston Symphony orchestra, one of Springfield's most welcome musical visitors, will once more people the stage of the Auditorium on Tuesday night the 10th. This is an important event, because it will open the series of the Springfield Community Concert association and Junior league, whose membership drive last spring, despite flood conditions, was an unprecedented success.

No vacant seats at an Auditorium concert to which admission is charged is a miracle that has come to this city but seldom—never, in fact, in recent years. Sparse audiences have come to be the rule rather than the exception, since therefore the depression, and entrepreneurs with an anxious eye to box office receipts have naturally been timid in attempting to bring first class (therefore expensive) musical attractions.

The Community Concert association, starting up not so many years ago, fared but ill for a number of seasons until the Junior league assumed the major part of the burden. From that time, the social prestige of the league and its efficient management have been instrumental in bringing an increasingly large response. This season there will be no empty seats—an experience that for local concertgoers accustomed to placing their coats on near by vacant chairs, will be strange and exciting.

A filled Auditorium at a concert means that 4000-odd individuals have spent money to hear music. This year, in fact, they have spent more money than in recent memory, and each will sit in his seat hoping to receive from the music what his particular fancy requires. To suit the separate fancies of 4000-odd individuals is obviously an impossibility, so that somehow a safe average must be established. Last season, the Community concert association asked its members for their preferences, which, when received, were carefully tabulated and analyzed. The results are known: Boston Symphony, Jose Iturbi, Jascha Heiftz, and Nelson Eddy.

Thus, the public, through the medium of the association and league committee, selected its course of concerts and expressed its approval in subscribing in large numbers. In this way the public expressed its sincerity in its wish for good music. It must be true, also, that the committee made an earnest effort to select, in so far as possible, the attractions that appeared to be the most popular.

Shows Good Faith

The public has shown good faith and the committee, intelligence. With this harmonious half-cadence, the season begins and the loveliness of the development section is awaited with pleasure. At the end of the season will come the recapitulation and the final progression to the closing chord. The ultimate felicity of the choice, therefore, is still to be proven, though it has indications of success.

At this point the greatest problem must be solved: Giving the public what it wants. Fear that the public, always careless in its disapproval, will fail to register its interest in future seasons is often responsible for the unnecessary sin of condescension on the part of entrepeneurs. The belief that the public "knows what it wants" is an indictment against popular taste. Mass sentiment is curious in that it is violently reactionary when led to unfamiliar ground, yet when that ground becomes familiar it has a pleasant touch. The first step may cause a shock, like a dash of cold water, but if repeated frequently enough will become a necessity too great to be denied.

The public needs adventure in the arts—carefully conducted adventure, to be sure, by safe and discriminating guides, but courageous ones who know from history that courage is immortal and timidity ephemeral. The sporting chance is as admirable in music as it is in mountain climbing. To take a chance, though something may be lost, is to hope that something may be gained.

The program by the Boston symphony given a year ago in the assosiation's series was a direct approach to adventure in music; its program of the 10th is less direct. Last year were played a Haydn symphony, the "Fire Bird" suite of Stravinsky and the Second symphony of Sibelius—classicism and modernism placed together in striking contrast. This program had unity and beauty and was presented magnificently by Dr Koussevitzky and his orchestra. It was a program to be discussed. Whereas Haydn was accepted—without question, the modern Stravinsky could cause a bad moment or two, and the Sibelius, unknown to many in the audience, might be objected to by reason of its length and unfamiliarity.

A Typical Program

Yet each of these composers has a place in the repertoire of great orchestras, and the Boston symphony, especially since the advent of Koussevitzky has become known for its championship of contemporary music. It was Koussevitzky who introduced Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" to America, conducted a cycle of the works of Sibelius, and performed many other courageous deeds in the interests of living composers, and last year was a typical Koussevitzky program.

That to be heard the 10th is also typical of the Russian conductor but of a different variety, composed of works by composers whose works are accepted without question. Mozart, Faure, Richard Strauss and Brahms, are names already classified by critical judgment and popular opinion. They are names of another period whose musical history is well enough known to most individuals and requires no special comment. The design of the program is orthodox in its classicism and conservative in its modernism.

Mozart's Symphony in A-major, No 29, was written when the composer was 18, and will have special interest in that the orchestra introduced it to Boston in its first program of the season this year. Of Mozart's innumerable symphonies, this particular one has found its way to concert programs but seldom, so that its performance here will have the nature of a premiere.

Faure's "Elegie" for cello and orchestra, in which Jean Bedetti will play the solo role is the work of a 19th century composer who lived through the first quarter of this century. His creative output was varied, including operas, works for orchestra, chamber music and solo selections.

"Don Juan," tone poem by Richard Strauss, the only living composer represented on the program, created a furore at its first performance in 1889. It was called "head-long music." Since that time Strauss has written "Don Quixote," a musical delineation of the Cervantes hero; "Also Sprach Zarathustra," which had the philosophical work of Nietsche as its inspiration; the operas "Elektra," "Salome" and "Der Rosenkavalier," to mention only a few. Strauss for many years has been one of the most discussed composers. He is now over 70 and continues to write, although critics have noted a failing vigor in his works.

The Second symphony of Brahms, which has not been heard in these parts for some time, is one of four works written in this form by the great German neo-classicist, and is regarded as the quietest and most melodious of the group.

Commentation on this program will be plentiful. The Community Concert association will offer its members an analytical talk by Werner Josten of the Smith college music faculty on Friday afternoon at 4, at Technical High school. William J. Watkins, music supervisor of the High School of Commerce, will speak over WMAS on the music at a time to be announced later, and the Chromatic club, at its meeting the night before the concert will hear John J. Bishop's analysis of the program. The public in this way will have ample opportunity to acquire an intellectual understanding of the music to be presented and thereby increase its enjoyment of it in many ways.

SYMPHONY IN FIRST TUESDAY

Post Nov 4 1936

Music of 19th Century Covered in List

Yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall a large audience sought refuge from the distractions of election day in listening to the first of the current series of six Tuesday afternoon symphony concerts. It is Dr. Koussevitzky's invariable custom to make for this series of Tuesday concerts programmes of a special nature. This year it is his plan to traverse during the half-dozen matinees the significant music of that most interesting of musical centuries, the 19th.

The programme of yesterday covered music composed during the first five decades of that century. For the beginning, in characteristically brilliant performance, there came Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture of 1843. With the next number, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, the clock was turned back to 1822. And Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, completed in 1807 or 1808—we cannot be quite sure which—brought the afternoon to a close. Throughout the concert applause was plentiful.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 1 - 1936

Brahms Festival Concerts Opening Here Friday Night

Musical Art Quartet to Appear at School of Design in First of 10 Concerts.

Symphony Coming Nov. 17

An unusual series in any season and a major event on November's musical calendar will be the Brahms chamber music festival opening Friday night at the Rhode Island School of Design and consisting of 10 concerts to be played by the Musical Art Quartet of New York, with accompanying soloists.

The month will also be marked by the first of the Providence Symphony Orchestra's series of concerts on Nov. 17. The Monte Carlo Ballet Russe is booked for the 21st and the Boston Symphony will give its second program on the 24th. In Pawtucket the Pawtucket Civic Music Association is opening its season next Sunday, with Jan Smeterlin, pianist, presenting the first of the four concerts scheduled.

Benefit Concert

Hugo Norden, violinist, assisted by Mary Del Deo, soprano, are announced for a benefit concert Wednesday evening in the Broadway M. E. Church, 197 Broadway, at 8:30 o'clock. Their program will be as follows: "La Follia," Corelli-Leonard, Hugo Norden; "Lascia Ch'io Pianga," "Would You Gain the Tender Creature," "Love in Her Eyes Sits Playing," "Let Me Wander Not Unseen," Handel, Mary Del Deo. Sonata in F, opus 24, Beethoven, Allegro, Adagio molto espressivo, Scherzo (Allegro molto), Rondo (Allegro ma non troppo), Hugo Norden. "Ave Maria," "I Think of Thee," "Serenade," "Cradle Song," Schubert, Mary Del Deo. "A Viking Lullaby," Hugo Norden; Menuetto e Gavotta, Veracini; "Tambourin," Leclair, Hugo Norden, Ingeborg Ziegler, accompanist. In charge of the recital are Lucy Del Deo, general chairman; Martha Ahlijian, publicity chairman; Frank Del Deo, business manager. The ushers will be Adolph Lobello, Frank Di Manna, Armando Ricciardi, Romolo Del Deo and Kirkor Ahlijian.

◆ ◆ ◆

Brahms Chamber Programs

The concert of Brahms chamber music on Friday night in the museum of the Rhode Island School of Design will be the first of a group of five to be played on consecutive days. The second group, completing the 10 concerts of the festival, will be played from Nov. 13 to 17 inclusive. The concerts will be in the evening at 8:30 o'clock except those on Sundays, which will begin at 3:30 o'clock and the final one on Tuesday, the 17th, which will also be a matinee.

Works to be played at this week's concerts, on Friday and Saturday evenings, have been announced as follows: Friday—Quintet in G-major, opus 111, for strings (two violins, two violas and 'cello); Sextet in B-flat major, opus 18, for strings (two violins, two violas, two 'cellos). Saturday—Sonata in G-major, opus 78, for violin and piano; Quintet in F-minor, opus 34, for piano and string quartet. Frank Sheridan, pianist, will be the soloist assisting the Musical Art Quartet.

◆ ◆ ◆

Quartet for "Te Deum"

Continuing the Providence Symphony Orchestra's policy of having Rhode Island artists assist at its concerts, Dr. Wassili Leps announces Lucy Marsh Gordon, soprano; Jeanette Lewis Waddington, contralto; George Tinker, tenor, and Ray A. Gardiner, bass, as the quartet which will take part in Bruckner's "Te Deum," to be presented at the orchestra's first program of the season, Tuesday night, Nov. 17, in the Metropolitan Theatre. Like Beethoven, Bruckner wrote nine symphonies but died before the last was completed. The "Te Deum" is often used as the final movement of the unfinished Ninth. It is considered as perhaps the composer's biggest choral work.

◆ ◆ ◆

Pawtucket Orchestra

The newly organized Pawtucket Philharmonic Orchestra will hold its first rehearsal Wednesday night in the Pawtucket Business Men's rooms 251 Main street. A number of instruments are needed to complete the organization which promises to have about 50 members. Oscar Schiller is president, David Buchler, secretary-treasurer, and Harold M. Soutar, conductor.

◆ ◆ ◆

No Guest Cards

Owing to the Federal tax exemption the Pawtucket Civic Music Association is no longer able to extend its customary courtesy to out of town concertgoers of securing guest cards from members prior to each concert. Now, only those who join during the membership campaign may attend the programs. Membership cards may still be used at the concerts in Fall River, Newport and New Bedford though not in Worcester, due to an oversold capacity. Pawtucket's first concert will be given by Jan Smeterlin, pianist, next Sunday afternoon, in the Senior high school at 3:30 o'clock. The doors will be opened half an hour earlier.

◆ ◆ ◆

Oratorio Society

The Providence Oratorio Society, William W. DeRoin, conductor, will sing Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" this evening at 7:30 o'clock in the Mathewson Street Church. The public is invited. The soloists are Armeline Cote, soprano; Jane DeRoin, soprano, and William W. DeRoin, tenor. Medora F. Ladaveze is organist and Charles D. Fiske, pianist.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 1 - 1936

CHICAGO ORCHESTRA

Achieved Feat of Being Self-Sustaining—Lessons for Other Ensembles

By OLIN DOWNES

CHICAGO.

TO remark that there exists in the heart of America a great symphony orchestra which not only achieves the highest standards of performance but is self-supporting may sound to us of the Eastern border fantastical. But it is true. This is accomplished without ostentation, under a highly conservative business management, and without resort to the system of star conductors.

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra is now in its forty-sixth season. It has functioned in that whole period under two leaders. The first was Theodore Thomas, who led the orchestra, which he founded in 1891, until his death in 1905. He was succeeded by Frederick Stock, formerly a member of the orchestra under Thomas, who directs it today. He directs it with the unwavering support of an exceptionally faithful public; with the passion of a great musician for his art and the solicitude of a father for every detail of the artistic affairs of the orchestra and its members.

* * *

The business management of this orchestra is as unified as its musical direction. A small office force works very efficiently under Henry Voegeli in the conduct of its practical interests. The major policies of the orchestra are subject to the scrutiny and counsel of a board of directors who number forty of the most representative citizens of the community and whose election to the board carries no financial obligation with it.

These directors choose from among themselves fifteen trustees who function in three groups of five members, each group serving for a period of not more than three years. Every year elections are held for one of the groups of five, so that the membership of trustees is constantly changing in such a manner that no one man or small group of men can acquire a preponderance of influence at the meetings. These fifteen, in turn, elect an executive board of five members who cooperate directly with the business and artistic direction of the orchestra.

Here it may be said that this entire organization is actually ruled by one thought, and that is to fulfill the objectives of Mr. Stock in his plans to develop the orchestra and to make it of the greatest possible musical service to the public.

And that is the position which the Chicago Symphony Orchestra occupies with signal success. It is an ideal that most of our great American orchestras entertain and that they realize in various degrees. It is doubtful if any European orchestra carries out the broad educational and cultural services which the representative American symphonic institution pursues almost as a matter of course today. The students' concerts of a Saturday night and the children's concerts given by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony; the supplementary Monday and Tuesday series, and the special festival performances and also certain concerts for the young of the Boston Symphony, and the children and youth concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra are instances of admirable institutional activities of this sort more or less paralleled in other principal orchestral centers of America. Such performances, with attendant lectures, program notes and various illustrative material, are developing very well informed generations of music-lovers through the length and breadth of the land.

* * *

The Chicago Orchestra cannot claim a monopoly of such activities. But it does seem to cover the ground and reach all classes and generations of music lovers more than any other American orchestra of which we can think. In addition to the subscription series of twenty-eight pairs of afternoon and evening concerts (as against twenty-four by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony this season) there are twelve Tuesday afternoon concerts on the second and fourth Tuesdays of the month, for six months; also six children's concerts, one a month, and Saturday night popular concerts through the season. Into these last two series of events Mr. Stock appears to enter with a particular zest. He talks with the children, and at times he talks and jests at the Saturday night entertainments, which reach a different class of patrons than any of the other concerts. Never a conductor of pose or pretense, the last man in the world for "side," he is with his audience heart and soul. Figuratively, at least, his coat can come off readily; nevertheless and invariably he remains the efficient and respected disciplinarian, the upholder of standards and ideals.

Through all these activities of the orchestra and those devoted to its service there is a rare sort of a family feeling, not only on the part of the members of the organization, but with those who benefit by its work.

* * *

In Boston, with Mr. Koussevitzky and his incomparable band, a similar relation is growing between the orchestra, its direction and its public. That relation receives a special embodiment in the organization called "The Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." It is, indeed, in the developments of such and similar bonds of service and good-will that an orchestra's greatest potency for good lies.

Pre-eminently, the Chicago Symphony Orchestra has made itself a place in the lives and hearts of its countrymen. This condition motivates every aspect of the Chicago Orchestra's activities. It shows in the quality of the band, with its solid and well balanced choirs, in the vitality and masculinity of the playing, which now has somewhat of roughness natural at the beginning of the season with considerable new material added to the ranks this Fall. But everything is there—all the potential qualities, a number of excellent solo players, who, however, understand very well that they are factors in an ensemble; and no bad or slack style. It would be inconceivable under the orchestra's leadership.

* * *

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra has a very important adjunct, of which the nearest parallel in New York is the admirable work of the National Orchestral Association. That, however, is an organization independent of the principal symphony orchestra of the city. The Chicago Civic Orchestra is the training school and the "feeder" for the Chicago Symphony and for other symphony orchestras of neighboring States. To its development the parent orchestra has contributed from its funds. It is composed of young applicants for orchestral training who already know their instruments and who desire education in theory, analysis and ensemble as well as the customary orchestral routine. The young men who enter this organization are selected by examination. They are trained individually and rehearsed in separate groups before the full rehearsals of the full orchestra. They are coached and conducted this season by Hans Lange, now assistant conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, as he was until last season the associate conductor of our Philharmonic-Symphony and now conductor of the Civic Orchestra, of which Mr. Stock is general director. The students are charged $25 to enter the Civic Orchestra, but they are paid $5 apiece for taking part in three concerts for which admissions are sold cheaply to the public.

In the end their membership and tuition cost them $10 a year. Most of them remain in the Civic Orchestra three or four years, then graduate into professional positions. A rehearsal conducted by Mr. Lange showed his quality and thoroughness, as it also showed what they might call on the gridiron a second or "scrub" orchestra of fine material and full symphonic proportions. With this body young soloists give public performances, and others have opportunity of trying their wings, both as composers and conductors.

Cont. above Right.

In a word, the Chicago Symphony has built from the ground up. Its existence and its efficacy do not depend upon momentary gusts of fortune, fair or ill, or upon the passing caprices of a restless public or press either. That it has gained its present position is, of course, due to its sedulous study of the public situations and the requirements of its patrons. But its affairs seem always to have been planned with long and broad vision. In only two seasons in the worst time of the depression did it find itself with unbalanced ledgers. In two successive years there were deficits of between $45,000 and $50,000—the total was less than $100,000. The public was asked and the money was contributed in various amounts, mostly small, which soon reached the required total.

It should not be understood that the receipts of the concerts alone pay for the orchestra. That would never be possible. But the Chicago Symphony, in addition to incidental assets of gifts, legacies, interest on trust funds, &c., has its own home and its building, which is situated in the center of the city and which has considerable rental space in addition to the very commodious Orchestra Hall, where rehearsals and concerts are held.

Many other rooms, even the rest room, are in constant use for the rehearsals in groups and the various instruction classes of the Civic Orchestra—now on its way to becoming a permanently endowed institution. Rentals count heavily toward balancing the orchestra's bills.

With these and other resources the Chicago Symphony Orchestra is a self-supporting institution, beholden to no person, parties or committees, male or female, for its existence and the independent pursuit of its artistic policies. And that is what every American orchestra should and perhaps must become if the changes, social and economic, which are upon us are to be survived.

Post Nov. 4/36

MUSIC

TUESDAY SYMPHONY

The first concert of the Tuesday series was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. The program was as follows:

Berlioz....Overture, "The Roman Carnival"
Schubert
Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished"
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 5 in C minor

One would not ordinarily assume that a national election day would be ideal for a symphony concert. Nevertheless a larger audience gathered yesterday than there has been at this series for the past few years. This is all to the good, inasmuch as both the short series are well worth attending. There are those, after all, who do not want or cannot afford to go to the regular concerts. The Tuesdays and Mondays are a sensible solution for such a public.

It is traditional that these concerts shall be conservative in the choice of music. Yesterday's program followed well-established paths. Perhaps Dr. Koussevitzky wanted to soothe those who had already been to the polls and induce a mood of tranquil behavior in those who had them still to face. The Berlioz overture, to be sure, was once a revolutionary work and is still exciting when played as dramatically as it was yesterday. The Schubert and the Beethoven are calculated to send any one away in a mood of chastened humility.

Both symphonies were beautifully played yesterday. Every detail of the "Unfinished" was marvelously brought forth. The loveliest of soft tones and the contrasts of climax were admirably produced. The Beethoven Fifth, too, was stirringly played. The audience applauded mildly after the Schubert and much more enthusiastically at the end of the concert.

A. W. W.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 3 - 1936

Mrs. Davenport to Entertain Boston Symphony Committe At Her Home To-morrow

A meeting of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, to be given at the Brooklyn Academy of Music this season, will be held to-morrow afternoon at the home of the chairman, Mrs. Henry Joralemon Davenport, No. 40A Monroe place. The business meeting at 4:30 o'clock will be followed by tea.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 1 - 1936

BRAHMS CONCERT ARTISTS SELECTED

Musical Art Quartet to Give Series of 10 Recitals Starting Friday.

21 NUMBERS ARE PLANNED

Victor Polatschek, First Clarinet of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Engaged to Play

The names of four musicians who will assist the Musical Art Quartet in its series of Brahms concerts here were announced last night.

The first of the 10 concerts will be given Friday night. All will be in the School of Design Museum. Twenty-one Brahms compositions will be played.

Artists assisting the quarter will include: Victor Polatschek, first clarinet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Gottfried Freiberg, horn, New York Philharmonic Orchestra; Ralph Ochsman, 'cello, and William Hymanson, viola, both of New York. As has been announced previously, Frank Sheridan, pianist, will be heard in 13 of the compositions.

Mr. Polatschek has been first clarinet of the Boston orchestra since the autumn of 1930, when he came to this country to take the position. He was born in Vienna in 1889. He took his musical degree at the Staats Academy in that city and joined the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra in 1912 as first clarinet. He became, in 1921, a professor at the Staats Academy, continuing with the Vienna orchestra as first clarinet until he came to this country.

The quartet comprises Sascha Jacobsen, first violin; Paul Bernard, second violin; Louis Kievman, viola; and Marie Rosemaet-Rosanoff, violoncello.

The concerts will be given from Friday through the following Tuesday, and from the next Friday through the next Tuesday, Nov. 6-10 and 13-17. The concerts will begin at 8:30 p. m. except the two on Sunday and the last one, on a Tuesday, which will begin at 3:30 p. m.

The Musical Art Quartet is well known both here and abroad, and has appeared in this city in concerts in the School of Design Museum. It has already begun a series of Brahms concerts in New York.

The first program here will comprise the quintet in G major for two violins, two violas and violoncello, and the sextet in B-flat major, for two violins, two violas and two violoncellos.

Globe Nov. 4 '36

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday afternoon series was played yesterday to an audience that nearly filled Symphony Hall. Indeed, if the size of this gathering is a criterion, the Tuesday series has been substantially affected by the general improvement in subscriptions this year.

Dr Serge Koussevitzky has decided to limit the repertory of these concerts to music of the 19th century. Three composers who lived during the first half of that 100 years had their innings yesterday: Berlioz with his "Roman Carnival" Overture; Schubert with his "Unfinished" Symphony, and Beethoven with his Fifth Symphony.

One cannot imagine a more telling performance of the overture than that which Dr Koussevitzky achieved. The brilliant work was literally played for all it is worth. Continuing in the realm of superlatives, he brought out the imperishable beauties of Schubert's score with a perfection of style, tone and proportion that exceeded any treatment of this symphony one remembers to have heard from him in the past. Beethoven's symphony was a letdown from the heights, for Dr Koussevitzky invariably over-dramatizes the work. The Fifth Symphony is, however, an enduring masterpiece, and it exerted its customary emotional power.

C. W. D.

Trans Nov. 3/36

On Reading a Program Book

Confusion Before Music

If ever before a concert I look
In that fount of wisdom, the program book,
I'm always mystified to read
Of sundry things that laymen need
To have explained in words of fewer Syllables, and meanings less obscure:
The symphony is scored for piccolos,
Okay!—and the flute surely everyone knows.
But a double bassoon—do they double their parts
And score the same as a double in hearts?
And what in the world can a tam-tam be?
Something of Burbank's? Does it grow on a tree,
A hybrid of trumpet and tympani?
And always unpleasant suspicions steal
Over the mind that a glockenspiel
Hides something morbid, underhand.
But more than these, I would understand
What is meant by the usual strings—
The words suggest a number of things:
Gift ribbon, traffic and fresh green beans—
Obviously not what the odd phrase means.
When the orchestra plays, perplexities scatter—
It sounds like music, so what does it matter?

TRISTRAM LIVINGSTONE

The program for the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday and Saturday of this week has been changed somewhat. "Das Lied von der Erde" remains. But in place of the little Mozart Symphony in E-flat and Malipiero's "Cimarosiana" a longer Symphony in C major K. 338) by Mozart will be played.

Monitor

Soloist

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Maria Ranzow

Singing This Week With the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde"

MUSIC HOLDS ALTHOUSE AFTER OWN REHEARSAL

While Serge Koussevitzky yesterday was leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra through an intensive rehearsal of "The Song of the Earth," masterpiece of Gustav Mahler, every detail was being eagerly taken in by an audience of one on the floor of the darkened auditorium.

Trans – Nov. 5/36

PAUL ALTHOUSE

An official of the orchestra recognized him as Paul Althouse, American tenor of the Metropolitan Opera, who will be one of the two soloists in the Mahler work tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. Having rehearsed his own part, he had quietly remained "out front."

"Mahler's music is so beautiful I can't tear myself away," commented Althouse. "It is extremely difficult for both the instrumentalists and the singers—especially the singers. But the result is wonderfully beautiful.

"A first acquaintance with Mahler's music may require concentration. But I think the general American public is ready now to listen harder, so that Mahler will be more and more enjoyed, instead of being a 'forgotten man' among composers."

and Musicians --- News of the Screen

Paul Althouse
Tenor Soloist for the Performances of Mahler's "Lied von der Erde" at the Symphony Concerts of Friday Afternoon and Saturday Evening of This Week

News of Orchestras

In Boston

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra and solo singers through "Das Lied von der Erde" by Mahler at the concerts of tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. Maria Ranzow, contralto, and Paul Althouse, tenor, will be the soloists. The only other number on the program will be a Mozart Symphony in C major (K. 338).

In Philadelphia

Leopold Stokowski will make his season's debut with the Philadelphia Orchestra at the concerts of tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, returning to conduct the group of which the principal conductor is now Eugene Ormandy. Mr. Stokowski's program includes his transcription of music from "Boris Godunov," arranged as a free suite or fantasia; his transcription of Tchaikovsky's "Solitude"; the latter composer's Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," and Rachmaninov's Third Symphony. The last-named composition will be performed for the first times on these occasions.

In Cincinnati

"Carmen" will be presented in staged version with the assistance of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra under Eugene Goossens tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. The title role will be sung by Gertrude Wettergren of the Metropolitan Opera Association.

In Chicago

Hans Lange will make his debut as associate conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of this evening and tomorrow afternoon, when he will present a program made up of a suite from Rameau's "Dardanus," Beethoven's Second Symphony, the Overture to "Flight into Egypt" by Berlioz, "Brigg Fair" by Delius, and the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde."

Ormandy Leads

Sight and Sound of the Philadelphia Orchestra Under Its New Conductor

By Moses Smith

Philadelphia

While enormous crowds of people paraded up and down Broad street outside of the Academy of Music here on the night of election day, a fairly large audience sat inside the hallowed auditorium, listening to the Philadelphia Orchestra make music under its new conductor, Eugene Ormandy. Let those who are expressing increased fears about the regimentation of our people take whatever comfort they can from that circumstance.

Mr. Ormandy is only relatively new as conductor here, since he has appeared in the past as guest conductor and he has already been in charge of the Philadelphia Orchestra through almost a month of concerts during the present season. How much of a hold he has taken on the imagination and affections of the concert audiences in this City of Brotherly Love only the practiced local commentators may venture to say accurately. If this visitor were to judge by what seemed like an inordinately cool reception on Tuesday evening he would report that Mr. Ormandy has yet to make his way with the Philadelphia public.

Certainly the applause was weak even in comparison with the behavior of a Friday afternoon audience at the Boston Symphony concerts, which can scarcely be charged with over-enthusiasm. Either the Philadelphian listeners on Tuesday night were apathetic to the performances, for the most part, or one must discard the remnants of a belief in applause as a gauge for measuring an audience's pleasure.

* * *

Mr. Ormandy and the orchestra, for their part, seemed to give the audience sufficient reason for greater warmth of applause than was exhibited. The conductor, who is still young, is evidently a master of the arts of showmanship (not necessarily to be construed in a derogatory sense). His beat is greatly varied, now sweeping and almost circular in the manner of Toscanini's; now weighted and vertical, to hammer out a rhythm; now minute and subtle. He has what are known as expressive hands. His figure is slight; but it is perfectly tailored. A fine blond head surmounts it.

The program included a Mozart Divertimento in D major; "Also sprach Zarathustra" by Strauss; Prokofiev's "Classical" Symphony, and Jacques Ibert's "Escales." Wherever this music permitted Mr. Ormandy made clear his primary concern with melody, whether the melody dominated the entire symphonic ensemble or whether it was a mere wisp of a subordinate part, as in measures of the slow movement of the "Classical" Symphony. The ups and downs of a phrase he made so obvious that none could miss them.

He was also concerned with contrast and with dramatic fervor and vigor. To the extent that orchestral color could assist in attaining these attributes of expression he employed it. Brilliancy for its own sake he did not court, as Stokowski has done with the same orchestra probably more skilfully than any conductor in the world. And if, in an effort to yield what Mr. Ormandy wanted, the orchestra lost some of the marvellous precision it has displayed under Stokowski, Mr. Ormandy seemed to accede.

It is true that, for example, in the Mozart Divertimento and the "Classical" Symphony, Mr. Ormandy gave his strings their head several times, so that they played with dazzling speed. But even here what seemed to matter to him was not so much a display of orchestral virtuosity as his conception of the purely musical requirements (a conception which, in turn, was sometimes distorted, in the opinion of this attestant).

* * *

Mr. Ormandy's approach to the music of Mozart is the prevalent, twentieth century approach. The music is "interpreted" in terms of our times and needs; or, to put it differently and more ingratiatingly, as Mozart would have liked it if he had had our virtuoso orchestras for which to write. But he did not have our orchestras. And it would seem that the object of a stylist is to reconstruct a style.

Besides, Mozart certainly did not have a large string orchestra (which Mr. Ormandy employed on Tuesday evening) in mind when he wrote his Divertimenti. One is no longer postulating, but relying on documents. In almost every case, the divertimenti, serenades, cassations, and so forth, had a specific, occasional character. When Mozart wished to write a symphony for a large instrumental ensemble, he knew how to well enough. In the case of the present Divertimento he wrote for strings and two French horns. Hearing it in Philadelphia the listener could not help noting that, brilliant and sonorous as the massed Philadelphian strings were, they were not Mozartean.

In other respects Mr. Ormandy's version of the music of Mozart had delightful moments as well as moments that aroused disturbing questions. Mr. Ormandy had in mind, clearly, sharp contrasts in dynamics. But he succeeded also in making these contrasts violent, a circumstance less in keeping with the composition. In the same way he seemed, at the moment of performance, to be overdoing the "Classical Symphony of Mozart. But here, it must be confessed, the present hearer was listening through ears habituated (or prejudiced) by numerous performances at home. A little reflection was sufficient to make Mr. Ormandy's version seem not only plausible but even most musical and penetrating.

* * *

The performance of "Also sprach Zarathustra" had so many admirable qualities that it was a pity that it also contained a less desirable one—occasional roughness of orchestral tone. But this factor was really a complement of Mr. Ormandy's superb balancing of parts in the orchestral ensemble, so that each line stood out in relief. Although Mr. Ormandy did not hesitate to point up the significant statements in the Straussian score he avoided oversentimentalizing music which, to start with, has some measures of questionable taste.

Ibert's "Escales" served sufficiently its purpose of a brilliant orchestral show-piece. This Philadelphia Orchestra is a brilliant aggregation, and it plays in an auditorium of marvelous acoustical qualities. The instrumental climaxes in "Escales," as played here Tuesday evening, hit the ears of the visiting listener with almost the force of an explosion. In this music, as throughout the rest of the program, Mr. Ormandy seemed to hold the musicians in the palms of his sensitive hands—held them much more securely, it seemed, than he did the audience. But this, again, may have been merely a figment of the visitor's imagination. If it was not, then the Philadelphia audience is standing by, awaiting the return this week of its idol, Leopold Stokowski.

Listening to a single program, the visitor would be foolhardy to venture a prediction as to Mr. Ormandy's ultimate position among American conductors. It was clear, though, that he is a leader of great competence and an interpreter of great imagination. His imagination seems purely musical; and this fact ought reasonably to insure that his faults of excess—which are a product of his time and environment—will tend to disappear.

Walter Helfer's Works at Composers' Forum Tonight

Because the first two meetings of the Composers' Forum Laboratory were attended by unexpectedly large audiences, the meeting place has been changed to Repertory Hall in the Repertory Theater Building. Compositions by Walter Helfer will be presented there this evening. The program will include "Apassionata" for violin and piano; "A Southern Serenade" for string trio; "Elegiac" Sonata for piano, and the String Quartet in G. The performers will be members of the Forum String Quartet and the Forum Trio. Admission to the concert, which begins at 8.15, is free. A question period follows the announced program.

LAWRENCE, MASS
TRIBUNE

NOV 2 - 193

The T. T. A. Man recently learned from the columns of The Lawrencian, local high school student publication, of another worthy work undertaken by the White Fund. This fund, which provides the city with free lecture and music courses and with books at the public library, has made it possible for four members of the high school orchestra to attend the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The trustees purchased five season tickets for the concerts and each week Robert Sault, orchestra director, takes four senior members of the orchestra for an evening of good music. The donation of the tickets may become an annual custom as it is well worth-while perpetuating.

* * * * *

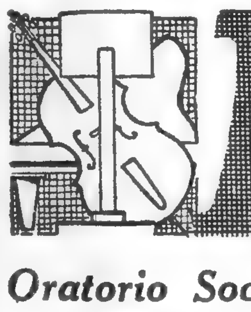
HOLYOKE, MASS
Transcript Telegram

NOV 3 - 193

Six symphony programs are included in the current Bushnell Concert Series, which opened Oct. 21 with a program by the Philadelphia Orchestra under the leadership of Eugene Ormany. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony in Hartford twice, on Nov. 17 and Jan. 6. The National Symphony will play Dec. 2, under the baton of Hans Kindler. The New York Philharmonic-Symphony, directed by John Barbirolli, will play Dec. 15, and the Cleveland Orchestra Feb. 17, under the direction of Arturo Rodzinski.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 2 - 1936



MUSIC

Oratorio Society Gives Interesting Performance of "Hymn of Praise."—Viennese Contralto, Far From Paris, Gets Gown in Cranston

By George Y. Loveridge

The Providence Oratorio Society, William DeRoin conductor, presented Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" last evening in Mathewson Street M. E. Church.

Dr. W. Earl Ledden spoke briefly in commendation of the society's work and said the service would present not only all the values of a concert but would have the further merit of being "dedicated to high spiritual ends."

The society sang this symphonic cantata creditably, with a fervor that gave religious significance and emotional satisfaction. A tenor and soprano duet was sung by Mr. DeRoin and his 16-year-old daughter, Jane.

This work was written at the request of the town council of Leipzig for a festival in commemoration of the invention of printing. It was first performed in the Church of St. Thomas, Leipzig, on June 5, 1840. Mendelssohn's Festgesang was written for the same festival. The not particularly good. But that is not the fault of the Oratorio Society. The work in general, especially the choral and the final chorus, maintains a tone of faith that is deep and genuine, and this the singers conveyed satisfactorily.

The society is to be commended not only for the general quality of its singing, but also for the works that it undertakes. Despite difficulties, it helps to keep alive compositions that, although acknowledged to be among the finest ever produced, are usually in danger of being submerged and forgotten under newer and inferior works.

List of Members

The members of the society: William W. De Roin, conductor; Medora F. Ladaveze, organist; Charles D. Fiske, pianist.

Soprano—Edna Brook, Armeline Cote, Pearl De Bow, Jane De Roin, Helen Haussler, Anne Redfern, Marion See, Dorothy Sinclair, Anne Southall, Mabel Baker, Mary Clayton, Emily Davis, Marion Garnett, Arria Huntington, Margaret Thurston, Ethel Vandale.

Alto—Elizabeth Anthony, Frances Fox, Rena Lebeau, Christine Nelson, Jessie Nelson, Elsie Olson, Alice DeRoin, Jean Donie, Mabel Johnson, Mary Reynolds.

Tenors—Jesse Baker, Stanley Hall, Page Sanderson, Chester Siok, Danforth Googins, Albert Rivard, Albert Vandale.

Bass—William Anthony, Wilbert Desroches, Arthur Elvin, Albert Hirst, Keith Lawrence, Hardress Murry, Robert Anthony, Henry Hunt, William MacDonald, Manton Taylor.

Soloists—Armeline Cote, soprano; Jane DeRoin, soprano; William DeRoin, tenor.

If Gustav Mahler, a good many years ago, had not written "Das Lied von der Erde,' it is probable that Maria Ranzow would not have been in Rhode Island yesterday having a gown fitted.

Explanation: Maria Ranzow is a contralto, a native of Vienna. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky invited her to take part in a performance of the Mahler symphony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday and Saturday in Boston. Mme. Ranzow learned rather late that one of the performances is to be in the afternoon, not both of them at night, as she had supposed. She had plenty of evening gowns but none that pleased her for afternoon wear. So she came here to have one made.

"It is just too funny," she protested yesterday, laughing a handsome, contralto laugh, and nodding her head in its round furred cap. "Here I, who live in Paris, have to come to Providence to have a gown made!" She leaned back in her arm chair and laughed again.

Visiting in Cranston

To do strict local justice she was not in Providence but in Cranston, 178 Columbia avenue, the home of Mr. and Mrs. Edmund C. Stickney. She spent Saturday night there, and returned to Boston last night. Yesterday afternoon she took time to make a few remarks on American singers, the radio and other trifles.

Mme. Ranzow is a person who brings Wagnerian roles to mind, and she mentioned, as a matter of fact, that on her only other visit to this country, about five years ago, she sang with the Metropolitan Opera Company in productions of Wagner's works.

Her eyes are vivacious, her hands expressive, and she has very definite opinions.

"I am a black, black monarchist," she asserted, frowning. "We are expecting the return of the monarchy over there." She gestured in the direction of Broad street and Vienna. "And was it not a surprise that the Blum Government came into being in France? They will have a civil war there the same as they are having in Spain."

How about Stravinsky?

"I adore Stravinsky. Yes, you may say I adore Stravinsky. I created the role of Jocasta in his 'Oedipus Rex' in South America."

Where in South America?

"But in Argentine, in Buenos Aires, of course. When one speaks of music in South America one means Argentine, Buenos Aires."

Just then there was a barking outside, and Mme. Ranzow requested: "Please let him in. I do not know him very well."

We knew him even less, but we went to the door, thinking perhaps it was only the wolf following us from home. It turned out to be a Pekingese. He came in with his nose in the air.

How about the radio?

Dislikes Radio in U. S.

"The radio? But over here it is terrible. The men with money hire the very best singers. And what do they do? They sing trash! Trash! They sing 'owah, owah, owah' because that is what the public wants, and they will ruin their voices."

Mme. Ranzow waved a hand on which shone a ring with a large, flat amythist.

"In Europe it is not so. If a man had millions of dollars, if he had all the millions of Rockefeller, he could not hire the radio to advertise a piece of soap. No, not a piece of soap!"

But is not the public taste here improving?

Continued above

"Yes, it is improving. And here are some of the finest voices in the world in America. But they must be careful of their training. They must have good training and take care of their voices or they will not last. When one sings one must have the technique so well mastered that one does not think of it at all. One thinks only of the song, the meaning. One does not think of the note of placing it in the nose, in the mouth, in the throat, in the head, in the tummy."

She brushed all such thoughts away with a vehement hand.

"One gives the note room, and there it is," she said. "That is how one must sing."

Mme. Ranzow said she will remain in this country for some time. She was driven to Rhode Island by Mrs. Warner Hurlbut, of Long Island, formerly of Providence, and who recommended the dressmaker Mme. Ranzow came to see.

"Das Lied von der Erde," in which she will sing in Boston, is a symphony for tenor, contralto and orchestra. It has six movements, all based on Chinese poems that date from the eighth century. The poets were Li Tai Po, Tschang-Tsi, Mong-Kao-Jen and Wang-Wei. The poems were translated into German by Hans Bethge. Mahler modified them to suit his needs.

and Musicians --- News of the Screen

Paul Althouse

Tenor Soloist for the Performances of Mahler's "Lied von der Erde" at the Symphony Concerts of Friday Afternoon and Saturday Evening of This Week

News of Orchestras

In Boston

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra and solo singers through "Das Lied von der Erde" by Mahler at the concerts of tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. Maria Ranzow, contralto, and Paul Althouse, tenor, will be the soloists. The only other number on the program will be a Mozart Symphony in C major (K. 338).

In Philadelphia

Leopold Stokowski will make his season's debut with the Philadelphia Orchestra at the concerts of tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, returning to conduct the group of which the principal conductor is now Eugene Ormandy. Mr. Stokowski's program includes his transcription of music from "Boris Godunov," arranged as a free suite or fantasia; his transcription of Tchaikovsky's "Solitude"; the latter composer's Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," and Rachmaninov's Third Symphony. The last-named composition will be performed for the first times on these occasions.

In Cincinnati

"Carmen" will be presented in staged version with the assistance of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra under Eugene Goossens tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. The title role will be sung by Gertrude Wettergren of the Metropolitan Opera Association.

In Chicago

Hans Lange will make his debut as associate conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of this evening and tomorrow afternoon, when he will present a program made up of a suite from Rameau's "Dardanus," Beethoven's Second Symphony, the Overture to "Flight into Egypt" by Berlioz, "Brigg Fair" by Delius, and the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde."

Ormandy Leads

Sight and Sound of the Philadelphia Orchestra Under Its New Conductor

By Moses Smith

Philadelphia

While enormous crowds of people paraded up and down Broad street outside of the Academy of Music here on the night of election day, a fairly large audience sat inside the hallowed auditorium, listening to the Philadelphia Orchestra make music under its new conductor, Eugene Ormandy. Let those who are expressing increased fears about the regimentation of our people take whatever comfort they can from that circumstance.

Mr. Ormandy is only relatively new as conductor here, since he has appeared in the past as guest conductor and he has already been in charge of the Philadelphia Orchestra through almost a month of concerts during the present season. How much of a hold he has taken on the imagination and affections of the concert audiences in this City of Brotherly Love only the practiced local commentators may venture to say accurately. If this visitor were to judge by what seemed like an inordinately cool reception on Tuesday evening he would report that Mr. Ormandy has yet to make his way with the Philadelphia public.

Certainly the applause was weak even in comparison with the behavior of a Friday afternoon audience at the Boston Symphony concerts, which can scarcely be charged with over-enthusiasm. Either the Philadelphian listeners on Tuesday night were apathetic to the performances, for the most part, or one must discard the remnants of a belief in applause as a gauge for measuring an audience's pleasure.

* * *

Mr. Ormandy and the orchestra, for their part, seemed to give the audience sufficient reason for greater warmth of applause than was exhibited. The conductor, who is still young, is evidently a master of the arts of showmanship (not necessarily to be construed in a derogatory sense). His beat is greatly varied, now sweeping and almost circular in the manner of Toscanini's; now weighted and vertical, to hammer out a rhythm; now minute and subtle. He has what are known as expressive hands. His figure is slight; but it is perfectly tailored. A fine blond head surmounts it.

The program included a Mozart Divertimento in D major; "Also sprach Zarathustra" by Strauss; Prokofiev's "Classical" Symphony, and Jacques Ibert's "Escales." Wherever this music permitted Mr. Ormandy made clear his primary concern with melody, whether the melody dominated the entire symphonic ensemble or whether it was a mere wisp of a subordinate part, as in measures of the slow movement of the "Classical" Symphony. The ups and downs of a phrase he made so obvious that none could miss them.

He was also concerned with contrast and with dramatic fervor and vigor. To the extent that orchestral color could assist in attaining these attributes of expression he employed it. Brilliancy for its own sake he did not court, as Stokowski has done with the same orchestra probably more skilfully than any conductor in the world. And if, in an effort to yield what Mr. Ormandy wanted, the orchestra lost some of the marvellous precision it has displayed under Stokowski, Mr. Ormandy seemed to accede.

It is true that, for example, in the Mozart Divertimento and the "Classical" Symphony, Mr. Ormandy gave his strings their head several times, s that they played with dazzling speed. But even here what seemed to matter to him was not so much a display of orchestral virtuosity as his conception of the purely musical requirements (a conception which, in turn, was sometimes distorted, in the opinion of this attestant).

* * *

Mr. Ormandy's approach to the music of Mozart is the prevalent, twentieth century approach. The music is "interpreted" in terms of our times and needs; or, to put it differently and more ingratiatingly, as Mozart would have liked it if he had had our virtuoso orchestras for which to write. But he did not have our orchestras. And it would seem that the object of a stylist is to reconstruct a style.

Besides, Mozart certainly did not have a large string orchestra (which Mr. Ormandy employed on Tuesday evening) in mind when he wrote his Divertimenti. One is no longer postulating, but relying on documents. In almost every case, the divertimenti, serenades, cassations, and so forth, had a specific, occasional character. When Mozart wished to write a symphony for a large instrumental ensemble, he knew how to well enough. In the case of the present Divertimento he wrote for strings and two French horns. Hearing it in Philadelphia the listener could not help noting that, brilliant and sonorous as the massed Philadelphian strings were, they were not Mozartean.

In other respects Mr. Ormandy's version of the music of Mozart had delightful moments as well as moments that aroused disturbing questions. Mr. Ormandy had in mind, clearly, sharp contrasts in dynamics. But he succeeded also in making these contrasts violent, a circumstance less in keeping with the composition. In the same way he seemed, at the moment of performance, to be overdoing the "Classical Symphony of Mozart. But here, it must be confessed, the present hearer was listening through ears habituated (or prejudiced) by numerous performances at home. A little reflection was sufficient to make Mr. Ormandy's version seem not only plausible but even most musical and penetrating.

* * *

The performance of "Also sprach Zarathustra" had so many admirable qualities that it was a pity that it also contained a less desirable one —occasional roughness of orchestral tone. But this factor was really a complement of Mr. Ormandy's superb balancing of parts in the orchestral ensemble, so that each line stood out in relief. Although Mr. Ormandy did not hesitate to point up the significant statements in the Straussian score he avoided over-sentimentalizing music which, to start with, has some measures of questionable taste.

Ibert's "Escales" served sufficiently its purpose of a brilliant orchestral show-piece. This Philadelphia Orchestra is a brilliant aggregation, and it plays in an auditorium of marvelous acoustical qualities. The instrumental climaxes in "Escales," as played here Tuesday evening, hit the ears of the visiting listener with almost the force of an explosion. In this music, as throughout the rest of the program, Mr. Ormandy seemed to hold the musicians in the palms of his sensitive hands—held them much more securely, it seemed, than he did the audience. But this, again, may have been merely a figment of the visitor's imagination. If it was not, then the Philadelphia audience is standing by, awaiting the return this week of its idol, Leopold Stokowski.

Listening to a single program, the visitor would be foolhardy to venture a prediction as to Mr. Ormandy's ultimate position among American conductors. It was clear, though, that he is a leader of great competence and an interpreter of great imagination. His imagination seems purely musical; and this fact ought reasonably to insure that his faults of excess—which are a product of his time and environment—will tend to disappear.

Walter Helfer's Works at Composers' Forum Tonight

Because the first two meetings of the Composers' Forum Laboratory were attended by unexpectedly large audiences, the meeting place has been changed to Repertory Hall in the Repertory Theater Building. Compositions by Walter Helfer will be presented there this evening. The program will include "Apassionata" for violin and piano; "A Southern Serenade" for string trio; "Elegiac" Sonata for piano, and the String Quartet in G. The performers will be members of the Forum String Quartet and the Forum Trio. Admission to the concert, which begins at 8.15, is free. A question period follows the announced program.

LAWRENCE, MASS
TRIBUNE

NOV 2 - 1936

The T. T. A. Man recently learned from the columns of The Lawrencian, local high school student publication, of another worthy work undertaken by the White Fund. This fund, which provides the city with free lecture and music courses and with books at the public library, has made it possible for four members of the high school orchestra to attend the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The trustees purchased five season tickets for the concerts and each week Robert Sault, orchestra director, takes four senior members of the orchestra for an evening of good music. The donation of the tickets may become an annual custom as it is well worth-while perpetuating.

* * * * *

HOLYOKE, MASS
Transcript Telegram

NOV 3 - 1936

Six symphony programs are included in the current Bushnell Concert Series, which opened Oct. 21 with a program by the Philadelphia Orchestra under the leadership of Eugene Ormany. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony in Hartford twice, on Nov. 17 and Jan. 6. The National Symphony will play Dec. 2, under the baton of Hans Kindler. The New York Philharmonic-Symphony, directed by John Barbirolli, will play Dec. 15, and the Cleveland Orchestra Feb. 17, under the direction of Arturo Rodzinski.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 2 - 1936

ROOSEVELT HIT BY FR. COUGHLIN

Radio Priest Calls President "Revivor of Heresy of Divine Right of Kings."

SCORES MUST LEGISLATION

The Providence Oratorio Society, William DeRoin conductor, presented Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" last evening in Mathewson Street M. E. Church.

Dr. W. Earl Ledden spoke briefly in commendation of the society's work and said the service would present not only all the values of a concert but would have the further merit of being "dedicated to high spiritual ends."

The society sang this symphonic cantata creditably, with a fervor that gave religious significance and emotional satisfaction. A tenor and soprano duet was sung by Mr. DeRoin and his 16-year-old daughter, Jane.

This work was written at the request of the town council of Leipzig for a festival in commemoration of the invention of printing. It was first performed in the Church of St. Thomas, Leipzig, on June 5, 1840. Mendelssohn's Festgesang was written for the same festival. The "Hymn of Praise" is considered one of his characteristic and important works.

Conductor and Soloist

Mr. DeRoin last night filled the two roles of conductor and tenor soloist. His singing showed the benefits of experience and sincerity. The duet with his daughter was particularly interesting. Miss DeRoin's voice, naturally, is not mature, but it has had the advantage of her father's guidance and shows promise. She sang with confidence and with general fidelity to pitch.

Some of the lines and phrases, such as "Praise to the Three-One-God" display a choice of words that seems not particularly good. But that is not the fault of the Oratorio Society. The work in general, especially the choral and the final chorus, maintains a tone of faith that is deep and genuine, and this the singers conveyed satisfactorily.

The society is to be commended not only for the general quality of its singing, but also for the works that it undertakes. Despite difficulties, it helps to keep alive compositions that, although acknowledged to be among the finest ever produced, are usually in danger of being submerged and forgotten under newer and inferior works.

List of Members

The members of the society: William W. De Roin, conductor; Medora F. Ladaveze, organist; Charles D. Fiske, pianist.

Soprano—Edna Brook, Armeline Cote, Pearl De Bow, Jane De Roin, Helen Haussler, Anne Redfern, Marion See, Dorothy Sinclair, Anne Southall, Mabel Baker, Mary Clayton, Emily Davis, Marion Garnett, Arria Huntington, Margaret Thurston, Ethel Vandale.

Alto—Elizabeth Anthony, Frances Fox, Rena Lebeau, Christine Nelson, Jessie Nelson, Elsie Olson, Alice DeRoin, Jean Donie, Mabel Johnson, Mary Reynolds.

Tenors—Jesse Baker, Stanley Hall, Page Sanderson, Chester Siok, Danforth Googins, Albert Rivard, Albert Vandale.

Bass—William Anthony, Wilbert Desroches, Arthur Elvin, Albert Hirst, Keith Lawrence, Hardress Murry, Robert Anthony, Henry Hunt, William MacDonald, Manton Taylor.

Soloists—Armeline Cote, soprano; Jane DeRoin, soprano; William DeRoin, tenor.

If Gustav Mahler, a good many years ago, had not written "Das Lied von der Erde," it is probable that Maria Ranzow would not have been in Rhode Island yesterday having a gown fitted.

Explanation: Maria Ranzow is a contralto, a native of Vienna. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky invited her to take part in a performance of the Mahler symphony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday and Saturday in Boston. Mme. Ranzow learned rather late that one of the performances is to be in the afternoon, not both of them at night, as she had supposed. She had plenty of evening gowns but none that pleased her for afternoon wear. So she came here to have one made.

"It is just too funny," she protested yesterday, laughing a handsome, contralto laugh, and nodding her head in its round furred cap. "Here I, who live in Paris, have to come to Providence to have a gown made!" She leaned back in her arm chair and laughed again.

Visiting in Cranston

To do strict local justice she was not in Providence but in Cranston, 178 Columbia avenue, the home of Mr. and Mrs. Edmund C. Stickney. She spent Saturday night there, and returned to Boston last night. Yesterday afternoon she took time to make a few remarks on American singers, the radio and other trifles.

Mme. Ranzow is a person who brings Wagnerian roles to mind, and she mentioned, as a matter of fact, that on her only other visit to this country, about five years ago, she sang with the Metropolitan Opera Company in productions of Wagner's works.

Her eyes are vivacious, her hands expressive, and she has very definite opinions.

"I am a black, black monarchist," she asserted, frowning. "We are expecting the return of the monarchy over there." She gestured in the direction of Broad street and Vienna. "And was it not a surprise that the Blum Government came into being in France? They will have a civil war there the same as they are having in Spain."

How about Stravinsky?

"I adore Stravinsky. Yes, you may say I adore Stravinsky. I created the role of Jocasta in his 'Oedipus Rex' in South America."

Where in South America?

"But in Argentine, in Buenos Aires, of course. When one speaks of music in South America one means Argentine, Buenos Aires."

Just then there was a barking outside, and Mme. Ranzow requested: "Please let him in. I do not know him very well."

We knew him even less, but we went to the door, thinking perhaps it was only the wolf following us from home. It turned out to be a Pekingese. He came in with his nose in the air.

How about the radio?

Dislikes Radio in U. S.

"The radio? But over here it is terrible. The men with money hire the very best singers. And what do they do? They sing trash! Trash! They sing 'owah, owah, owah' because that is what the public wants, and they will ruin their voices."

Mme. Ranzow waved a hand on which shone a ring with a large, flat amythist.

"In Europe it is not so. If a man had millions of dollars, if he had all the millions of Rockefeller, he could not hire the radio to advertise a piece of soap. No, not a piece of soap!"

But is not the public taste here improving?

Continued above

"Yes, it is improving. And here are some of the finest voices in the world in America. But they must be careful of their training. They must have good training and take care of their voices or they will not last. When one sings one must have the technique so well mastered that one does not think of it at all. One thinks only of the song, the meaning. One does not think of the note of placing it in the nose, in the mouth, in the throat, in the head, in the tummy."

She brushed all such thoughts away with a vehement hand.

"One gives the note room, and there it is," she said. "That is how one must sing."

Mme. Ranzow said she will remain in this country for some time. She was driven to Rhode Island by Mrs. Warner Hurlbut, of Long Island, formerly of Providence, and who recommended the dressmaker Mme. Ranzow came to see.

"Das Lied von der Erde," in which she will sing in Boston, is a symphony for tenor, contralto and orchestra. It has six movements, all based on Chinese poems that date from the eighth century. The poets were Li Tai Po, Tschang-Tsi, Mong-Kao-Jen and Wang-Wei. The poems were translated into German by Hans Bethge. Mahler modified them to suit his needs.

NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
NEWS

OCT 31 1936

CABBAGES AND KINGS

> "The time has come," the Walrus said,
> "To talk of many things;
> Of shoes—and ships—and sealing wax—
> Of cabbages and Kings—"
> —Alice in Wonderland.

By NED BROWN

"Should Armistice Day be observed as a national holiday?" was a question recently asked by a radio interviewer. All but one of his answers were in the affirmative. One disagreed not only on the grounds that we have "too many" holidays, as it is. Whether we have too many or not is a question which obtains varying answers, according to how the holiday affects the individual. Considering the matter through one's own back door, it might be said that newspaper men, for instance, care little, whether there is a holiday or not; they work anyhow, and holiday events may augment their duties.

Let's get profound about it, though. There is no doubt but that there should be a national observance of November 11, if the type of observance served to promote the idea of peace. We suspend activities of the routine world on holidays, in order the day may be set apart for concentration of thought upon the significance of the occasion. How many Americans pause to think upon what the day signifies is a question upon which your guess is as good as that of your neighbor.

If the national suspension of normal activities and a specialized observance sought to impress upon the nation's mind the necessity for world peace in the future, no one could possibly object to a holiday. What shall this observance be like? Are we wise in having the day marked by parades, by blaring of trumpets and the rumble of drums? Does this glorify the institution of war, rather than deliver a cogent message for peace? It's not for one individual to say. One can only take a poll of many persons to obtain their reactions—and in some cases they might not be positive.

It impresses this writer that the major Armistice Day celebration should be marked by some sort of general community gathering, where a good speaker might deliver an appropriate and impressive message of the "it sholl not be again" character. There might be music of an appropriate and thought-provoking nature. The military aspect of things should be subdued except in such degree as would cause the people to sense the sacrifice which the war veterans made.

"I love a parade," says the song, and so does everyone. No one, however, enjoys it as much as does the young boy or girl. But how do they interpret the military procession? Does it cause them to imply that war is a great and glorious thing, or do they merely regard it as a spectacular and colorful demonstration? It is as natural for a boy to play soldier and to flaunt his wooden gun as it is for him to go coasting in the winter time. "Bingism," as Booth Tarkington calls it, in referring to that period of boyhood when the lad is dominated by toy pistols and military accoutrements is an institution. The glory of Bingism cannot be suppressed. Youngsters might want to "play war" with toy pistols, ammunition, and ramparts—but not even the most audacious and romantic of children would care to simulate the slimy aspects of war—the filth, the disillusionment, the pain, the general living conditions.

If the young people must gain an idea of war, let them obtain it in its fullness and horror. With every tale of heroism, see that a tale of filth and atrocity goes hand in hand. But when the day comes to honor the veterans, who made a sacrifice for a cause, let us make certain that they, not the institution, receive the glorification.

We should like to have our friends among the music lovers read carefully the following anonuncement regarding a most interesting and worthwhile special series of symphony concerts:

"A concert season of unique distinction opens Tuesday at 3 o'clock in Symphony Hall, Boston. For this will be the opening of the annual series of six symphonic matinees in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays what might be termed programs with a plot, under the leadership of its world-famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. He does the plotting, and always is able to find something new. The music of last year's matinees was assembled nation by nation. This time the plot of the season will be music drawn from the masters of the nineteenth century, who are known as "the romantic school." They made great advances in the art of writing for orchestra, besides infusing their work with great appeal to the emotions and the imagination.

"To hear the characteristic works of the nineteenth century masters, as Koussevitzky will group them at the Tuesday matinees at approximately monthly intervals, will be to range over some of the most glorious music of the world. The composers will include Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Liszt, Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Debussy and Sibelius.

"Although the entire strength of the Boston Symphony, 109 players, is heard in the Tuesday matinees, these concerts are looked on by many as a bargain symphony series. Due simply to there being only six concerts, where as there are 24 on Fridays and Saturdays, reserved season tickets are inexpensive. Also, the late starting time, 3 o'clock, appeals to out-of-towners.

"On Tuesday, November 3, the program is scheduled to include: the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven; Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture, and the "Unfinished Symphony of Schubert."

Oct 29/36

ABILENE TEXAS
NEWS

IN NEV

By GEOF

NEW YORK, Oct. 28.—Fifteen minutes after your favorite radio stars have said "Au Revoir" for the evening, the odds are two to one they are up at Harry Harrison's office betting the lowdown on themselves. Harry is the boy who's made a big business out of telling the ether's top-notchers where they hit that wrong note, or how to get the most of a particularly good gag.

The sign on the door of his office reads: "Radio Recording Studio." Harry's lifework is just that. When stars want to hear exactly how they sounded to the folks listening in out at Detroit or Dubuque, they call up Harry and tell him to "put them on the gelatin." In ordinary parlance that order simply means taking a recording of their radio broadcast from start to finish.

* * *

Gets a Sock on the Gelatine

Six years ago Harry Harrison was in the music publishing business. In those days radio was beginning to approach its present pinnacle in the entertainment world. And all Harry heard from morn until midnight was the complaint of every radio artist that they couldn't improve because it was impossible to sing and listen to themselves at the same time.

Impossible? Harry didn't think so. He went out and bought himself a roomful of gadgets, rented an office and mailed out a few announcements. Everyone thought he was crazy. Today his customers range from Gladys Swarthout and Eddie Cantor to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Peculiarly enough Harry's first client wasn't a singer, comedian or orchestra leader. He was Jack Sharkey, the former fistic champion of these United States. Sharkey wanted the entire radio broadcast of his fight that night. He got it—plus a lovely gift to the jaw in the sixth round which finished the fight. For weeks afterwards, Harry tells me, Sharkey was worried for fear there were a couple of recordings which hadn't been delivered to him. He broke every one he bought.

Hans Kindler, conductor of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, has a standing order every time his organization goes on the air. Next day he plays the record back to ihs musicians to show them where they were at fault. Rosa Ponselle and Lawrence Tibbett were customers long before they made their radio debut. They used to come up and sing in the studio which Harry has right in his office, in order to learn the proper technique for radio broadcasting. Both of them possessed such resonant voices that they had to be trained not "to blast" into the microphone. Today Harry has two autographed pictures of them which he wouldn't trade f or all the bandleaders in the world.

* * *

Refuses "Going Out" Pleas

The list of artists who subscribe to Harry's service reads like a "Who's Who" of the entertainment world. But some of his people aren't illustrious. A great many of them are amateurs, who come up to the studio after a broadcast and plead with Harry to erase that awful gong-like sound. But he won't do it. Business is business—and besides it ruins the record.

His current elaborate equipment permits Harry to record four different broadcasts at the same time. The price is usually standard—$15.00 per hour.

At least six of the larger programs being broadcast from the coast are among Harry's list of satisfied customers. He air-mails the recordings the same day. With six competitors in Los Angeles, he considers that the highest type of compliment.

"After all," Harry says, "they recognize a pioneer when they see one. No one ever bought electric lights from anyone but Edison." In that respect Harry is one of Manhattan's modest entrepreneurs.

COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

Nov. 1/36

Symphony Club to Open Season on Monday

THE PROGRAM which Arthur Rodzinski and the Cleveland Symphony orchestra will present at its Monday evening Memorial hall concert, is one which traverses, in a sense, the history of music from the serene heights of Bach to the jagged, Soviet mountain ranges of Shostakovich.

Alfredo Casella's transcription of the Bach Chaconne, in its own right music which only the greatest of violin virtuosi may attempt, heads the program list. Dedicated to Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, the Casella transcription was given its world premier in Boston last March. By report, the Italian composer has done a brilliant piece of work. Monday night's will be the transcription's first Central Ohio performance.

Another Columbus "first performance" will be that of Shostakovich's Symphony No. 1, Op. 10. Its composer's artistic credo has been summed up in his own statement, that "Good music lifts and heartens and lightens people for work and effort. It may be tragic, but it must be strong. It is no longer an end in itself, but a vital weapon in the struggle." The first symphony, whatever of this philosophy may be detected in its measure, s best regarded as pure music since it has no avowed political implications such as may be found in the later "October" and "May Day" symphonies.

Entirely familiar grond is dealt with by the music to be heard duing the second portion of the concert. First vill come the Prelude and Love Death from Vagner's "Tristan and Isolde." This is to be followed by "Le Fete Dieu" from the "Iberian Suite" of the Spanish Albeniz—a section of the suite picturing the happenings of a great festival day in Seville. The second suite of excerpts from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," will bring the concert to an end.

* * *

THE ALREADY sold-out matinee concert for Young People, to be conducted by Rudolph Ringwall, will also cover a wide musical terrain presenting such matter as a movement from the Franck D-minor Symphony, dances by Johann Strauss fils, music by Pierne and our native Nathaniel Dett, among others.

Interest in this concert is testified to by the fact that the auditorium has been sold out for the past 10 days, and a waiting list of some 5500 would-be patrons has been drawn up. Prizes, in the form of tickets to the Philadelphia Symphony concert here in February, are to be awarded students who write the best essay on impressions of the Monday event.

Nor has interest been entirely local. Towns near Columbus who are sending in deputations of pupils to the concert have also made the Cleveland orchestra's advent a thing of special note. In conjunction with the public schools, for instance, Groveport merchants have offered a prize for the best accounts of the concert and trip to Columbus.

The matinee will begin at 3:30 o'clock, the evening concert at 8:30. Season tickets for the Cleveland and Philadelphia orchestra concerts and single admissions for Monday night's concert will be on sale at the Symphony club box office at Heaton's all day Monday and at Memorial hall an hour before performance time.

Artur Rodzinski will conduct the Monday night concert by the Cleveland Symphony orchestra in Memorial hall under the auspices of the Symphony club of Central Ohio.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

NOV 1 - 1936

One of the outstanding dates of the present musical season is December 8th, when Mrs. Berry will bring the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The concert will be the fourth in her series.

* * *

Forum to Present Pianist

The Music Forum for Piano Teachers will present Stanley Fletcher, pianist, next Friday evening, beginning at 8.30 o'clock, in the Twentieth Century Club. The program:

English suite, A minor ....Bach
  Prelude.
  Sarabande.
  Gigue.
Sonata, Op. 31, No. 2, D minor. Beethoven
  Largo, allegro.
  Adagio.
  Allegretto.
Sonata, op. 35 b flat minor.....Chopin
  Grave, agitato.
  Scherzo.
  March funebre presto.
Six etudes ....Chopin
La Fille Aux Cheveux de Lin...Debussy
The Clown (Florentine sketches)...
  ....Pattison
Night Fall (Roman sketches)...Griffes
Malagulua ....Lecuona

CONCORD, N. H.
Monitor & N. H. Patriot

NOV 3 - 1936

TO START ENTERTAINMENTS

Four Members of Boston Symphony Will Play At Manchester

The Currier Gallery of Art at Manchester announces the first in a series of Sunday afternoon entertainments on Nov. 8, free to the public, at the museum at 3:30 o'clock when four members of the Boston symphony orchestra, known as The Aeolians, will be heard. The group includes: Violin, Minot Beale; flute, George Madsen; cello, Carl Stockbridge; and harp, Marion Watson.

An exhibition of Chinese court costumes; reproductions of German graphic art in the Middle Ages, and a showing of water colors by Oscar H. Julius are at the gallery this month.

TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES

Oct. 30/36

In pre-war days Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was both conductor and financial backer of his own symphony orchestra in Russia.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

NOV 1 - 1936

FIRST TUESDAY CONCERT

Next Tuesday afternoon in Symphony hall at 3 o'clock, there will be given the first of the series of six Tuesday concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Serge Koussevitzky is devoting the programmes of this series to the music of the nineteenth century. The first programme will be as follows: Berlioz's Overture, "The Roman Carnival"; Schubert's Symphony in B minor, the "Unfinished"; and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

Nov. 1/36

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky will play here on Dec. 8, the fourth concert in the Zorah B. Berry series.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

31.

LONG ISLAND CITY, N. Y.
STAR

NOV 3 - 1936

Florence Mills Adds New Beauty To Beethoven Music At Recital

Concert Pianist And Lecturer Charms Members Of Forest Hills Women's Club With Jewel-Clear Tones.

By LUCILLE SHEARWOOD.

Long-familiar music glowed with new beauty yesterday afternoon under the inspired touch of Florence Terrel Mills, concert pianist, lecturer and resident of Forest Hills.

The appearance of Mrs. Mills, in a lecture-recital based on the life and works of Beethoven, provided an artistic climax for the busy November program of the Forest Hills Women's Club in the Community House.

Actually the pianist returned by request of the many club members who still recall the all-Chopin recital given about four years ago, soon after Mrs. Mills came to the community.

Critics had unstinted praise for the promising young artist, when the present Mrs. Mills made her debut at the age of seventeen as a soloist with the New York Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Walter Damrosch.

Later the pianist was chosen to play with the Boston Symphony. Mrs. Mills studied with the late Alexander Lambert.

It is not every artist who has the ability to tune the pulse of her audience in advance of the music, but Mrs. Mills creates an understanding atmosphere by first establishing the background of the composer's life and emotional conflicts.

Thus the listeners were able, as never before, to capture the moods of the exquisite "Moonlight Sonata," when the artist followed her spoken word with the eloquent music.

Jewel-Clear Tone.

Beethoven himself considered the sonata sheer fantasy, Mrs. Mills warned, and her behind-the-scenes introduction keyed the intent audience to listen for the great composer's response to moods—alternating from reflective song to the feverish and impetuous strains of the third movement.

This pianist has a firm, jewel-clear tone, She plays with the ease of confident assurance. More important, Mrs. Mills plays both from the head and from the heart. Her listeners feel because she felt. To all who give an understanding ear, she communicates her own perception of a composer's moods—of the song in his heart.

After the "Moonlight Sonata" came an all-too-brief condensation of the "Eroica Symphony," in a piano arrangement by Mrs. Mills herself. The artist explained that Beethoven admired the great General Bonaparte tremendously until he learned and resented Napoleon's ambition to be Emperor of France. Then the composer tore the dedication sheet from his manuscript, but he could not tear out the splendid heroism. And the name "Eroica" remained.

Brilliance, finish and masterly musicianship were joined in this arrangement of the famous symphony. In this, as in her other numbers, Mrs. Mills first accented the theme, before playing the entire movement.

Next came the haunting emotion of the "Appassionata Sonata, Opus 57," termed his favorite work by the composer.

"Read Shakespeare's 'Tempest'," Beethoven advised, when friends sought for the solution of the intense feeling here revealed.

Artistry Wins Ovation.

Fittingly, Mrs. Mills chose to complete her lecture-recital with a portion of the Fifth Symphony, relating man's struggle and final triumph. Victorious it was, from the lovely united song of violin and 'cello—delicately interpreted by the pianist, through the theme where clarinets, horns and wood winds in turn lift their voices.

Under the artist's fingers, the piano spoke and sang and eventually thundered its exultant triumph, and the last notes met their echo in almost tumultuous applause. As one listener said, "We need something like this."

Guests of the club found much to applaud yesterday in the capacity attendance, encouraging reports, reviews of current plays and the prompt routine of business, handled by the president, Mrs. John R. Price.

"Presidents' Day," observed by the club on alternate years, brought at least thirty heads of clubs from Long Island, Manhattan and a few more distant sections. The visiting officers, numbering at least two past presidents of the Forest Hills Women's Club who now hold office in the city federation, were introduced by Mrs. Price. Rose corsages designated the special guests.

Arrangements for the program were made by Mrs. Frederick W. S. Locke. A reception and tea in the lounge of the Community House followed the program.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

NOV 1 - 1936

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S UNIQUE MATINEES

A concert season of unique distinction opens Tuesday at 3 o'clock in Symphony hall, Boston. For this will be the opening of the annual series of six symphonic matinees in which the Boston Symphony orchestra plays what might be termed programs with a plot, under the leadership of its world-famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. He does the plotting, and always is able to find something new. The music of last year's matinees was assembled nation by nation. This time the plot of the season will be music drawn from the masters of the nineteenth century, who are known as "the romantic school." They made great advances in the art of writing for orchestra, besides infusing their work with great appeal to the emotions and the imagination.

To hear the characteristic work of the nineteenth century masters, as Koussevitzky will group them at the Tuesday matinees at approximately monthly intervals, will be to range over some of the most glorious music of the world. The composers will include Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Liszt, Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Debussy and Sibelius.

Although the entire strength of the Boston Symphony, 109 players, is heard in the Tuesday matinees, these concerts are looked on by many as a bargain symphony series. Due simply to there being only six concerts, whereas there are twenty-four on Fridays and Saturdays, reserved season tickets are inexpensive. Also, the late starting time, three o'clock, appeals to out-of-towners.

On Tuesday, November 3, the programme is scheduled to include: the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven; Berlioz's "Roman Carnival, and the "Unfinished" Symphony of Schubert.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

NOV 1 - 1936

ON THE RECORDS

By MICHAEL SHAW, JR.

HUBERT'S "UNFINISHED" Symphony, hes some of music's highest reaches, receives a h dualistic performance from Serge Koussevitzk ostonians (Victor Set M-319; five sides).

Many will like this sprightly-stepped reading, but we still favor Sir Henry Wood's version. Where Koussevitsky spins stiff contrasts, his English colleague makes reasoned contours, particularly in the basses' legend-like melody. The Boston strings, than which no orchestra has better, do themselves proud when not encumbered with super-conductorial vehemence or sound experts who occasionally forget that so-called higher fidelity is not a twin of tonal cannonading.

The odd side contains a selection from Schubert's "Rosamunde" Ballet Music.

Trans. Nov 4/36

Tuesday Symphony Series Is Resumed

Another season of supplementary Tuesday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky. As in the past, the programs of these concerts are drawn from the orthodox repertory, leaving the more controversial issues to the week-end series. By "orthodox" one means nowadays "nineteenth century," since works of this period form the greater part of the current programs—a regretable circumstance.

However this may be, it was something of a delight to hear a concise reading of two such hackneyed works as Schubert's B minor and Beethoven's C minor Symphonies which made up the bulk of yesterday's program. The latter had been heard earlier this season at the regular series, and although several offensive details noted at that time by another reviewer were still apparent, the performance as a whole was extremely sober and refreshing.

Among these details were the overzealous attack of the basses in the Trio, the wholly unnecessary retard in the transition to the last movement, and occasional muddiness and brassiness in the last. To offset these, however, were many welcome features: the well-chosen and well-sustained tempi throughout, the gratifying observance of the sforzando in the 'cellos near the beginning of the Scherzo, etc. We question the advisability of repeating the exposition of the first movement. The composer is not always to be trusted in this device. In many cases he indicates it out of pure inertia.

We are indebted to Dr. Koussevitsky for an almost faultless performance of the Schubert B minor. The tone of the orchestra has assumed of late a new mellowness which was particularly apparent in the second movement of this work—by far the superior movement. The utter repose of this Andante, despite dramatic interludes, was especially welcome to the present writer in that it helped him to forget the banality and sheer noise of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture which opened the program.

A. V. B.

SPRINGFIELD ,MASS.
REPUBLICAN

NOV 5 - 1936

ly

te Sym- – Prof Speak

as to give program to be presented Tuesday night at the Auditorium by the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be unable to appear, owing to illness. The talk, which is scheduled for tomorrow afternoon at 4 at Technical high school auditorium, will be given by Prof Arthur Ware Locke of the faculty of Smith college.

Prof Locke has been professor of music at Smith for the past 20 years and is now the senior member of the department of music. He is a student and enthusiast of Brahms and the author of a book entitled "Music and the Romantic Movement in France." At present he is completing a second book, "Stravinsky's Music, a Critical Survey."

The talk is sponsored by the Junior league, to which all holders of community concert series memberships are invited.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 4 - 1936

Mrs. Putnam C. Aldrich entertained at a small luncheon yesterday at her home on Bowen street in honor of Mme. Maria Ranzow, contralto, formerly of Vienna, who will take part in the performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday and Saturday in Boston.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

NOV 4 - 1936

Mrs. Putnam C. Aldrich entertained yesterday at a small luncheon at her home on Bowen street in honor of Mme. Maria Ranzow, contralto, formerly of Vienna. The latter will participate in the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on Friday and Saturday.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
NEWS

All Things Considered

New Phonograph More Important Than Late Political Issues.

HOWARD VINCENT O'BRIEN

It is now only a matter of hours before we know whether or not the nation has been saved, liberty restored and prosperity made secure on her throne.

That is one way of looking at it. Another way is to think of today's exercises as a sham battle, a wrestling match between two sets of politicians, each thirsty for the gravy that goes with control of government in a democracy. A third way is to dismiss it as just a bubble on the simmering surface of time, full-blown at the moment, but soon to vanish, leaving no trace.

As we prepare to cheer for victory or grit our teeth for the knout of defeat, we might remember to shed a tear for tomorrow's jobless—the spellbinders, the statisticians and the newspaper editorialists. Even after all the alibis have been swept up and polished and put back in their places there is bound to be a lull while search is made for new things to view with alarm or point to with pride.

Turning to Schubert.

I am one of those who will suffer from this form of technological unemployment. After having put in so many evenings listening to political harangues it will be a little difficult to resume a normal use of leisure.

There are compensations, however. One of them is a new phonograph, a recent newcomer on the market, and instead of wasting my time in a futile effort to understand such things as the silver-purchase act, I shall put in some time getting better acquainted with Sibelius. On my table now, unopened, is a package containing something far more worthy of attention than all the political oratory of a generation—a new and improved recording of that incomparable combination of sounds, Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by that tone poet, Serge Koussevitzky. It is rightly named, for I shall never hear it enough to call it "finished."

Familiarity and Respect.

Not least among the miracles of our time is the rebirth of interest in "canned" music. The radio, far from superseding the phonograph, has encouraged it. The reason is, I think, that the nobler the music the less it leaves on its first call. To hear Beethoven or Brahms through the courtesy of Ford or General Motors is to want a return engagement, and familiarity with music breeds respect.

Whatever the reason, the record business is on the boom and factories work overtime supplying needles. Incidentally, it may interest you to learn who buys the records—the good ones and the symphonic albums. Is it those supposed custodians of culture, the dear delightful women? It is not. It is the men—and mostly the younger men.

To mighty oaks the little acorns grow, and from the little needles, cactus, fiber or chromium-plated, may come great changes in our scheme of things.

Changing World.

Not everyone has the price of even a gallery seat to see Albert Spaulding play his fiddle, and even those who can afford it may count the pains of getting there too high. For them today's amazingly improved phonograph offers nearly a perfect substitute.

Elections come and go without much effect one way or another. The real changes in our ways of living come from deeper sources. It is likely that the phonograph needle, for example, will etch deeper lines in our social structure than all the back-to-the-land laws we have ever devised.

People left the farms and flocked to the ungracious discomfort of cities to a considerable extent because they were lonely and bored. The motor car, the radio, the movie, the telephone and the phonograph will play a large part in making them flock back.

As a long-term investment I think that stock in a phonograph company will pay out better than city real estate.

(Copyright, 1936, by the Chicago Daily News, Inc.)

What's

Monitor Nov 7

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

IN THE arrangement of the fifth pair of programs for the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week Dr. Koussevitzky kept faith with his patrons to whom he had promised a revival of Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde," written for tenor, contralto and orchestra. The work had not been heard at these concerts since 1930. For introductory item, the program carried the Mozart Symphony in C major, No. 34 (Koechel No. 358), which was also a revival, since the last performance at these concerts took place in 1931.

The significance of "Das Lied von der Erde" may not be lightly dismissed, therefore it may be pertinent to recall that the work is virtually a combination of song-cycle and symphonic poem, written in six parts, the text of which has been taken from a collection of eighth century Chinese lyrics called "The Chinese Flute." They were done into German by Hans Bethge and from German into his own language by Mahler himself, who selected only those which might best serve the purpose of placing emphasis upon world weariness and withdrawal from the world. In some instances he has altered the text so that this idea might be still more strongly accented.

There are, apparently, varying degrees of pessimism in music as well as in prose or poetry. Mahler's opus is intended to play upon the emotions of the listener—if perchance he finds himself in key with the pitch of the composer's mind. Unfortunately for our own enjoyment, we have never been able to find a common meeting ground with the composer in this particular musical conception. The score seems to furnish better reading than hearing. Mahler was acknowledged as a master in the art of conducting—of bringing musical order out of orchestral chaos, therefore it is evident that he was extremely sensitive to the ideas of his fellow composers, yet in the expression of his own ideas in the orchestral idiom he became, in this instance, singularly incoherent. Seemingly his thoughts were too vast for clear, musical utterance, which resulted for us in boredom instead of depression. The boredom, however, did not extend to the performance of the work, which was played with unusual penetration and poetic feeling. One might wholeheartedly applaud the performance, if not the work.

The tenor soloist was Paul Althouse, and when the composer allowed him to be heard, he gave pleasure to his listeners who were not strangers to his art. Mme. Maria Ranzow made her initial appearance with the orchestra at the concert yesterday afternoon. Her voice is of wide range and of rich quality in the lower register. When the voice soars, however, a fatal edge is discernible, and while her musicality was evident, it was also apparent that her voice was not adapted to the demands of the score, although her audience warmly applauded her performance.

If the Mahler opus left us but slightly impressed, the Mozart thoroughly aroused our enthusiasm. It is altogether charming music and was expertly performed except for the final movement, during which the demon "speed" possessed the conductorial arm with the result that far too much of the music suffered an almost total eclipse. Every Bostonian knows that Dr. Koussevitsky has a virtuoso orchestra at his command. It hardly seems necessary for him to demonstrate its virtues at the expense of a symphonic movement as delightful as the one under discussion.

G. M. S.

FULLER IS ELECTED SYMPHONY TRUSTEE

Globe Nov 7/36

R. C. Paine Is Also Chosen for Orchestra Board

Ex-Gov Alvan T. Fuller and Richard C. Paine have been elected to the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to fill one vacancy of some standing and another made by the recent resignation of William Phillips because of his appointment as Ambassador to Italy.

The new trustees were elected at the recent annual meeting of the board of trustees. At the same time the officers of the board were reelected: Bentley W. Warren, president; Henry B. Sawyer, vice president; Ernest B. Dane, treasurer and clerk.

The board of trustees includes Allston Burr, Henry B. Cabot, Ernest B. Dane, Alvan T. Fuller, N. Penrose Hallowell, M. A. De Wolfe Howe, Roger I. Lee, Richard C. Paine, Henry B. Sawyer, Pierpont L. Stackpole, Edward A. Taft and Bentley W. Warren.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

31.

LONG ISLAND CITY, N. Y.
STAR

NOV 3 - 1936

Florence Mills Adds New Beauty To Beethoven Music At Recital

Concert Pianist And Lecturer Charms Members Of Forest Hills Women's Club With Jewel-Clear Tones.

By LUCILLE SHEARWOOD.

Long-familiar music glowed with new beauty yesterday afternoon under the inspired touch of Florence Terrel Mills, concert pianist, lecturer and resident of Forest Hills.

The appearance of Mrs. Mills, in a lecture-recital based on the life and works of Beethoven, provided an artistic climax for the busy November program of the Forest Hills Women's Club in the Community House.

Actually the pianist returned by request of the many club members who still recall the all-Chopin recital given about four years ago, soon after Mrs. Mills came to the community.

Critics had unstinted praise for the promising young artist, when the present Mrs. Mills made her debut at the age of seventeen as a soloist with the New York Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Walter Damrosch.

Later the pianist was chosen to play with the Boston Symphony. Mrs. Mills studied with the late Alexander Lambert.

It is not every artist who has the ability to tune the pulse of her audience in advance of the music, but Mrs. Mills creates an understanding atmosphere by first establishing the background of the composer's life and emotional conflicts.

Thus the listeners were able, as never before, to capture the moods of the exquisite "Moonlight Sonata," when the artist followed her spoken word with the eloquent music.

Jewel-Clear Tone.

Beethoven himself considered the sonata sheer fantasy, Mrs. Mills warned, and her behind-the-scenes introduction keyed the intent audience to listen for the great composer's response to moods—alternating from reflective song to the feverish and impetuous strains of the third movement.

This pianist has a firm, jewel-clear tone. She plays with the ease of confident assurance. More important, Mrs. Mills plays both from the head and from the heart. Her listeners feel because she felt. To all who give an understanding ear, she communicates her own perception of a composer's moods—of the song in his heart.

After the "Moonlight Sonata" came an all-too-brief condensation of the "Eroica Symphony," in a piano arrangement by Mrs. Mills herself. The artist explained that Beethoven admired the great General Bonaparte tremendously until he learned and resented Napoleon's ambition to be Emperor of France. Then the composer tore the dedication sheet from his manuscript, but he could not tear out the splendid heroism. And the name "Eroica" remained.

Brilliance, finish and masterly musicianship were joined in this arrangement of the famous symphony. In this, as in her other numbers, Mrs. Mills first accented the theme, before playing the entire movement.

Next came the haunting emotion of the "Appassionata Sonata, Opus 57," termed his favorite work by the composer.

"Read Shakespeare's 'Tempest'," Beethoven advised, when friends sought for the solution of the intense feeling here revealed.

Artistry Wins Ovation.

Fittingly, Mrs. Mills chose to complete her lecture-recital with a portion of the Fifth Symphony, relating man's struggle and final triumph. Victorious it was, from the lovely united song of violin and 'cello—delicately interpreted by the pianist, through the theme where clarinets, horns and wood winds in turn lift their voices.

Under the artist's fingers the piano spoke and sang and eventually thundered its exultant triumph, and the last notes met their echo in almost tumultuous applause. As one listener said, "We need something like this."

Guests of the club found much to applaud yesterday in the capacity attendance, encouraging reports, reviews of current plays and the prompt routine of business, handled by the president, Mrs. John R. Price.

"Presidents' Day," observed by the club on alternate years, brought at least thirty heads of clubs from Long Island, Manhattan and a few more distant sections. The visiting officers, numbering at least two past presidents of the Forest Hills Women's Club who now hold office in the city federation, were introduced by Mrs. Price. Rose corsages designated the special guests.

Arrangements for the program were made by Mrs. Frederick W. S. Locke. A reception and tea in the lounge of the Community House followed the program.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

NOV 1 - 1936

Many will like this sprightly-stepped reading, but we still favor Sir Henry Wood's version. Where Koussevitsky spins stiff contrasts, his English colleague makes reasoned contours, particularly in the basses' legend-like melody. The Boston strings, than which no orchestra has better, do themselves proud when not encumbered with super-conductorial vehemence or sound experts who occasionally forget that so-called higher fidelity is not a twin of tonal cannonading.

The odd side contains a selection from Schubert's "Rosamunde" Ballet Music.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

NOV 1 - 1936

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S UNIQUE MATINEES

A concert season of unique distinction opens Tuesday at 3 o'clock in Symphony hall, Boston. For this will be the opening of the annual series of six symphonic matinees in which the Boston Symphony orchestra plays what might be termed programs with a plot, under the leadership of its world-famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. He does the plotting, and always is able to find something new. The music of last year's matinees was assembled nation by nation. This time the plot of the season will be music drawn from the masters of the nineteenth century, who are known as "the romantic school." They made great advances in the art of writing for orchestra, besides infusing their work with great appeal to the emotions and the imagination.

To hear the characteristic work of the nineteenth century masters, as Koussevitzky will group them at the Tuesday matinees at approximately monthly intervals, will be to range over some of the most glorious music of the world. The composers will include Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Liszt, Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Debussy and Sibelius.

Although the entire strength of the Boston Symphony, 109 players, is heard in the Tuesday matinees, these concerts are looked on by many as a bargain symphony series. Due simply to there being only six concerts, whereas there are twenty-four on Fridays and Saturdays, reserved season tickets are inexpensive. Also, the late starting time, three o'clock, appeals to out-of-towners.

On Tuesday, November 3, the programme is scheduled to include: the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven; Berlioz's "Roman Carnival, and the "Unfinished" Symphony of Schubert.

Trans. Nov 4/36

Tuesday Symphony Series Is Resumed

Another season of supplementary Tuesday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky. As in the past, the programs of these concerts are drawn from the orthodox repertory, leaving the more controversial issues to the week-end series. By "orthodox" one means nowadays "nineteenth century," since works of this period form the greater part of the current programs—a regretable circumstance.

However this may be, it was something of a delight to hear a concise reading of two such hackneyed works as Schubert's B minor and Beethoven's C minor Symphonies which made up the bulk of yesterday's program. The latter had been heard earlier this season at the regular series, and although several offensive details noted at that time by another reviewer were still apparent, the performance as a whole was extremely sober and refreshing.

Among these details were the over-zealous attack of the basses in the Trio, the wholly unnecessary retard in the transition to the last movement, and occasional muddiness and brassiness in the last. To offset these, however, were many welcome features: the well-chosen and well-sustained tempi throughout, the gratifying observance of the sforzando in the 'cellos near the beginning of the Scherzo, etc. We question the advisability of repeating the exposition of the first movement. The composer is not always to be trusted in this device. In many cases he indicates it out of pure inertia.

We are indebted to Dr. Koussevitsky for an almost faultless performance of the Schubert B minor. The tone of the orchestra has assumed of late a new mellowness which was particularly apparent in the second movement of this work—by far the superior movement. The utter repose of this Andante, despite dramatic interludes, was especially welcome to the present writer in that it helped him to forget the banality and sheer noise of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture which opened the program.

A. V. B.

SPRINGFIELD ,MASS.
REPUBLICAN

NOV 5 - 1936

DR WERNER JOSTEN ILL; WAS TO TALK TUESDAY

Planned to Analyze Symphony Program — Prof Locke of Smith to Speak

Dr Werner Josten, who was to give an analytical talk on the program to be presented Tuesday night at the Auditorium by the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be unable to appear, owing to illness. The talk, which is scheduled for tomorrow afternoon at 4 at Technical high school auditorium, will be given by Prof Arthur Ware Locke of the faculty of Smith college.

Prof Locke has been professor of music at Smith for the past 20 years and is now the senior member of the department of music. He is a student and enthusiast of Brahms and the author of a book entitled "Music and the Romantic Movement in France." At present he is completing a second book, "Stravinsky's Music, a Critical Survey."

The talk is sponsored by the Junior league, to which all holders of community concert series memberships are invited.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 4 - 1936

Mrs. Putnam C. Aldrich entertained at a small luncheon yesterday at her home on Bowen street in honor of Mme. Maria Ranzow, contralto, formerly of Vienna, who will take part in the performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday and Saturday in Boston.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

NOV 4 - 1936

Mrs. Putnam C. Aldrich entertained yesterday at a small luncheon at her home on Bowen street in honor of Mme. Maria Ranzow, contralto, formerly of Vienna. The latter will participate in the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on Friday and Saturday.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
NEWS

All Things Considered

New Phonograph More Important Than Late Political Issues.

HOWARD VINCENT O'BRIEN

It is now only a matter of hours before we know whether or not the nation has been saved, liberty restored and prosperity made secure on her throne.

That is one way of looking at it. Another way is to think of today's exercises as a sham battle, a wrestling match between two sets of politicians, each thirsty for the gravy that goes with control of government in a democracy. A third way is to dismiss it as just a bubble on the simmering surface of time, full-blown at the moment, but soon to vanish, leaving no trace.

As we prepare to cheer for victory or grit our teeth for the knout of defeat, we might remember to shed a tear for tomorrow's jobless—the spellbinders, the statisticians and the newspaper editorialists. Even after all the alibis have been swept up and polished and put back in their places there is bound to be a lull while search is made for new things to view with alarm or point to with pride.

Turning to Schubert.

I am one of those who will suffer from this form of technological unemployment. After having put in so many evenings listening to political harangues it will be a little difficult to resume a normal use of leisure.

There are compensations, however. One of them is a new phonograph, a recent newcomer on the market, and instead of wasting my time in a futile effort to understand such things as the silver-purchase act, I shall put in some time getting better acquainted with Sibelius. On my table now, unopened, is a package containing something far more worthy of attention than all the political oratory of a generation—a new and improved recording of that incomparable combination of sounds, Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by that tone poet, Serge Koussevitzky. It is rightly named, for I shall never hear it enough to call it "finished."

Familiarity and Respect.

Not least among the miracles of our time is the rebirth of interest in "canned" music. The radio, far from superseding the phonograph, has encouraged it. The reason is, I think, that the nobler the music the less it leaves on its first call. To hear Beethoven or Brahms through the courtesy of Ford or General Motors is to want a return engagement, and familiarity with music breeds respect.

Whatever the reason, the record business is on the boom and factories work overtime supplying needles. Incidentally, it may interest you to learn who buys the records—the good ones and the symphonic albums. Is it those supposed custodians of culture, the dear delightful women? It is not. It is the men—and mostly the younger men.

To mighty oaks the little acorns grow, and from the little needles, cactus, fiber or chromium-plated, may come great changes in our scheme of things.

Changing World.

Not everyone has the price of even a gallery seat to see Albert Spauiding play his fiddle, and even those who can afford it may count the pains of getting there too high. For them today's amazingly improved phonograph offers nearly a perfect substitute.

Elections come and go without much effect one way or another. The real changes in our ways of living come from deeper sources. It is likely that the phonograph needle, for example, will etch deeper lines in our social structure than all the back-to-the-land laws we have ever devised.

People left the farms and flocked to the ungracious discomfort of cities to a considerable extent because they were lonely and bored. The motor car, the radio, the movie, the telephone and the phonograph will play a large part in making them flock back.

As a long-term investment I think that stock in a phonograph company will pay out better than city real estate.

(Copyright, 1936, by the Chicago Daily News, Inc.)

What's

Monitor Nov 7

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

IN THE arrangement of the fifth pair of programs for the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week Dr. Koussevitzky kept faith with his patrons to whom he had promised a revival of Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde," written for tenor, contralto and orchestra. The work had not been heard at these concerts since 1930. For introductory item, the program carried the Mozart Symphony in C major, No. 34 (Koechel No. 358), which was also a revival, since the last performance at these concerts took place in 1931.

The significance of "Das Lied von der Erde" may not be lightly dismissed, therefore it may be pertinent to recall that the work is virtually a combination of song-cycle and symphonic poem, written in six parts, the text of which has been taken from a collection of eighth century Chinese lyrics called "The Chinese Flute." They were done into German by Hans Bethge and from German into his own language by Mahler himself, who selected only those which might best serve the purpose of placing emphasis upon world weariness and withdrawal from the world. In some instances he has altered the text so that this idea might be still more strongly accented.

There are, apparently, varying degrees of pessimism in music as well as in prose or poetry. Mahler's opus is intended to play upon the emotions of the listener—if perchance he finds himself in key with the pitch of the composer's mind. Unfortunately for our own enjoyment, we have never been able to find a common meeting ground with the composer in this particular musical conception. The score seems to furnish better reading than hearing. Mahler was acknowledged as a master in the art of conducting—of bringing musical order out of orchestral chaos, therefore it is evident that he was extremely sensitive to the ideas of his fellow composers, yet in the expression of his own ideas in the orchestral idiom he became, in this instance, singularly incoherent. Seemingly his thoughts were too vast for clear, musical utterance, which resulted for us in boredom instead of depression. The boredom, however, did not extend to the performance of the work, which was played with unusual penetration and poetic feeling. One might wholeheartedly applaud the performance, if not the work.

The tenor soloist was Paul Althouse, and when the composer allowed him to be heard, he gave pleasure to his listeners who were not strangers to his art. Mme. Maria Ranzow made her initial appearance with the orchestra at the concert yesterday afternoon. Her voice is of wide range and of rich quality in the lower register. When the voice soars, however, a fatal edge is discernible, and while her musicality was evident, it was also apparent that her voice was not adapted to the demands of the score, although her audience warmly applauded her performance.

If the Mahler opus left us but slightly impressed, the Mozart thoroughly aroused our enthusiasm. It is altogether charming music and was expertly performed except for the final movement, during which the demon "speed" possessed the conductorial arm with the result that far too much of the music suffered an almost total eclipse. Every Bostonian knows that Dr. Koussevitsky has a virtuoso orchestra at his command. It hardly seems necessary for him to demonstrate its virtues at the expense of a symphonic movement as delightful as the one under discussion.

G. M. S.

FULLER IS ELECTED SYMPHONY TRUSTEE

Globe Nov. 9/36

R. C. Paine Is Also Chosen for Orchestra Board

Ex-Gov Alvan T. Fuller and Richard C. Paine have been elected to the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to fill one vacancy of some standing and another made by the recent resignation of William Phillips because of his appointment as Ambassador to Italy.

The new trustees were elected at the recent annual meeting of the board of trustees. At the same time the officers of the board were reelected: Bentley W. Warren, president; Henry B. Sawyer, vice president; Ernest B. Dane, treasurer and clerk.

The board of trustees includes Allston Burr, Henry B. Cabot, Ernest B. Dane, Alvan T. Fuller, N. Penrose Hallowell, M. A. De Wolfe Howe, Roger I. Lee, Richard C. Paine, Henry B. Sawyer, Pierpont L. Stackpole, Edward A. Taft and Bentley W. Warren.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
NOV 5 - 1936

Boston Symphony Sponsors Meet At Home of Mrs. Davenport; Committee Is Announced

The Brooklyn Committee for the five Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts to be given at the Brooklyn Academy of Music during the winter and spring seasons, met yesterday afternoon at the home of the executive chairman, Mrs. Henry Joralemon Davenport, of No. 40a Monroe place.

Announcement was made that the concerts, to be given with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, on the evenings of Nov. 20, Jan. 8, Feb. 11, Mar. 12 and Apr. 2, would begin at 8:30 o'clock instead of at 8:15 as in previous years.

Plans were made to hold an informal reception and to serve coffee in the ballroom of the Academy during the first intermission on the evening of the opening concert. Mrs. Maxwell Lester, heading the hostess committee, will be assisted by Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin and Mrs. H. V. Kaltenborn.

More Subscribers

Mrs. Davenport announced that subscriptions for this year's concerts are greater in number than those of last year for the same date. Mrs. Edward C. Blum reported for the box committee and Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow for the committee membership. Mrs. Davenport, George H. Gartlan and Robert Alfred Shaw appealed for increased support of the concerts. Plans for an intensive subscription campaign were made.

Tea was served with Mrs. Edward C. Blum pouring.

The Boston Symphony concerts are given in Brooklyn under the sponsorship of Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Edward C. Blum, president of the board of directors; the Brooklyn Committee, Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman, and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, R. Huntington Woodman, president.

Mrs. Blum and Mrs. William H. Good are serving as vice-chairmen of the Brooklyn Committee. Miss Virginia Marvin heads the Junior League Committee.

Sponsors Named

The Brooklyn committee includes Dr. Joseph Dana Allen, Juan A. Almirall, Lloyd V. Almirall, John Anderson, Charles D. Atkins, Dr. Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Charles Lynde Babcock, Jr., Judge William R. Bayes, Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Bruce D. Bromley, Mrs. Samuel T. Brown, Mrs. Glentworth Reeve Butler, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, Mrs. Thomas F. Casey, Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Mrs. Ellwood Colahan, Mrs. Gordon Weir Colton, Miss Frances H. Coutts, Judge Frederick E. Crane, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, Walter H. Crittenden, Mrs. Russell V. Cruikshank, Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, Dr. John H. Denbigh, Justice Norman S. Dike.

Also Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mrs. Guy Du Val, Mrs. William F. Eastman, S. Raymond Estey, Sumner Ford, Mrs. Merrill N. Foote, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. Charles W. Franklin, Mrs. George H. Gartlan, Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, rMs. Charles R. Gay, Mrs. Emil Goetsch, Miss Theodora Goldsmith, Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, Mrs. William B. Greenman, Mrs. J. Morton Halstead, Mrs. William Peter Hamilton, Walter Hammitt, Mrs. James M. Hills, Mrs. Earle P. Huff, Mrs. Russell S. Hume, Mrs. O. Paul Humpstone, William T. Hunter, Henry A. Ingraham, Mrs. R. F. Ives, Dr. William A. Jewett, Mrs. Frederick L. Johanns, Ralph Jonas, Mrs. Hans V. Kaltenborn, Jacob C. Klinck, David H. Lanman, Charles D. Lay, Mrs. Robert B. Lea, Mrs. John Eadie Leech.

Also Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Mrs. W. H. Lohman, Miss Hilda Loines, Mrs. Frederick D. MacKay, Mrs. William W. Marshall, Mrs. E. P. Maynard, Jr., Mrs. Frank Melville, Jr., Miss Irene Miles, Dr. Raymond B. Miles, Miss Ida A. Mollenhauer, Mrs. Alfred E. Mudge, Mrs. Carroll Leja Nichols, Neilson Olcott, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Clifford E. Paige, Mrs. Frank H. Parsons, Mrs. Charles Elwell Perkins, James H. Post, Mrs. Charles E. Potts, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Richardson Pratt, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, G. William Rasch, Mrs. Frank Reynolds, Miss Jessie Righter, Mrs. Donald Ross, Mrs. F. R. Schepmoes, Mrs. John D. H. Schulz, Mrs. Helen W. Seeley, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons, Mrs. William Slater, Mrs. Harold Irving Small, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith, Mrs. W. C. Spelman, Porter Steele, Mrs. Ernest K. Tanner, Mrs. Franklin Taylor, Miss Marion J. Terry, Thornton C. Thayer, Carl H. Tollefsen.

Other members are Mrs. Walter Truslow, John T. Underwood, Dr. Joshua M. Van Cott, Mr. and Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen, Mrs. James P. Warbasse, Mrs. Edwin Carrington Ward, Mrs. Clarence Waterman, Mrs. Walter F. Wells, Mrs. George Whittlesey, Mrs. William H. Whitton, Miss Josephine D. Wilkin, Surrogate George Albert Wingate, Mrs. Harry Michael Wingle, R. Huntington Woodman, Mr. and Mrs. Philip N. Youtz.

Junior League Unit

The Junior League Committee includes the Misses Helen Adam, Phyllis Barnes, Anne Chapman, Louise Goetze, Mrs. Theodore Fitz Randolph, the Misses Althea McCammon, Lillie Meurer, Mrs. Charles B. Singleton, the Misses Arietta Smith, Catherine Van Brunt, Edith Warren and Mrs. Hollis Thayer.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES

Good Music

—By James Thrasher.

It's a little hard to keep one's Sevitzkys and Koussevitzkys straight, especially since there is a new member of the former tribe in the field.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, of course, is the Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor. Fabien Sevitzky, who will conduct the Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra on Nov. 17, also is conductor of the Boston People's Symphony and the Philadelphia Sinfonietta. And now comes 15-year-old Rael Sevitzky to fiddle with Leon Barzin and a symphony orchestra over WOR at 9:15 o'clock tonight.

(Perhaps we had best stop telling you about the WOR music programs. The only people we know who get the Newark station satisfactorily are those with radios in their automobiles, and it's getting a little too cold to sit out of an evening, even for WOR's excellent entertainment.)

Young Sevitzky is a pupil of Louis Persinger, which speaks well for any "prodigy." Since this teacher guided the musical footsteps of the gifted Yehudi Menuhin and Ruggiero Ricci, to mention only two, one is convinced that he knows about what to do in the matter of bringing out latent talent.

Tonight's soloist is to play the first movement of the Goldmark Concerto, while Mr. Barzin will take the orchestra through Mozart's "Seraglia" Overture and "Cripple Creek," from Lamar Stringfield's "Southern Mountains" Suite.

# #

Dr. Walter Damrosch is to tell school children, and any one who cares to listen, all about cellos and basses on the NBC Music Appreciation Hour at 1 p. m. tomorrow over WIRE. This will occupy the program's first half hour, and will include "The Swan" by Saint-Saens; the introduction to the "William Tell" Overture of Rossini, and parts of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

Doubtless the Beethoven excerpt will be from the trio of the third movement. The passage is one that made bass players in Beethoven's day struggle, perspire and say hard things about the composer. That was before the time of French bows for the "bull fiddle," and the music offered the first of many virtuoso snags which have been written since for the eight or ten gentlemen in the back row.

The second part of Dr. Damrosch's hour will take up the musical telling of fairy tales, for the benefit of Series B students. Included will be the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, the "Prayer" from Humperdinck's opera, "Hansel and Gretel," scheduled for performance by the Arthur Jordan Conservatory in December, and "In the Hall of the Mountain King" from Grieg's incidental music to "Peer Gynt."

You'll recognize the Humperdinck selection (we hope) even if you don't know it already. It's the Detroit Symphony Orchestra's "theme song" that opens their Sunday night broadcasts.

OFFERS NEW WORK BY RACHMANINOFF

Stokowski Leads Philadelphia Orchestra in Russian's Third Symphony.

COMPOSER TAKES BOWS

N. Y. Times Nov. 7/36

Tchaikovsky's 'Solitude' and a Part of Mussorgsky's 'Boris' Complete Program.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 6.—With Leopold Stokowski conducting, the Philadelphia Orchestra presented at the Academy of Music today the third symphony in A minor by Sergei Rachmaninoff, heard for the first time anywhere.

The concert marked Stokowski's first appearance of the Philadelphia Orchestra season. Besides the Rachmaninoff composition, he led the orchestra in two orchestral arrangements of his own, transcriptions from Tchaikovsky's "Solitude" and Mussorgsky's "Boris Godunoff."

The all-Russian program, but more especially the Rachmaninoff third symphony, was received with enthusiastic applause by an obviously impressed audience.

Rachmaninoff himself, as the only living one of the three distinguished Russian composers represented, joined in the applause for Stokowski's magnificent performance of his symphony, finally appearing on the stage to take several bows before the audience permitted him to depart.

Regarding the superb rendition of the new Rachmaninoff composition, Linton Martin, music critic of The Philadelphia Inquirer, said in part:

"It is thoroughly characteristic of its composer. In musical thought and expression it bears conspicuously closer relationship to the imperial past than to the puny present. Written in three movements, its thematic material is developed in highly original and even irregular manner and is of varying vitality in inspiration, though its qualities and construction are such that what it has to say manifestly cannot be entirely apprehended on the strength of a single hearing.

"If the impression produced was not deceptive or misguided, there seems to be more of gayety and less of gloom than Rachmaninoff has shown in certain earlier offerings. Whatever its ultimate place in the symphonic répertoire may be, it was hailed today with enthusiasm."

Trav. Nov. 8 '36

Work of Clementi Selected by Dr. Koussevitzky

Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen an entirely unknown symphony by Muzio Clementi for performance next Friday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Clementi was born in Rome in 1752 and died in England in 1832 and was thus somewhat older than Beethoven whom he outlived. He is known to the contemporary public, if at all, as a composer of piano works. He was, indeed, famous as pianist and also had a distinguished commercial career in England, where he passed the greater part of his life.

It was Clementi's misfortune that for many years his orchestral works appeared to have been lost. There were fragments, but no one bothered about them. Now, however, the modern Italian composer, Alfredo Casella, has pieced together two of his four last symphonies. Three of these scores were in the Congressional Library at Washington and the other in the British Museum. Mr. Casella things that they are much more than remarkable works. The story of his work in restoration of the symphonies is a fascinating one and will, no doubt, be told in full in Mr. Burk's program notes on Friday. Not all of the scores were complete, and Mr. Casella had to compose music in the proper style to fill them out. The First and Second have now been published by Ricordi, and we may be glad that Dr. Koussevitzky is going to let us hear one of them.

Cosella has written the following about Clementi as a composer: "The style is that of a musician whose life spans the gap from the death of J. S. Bach to the bloom of romanticism. A fundamentally classic spirit, severely trained and the possessor of a truly exceptional constructive and polyphonic technique, Clementi in these symphonies aims visibly to renew the great classic heredity with the new aspirations of the century. In these works we find a new and more potent assertion of the music, at once grandiose and witty, tragic, but more often serene, of his best piano sonatas."

NEWS FROM THE WEST

N. Y. Times Nov. 8/36

THE San Francisco Symphony, directed by Pierre Monteux, celebrates its silver jubilee this season. Efforts are being made, in connection with the anniversary, to increase the personnel of the orchestra to ninety players. The first pair of concerts will be given Friday afternoon, Jan. 8, and Saturday night, Jan. 9. There will be ten pairs in all.

Six Sunday afternoon concerts by the Seattle Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Basil Cameron, are to be given this season in the organization's recently formed Sunday Concert Club. The first will be presented next Sunday. The purpose of the club is to provide concerts in a more informal atmosphere than usually obtains. Its members are admitted to final rehearsals of the orchestra and have other privileges, such as meeting visiting artists, and so on.

Following a fortnight given over to opera performances and touring, the Cleveland Orchestra, conducted by Artur Rodzinski, resumes its symphony concerts this Thursday and Saturday nights in Cleveland, with Beryl Rubinstein as soloist in the world première of his Second concerto for piano. The program will contain further, Weber's "Oberon" overture, the Brahms Second symphony and Kodály's "Dances from Galanta."

Symphony Show by Frederick Lowell

Trav. Nov. 7/36

Frederick Eldridge Lowell, whose paintings will be shown at Symphony Hall, was born in Boston in 1874. He was the son of Edward Jackson Lowell, the writer, and was brother to Guy Lowell, the well-known architect. He graduated from Harvard in 1895. He took one or two courses in art at Harvard but did not show marked interest in that subject in his early years. After graduation he went into business and remained in one business or another until 1921 when he gave up business to devote his whole time to painting.

In the year 1898 he began to paint. His enthusiasm for art steadily increased and he eagerly spent what time he could on Sundays and vacations in painting. Finally the desire to devote his whole time to painting overmastered him and as before stated he gave up his business. After that he went to Europe several times and painted there and continued to paint in America when he was at home. He was an accomplished painter long before he took the final plunge in abandoning his business.

He did most of his painting at Cotuit and on the West Barnstable sand-dunes and other places on Cape Cod as well as at his home in Concord, while in America. In Europe he painted principally in France and Italy. He was very modest and not eager to push himself to have his first exhibition in Boston in 1926. This was very successful. Thirty-eight out of forty-one pictures were sold. In the following year he had an exhibition in New York and also sold several pictures.

Last Exhibition in 1928

His last exhibition was in 1928. This also was a success. After that he occasionally exhibited single pictures or groups of pictures with other artists. He died in 1933. In the spring of 1934 a memorial exhibition of his paintings was held at the Fogg Art Museum. This, like the exhibitions during his lifetime, attracted and fascinated many people.

The present exhibition is held at the wish of the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra, for Mr. Lowell was the first treasurer of the corporation and was selected by M. Henry L. Higginson himself for that position. He served as trustee until the time of his death. He painted landscapes principally but occasionally painted still life subjects and flowers. In his earlier days he worked more partularly in oils but his later work was almost entirely in water color. Besides the early oils and later water colors, a few black and whites will be included in the exhibition.

It is very appropriate that an exhibition of his work should be in Symphony Hall, for he was an extraordinarily musical person. He preferred to remain an amateur, but many people who heard him sing felt that his was the most beautiful voice that they had ever heard. He had a high baritone voice. It was not of exceptional size or power, but the distinction lay in his great sensitiveness and subtlety and the fact that his singing was pure music.

His paintings with their refined and strong sense of color were exhibited at a time when thee was rather a rage for the striking and bizarre, but now that many people are getting tired of the over-exuberance of much of the art of the last twenty years, people may be more and more in the mood to appreciate the delicate qualities of the art of such a rare person.

This exhibition will last about a month.

NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Forgotten Scores Are Brought Out

Nov 8 Post

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

IN view of the fact concert programmes of all kinds so easily fall into distressing rut and routine, it is surprising that those who make them tend to confine themselves so closely to two classes of compositions, the generally acknowledged masterpieces of the established composers and the often ephemeral pieces of the hour. Thus we are likely to hear but half the piano sonatas of Beethoven or half of the viable symphonics of Mozart or of Haydn, a mere handful of the songs of Wolf or of Strauss. Dr. Koussevitzky, however, has now begun to search out the less known or unknown symphonies of Mozart, and the one he has thus far "discovered" this season gave so much pleasure that it is to be hoped that the good work will be continued.

There is also a praiseworthy movement now in progress to atone for the injustice long done those remarkable composers of symphonies, whose names are so often linked, Anton Bruckner and Gustav Mahler. Although first produced 25 years ago, Mahler's "Song of the Earth" remained unheard at Symphony Hall until 1928, when Dr. Koussevitzky most commendably brought it to our attention. Thanks to his devotion to a noble and touching score, we have just heard "Das Lied von der Erde" ised this season a revival of Mahler's Fifth Symphony, performed five times at Symphony Hall, between 1906 and 1914, but then abandoned. The Third, Fourth, Sixth, Seventh and Eighth Symphonies have never been attempted here.

Bruckner has fared slightly better, although the Third and Fifth Symphonies have not been played here since 1901, or the Ninth since 1914, while the First, Second and Sixth are unknown to us. It appears, however, that Arthur Fiedler's MacDowell Club Orchestra is at work upon the Third, sometimes called the "Wagner Symphony," and will probably perform it later in the season. This service to Bruckner is no less creditable to the club and to Mr. Fiedler than was the performance at a MacDowell Club concert, two years ago, of Tchaikovsky's First Symphony, until then unknown to Boston—an agreeable work, as it proved, if somewhat tentative and immature.

* * * *

And now Dr. Koussevitzky is to offer us at the Symphony Concerts of this week an American premiere of the symphony of a contemporary of Beethoven, none other than our old friend, Muzio Clementi, of the Sonatinas of our childhood days at the piano, and of the "Gradus ad Parnassum." Clementi was born in Rome in 1752, procured an appointment as organist at the age of nine; at the age of 14 had composed a mass which, publicly performed, created considerable stir in Rome; went to England as a youth, and at the age of 21 burst upon London as a pianist and composer of so conspicuous attainments that, to quote the article in Grove's dictionary, "he carried everything before him." As conductor in London, as travelling virtuoso, as composer and as teacher, he lived a long and busy life, dying in the town of Evesham in Worcestershire, at the age of 80, and being buried in Westminster Abbey. Again, to quote the Grove article, "he was married three times, had children in his old age and, shortly before his death, was still able to rouse a company of pupils and admirers—amongst whom were J. B. Cramer and Moscheles—to enthusiasm with his playing and improvisation."

The symphony which we are to hear is one of three which Alfredo Cassela has, after much research, reconstructed from fragments found in various European libraries. Another of the three was heard with interest in New York, last season, when Mr. Toscanini introduced it to that city.

* * * *

53.

FOLK MELODIES OF BRAZIL

N.Y. Times Nov. 8/36

BRAZIL has no folksongs, but incontestably has folk-melodies, according to Mario de Andrade in The Brazilian American of Rio de Janeiro. That is, Brazil possesses no traditional folk-tunes even a century old. But there is a great abundance of songs and dances having all the characteristics exacted by science for placing a musical expression in the category of folklore. These melodies are born and die quickly, for the people soon forgot them. But, although the music is not preserved, it always conforms to certain methods of treatment, and always contains a certain number of recurring themes and rhythms, tonal tendencies and turns of rhythm. These are traditional, completely anonymous and autochthonous, sometimes peculiar to and always characteristic of the Brazilian folk idiom.

LISZT ANNIVERSARY BOOK

In conjunction with the fiftieth anniversary of the death of Franz Liszt, a new work on that master, by Herbert Westerby, entitled "Liszt, Composer, and His Piano Works," was published by William Reeves recently in London, England. The book is in three parts—a biography, which brings to light many hitherto unknown details; a critical analysis of Liszt's piano compositions, with an evaluation of Liszt as composer and a consideration of the relative technical difficulty of the piano works.

Mozart and Mahler Happily Paired by Dr. Koussevitzky

Trans. Nov. 7/36

Performance of "Das Lied von der Erde" Reveals Artistry of a Singer New to Boston

By Moses Smith

Two symphonies complete this week's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One is that delightful work of Mozart in C major which bears the Koechel Number 338, and which was strangely neglected in the early history of the orchestra. The other is really Mahler's Ninth. But he called it "Das Lied von der Erde" because—so the tale runs—of his superstition that he could not survive more than the hallowed nine symphonies that Beethoven wrote.

When a number as long and as elaborate as Mahler's symphonic song-cycle is planned for performance, the rest of the program must make shift accordingly. A conductor has the choice of a medium-sized symphony or of a couple of short numbers. And so this week's program is dictated by other exigencies than mere clever program-building.

But the result is a happy one. For the weightiness and sombreness of "Das Lied von der Erde" Mozart's gay symphony is splendid foil. This symphony in three movements—without a minuet—is a masterpiece, as it is scarcely necessary to remind those who remember it. For the performers it has the usual number of pitfalls of other works by Mozart and perhaps a few more. It must be played "straight," but it must also be played imaginatively.

The performance at yesterday's concert under Dr. Koussevitzky's baton was very fine. I do not recall such beautiful Mozartean playing by the Symphony Orchestra through the years of Dr. Koussevitzky's tenure. From beginning to end the pace of the successive movements was happily chosen and admirably maintained. There was no irritating wayside stopping, to admire the scenery while the course and direction of the music were lost. There was not an accent but what was perfectly in place and perfectly stressed. The phrasing was free from mannerism; but it had vitality at every point. The instrumentalists, and especially the string section, were in superb form. Thus a masterpiece of vivacity and wit and refined sentiment came and went, and left not a troubled thought behind.

* * *

What a contrast between this music and that of Mahler! What a distance between the ironic inflection of Mozart, always good-humored though subtle, and the acid, bitter satire, the stinging pessimism of Mahler! As direct and straightforward as the earlier composer was in both thought and utterance, the composer writing a century and a quarter later was tortuous and involved.

But each artist according to his time and his lights. Mozart's music is wonderful for itself. It could not have been written in the stormy nineteenth century or the troubled twentieth. And it could not, in any event, have been written by anyone other than the unique genius who wrote it.

It is one of the finest tributes that can be paid to Mahler's music to say that none but Mahler could have written it. There are reminiscences of other composers, but they are few and unimportant. We are only beginning to realize, I think, how original a composer Mahler was. His originality is exhibited in his formal schemes, obviously; in his melodic line and his harmonic vocabulary; above all, in the color of his instrumentation. The individuality of Mahler is reflected in his influence on other composers; an influence which, far from being negligible, is in some respects the mainspring of the whole Viennese school of Schonberg.

* * *

These considerations were prompted by yesterday's performance of "Das Lied von der Erde," an almost wonderful and almost terrifying work. It is now harsh and now poetic. The variety of the musical speech is never aimless. Mahler's ingenious use of the device of the motto theme insures unity without monotony. The work is long, but, for the sympathetic, not tiresome. There is a hypnotic quality in some of the more contemplative sections which is dangerous. For it can be so effective as to lull the weak-willed to sleep. And there is in the final movement a poignancy that is rare in all music.

To be effective, it is true, this music must be well performed. No routine rendering suffices (as it would in the case of a Mozart symphony). Yesterday's performance was glorious. Dr. Koussevitzky was in one of his best elements. (It is strange, not that he should present the music of Mahler as often as he does but that he does not include it even more frequently on his programs.) His orchestra was with him at every stage in a presentation that seemed exceptionally well prepared.

The six songs for solo voices are evenly divided between a tenor and a contralto. This music is not easy to sing; it is even more difficult to project. It requires not merely careful vocalization but also conviction and imagination. Paul Althouse, the tenor in yesterday's performance is a reliable singer, a conscientious artist. But neither his voice nor his temperament was as well suited to the music of Mahler yesterday as both have been to other music he has sung at these concerts. But perhaps this evening will tell another story.

* * *

Maria Ranzow, the contralto, was new to Boston, and she was a pleasant surprise. Her voice was yesterday of uneven quality. Her high tones were frequently strained, harsh and even coarse, especially when fullness was required. Her low tones were truer, but not always sufficiently resonant. But in the middle the voice was of a gorgeous, velvety quality.

Yet it was not so much the voice as the singing, not so much the singing as the divining artistry that moved the listener. There was an imperious aspect to her rendering, that made it a fit companion to Dr. Koussevitzky's presentation. The music of Mahler is not yet popular. But the wonderful singing of Mme. Ranzow in the final number, and the equally admirable playing of the orchestra stirred the Friday afternoon audience most profoundly.

MEXICO'S ARTISTIC DEVELOPMENT

N.Y. Times - Nov. 8/36

Native Influences Have Vitalized the Music of Nation

IN the field of music the Mexican revolution is achieving perhaps its most pronounced success. The imitativeness that formerly characterized so much of musical composition is steadily passing, and out of the disappearing mists it is now possible to determine the broad outlines of the new musical spirit that is taking shape.

With some reservations, comment upon the newer productions can be only favorable. The new school of Mexican composers includes names that are rapidly becoming familiar to international audiences, and in their work is a quality that is in fair way of giving Mexican influence a dominant position in certain departments of the art.

The immediate effect of the revolutionary spirit was a revulsion to foreign influence. That, of course, is characteristic of revolutions, not only in Mexico but in Germany, in Turkey, in Russia and elsewhere. In politics this has been expressed in the slogan "Mexico for Mexicans" and in laws forbidding the employment of foreigners. In the fine arts the revolution has meant a reaction to foreign influence and a search for inspiration among native sources. All this has too frequently meant a narrowing and devitalizing ingrowth, but in the case of Mexico the result has been the opposite.

* * *

A number of reasons exist for the success of the Mexican musical revolution. The nascent Musica Mexicana is characterized as new, but it is new only in the sense that it is unfamiliar to the modern world. The freshness of form and manner which one observes in the works of Ponce, Rolan, Revueltas, Huizar and Chavez derives from its emphasis and reliance upon indigenous inspiration, particularly the Aztec. Like the cathedral and the National Palace in Mexico, D. F., the new musical structure is built upon foundations that were laid long before the appearance of the conquistadores in the New World.

* * *

Even the casual visitor to Mexico cannot escape the fact of a vigorous musical temperament, which must have its roots deep in the racial history. Music pervades the soul of Mexico. Stand on the Cinco de Mayo any cool evening, and presently you will be surrounded by a group of boyish musicians, strings tightened, drums stretched, ready to beguile you with a dance and a melody. Press into a crowd in the market places, and like as not you will find a young man with a guitar singing the latest love ditties. Walk along the narrow, traffic laden streets, and you will find yourself keeping time to a sidewalk xylophone, or listening to airs from a wheezy accordion. If you are incurably romantic, go out along the less frequented thoroughfares and listen to the music from maidens' throats that floats out through the heavily barred windows. Or better still, go out to Xochimilco, drift along the lagoons in a flower-wreathed boat, and sink into a reverie of Venice, while songs, mingled with the sighing of the breeze among the poplars, are wafted to you across the waters.

The archaeologist understands as well as any one how deep the spirit of music runs. Search among the carvings on prehistoric Mayan and Aztec ruins and you will find an incredible variety of musical instruments portrayed. You will find them painted on fragments of pottery dug up among the ruins, and here and there, in the museums, bits of these instruments themselves. Go among the Indian villages—villages where despite the influence of the four hundred years since the conquest the ancient life of the Aztec still goes on—and you will find these same instruments, modified of course by the currents of time, played upon in evenings when the moon rises and the night birds begin to call through the forest.

The enthusiasm for music exists everywhere in Mexico. The smallest pueblo has its band that plays once a week in the public plaza. In the national capital two splendid symphonies are maintained—the Orquesta Sinfonica de Mexico, and the Orquesta Nacional de Mexico—while the Mexico City Police Band is accounted among the best brass bands of the world. Perhaps the most convincing evidence that can be offered to the inquiring visitor is to ask him to go to any one of the various recreational centers for workers on an evening when the Orquesta Sinfonica is playing. These concerts, of the same quality and program as at the Palacio de Bellas Artes, are given regularly during the Summer season, with admission free to workers and children. These concerts are always enthusiastically attended, and to observe the rapt attention given to Beethoven's Fifth by men, women and children of the type described as Indians and mestizos is to need no further persuasion as to the meaning of music to the Mexican.

Mexican music never made much impression on the world at large, of course, and has been, until recently, without creative impulse. What stifled the creative spirit was, as in other departments of the fine arts, the pressure of European influence. Mexico was a land with a highly organized metropolitan life and an undernourished, neglected hinterland. To the educated Mexican, life seemed bearable only in the capital. Mexico, D. F., was to the Mexican what Paris is to the Frenchman, only more so. Mexico, D. F., became an imitation of Paris, a spurious thing foreign to the native spirit of Mexico. In the same way music, art, literature, all the expressions of civilized society, were borrowed from, or found their inspiration in, European models. The purely native was scorned. The term "Indian" or "mestizo" was one of opprobrium.

* * *

In music the revolutionary movement has been particularly fortunate—more so perhaps than in the plastic and decorative arts—in the fact that when foreign influence was cast aside, there was a native musical culture upon which to fall back. It has been an advantage that this culture has not enjoyed—except in the most tenuous manner—a continuous tradition. Though there exists a native music, it does not lie scattered about like boulders on a landscape, ready for any artisan to gather. It must be sought for, quarried out of the rock, pieced together from prehistoric fragments and patiently reconstructed. This is a task that requires time. Thus, the revolutionary movement in Mexican music has been spared the frenzy that has marked the decorative arts, as in Diego Rivera's work, or the barbarism of the plastic arts, as in the sculpture of Carlos Bracho. Mexican music has

---

BARBIROLLI OPENS SYMPHONY SEASON

Philharmonic's First Concert at Carnegie Hall Directed by English Conductor.

WORK BY BERLIOZ IS GIVEN

'Roman Carnival' Initial Piece on Program—Composition by Bax Presented.

N.Y. Times [illegible]

By OLIN DOWNES

The 1936-1937 season of the Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra opened last night in Carnegie Hall with a brilliant audience in a festive mood, and it introduced to the American public the young English conductor, John Barbirolli.

The biographical facts of Mr. Barbirolli's career have been extensively published, and there is no need to recount them in detail here. He commended himself to the audience by the modesty of his demeanor and his evident spirit and sincerity as an interpreter.

He opened the program with one of the best of orchestral curtain-raisers, the Berlioz "Roman Carnival" overture. The performance was one of contagious zest. Every conductor, granted he possesses the degree of temperament and individuality which connotes a person capable of leading and inspiring an orchestra, draws from his orchestra a certain characteristic quality of tone. Mr. Barbirolli makes his orchestra sound. He is not a big or a robust-appearing person, but his predilection is for a full blooded tone, and his excitement was felt by the audience.

Also evident was a tension and perhaps a lack of composure very understandable in the circumstances. The sum of this opening performance was an interpretation, warmly applauded, which gave the audience evident satisfaction and reminded us again of the magnificent qualities of the orchestra.

Mr. Barbirolli introduced a novelty, dedicated to him by the English composer Bax. It is a symphonic poem, "The Tale the Pine Trees Knew," and a very poor piece of music. This must be said, although the conductor did all that he could for the composition. But it is curiously bad Bax for the date of the work, which is 1933. One would be inclined, in fact, if the program note had not given information to the contrary, to ascribe this effusion to the composer's immature period. It is nebulous and in general imitative music, possessed of most of the vices of the semi-impressionistic Celtic school and none of the distinguished qualities of the best Bax scores. It has not, for example, the ingratiating Celtic atmosphere of the early "Garden of Fand," and it is far from the power and the fine, rugged lines of the last two Bax symphonies. The piece served to show the conductor as interpreter of music of a certain type, but it cannot be said that it ranks as an addition to the Philharmonic-Symphony repertory.

The program, longer than has been customary at the Philharmonic-Symphony concerts, provided two symphonies. The first is infrequently heard—the Mozart symphony in C major, No. 425 in the Kochel catalogue. Exceptions could be taken to passages in this work, where there was a tendency, now and again, to drag a tempo and sugar a phrase.

It might also be fair to say that the season is young to play a Mozart symphony with the degree of transparency, finish and perfection of classic style that this music so imperatively requires. The fast movements had much to commend them; the slow movement, the most difficult to do with complete justice, is perhaps the highest test of the interpreter. But, again, this account is written of a gifted young conductor, giving his first American concert under conditions to which he has to find complete adjustment.

For the writer the best part of the evening was offered by the last two movements of the Brahms Fourth symphony, where there was exceptional virility, grip, lyrical opulence and on occasion the impact of the bear's paw. The tempo of the first part of the scherzo was the right one—a tempo of rugged Brahms indvidualism. Perhaps the trio was a little slow, a little sentimental. In general this was a red-blooded, dramatic and grandly constructed reading—more especially in the later pages of the symphony.

Of earlier ones not so much could be said. These movements were somewhat episodic, having in places the one tempo and the true accent, in other places missing the essence of the composer's thinking. But the variations of the celebrated passacaglia were read with a fine versatility of expression, now in a poetic, now in a heroic spirit. At the end the audience gave Mr. Barbirolli resounding applause.

Mr. Barbirolli's manner on the platform is ingratiating, and unintentionally demonstrative as the musical afflatus seizes him. It is a pleasure to chronicle the fact that he conducts from score, and not from memory in the ridiculous and unnecessary way in which certain celebrated conductors find it necessary to imitate Toscanini. It was evident that in more than one instance Mr. Barbirolli could have led without score, had it been necessary. He did not choose thus to exhibit himself and thus to make matters more risky and less certain for the players of the orchestra.

It will be time to estimate him in detail as an interpretative musician after we have heard him not in one, but in half a dozen concerts. His American début gained him a very favorable reception.

GLOBE
TORONTO, CAN.
NOV 14 1936

France has bestowed the order of Commander of the Legion of Honor upon Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As Sir Thomas Beecham with the London Philharmonic Orchestra opened a tour of Germany in Berlin yesterday, and the Dresden State Opera Company has just concluded a special "season" at Covent Garden in London, one wonders whether music has entered the realm of international diplomacy, not to say "Welt-Politik."

OPERA AND CONCERT ACTIVITIES

LOOK for something different in the selection of an opening night opera at the Metropolitan Opera House. It is whispered that Edward Johnson is ready to abandon the time-honored practice of starting with a French or Italian work. If he does decide to take another course, he is confronted with a choice from the German répertoire or an opera in English. Since the pickings in the latter category are scarce, it would seem that a Wagner opera might be selected.

Three works by the incomparable Richard come to mind that have qualities that should commend them for an opening—pageantry, color, grandeur. "Die Meistersinger" would perhaps be considered first, since it has a great deal of cheer; the other two might be "Tannhaeuser" or "Lohengrin."

It may be, of course, that Mr. Johnson and his advisers will select such a work as the English version of "The Bartered Bride," which is gay, tuneful and well sung. It was the brightest spot in the Spring season.

The Metropolitan auditions of the air are now in their third week and will continue for at least twenty-three, possibly thirty-six more. As many as 250 young singers apply for auditions in the course of one week, and four are heard on the air each Sunday. The Metropolitan expects to take seven young singers for the next Spring season. If more than seven talents are discovered, the Metropolitan may give débuts to the others as well.

John Barbirolli gave it as his opinion, the day he arrived in New York, that his most important meeting with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra would be the first rehearsal.

That rehearsal went off smoothly, according to reports of eyewitnesses. The new conductor was introduced by Arthur Judson, the manager of the orchestra. Mr. Barbirolli observed that it was an honor to be called to head the Philharmonic-Symphony. The first work, a Berlioz overture, was played without pause. Mr. Barbirolli obviously wanted to get an idea of the tone. Afterward he said that it was splendid. The remainder of the rehearsal was according to Hoyle, the conductor stopping the orchestra from time to time to request changes.

At the end of the rehearsal some of the musicians spoke with approval of Mr. Barbirolli's beat. He seemed to be well satisfied with the orchestra.

News comes to light in devious ways. The fact that Paul Hindemith, the German composer, would visit these shores late this season was revealed indirectly the other day in an announcement that the League of Composers would tender a reception in his honor in April. But the immediate reason for Mr. Hindemith's visit is his expected participation at the Library of Congress Music Festival in Washington in the Spring.

The opera school of the Juilliard School of Music has confirmed the report, printed in this column, that it would present the première of the new romantic comedy-opera by Albert Stoessel and Robert A. Simon and Vaughan Williams's "The Poisoned Kiss." The Stoessel-Simon work has acquired a title since last heard of. It will be called "Garrick."

The Williams opera, described as a romantic extravaganza, has a text by Evelyn Sharp. It was performed in London, where opinion was divided. Some thought that Mr. Williams had written charmingly in a gay, romantic vein. Others were disappointed that the composer of the "London" and "Pastoral" symphonies had not chosen a more momentous theme.

The Juilliard opera school will open its season with Gounod's setting of Molière's "Le Médecin malgré lui." A new version of this rarely heard work has been prepared by Marshall Bartholomew and Alexander Dean, to be called "The Frantic Physician." This work will be done Dec. 9 to 12. "Garrick" will follow on Feb. 24 to 27, and "The Poisoned Kiss" will be last April 21 to 24.

McCormack C

Markevitch's Latest Score: "Le Paradis Perdu"

Her. Nov. 8/36

By ALEXANDER W. WILLIAMS

"The exploitation of Igor Markevitch"—so might run a chapter heading in a future history of music of the 20th century. And what an account of snobbishness and meanness it would be! It is all very well to consider politics a disagreeable trade, but one can go to the arts as well for examples of petty prejudices. The case of Igor Markevitch furnishes an instance of the evils of publicity and the peculiar snobbism of the intellectual world. The musical world, as a matter of fact, has never been considered a very pleasant place. Romain Rolland's "La Foire sur la Place" is a scathing account of its worst aspects, its hideous commercialism. One can also go back to the reports that Heine wrote from Paris in the 1840s.

Markevitch was one of the last of the composers to have worked for the great impresario Diaghileff. He was also one of the youngest and is today but 24 years old. He had undoubted talent and was taken up by the smart intellectuals. His music was played at the "Serenade" concerts of the Princesse de Polignac. He was sponsored by Jean Cocteau, who is certainly a writer of immense cleverness, but in a decadent tradition and one whose literary style has veered to all the winds of fashion. Virgil Thomson, the American composer, wrote an amusing account of the young artist's debut in Modern Music for November, 1932.

AN UNFORTUNATE LAUNCHING

From the point of view of the musical world outside Paris, Markevitch could not have had a worse introduction. There is nothing, for instance, that your English or American critic hates worse than to be dictated to by Paris. Across the channel and the Atlantic the critics breathed fire and waited their chance. It was not long in coming, and ever since Markevitch's music has been treated in the English-speaking press much as a freshman is handled by a western college fraternity. He has had a poor time of it, and we owe him the decency of an unprejudiced hearing.

Mr. Thomson first created the sneer "little Igor," in belittling comparison with Stravinsky. The nickname has been taken up on all sides, and in almost any review of one of his works you will find it used with mocking cruelty. There is something rather nauseating in this spectacle, the hounding of a young man whose faults in another would be attributed to youth. Another fault was that the unhappy composer began by writing wittily. Of course he was at once denounced for being superficial. Would the youthful Olivier Messiaen's "Les Offrandes oubliees," heard here recently, have been accorded such respect if it had not been a solemn work?

Markevitch, at any rate, soon learned his lesson. He turned his back on the boyish impudence and wit of "Rebus," set his jaw with determination and wrote a serious "Introduction and Hymn." But it was too late, and furthermore, the latter work is not a good one. In the situation here Dr. Koussevitzky has evidently lost faith in Markevitch, for he has not repeated his works and has not introduced any new ones. The Harvard Glee Club brought out a part of the interesting "Cantate" last year. The Flute Players' Club, if we remember right, gave a piece of chamber music. But there has not been much attention to a composer whose publicity was so extensive.

"LE PARADIS PERDU"

This, we must remark again, is a misfortune, for Markevitch is a young composer. He has shown talent, even if his critics consider it to have been misguided. At 24 he is surely capable of composing something that is worth hearing. At 24 he is hardly to be dismissed as an artist barren of ideas. The answer is that he has done something of interest—"Le Paradis Perdu," which is a cantata inspired by Milton's poem, but to a text by the composer.

We had the advantage of hearing this work under rather unusual conditions last summer in Switzerland. Markevitch and his wife (she is the daughter of Nijinsky) were living near Vevey. He had with him some records of "Le Paradis Perdu" which had been made during the performance of the work by the B. B. C. orchestra in London. But he had no gramophone. Mr. Hugh Cuenod, who was one of the soloists in that performance, introduced him to a house where there was a gramophone; and we were lucky to be present at the session.

It is not possible to write finally of our impression of this work, because temporary records struck off during the actual performance are necessarily very imperfect. Nevertheless, we felt that it was an amazing work. It might be too quickly compared with Stravinsky's "Persephone," but the music is much more emotional and more dramatic. As in much of modern music, its fascination lies in the rhythmic ingenuity and the strange effects of instrumental timbre. More particularly the characterization of the spirit of evil and the contrast with the other solo voices are skillfully carried out. "Le Paradis Perdu" deserves a hearing, but only if we can rid our minds of the prejudice with which we have hitherto listened to Markevitch's music.

Hollywood has in several instances called on outstanding American composers to provide music for its output. The trend toward inviting men of serious purpose has been developing steadily, but it is still behind the movement abroad, where motion picture companies have long made a habit of entrusting musical scores to composers of reputation.

At the Radio City Music Hall this week there is current "As You Like It," a sound film which boasts a score by William Walton. Mr. Walton's name is well known to readers of the music pages. He is the composer of the symphony which the Philadelphia Orchestra introduced to New York last month. He has written other weighty works. Men of his caliber lend distinction to their share in the movies.

In response to requests for information, the family of the late Marcella Sembrich reveal that the soprano's studio, which stands on a wooded point of land jutting out into Lake George, near Bolton, will be preserved as Mme. Sembrich left it. It will be open to visitors next Summer and plans are being made for an added display room.

Adv. Nov. 8/36

Music Editor

MOZART'S Symphony in C major, No. 34 (K. 336), and Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde" for tenor, contralto and orchestra comprised the program of the fifth regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts conducted by Serge Koussevitzky on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

The program itself was marvelously designed, as so many of Dr. Koussevitzky's are,—Mozart's scintillating little jewel of a work beautifully offsetting the introspective melancholy of the larger work.

Contrary to one's anticipation of the event, however, the concert of Friday afternoon was not an occasion of unalloyed musical enjoyment.

Previous performances of Mozart by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra—especially those of this season—have tutored one to expect not only a perfect but an inspired revelation of that master's music.

* * *

IT IS quite probably not the part of wisdom to expect miracles as a matter of course, and certainly more gracious to greet their occurence with enthusiasm than to deplore their absence with bitterness. It is, in short, with all due acknowledgment of the fact that inspiration cannot be turned on and off at will like a mechanical device, that it must nevertheless be recorded that the performance of Mozart's Symphony on Friday afternoon was neither perfect nor inspired. (It might well have been otherwise on Saturday evening.)

The difference between a good performance of a work and a great one, while immeasurable in extent of relative significance, is often slight in actual fact. The dynamics a little forced, the phrasing a bit too studied, the myriad number of details—none of them of minor importance—only slightly out of joint results in the displacement of animated brilliance for nervous strain, of a sustained and spontaneously flowing expression of mood for a stilted one.

Thus, though there were moments of both wit and brilliance, and, in the second movement much sheer loveliness, in the performance of the Mozart Symphony on Friday afternoon, the total result was disappointing.

* * *

IF THE performance of Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde" brought added disappointments the fault was neither Dr. Koussevitzky's nor the orchestra's.

It was unfortunate that both to the demands made upon the guest artists by the music, and to the standard of performance set by the orchestra, they proved inadequate.

As the tenor, Paul Althouse's voice was often submerged by the orchestra. It is entirely too thin in quality for such a score. In addition, his reading lacked poetic intensity.

Maria Ranzow's performance as contralto was likewise inadequate.

This music, based on the verses of Hans Bethge, who in turn had it from such ancient Chinese as Li-Tai-Po (Eighth century), Mong-Kao-Jen (Eighth century), and Wang-Wei (of thereabouts) is an embodiment of sheer poetry of thought sublimely expressed.

* * *

MAHLER composed it in the summer of 1908 while in Austria vacationing from his arduous duties as conductor of the New York Philharmonic. It was a period of gloom and intensified sadness for him—one in which he felt his approaching doom and which found him only too well attuned to the philosophy running through the verses, "Empty the cup to the dregs. Dark is life, and dark is death."

Written in six parts, "Das Lied von der Erde" is not strictly speaking a song cycle, neither is it a symphony in the classic sense. But while it is neither it has the essential qualities of both and Mahler, always original, has here written music that is its own justification for itself.

MAHLER AT BEST WITH SYMPHONY

Overwhelming Music of "Song of the Earth"

Nov. 7/36

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Within the space of five weeks the current season of Symphony Concerts has yielded two "occasions": first, the double anniversary performance of Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, and now a repetition of Mahler's "Song of the Earth," 25 years almost to a day after the first performance of it in Vienna. And by the word "occasion" something much more than mere ceremonial and observance is intended. Cont.

MAHLER

Two pieces which Dr. Kou terday and wi
Mozart's Symph an early yet d symphony, if it Mahler. Yet it need to review that the symph
even to mind,
the impression
Mahler and by at the hands of his orchestra.

In 1928 Dr. K to Boston this tenor, contralto
he repeated it,
ers. The perf
brought yet an Maria Ranzow,
pearance here,
old and valued

Cruel

These singers, music, were face
ing task. Mahle fore him, wrote
isted only in hi
Mr. Althouse no himself understo
tral background,
signed for parts songs from the Song of Earthly cruel a predicam in parts of th
Beauty." Yet to what extent the conductor could tone down the orchestra in these passages is a question difficult to decide. Admittedly it was intended that the words should be heard. Admittedly, too, "Das Lied von der Erde" is primarily a symphonic work in which the orchestra no more plays the role of accompanist than it does in "Tristan" or the "Ring."

When Mr. Althouse was not pitting himself against an inconsiderate composer and conductor, as in the fascinating third division, "Of Youth," or in most of the fifth, "The Drunken One in Springtime," he was once more the accomplished singer and musician we know so well, neglecting neither the requirements of the composer nor those of the poet.

To the contralto falls the most impressive, the most characteristic portions of the work, "The Lonely One in Autumn" and "The Farewell." Here, indeed, Mahler has written a music so sorrowful that it melts the heart, music that stabs with its beauty.

Once or twice yesterday Miss Ranzow failed to bring forth the full significance of that which was entrusted to her, as in the phrase "Ich komm' zu dir" in "The Lonely One," but in the final division, with Mahler, with Dr. Koussevitzky and with the orchestra, she ascended to the heights. And throughout, as did Mr. Althouse, she displayed a spirit of true devotion to the composer. This is not soloist's music.

Heard again, "The Song of the Earth" seems more than ever a work standing alone and apart. If comparisons are to be sought, they may be found in the third act of "Tristan" or in certain lofty utterances in the last sonatas and quartets of Beethoven. But in the end we must admit that Mahler has given us here something for which there is no precise equivalent elsewhere.

In the case of this work we stand in double debt to Dr. Koussevitzky, first for bringing us music which, for some at least, has become a precious possession, and second for causing it to sound as in all likelihood it has never sounded before.

MUSIC

Nov. 7/36

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

In all his dozen years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr Serge Koussevitzky has accomplished nothing for which we could be placed more in his debt than the first performances here, and subsequent repetition, of Gustav Mahler's "The Song of the Earth." This unique score fills the greater part of the Symphony concerts this week, with the solo parts for contralto and tenor sung, respectively, by Maria Ranzow and Paul Althouse. It is preceded by one of the most delectable among the earlier symphonies of Mozart, that in C major, Koechel No. 338.

No score exists in modern music to parallel the qualities of this spiritual testament of an artist who conceived it toward the end of his days—when life had become for him a heavy burden and a mocking presence. For this reason it really ought not to share a concert program with anything else. Small wonder that a superb performance of Mozart's work yesterday afternoon was almost obliterated in memory by the searing intensities of Mahler's music.

Both a symphony and a cycle of songs, "The Song of the Earth" has for its literary basis a half-dozen verses by Chinese poets of the 8th Century. They came to Mahler's attention in the form of a German adaptation, published under title of "The Chinese Flute," by Hans Bethge, the German poet. These verses Mahler himself altered to suit his own purpose. They speak of the darkness of life and death alike, of melancholy, youth and beauty, and end in a mood of peaceful acceptance of destiny.

Many another poet his written of these things. But Mahler's treatment of them, with music of indescriable emotional depth resulted in a lonely masterpiece in which are inextricably mingled poetry, music and philosophic thought. Such intimate speaking from a full heart is not for those who merely "enjoy" music; they will be unmoved by "The Song of the Earth," and they will not have the slightest understanding of it. Without extravagant claim, this masterpiece may be said to be felt rather than heard, since Mahler concerned himself less with art than with life itself. Full realization of what "The Song of the Earth" meant to the composer is possible only when one has a notion of the troubled heart of Mahler, whose idealistic dreams were cruelly wounded by the rougher side of his experience.

All this will probably appear in cold print to be a soaring panegyric. But any save a genius who attempts to write illuminatingly of the substance in "The Song of the Earth" runs the risk of seeming either commonplace or hysterical. Mahler's genius as a composer has been questioned; his pessimistic side has been frivolously treated. It would be as futile, as cold-blooded to dwell on the disparate technical elements of the score. No matter where Mahler found the means to his expression, his uses of them here are his alone, and they are to some of us without flaw.

The performance yesterday was orchestrally magnificent. Dr Koussevitzky conducted with a truly apostolic fervor. Mr Althouse, long known here for the dependable qualities of his musicianship, sang admirably, though even in some places where the orchestral volume was not sufficient to veil his tones, he was not clearly heard. Possibly it was a case of not being in his best voice.

Mme Ranzow appeared for the first time in Boston. She is known in Europe and South America, however, and sang at the Metropolitan Opera more than five years ago, making her debut as Erda in "Siegfried." Her voice is smooth and of pure quality in its middle section, but extreme notes at either end of her range tended yesterday to be somewhat hard. Her singing of "The Lonely One in Autumn," was notable, and she proved herself an obviously serious and well-schooled musician. Yet on the whole she did not efface memories of Margarete Matzenauer's gorgeous delivery of the contralto songs in Mahler's work when it was last given here, six seasons ago.

The program next week will contain, in addition to the D minor Symphony of Cesar Franck, and the "Spring" orchestral concerto of Vivaldi, a rare novelty, one of Muzio Clementi's symphonies, re-orchestrated by Alfredo Casella.

C. W. D.

McCormack

OPERA AND CONCERT ACTIVITIES

LOOK for something different in the selection of an opening night opera at the Metropolitan Opera House. It is whispered that Edward Johnson is ready to abandon the time-honored practice of starting with a French or Italian work. If he does decide to take another course, he is confronted with a choice from the German répertoire or an opera in English. Since the pickings in the latter category are scarce, it would seem that a Wagner opera might be selected.

Three works by the incomparable Richard come to mind that have qualities that should commend them for an opening—pageantry, color, grandeur. "Die Meistersinger" would perhaps be considered first, since it has a great deal of cheer; the other two might be "Tannhaeuser" or "Lohengrin."

It may be, of course, that Mr. Johnson and his advisers will select such a work as the English version of "The Bartered Bride," which is gay, tuneful and well sung. It was the brightest spot in the Spring season.

The Metropolitan auditions of the air are now in their third week and will continue for at least twenty-three, possibly thirty-six more. As many as 250 young singers apply for auditions in the course of one week, and four are heard on the air each Sunday. The Metropolitan expects to take seven young singers for the next Spring season. If more than seven talents are discovered, the Metropolitan may give débuts to the others as well.

John Barbirolli gave it as his opinion, the day he arrived in New York, that his most important meeting with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra would be the first rehearsal.

That rehearsal went off smoothly, according to reports of eyewitnesses. The new conductor was introduced by Arthur Judson, the manager of the orchestra. Mr. Barbirolli observed that it was an honor to be called to head the Philharmonic-Symphony. The first work, a Berlioz overture, was played without pause. Mr. Barbirolli obviously wanted to get an idea of the tone. Afterward he said that it was splendid. The remainder of the rehearsal was according to Hoyle, the conductor stopping the orchestra from time to time to request changes.

At the end of the rehearsal some of the musicians spoke with approval of Mr. Barbirolli's beat. He seemed to be well satisfied with the orchestra.

News comes to light in devious ways. The fact that Paul Hindemith, the German composer, would visit these shores late this season was revealed indirectly the other day in an announcement that the League of Composers would tender a reception in his honor in April. But the immediate reason for Mr. Hindemith's visit is his expected participation at the Library of Congress Music Festival in Washington in the Spring.

The opera school of the Juilliard School of Music has confirmed the report, printed in this column, that it would present the première of the new romantic comedy-opera by Albert Stoessel and Robert A. Simon and Vaughan Williams's "The Poisoned Kiss." The Stoessel-Simon work has acquired a title since last heard of. It will be called "Garrick."

The Williams opera, described as a romantic extravaganza, has a text by Evelyn Sharp. It was performed in London, where opinion was divided. Some thought that Mr. Williams had written charmingly in a gay, romantic vein. Others were disappointed that the composer of the "London" and "Pastoral" symphonies had not chosen a more momentous theme.

The Juilliard opera school will open its season with Gounod's setting of Molière's "Le Médecin malgré lui." A new version of this rarely heard work has been prepared by Marshall Bartholomew and Alexander Dean, to be called "The Frantic Physician." This work will be done Dec. 9 to 12. "Garrick" will follow on Feb. 24 to 27, and "The Poisoned Kiss" will be last April 21 to 24.

Hollywood has in several instances called on outstanding American composers to provide music for its output. The trend toward inviting men of serious purpose has been developing steadily, but it is still behind the movement abroad. where motion picture companies have long made a habit of entrusting musical scores to composers of reputation.

At the Radio City Music Hall this week there is current "As You Like It," a sound film which boasts a score by William Walton. Mr. Walton's name is well known to readers of the music pages. He is the composer of the symphony which the Philadelphia Orchestra introduced to New York last month. He has written other weighty works. Men of his caliber lend distinction to their share in the movies.

In response to requests for information, the family of the late Marcella Sembrich reveal that the soprano's studio, which stands on a wooded point of land jutting out into Lake George, near Bolton, will be preserved as Mme. Sembrich left it. It will be open to visitors next Summer and plans are being made for an added display room.

Markevitch's Latest Score: "Le Paradis Perdu"

Her. Nov. 5/36

By ALEXANDER W. WILLIAMS

"The exploitation of Igor Markevitch"—so might run a chapter heading in a future history of music of the 20th century. And what an account of snobbishness and meanness it would be! It is all very well to consider politics a disagreeable trade, but one can go to the arts as well for examples of petty prejudices. The case of Igor Markevitch furnishes an instance of the evils of publicity and the peculiar snobbism of the intellectual world. The musical world, as a matter of fact, has never been considered a very pleasant place. Romain Rolland's "La Foire sur la Place" is a scathing account of its worst aspects, its hideous commercialism. One can also go back to the reports that Heine wrote from Paris in the 1840s.

Markevitch was one of the last of the composers to have worked for the great impresario Diaghileff. He was also one of the youngest and is today but 24 years old. He had undoubted talent and was taken up by the smart intellectuals. His music was played at the "Serenade" concerts of the Princesse de Polignac. He was sponsored by Jean Cocteau, who is certainly a writer of immense cleverness, but in a decadent tradition and one whose literary style has veered to all the winds of fashion. Virgil Thomson, the American composer, wrote an amusing account of the young artist's debut in Modern Music for November, 1932.

AN UNFORTUNATE LAUNCHING

From the point of view of the musical world outside Paris, Markevitch could not have had a worse introduction. There is nothing, for instance, that your English or American critic hates worse than to be dictated to by Paris. Across the channel and the Atlantic the critics breathed fire and waited their chance. It was not long in coming, and ever since Markevitch's music has been treated in the English-speaking press much as a freshman is handled by a western college fraternity. He has had a poor time of it, and we owe him the decency of an unprejudiced hearing.

Mr. Thomson first created the sneer "little Igor," in belittling comparison with Stravinsky. The nickname has been taken up on all sides, and in almost any review of one of his works you will find it used with mocking cruelty. There is something rather nauseating in this spectacle, the hounding of a young man whose faults in another would be attributed to youth. Another fault was that the unhappy composer began by writing wittily. Of course he was at once denounced for being superficial. Would the youthful Olivier Messiaen's "Les Offrandes oubliees," heard here recently, have been accorded such respect if it had not been a solemn work?

Markevitch, at any rate, soon learned his lesson. He turned his back on the boyish impudence and wit of "Rebus," set his jaw with determination and wrote a serious "Introduction and Hymn." But it was too late, and furthermore, the latter work is not a good one. In the situation here Dr. Koussevitzky has evidently lost faith in Markevitch, for he has not repeated his works and has not introduced any new ones. The Harvard Glee Club brought out a part of the interesting "Cantate" last year. The Flute Players' Club, if we remember right, gave a piece of chamber music. But there has not been much attention to a composer whose publicity was so extensive.

"LE PARADIS PERDU"

This, we must remark again, is a misfortune, for Markevitch is a young composer. He has shown talent, even if his critics consider it to have been misguided. At 24 he is surely capable of composing something that is worth hearing. At 24 he is hardly to be dismissed as an artist barren of ideas. The answer is that he has done something of interest—"Le Paradis Perdu," which is a cantata inspired by Milton's poem, but to a text by the composer.

We had the advantage of hearing this work under rather unusual conditions last summer in Switzerland. Markevitch and his wife (she is the daughter of Nijinsky) were living near Vevey. He had with him some records of "Le Paradis Perdu" which had been made during the performance of the work by the B. B. C. orchestra in London. But he had no gramophone. Mr. Hugh Cuenod, who was one of the soloists in that performance, introduced him to a house where there was a gramophone; and we were lucky to be present at the session.

It is not possible to write finally of our impression of this work, because temporary records struck off during the actual performance are necessarily very imperfect. Nevertheless, we felt that it was an amazing work. It might be too quickly compared with Stravinsky's "Persephone," but the music is much more emotional and more dramatic. As in much of modern music, its fascination lies in the rhythmic ingenuity and the strange effects of instrumental timbre. More particularly the characterization of the spirit of evil and the contrast with the other solo voices are skillfully carried out. "Le Paradis Perdu" deserves a hearing, but only if we can rid our minds of the prejudice with which we have hitherto listened to Markevitch's music.

MAHLER AT BEST WITH SYMPHONY

Overwhelming Music of "Song of the Earth"

Trav. 7/36

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Within the space of five weeks the current season of Symphony Concerts has yielded two "occasions": first, the double anniversary performance of Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, and now a repetition of Mahler's "Song of the Earth," 25 years almost to a day after the first performance of it in Vienna. And by the word "occasion" something much more than mere ceremonial and observance is intended. Cont.

Adv. Nov. 8/36

Music Editor

MOZART'S Symphony in C major, No. 34 (K. 336), and Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde" for tenor, contralto and orchestra comprised the program of the fifth regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts conducted by Serge Koussevitzky on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

The program itself was marvelously designed, as so many of Dr. Koussevitzky's are,—Mozart's scintillating little jewel of a work beautifully offsetting the introspective melancholy of the larger work.

Contrary to one's anticipation of the event, however, the concert of Friday afternoon was not an occasion of unalloyed musical enjoyment.

Previous performances of Mozart by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra—especially those of this season—have tutored one to expect not only a perfect but an inspired revelation of that master's music.

* * *

IT IS quite probably not the part of wisdom to expect miracles as a matter of course, and certainly more gracious to greet their occurrence with enthusiasm than to deplore their absence with bitterness. It is, in short, with all due acknowledgme cannot be turned mechanical device, recorded that th
Symphony on Frid fect nor inspired. ( wise on Saturday e
The difference b a work and a grea extent of relative actual fact. The phrasing a bit too details—none of th slightly out of joint animated brilliance tained and sponta mood for a stilted
Thus, though wit and brilliance, much sheer lovelin
Mozart Symphony result was disappo

IF THE perf
von der Erde" bro fault was neither chestra's.
It was unfort made upon the g
to the standard chestra, they pro
As the tenor, submerged by th

MAHLER OVERWHELMS

Two pieces made the programme which Dr. Koussevitzky offered yesterday and will repeat this evening, Mozart's Symphony in C major, No. 34, an early yet delightful work, and the symphony, if it may be so styled, of Mahler. Yet it is only when there is need to review the concert as a whole that the symphony of Mozart comes even to mind, so overwhelming was the impression made by the music of Mahler and by the performance of it at the hands of Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra.

In 1928 Dr. Koussevitzky introduced to Boston this six-part symphony for tenor, contralto and orchestra; in 1930 he repeated it, but with different singers. The performance of yesterday brought yet another pair of soloists: Maria Ranzow, making her first appearance here, and Paul Althouse, an old and valued friend.

Cruel for Singers

These singers, like all who essay this music, were faced with a heart-breaking task. Mahler, as did Wagner before him, wrote for vocalists who existed only in his imagination. Neither Mr. Althouse nor any other can make himself understood above the orchestral background that Mahler has designed for parts of the first of these songs from the Chinese, the "Drinking Song of Earthly Woe." In almost as cruel a predicament was Miss Ranzow in parts of the fourth song, "Of Beauty." Yet to what extent the conductor could tone down the orchestra in these passages is a question difficult to decide. Admittedly it was intended that the words should be heard. Admittedly, too, "Das Lied von der Erde" is primarily a symphonic work in which the orchestra no more plays the role of accompanist than it does in "Tristan" or the "Ring."

When Mr. Althouse was not pitting himself against an inconsiderate composer and conductor, as in the fascinating third division, "Of Youth," or in most of the fifth, "The Drunken One in Springtime," he was once more the accomplished singer and musician we know so well, neglecting neither the requirements of the composer nor those of the poet.

To the contralto falls the most impressive, the most characteristic portions of the work, "The Lonely One in Autumn" and "The Farewell." Here, indeed, Mahler has written a music so sorrowful that it melts the heart, music that stabs with its beauty.

Once or twice yesterday Miss Ranzow failed to bring forth the full significance of that which was entrusted to her, as in the phrase "Ich komm' zu dir" in "The Lonely One," but in the final division, with Mahler, with Dr. Koussevitzky and with the orchestra, she ascended to the heights. And throughout, as did Mr. Althouse, she displayed a spirit of true devotion to the composer. This is not soloist's music.

Heard again, "The Song of the Earth" seems more than ever a work standing alone and apart. If comparisons are to be sought, they may be found in the third act of "Tristan" or in certain lofty utterances in the last sonatas and quartets of Beethoven. But in the end we must admit that Mahler has given us here something for which there is no precise equivalent elsewhere.

In the case of this work we stand in double debt to Dr. Koussevitzky, first for bringing us music which, for some at least, has become a precious possession, and second for causing it to sound as in all likelihood it has never sounded before.

MUSIC

Mon. 7/36

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

In all his dozen years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr Serge Koussevitzky has accomplished nothing for which we could be placed more in his debt than the first performances here, and subsequent repetition, of Gustav Mahler's "The Song of the Earth." This unique score fills the greater part of the Symphony concerts this week, with the solo parts for contralto and tenor sung, respectively, by Maria Ranzow and Paul Althouse. It is preceded by one of the most delectable among the earlier symphonies of Mozart, that in C major, Koechel No. 338.

No score exists in modern music to parallel the qualities of this spiritual testament of an artist who conceived it toward the end of his days—when life had become for him a heavy burden and a mocking presence. For this reason it really ought not to share a concert program with anything else. Small wonder that a superb performance of Mozart's work yesterday afternoon was almost obliterated in memory by the searing intensities of Mahler's music.

Both a symphony and a cycle of songs, "The Song of the Earth" has for its literary basis a half-dozen verses by Chinese poets of the 8th Century. They came to Mahler's attention in the form of a German adaptation, published under title of "The Chinese Flute," by Hans Bethge, the German poet. These verses Mahler himself altered to suit his own purpose. They speak of the darkness of life and death alike, of melancholy, youth and beauty, and end in a mood of peaceful acceptance of destiny.

Many another poet his written of these things. But Mahler's treatment of them, with music of indescriable emotional depth resulted in a lonely masterpiece in which are inextricably mingled poetry, music and philosophic thought. Such intimate speaking from a full heart is not for those who merely "enjoy" music; they will be unmoved by "The Song of the Earth," and they will not have the slightest understanding of it. Without extravagant claim, this masterpiece may be said to be felt rather than heard, since Mahler concerned himself less with art than with life itself. Full realization of what "The Song of the Earth" meant to the composer is possible only when one has a notion of the troubled heart, of Mahler, whose idealistic dreams were cruelly wounded by the rougher side of his experience.

All this will probably appear in cold print to be a soaring panegyric. But any save a genius who attempts to write illuminatingly of the substance in "The Song of the Earth" runs the risk of seeming either commonplace or hysterical. Mahler's genius as a composer has been questioned; his pessimistic side has been frivolously treated. It would be as futile, as cold-blooded to dwell on the disparate technical elements of the score. No matter where Mahler found the means to his expression, his uses of them here are his alone, and they are to some of us without flaw.

The performance yesterday was orchestrally magnificent. Dr Koussevitzky conducted with a truly apostolic fervor. Mr Althouse, long known here for the dependable qualities of his musicianship, sang admirably, though even in some places where the orchestral volume was not sufficient to veil his tones, he was not clearly heard. Possibly it was a case of not being in his best voice.

Mme Ranzow appeared for the first time in Boston. She is known in Europe and South America, however, and sang at the Metropolitan Opera more than five years ago, making her debut as Erda in "Siegfried." Her voice is smooth and of pure quality in its middle section, but extreme notes at either end of her range tended yesterday to be somewhat hard. Her singing of "The Lonely One in Autumn," was notable, and she proved herself an obviously serious and well-schooled musician. Yet on the whole she did not efface memories of Margarete Matzenauer's gorgeous delivery of the contralto songs in Mahler's work when it was last given here, six seasons ago.

The program next week will contain, in addition to the D minor Symphony of Cesar Franck, and the "Spring" orchestral concerto of Vivaldi, a rare novelty, one of Muzio Clementi's symphonies, re-orchestrated by Alfredo Casella.

C. W. D.

55

English Conductor Makes His American Debut at Season's Opening of New York Philharmonic

Nov. 8 '36

By Moses Smith

NEW YORK, Nov. 6—The Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York, the existence of which goes back almost one hundred years, to 1842, gave its 3231st concert in Carnegie Hall last night and began, somewhat later than usual, a new and shortened season. At the same time John Barbirolli, an English conductor of French and Italian parentage, thirty-six years old, made his American debut as conductor of the Society, which he will direct through the next ten weeks.

There were some persons in last night's audience who had at least a passing acquaintance with Mr. Barbirolli's art from the numerous phonograph records, re-issued here, which he has had a share in making. But the great majority of the persons who virtually filled Carnegie Hall last night had at most a sketchy knowledge of his career, gleaned from newspaper accounts.

In much greater degree, no doubt, they had curiosity concerning how this young man was going to fare as the successor of Toscanini. His protestations that he was not making any attempt to "succeed" Toscanini but that, on the contrary, he was only a serious young man trying to do his best at the perilous profession of music-making—these were likely to be of little avail, as anyone who is at all familiar with the temper of the New York concert-going public will agree.

And so there was unmistakably a challenge in the air last night as the slight but sturdy Mr. Barbirolli walked on the stage to begin a program that included the "Roman Carnival" Overture of Berlioz, "The Tale the Pine-Trees Knew," by Arnold Bax; Mozart's Symphony in C major (K. 425) and the E minor Symphony of Brahms. The only unfamiliar number on this list was the composition by Bax, which had never previously been performed in this country and which, by the way, had been dedicated to the conductor of last evening.

* * *

It may be said at once that Mr. Barbirolli is no Toscanini. Nobody seriously expected that he would be; and it was patently unfair to couple him with that superlative flower of the art of conducting. It may also be said, although less categorically, since a single concert scarcely represents the complete "returns," that Mr. Barbirolli is not a first-rate conductor at all. Whether he will become one remains to be seen. At present his abilities are along the modest lines of his pretensions—no more.

Perhaps the best opportunity to observe, in a single evening, the musical qualities of Mr. Barbirolli was in the Mozart Symphony. But the present writer may as well confess that he was prevented from obtaining a suitable notion of how the music sounded because he was required to hear it from the unfamiliar position of a seat immediately below the stage, so that he could neither see the musicians nor make out clearly the instrumental parts.

Making shift for himself, this reporter betook himself to more favorable positions for the other numbers on the program. In this list Mr. Barbirolli had promptly begun to pay his respects to his fellow-Britishers and to introduce some of their music to American ears. The piece of Bax had an aspect familiar to many of us who know some of his other music. It is long and somewhat overstuffed; it tells a story while the composer disclaims story-telling; it is concerned almost inevitably with the object of so much of Bax's preoccupations — Celtic saga. It has the direct and highly personal character of the music of Bax. It is romantic and essentially music of "escape." Bax has done this sort of thing well; the present effort is not of his best.

* * *

Mr. Barbirolli conducted this music as if he meant every note of it. He did the same for the other numbers on the program. He proved to be a conductor of extraordinary energy, a man of many and sweeping gestures, bodily contortions, stamping of feet and, not infrequently, audible warnings to the musicians. His arm and body gyrations were so pronounced—perhaps some may call them picturesque—that they apparently explained why most of the time his feet were firmly planted widely apart on the podium as if in support. Not infrequently he pulled himself up suddenly, his legs and feet coming close together with an almost military snap and precision.

JOHN BARBIROLLI
New Conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society

Wide and sweeping as were the movements of his arms last night, his baton technic seemed curiously inflexible. He is evidently not one of those who rely on the slight inflection of the stick to convey a world of meaning to the musicians. His movements were spectacular, not to be missed. When he wanted the double-basses to sound vigorously his arms sawed the air as he crouched in a half-stooping position. His cues to the instruments at important entrances were strikingly manifest—too obvious, in fact.

It was evident last night that he was thoroughly aware of the contents of the various scores he was presenting. They rested on a stand at his side (not before him, as is the usual custom here). They were opened; but the conductor was only occasionally concerned with them, as he indicated by his page-turning. He had the scores in his head.

He also had them in his heart. This became more and more apparent as the program proceeded, particularly in the case of the Brahms Symphony. He seemed as ecstatic in his music-making as if he were a soloist playing in private. Such an approach does not necessarily produce the best-balanced performance, in spite of a popular delusion to the contrary. It did not produce a rounded, well-reasoned, well-balanced performance of the Brahms E minor Symphony last night.

* * *

The audience found sufficient in the quality of the performance and in the demeanor of the conductor to engage its attention throughout the evening. The applause seemed cordial enough. It was by no means of the duration or intensity of demonstration which New Yorkers can generate when they are genuinely excited by a musical performance. Very likely most of the audience realized that the playing of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra last night was not its best. Very likely, too, the listeners had expected more from this newcomer than they received. But it was also not unlikely that they made some allowance both for his probable nervousness at an important debut and for his unfortunate position, a circumstance over which he had had no control.

This position was due as much to the New York press as to the New York concert-goers themselves. Anyone coming after Toscanini was bound to suffer by comparison. When, besides, it was taken for granted that the new conductor was himself a top-notch leader and interpreter, a young man who is "only" a serious musician had no chance at all. As these lines are written the reviews of the leading New York critics are not yet available. They are being awaited hungrily by thousands of readers. It will be interesting to observe how these writers will emerge from the dilemma they have created for themselves. Tolerance is nowadays a rare commodity. But nothing less than tolerance is due Mr. Barbirolli at the beginning of his American engagement.

PORTLAND, MAINE
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

NOV 8 - 1936

Mrs. Clement F. Robinson and her daughter, Miss Emily Robinson, of Carroll Street, spent Tuesday in Boston where they attended the Boston Symphony concert.

News of Music

More on the Subject of John Barbirolli's Debut; Orchestras, Conductors, Composers

Trans. Nov. 9 '36

The "press" that greeted John Barbirolli, following his debut as conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society last week, was largely non-commital. Of the reviews at hand the most favorable to the young English conductor was that of Lawrence Gilman, who in the Herald Tribune, ended a column-long review with the observation that Mr. Barbirolli "is something better and rarer and finer than a conductor of power and sensibility. He permits us to think that he is akin to those uncommon interpreters who give us a measure of 'that inner standard of distinction, selection, refusal' which an incorruptible artist once defined: who have sifted from experience "all that seemed beautiful and significant. and have treasured above all things those savings of fine gold.' "

Olin Downes of the Times also wrote a long review; found a little less to praise and a little more to which to take exception; but pleaded that it would be fairer to postpone judgment of Barbirolli's interpretative gifts until later in the season. The evening papers were even more reserved in praise, through both Pitts Sanborn of the World-Telegram and W. J. Henderson of the Sun found some excellent qualities in Mr. Barbirolli's conducting. There was reference, also, to the likelihood that the conductor was prevented by nervousness from giving of his best.

New by Rachmaninov

Concerning the new Third Symphony by Rachmaninov, which was first played on Friday by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Leopold Stokowski and in the presence of the composer, Linton Martin, music critic of the Philadelphia Inquirer, wrote:

"It is thoroughly characteristic of its composer. In musical thought and expression it bears conspicuously closer relationship to the imperial past than to the puny present. Written in three movements, its thematic material is developed in highly original and even irregular manner and is of varying vitality in inspiration, though its qualities and construction are such that what it has to say manifestly cannot be entirely apprehended on the strength of a single hearing.

"If the impression produced was not deceptive or misguided, there seems to be more of gayety and less of gloom than Rachmaninov has shown in certain earlier offerings." The Symphony was enthusiastically received by the Philadelphia audience.

Orchestras Afield

A series of thirty-nine nationally broadcast radio programs will be inaugurated via a Columbia national network on Friday evening, Nov. 13, when the Philadelphia Orchestra, under Leopold Stokowski, will play in a half-hour program, beginning at ten in the evening and including addresses by two speakers. (The program is "sponsored" by a large group of banks and financial institutions.) Stokowski, too, will speak briefly on his program, which will include a group of short numbers by Bach, Debussy's "La Cathedrale engloutie" and an excerpt from "Das Rheingold." Stokowski will direct the first three of the concerts and he will be succeeded by Eugene Ormandy.

When the Philadelphia Orchestra gives a concert in the Hippodrome, New York City, on Dec. 1, for the benefit of the Williams College Museum of American Music and the pension fund of the Philadelphia Orchestra, it will be "assisted" by Paul Whiteman's Orchestra. The program, it is written, will contain four compositions never heard before in public.

The Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra will begin its season on the night of Thanksgiving day. Otto Klemperer will again be conductor. The Orchestra will have no fewer than twenty new instrumentalists. Among the soloists will be Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist, Guiomar Novaes, pianist, Erica Morini, violinist, Rose Bampton, contralto, Nathan Milstein, violinist, and Vladimir Horowitz, pianist. The programs will include a Beethoven cycle and the Bach "St. John Passion."

Continued

The San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, will give ten pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts this season, beginning on Jan. 8. The soloists will include among others, George Gershwin, pianist, Alexander Tansman, pianist-composer, Marian Anderson, contralto, and Vladimir Horowitz, pianist. The Orchestra will also participate in the season of the Monte Carlo Russe and will give three special concerts, at one of which Stravinsky will conduct his "Symphony of Psalms."

Operatic Novelties

"The Poisoned Kiss," opera by Vaughan Williams produced in England last season, will be presented under the auspices of the Juilliard School in New York next April. Earlier in the season the Juilliard opera school will offer a work that is described as a romantic comedy-opera, with music by Albert Stoessel and libretto by Robert A. Simon. The name of the piece is "Garrick," and it will be presented from Feb. 24 to 27. The school's opera season will open with the production of a new version of Moliere's "Le Medecin malgre lui" by Marshall Bartholomew and Alexander Dean on Dec. 9 and the three following days.

Items of the Day

Otto Klemperer has been appointed conductor of a new symphony orchestra in Moscow, according to the New York Times, and

JAN SMETERLIN
Pianist Who Will Be Heard in Alumnae Hall, Wellesley, this Evening, and Subsequently at the Statler on Wednesday Morning, Nov. 18, and in Symphony Hall on Sunday Afternoon, Nov. 22 will lead it through part of its season before he takes up his duties with the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra. Among the guest conductors of the Moscow ensemble will be Erich Kleiber, Bruno Walter, Felix Weingartner, Ernest Ansermet and Fritz Stiedry.

Rosa Ponselle, who has for some time been occupying an anomalous position with the Metropolitan Opera Association, has finally been re-engaged as leading soprano of that organization for most of the season. Previous bookings will prevent her appearing at the Metropolitan until the week of Jan. 4, and she will remain with the Association until March 6.

At the next meeting of the Composers' Forum-Laboratory in Repertory Hall on Thursday evening, Nov. 19, the program will consist of compositions by Joseph Wagner, Boston composer.

EXPRESS

NOV 9 - 1936

MUSICIAN HONORED

BOSTON, Nov. 9. (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced today receipt of notification through the French consulate here of his elevation to the rank of commander of the French Legion of Honor.

Cinema Flashes

Three luminaries of the London Film studios arrived here recently on the Queen Mary. They are William K. Howard, who recently completed "Fire Over England" for Alexander Korda; Tamara Desni, a Korda discovery who has an important role in that film, and Jack Okey, who designed and helped construct the huge new Denham Studios. Mr. Howard is on his way to Hollywood, where he will direct "Summer Lightning" for Walter Wanger. Miss Desni, a young Russian girl, is making her first visit to this country. Okey's return marks the completion of his undertaking at Denham. He was the construction head of numerous similar enterprises in this country, including the First National studios and others.

* * *

"Fatty Joe Cobb once again appears in an "Our Gang" comedy at the Hal Roach Studios. He is cast in "Pay As You Exit." When he outgrew the juvenile comedy troupe in 1930, he had attained international fame. Cobb is now nineteen years old and was graduated from high school in Dallas, Texas, last spring. Last summer he accompanied the present children on their personal appearance tour, acting as master of ceremonies.

* * *

"Dreaming Lips," the forthcoming Elisabeth Bergner film, is now in the cutting stage, and is due for London presentation in mid-December. No announcement has been made on its releasing date over here. Raymond Massey plays the masculine lead opposite Miss Bergner. "Dreaming Lips" was under the direction of Dr. Paul Czinner, Miss Bergner's husband.

* * *

"For Ever and Ever" will be the new title of the forthcoming Douglas Fairbanks Jr., starring vehicle for Criterion Films, it was announced today. The film was formerly titled "Jump for Glory." Shooting on the production is scheduled to begin soon. Dialogue will be directed by Harold French, cameras and lighting by Victor Armenise; art direction by Edward Carrick. The story is an adaptation from the novel by Gordon McConnel

---

OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE

NOV 1 - 1936

Boston Symphony Plays French Work

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, in its concerts of October 16 and 17 played a new work, "Les Offrandes oubliees," by Oliver Messiaen. Koussevitzky heard this work at a concert given in Paris last Summer by a group styling themselves "La Jeune France," and it seemed to him worth an American hearing. The music reviewer on the "Transcript" seems to have thought otherwise, his verdict being that "the offering of Messiaen was too generous to be dismissed with condescension, and not ample enough to justify its imposing auspices. It is a musical setting of the Cross, Sin and the Eucharist. The part purporting to depict Sin is the most exciting, as it would have to be to represent Sin at all well. The composer is unfortunately no Berlioz, nor even the now despised Saint-Saens, who once had something to say about purity in French art."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

NOV 9 - 1936

KOUSSEVITZKY IS HONORED

BOSTON, Nov. 9 (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced today receipt of notification through the French consulate here of his elevation to the rank of the commander of the French Legion of Honor.

Parts of Country Have Policies in Vogue That Make Symphonic Ensembles Indispensable Nucleus of Cultural Life

By OLIN DOWNES

THIS reporter of musical events seated himself in Carnegie Hall last Thursday evening, when the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra gave its opening concert of the season, with the pleasant feeling of being home again and present at an uncommonly interesting inauguration of the New York orchestra's season. Of the part in that opening taken by John Barbirolli, who then made his début in America as a conductor, much has been said in earlier columns than this one.

It was good to hear the great orchestra again and to realize, as all New Yorkers should, that even a Toscanini does not constitute the basic value of an orchestral program. As readers well know, the writer yields to no one in admiration of the Italian master who has left us. But there is not the slightest reason for any one to assume that because he has departed, the glories of an internationally famous orchestra have gone with him. It is the orchestra itself and the magnificent literature of symphonic composition which is our incalculable treasure of beauty, and which there are not years enough in a lifetime properly to explore.

It is often the case, especially in a country where advertising is as powerful an agent as in America, that the best—and sometimes not the best but the most extensively advertised—is the enemy of that which would be of the most substantial good to the community. We should remember this during the aftermath of Mr. Toscanini. With a new orchestral situation and a conductor of unquestioned ability before us, we can feel exultant in the possession of the orchestra which is one of the greatest artistic monuments of the city, and the music which it is so eminently capable of dispensing for us.

It is probable that the directors of the Philharmonic-Symphony Association feel, as the writer does, that where conductors are concerned it will be better when the Philharmonic-Symphony finds a permanent leader who is both an interpreter and orchestra and program builder than it is today, in a situation when five conductors lead the orchestra through a season. The point is how to change from the more or less accepted "star system" of past seasons to the other system in a way to maintain the traditions of the orchestra and the interest of its public. Perhaps the best way is through trial of various leaders till the right one is found. In the meantime, with the question of a permanent conductor temporarily on the shelf, we shall certainly hear some interesting musical individualities and some equally significant performances from the conductors whom the Philharmonic-Symphony will present this season.

* * *

A little travel around the country, more particularly in the Middle West, has apprised this observer of certain orchestral standards and conditions which appear to him, in connection with orchestral affairs in New York, worthy of consideration. The performances also provided certain bases of comparison. Not only was it good to be back home when the resident orchestra opened its season, but it was also good to hear the splendid sonorities of the band, and of the full complement of strings which the great Eastern orchestras possess and which few of the orchestras further west than Philadelphia have in sufficient measure. The modern orchestra needs its sixteen firsts and a corresponding number of seconds. The full string choir of players who have tone and virtuosity at command is an indispensable element of the perfect orchestra. The more gloriously, after the pilgrimage, sounded the richness and glow of the Philharmonic strings. Enumeration of individual excellences in the orchestra would go considerably further than Mr. Jaenicke's horn or Mr. Amans's flute. The virtues of this orchestra are thrown into the higher relief by comparison with various bands.

* * *

On the other hand, there are not only very fine orchestras to be heard west of Philadelphia, let us say with the famous Chicago Orchestra and the orchestra of Cleveland in the lead, but there is an attitude toward the orchestra, on the part of the public of the Midwestern cities, which there should be, and is not, here. The organizations of which we speak are not only fostered, as the Philharmonic-Symphony is here, by groups of public-spirited men and women ready and willing to assist if necessary, but they are enthusiastically and affectionately supported by their public.

And it is not a question of star conductors.

The orchestras have each a permanent conductor. Mr. Stock is the oldest established and most distinguished of them all. He could rest upon achievements which have been recognized not only by Chicago but by all America, and the reputation of a conductor and an orchestra who have contributed a very large share to making of American musical history, if so he chose. As a matter of fact, he works as hard and painstakingly as when he inherited the mantle of Theodore Thomas, and his organization and his fellow-citizens are with him to a man. He has every affair and every detail of the orchestra's existence at heart. Such has been the business organization and the public support of the Chicago Orchestra that it has found ways, through very sound and conservative financing, rentals, and what not, to be self-financing. The details of its policies have previously been recounted. The point is the forethought and the solidity of policies which make the orchestra an institution which could hardly be overthrown or pass from existence, either in a period of depression, or for lack of generous individual support. This is for practical intents and purposes a civic institution in which the city takes great interest and pride.

The same thing shows itself in striking ways in other cities. Here is St. Louis, with young Mr. Golschmann, well and favorably known for past performances in New York. In five years under his direction it has won a steadfast and cooperative public; it starts its 1936-37 season with just about twice the subscription it had five years ago. It has, it is true, an extraordinary young president, self-effacing, with an intense love of music, and great wealth. He could and would come to the rescue of the orchestra if this were necessary. But it is not necessary. With the subscriptions for 1936-37 in, the orchestra has, of course, not sufficient money to pay its bills. No orchestra can exist from receipts of its concerts alone. Hence, in St. Louis also, what is commonly called a "deficit" for the coming season has already been acknowledged and calculated. What is done to meet it? The amount calculated as necessary to meet the season's bills has been made known, and the money already subscribed, at the beginning of the season! There were the books, with the figures. The figures are not cited as "deficit." "Deficit," said a representative of the management, "suggests a degree of failure, whereas our St. Louis Orchestra is a success. We call this a maintenance fund." The amount is substantial, and over a hundred thousand dollars. It has been contributed by over twelve hundred people, in amounts ranging from $1 to $5,000, and it stands on the books, two thousand and odd dollars more than the most pessimistic calculation of what the orchestra will cost this season.

* * *

The support comes from the public. Mr. Golschmann has found a way to please large audiences of very different tastes with his programs, which contain, in a well-balanced way, established classics, works of the romantic and impressionistic periods, and, also, in small and rather systematically applied doses, works by contemporaneous composers. The audience among which the writer sat subscribed with the utmost heartiness to the "Lohengrin" prelude and the "Eroica" symphony. They gave a pretty good hand—no more than it deserved—to Respighi's "Fountains of Rome." They were polite rather than enthusiastic over the novelty of the afternoon, the "Sinfonietta" of Albert Roussel, which is certainly an admirable piece of writing. In another season Mr. Golschmann will doubtless repeat this work, meanwhile presenting other new scores, which may or may not prove palatable. And he has planned St. Louis premières of some seventeen or eighteen American compositions.

In a Sunday article the work of Mr. Goossens with the Cincinnati Orchestra was described. In Cleveland, Mr. Rodzinski gives every indication of serving, admirably, the musical needs of his public, and he also, unquestionably, has its hearty approval and support.. He adds a few operas to the symphonic repertory each season, as Mr. Goossens does in Cincinnati. It is to be noted that opera is particularly scarce in Cleveland and Cincinnati, and this policy, which was not successful last season in Philadelphia, has proved advisable and instrumental in bringing a new element to the audiences of the Cleveland Orchestra. And think of an orchestra with a really fine volunteer chorus of a total of approximately 300 to aid it in the performances of choral or operatic compositions! This is an orchestra which is part and parcel of its community.

All these orchestras are growing. All of them announce increased subscriptions for the coming season. More people, in other words, are becoming interested in music in these places, and none of them is canceling subscriptions because of the absence of Toscanini or another international star on the placards of the season. Nor do they need to be told by the newspapers what they think of the concerts. They know what they think, and in some cases are quite truculent about it. They also feel that the orchestra has something direct to do with them, and that they have a certain responsibility toward it.

* * *

Of course the orchestral situation in the biggest city in the world, with an international population, and a musical market as competitive as all others, is in many ways different from that which exists in younger and smaller centers, centers further inland, and with more inhabitants born and nurtured on the soil. In certain ways the orchestral problems are harder here than there. Yet one asks if everything has been done that could be done to bring the Philharmonic-Symphony and its ministrations closer to the community, and if sensational orchestral policies do not bring their penalties, wherever they are pursued? These questions cause considerable reflection by those concerned with the destinies of the Philharmonic-Symphony.

---

not yet been made the vehicle for the temporary mood and mania. The structure of the new music will not be a collection of unworked stones, such as hut dwellers might assemble, but a smooth, cemented piece of masonry, solid and enduring.

To all of which must be added the circumstance that the revolutionary movement in music has been fathered by one whose outlook is sane and splendidly balanced. This is Carlos Chavez, guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony this coming season. Mr. Chavez is director of the Orquesta Sinfonica de Mexico and until recently was head of the National Conservatory of Music. Mr. Chavez is a musician among musicians, a man among men.

* * *

Mr. Chavez has long been interested in evoking in music the native spirit of Mexico. As director of the Orquesta Sinfonica he has made it a point to give as wide opportunity as possible for works of Mexican composers and at the same time preserve a balance with the classic tradition and modern tendencies. An analysis of the programs presented in six years of the Sinfonica shows 167 different works played, of which 51 have been "moderns," 38 works of Mexican composers and 78 classics. It is worth noting that of the 51 modern works, 45 received their first Mexican performance under the direction of Mr. Chavez, and that of the 38 Mexican works, 28 had their première under Mr. Chavez.

Under his direction as head of the National Conservatory of Music, a tremendous research into pre-Cortesian music has been inaugurated.

The first modern musical work making use of Aztec instruments was a symphony composed by Mr. Chavez in 1921, his first symphonic work, in fact. For the performance of this work he himself constructed, and had constructed under his supervision, a number of these instruments which he used as a complement in the orchestra. Since then he has continued this vein, although not exclusively—as witness his "H. P."' ballet—and has created the Orquesta Mexicana, which uses a complement of purely Mexican instruments.

ELGIN GROSECLOSE.

WITH SOME ORCHESTRAS

N. Y. Times [illegible]

THE Philadelphia Youth Orchestra, started two years ago by Leopold Stokowski and conducted by Sylvan Levin and Saul Caston, has been reorganized and is directed by Jacques Singer of the Philadelphia Orchestra. The Youth Orchestra, composed of musicians from 13 to 25 years of age, plans to give an initial concert soon. All of the players are members of the audience of the Philadelphia Orchestra's Concerts for Youth. Soloists will be chosen by contests, and so will the compositions of young Philadelphians which form a feature of the programs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, opens its season of five concerts in Carnegie Hall, Thursday night, Nov. 19 and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 21. The new First symphony by Werner Josten will be given its world première this Friday and Saturday by the orchestra in Boston, with the composer conducting.

A Brahms cycle of four concerts will be presented by the Newark Civic Symphony Orchestra, directed by Philip Gordon, in Newark, N. J., Nov. 24, Dec. 1, Dec. 8 and Dec. 15. The orchestra is a unit of the Federal Music Project.

The I. W. O. Symphony Orchestra has started its fourth season, under the direction of I. R. Koreman, and is preparing programs for each borough of the city. Vacancies are open in all departments of the orchestra, which holds its rehearsals Tuesdays at 8 P. M. and Saturdays at 3 P. M.

The Enid Symphony Orchestra, under Maurits Kesnar, opens its season of four concerts Nov. 17, in Enid, Okla. At each concert a contemporary American work will be performed. The orchestra is sponsored by Phillips University.

The works for orchestra by thirteen American composers, played for the first time in the symposium of American orchestral music held this year at the Eastman School of Music, Rochester, N. Y., and performed by the Rochester Civic Orchestra, directed by Howard Hanson, have all been recorded. Thus the composers will have available a valuable asset for intensive study of their music as brought to auditory life. The composers whose music was played and recorded are George F. McKay, Timothy Mather Spelman, Robert Doellner, Victor Alessandro, Erik Leidzen, Louis Cheslock, Gordon Kinney, David Diamond, William Grant Still, Burnet C. Tuthill, Robert McBride, A. W. Binder and Hugh McColl.

Otto Klemperer has been appointed the conductor of the newly formed symphony orchestra of Moscow, composed of 130 of the best musicians of that city. He will direct it before his return to lead the Los Angeles Orchestra. Klemperer's substitute will be the Moscow conductor, A. Hauk, and the concertmaster is L. Zeitlein, who founded the first conductorless orchestra. Guest conductors will include Erich Kleiber, Bruno Walter, Felix Weingartner, Ernest Ansermet, Fritz Stiedry and others.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

NOV 4 - 1936

Locke Will Give Analytical Talk

To Appear in Place of Werner Josten for Community Concert

Due to illness, Werner Josten will be unable to give the analytical talk of the first concert of the Community Concert series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Josten's place will be ably filled by Arthur Ware Locke, also of the faculty of Smith College.

Mr. Locke has been a professor of music at Smith for twenty years and is now the senior member of the department of music. He is a student and enthusiast of Brahms which should make his comments on that part of the Boston Symphony's program the most valuable. He is the author of the book, "Music and the Romantic Movement in France" and is at present completing a second book, "Stravinsky's Music, a Critical Survey."

The talk, which is sponsored by the Junior League and to which all holders of Community Concert Series tickets are invited, will take place as scheduled, Friday, Nov. 6, at 4 at the Technical High School auditorium.

CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS

NOV 3 - 1936

ALL THINGS CONSIDERED

BY HOWARD VINCENT O'BRIEN

IT IS now only a matter of hours before we know whether or not the nation has been saved, liberty restored and prosperity made secure on her throne.

That is one way of looking at it. Another way is to think of today's exercises as a sham battle, a wrestling match between two sets of politicians, each thirsty for the gravy that goes with control of government in a democracy. A third way is to dismiss it as just a bubble on the simmering surface of time, full-blown at the moment, but soon to vanish, leaving no trace.

As we prepare to cheer for victory or grit our teeth for the knout of defeat, we might remember to shed a tear for tomorrow's jobless—the spellbinders, the statisticians and the newspaper editorialists. Even after all the alibis have been swept up and polished and put back in their places there is bound to be a lull while search is made for new things to view with alarm or point to with pride.

Turning to Schubert

I am one of those who will suffer from this form of technological unemployment. After having put in so many evenings listening to political harangues it will be a little difficult to resume a normal use of leisure.

There are compensations, however. One of them is a new phonograph, a recent newcomer on the market, and instead of wasting my time in a futile effort to understand such things as the silver-purchase act, I shall put in some time getting better acquainted with Sibelius. On my table now, unopened, is a package containing something far more worthy of attention than all the political oratory of a generation—a new and improved recording of that incomparable combination of sounds, Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony with the Boston Symphony orchestra, led by that tone poet, Serge Koussevitzky. It is rightly named, for I shall never hear it enough to call it "finished."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

NOV 7 - 1936

ILLUSTRATES HIS TALK WITH PIANO SELECTIONS

Prof A. W. Locke of Smith Analyzes Program Planned by Boston Symphony

A gathering of more than 200 in Technical high school auditorium yesterday afternoon heard Prof Arthur Ware Locke of Smith college give an interesting and analytical talk on the program to be presented Tuesday night at the Municipal auditorium by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor.

Prof Locke, senior member of the department of music at Smith, student and enthusiast of Brahms, explained to his audience that his purpose was to bring to them the background and characteristic motifs behind the works of Mozart, Brahms, Faure and Richard Strauss, whose compositions will make up the program at the Boston Symphony concert.

He illustrated his talk with piano selections from the symphonies of Mozart, Brahms and Strauss, contrasting to his audience the clear, dainty theme of Mozart's works with the quiet, reflective nature of Brahms, which he said, often comes out in Brahms's music. Prof Locke also played several selections from Strauss's "Don Juan," pointing out the highly dramatic and exceedingly virgorous motif characteristic of this work.

Prof Locke read a passage on Strauss's "Don Juan" from "Philip Hale's Boston Symphony Notes," and recommended that his audience refer to this book in order that they might get a clearer interpretation of the works which will be presented at the concert.

Prof Locke is the author of a book entitled "Music and the Romantic Movement in France." and at present he is completing a second book, "Stravinsky's Music, a Critical Survey." His talk yesterday was sponsored by the Springfield Junior league

---

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

KOUSSEVITZKY HONORED

BOSTON, Nov. 9 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced today receipt of notification through the French consulate here of his elevation to the rank of the commander of the French Legion of Honor.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 8 - 1936

Boston Symphony Next In Woolsey Hall Series

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Selects Sibelius Opus for Presentation Here November 16th

THE SECOND event of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series will take place in Woolsey Hall a week from Wednesday evening, November 18th. The occasion will be the first of the two concerts here this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, famed Russian leader of the great 110 piece orchestra, conducting.

Always to be relied upon to furnish music-lovers with a program of great variety and quality, Dr. Koussevitzky has planned an unusually appealing group of selections for the forthcoming occasion. The outstanding composition to be heard is the Sibelius Symphony No. 5 in E flat major, Op. 82, which will take up the entire second half of the evening of great music. The opening selection will be Haydn's Symphony in B-flat, No. 102, which will be followed by Debussy's "La Mer."

These three great works will undoubtedly combine in furnishing a concert that will meet with the approval of a tremendous number of music patrons, resulting in the usual audience that packs Woolsey Hall to the doors each time the great symphonic body performs here. Although it would be difficult to select the offering that will cause the most interest, the fact that Dr. Koussevitsky is one of the leading exponents in the presentation of Sibelius' writings causes his composition to stand out conspicuously on the evening's musical schedule.

The complete program, with the movements of each composition listed, is as follows:

HAYDN—Symphony in B-flat No. 102 (the Ninth of the London Series).
I. Largo; Allegro vivace.
II. Adagio.
III. Menuetto; Allegro, Trio.
IV. Finale: Presto.

DEBUSSY—"La Mer," three orchestral sketches.
I. De l'aube a midi sur la mer.
II. Jeux de vagues.
III. Dialogue de vent et de la mer.

SIBELIUS—Symphony No. 5 in E-flat major, Op.82.
I. (Tempo molto moderato.
II. (Allegromoderato, ma poco a poco stretto.
III. Andante mosso, quasi allegretto.
IV. Allegro molto.

Place your rent ad in The Register Classified Columns. A thousand times better than rent signs.—Adv.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 9 - 1936

As they Go

CHOCO, with a glistening blue bow holding a fringey forelock in place, headed the receiving line when the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony concerts went to Mrs. Henry Joralemon Davenport's home for tea the other day. Choco, a prize French poodle of richest cocoa hue, is named after Chocolat, the famous French clown. The name fits all the way around. He is a funmaker in his own right and cut a few capers while ushering the guests in and out.

* * *

NEW SET

Among the surprises plotted when the committee members put their heads together in Madam Chairman's drawing-room was the matter of a new set from which the Boston musicians will pipe their tunes this season. It is a shell-like business, to which the Academy of Music fell heir some years ago when the Philharmonic cut Brooklyn from its calling list. When you see it you may remark, with the ease of one who knows, that it was constructed from plans made by Mengleberg and that eventually the completed set came to delight the great Toscanini.

* * *

SILK HATS

You may also buzz behind a white-gloved hand that the set, which is being given a trial run to-day by the Boston orchestra's Mr. Judd and Manager Swin of the Academy, is slightly more expensive to erect for each performance than the old and weary flats, and that the sponsors are looking to silk hats for dollars instead of rabbits to defray the cost.

* * *

COMMERCIAL SIDE

A dozen new subcommittees have been formed to ensnare additional subscribers. Don't be surprised when all of your friends bounce on you at once. That Boston music is a bargain is the opinion of Robert Alfred Shaw, veteran culture patron, commenting on the commercial side of refinement. "We're getting it for about 50 cents on the dollar, when you talk bookkeeping," he confides.

* * *

PEANUT BUTTER

In keeping with hostess' idea of prompt dispatch, tea was served while the guests assembled, and if you didn't get there in time you were cheated out of the best peanut butter and bacon sandwiches in many seasons. Dish rattling out of the way, the committee was free to devote its ingenuity to business. "Boost Boston" was the text.

* * *

APPROVAL

As a compliment to everyone concerned, one of the truly delightful ladies of the committee, having a sally with this column, as the latter demolished another sandwich of the peanut-butter-and-bacon variety, whispered capriciously, "You always turn up at the right places, my dear!"

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 8 - 1936

RECENT R

By JEROME

ALTHOUGH he composed the mov symphony in 1822, Schubert was formed. The efforts of his frienc published by Peters failed because the lend his name to "works by masters a So it was not heard until 1865 when Her Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, having brenner, first unfolded its enamoring p concerts. It was not printed until 1867 by Spina.

The fact that the Graz musical society which had received the two movements as token of Schubert's appreciation for having been elected an honorary member never saw fit to acknowledge the gift, much less to consider making its contents known to the world, may have dissuaded Schubert from completing the symphony. For while there is no more conclusive evidence available that he intended to compose the customary additional two movements than the existence of a few measures of a projected scherzo, it seems more than likely that he would have done so had the stolid "Grazer" seen fit to risk experimenting with unfamiliar musical pabulum.

However, the unfinished symphony has suffered no neglect during the last half century, and the makers of phonographic records have certainly not been unaware of its existence. For not even the fifth symphony of Beethoven has been transferred to the disks so frequently. The latest addition to the lists is Victor's release of Serge Koussevitzky's interpretation with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Needless to say, the tonal texture achieved throughout the work in this flawlessly recorded version, is unexcelled in sleekness by any other orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky approaches the score with full cognizance of its conflicting lyric and dramatic aspects. He does not, however, strike a just pace for the chief subject of the andante movement until its second entrance. Its enunciation at the opening of the movement is in an adagio, rather than in the prescribed andante con moto.

BANGOR, ME.
NEWS

NOV 10 1936

Honor Conferred on Boston Symphony Orchestra Conductor

BOSTON, Nov. 9—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received word today he had been named a commander of the Legion of Honor of France. The citation will be presented after the symphony concert next Friday afternoon. Dr. Koussevitzky, although Russian by birth, has long resided in Paris and has been instrumental in the development and recognition of new French musical leaders.

The orchestra also announced the appointments of former Governor Alvan T. Fuller and Richard C. Paine to the board of trustees. One appointment fills the vacancy caused by the recent resignation of William L. Phillips, new ambassador to Italy.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

NOV - 193

Atty. B. W. Warren Reelected President Boston Symphony

Atty. Bentley W. Warren of Boston and Williamstown, director of the Holyoke Water Power company, has been re-elected president of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Former Governor Alvan T. Fuller of Massachusetts was elected to the board of trustees of this institution last week.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

NOV 10 1936

Koussevitzky Is Made French Commander

Boston, Nov. 9.—(AP.)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced today receipt of notification through the French consulate here of his elevation to the rank of the commander of the French Legion of Honor.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMERICAN

NOV 10 1936

WINS FRENCH HONOR

BOSTON, Nov. 9 (AP).—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced today receipt of notification of his elevation to the rank of the commander of the French Legion of Honor.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 10 1936

France Honors Koussevitzky

BOSTON, Nov. 9 (AP).—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced today his receipt of the notification through the French Consulate here of his elevation to the rank of commander in the French Legion of Honor.

MUSIC

He Nov 14

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The sixth regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Werner Josten was the guest conductor in his new symphony, which received its first performance on this occasion. The full program was as follows:

Concerto No. 1 from "The Four Seasons' ("Spring") edited Molinari......Vivaldi
"Gymnopedies." orchestrated by Debussy ......Satie
Scherzo in G minor from the Octet Op. 20 (arranged for orchestra by the composer) ....Mendelssohn
Symphony in F..................Josten
Symphony in D minor.............Franck

Yesterday's concert provided curious and interesting music before the familiar strains of the Franck Symphony sounded forth and the audience once more knew precisely its bearings. The Vivaldi Concerto has no doubt been to some extent modernized by Mr. Molinari. At all events it could hardly have sounded in its day as it did yesterday with the full string choir of the Boston Symphony to deal with its straightforward qualities. It is certainly and in this form a charming work, of buoyant freshness. We only doubt the advisability of the thunderous contrasts between the solo violins and the whole string orchestra.

Saties "Gymnopedies" are pieces of exquisite sensibility and a simplicity that borders on the precious. Their mood is perfectly explained by the idea in the program. They are somewhat warmer even in Debussy's restrained orchestration than they are in the bare chillness of the piano. Nor does Mendelssohn's Scherzo from the Octet require much comment. It is spontaneous and delightful music, Mendelssohn at his best. Perhaps these pleasing short works did not lead up suitably to the acerbities of Mr. Josten's score; but it is difficult to suggest works that would have done so any better.

Mr. Josten, as fits a distinguished teacher and musician, is in no doubt about the manner and form of his musical expression. The new Symphony is concise and to the point. Its form is clear and well defined. The trouble is that there is too much manner to too little matter. Mr. Josten writes in a dissonant harmonic idiom, persistently so. Somewhat in the manner of Hindemith he does so in an established classical form. But this symphony is both self-conscious and cerebral to a painful degree.

There is very little that sounds natural in this work, unless it is the functioning of a logical mind on musical material regardless (except for the instrumentation) of the effect in actual performance. Such attraction as the symphony has resides in the rather equare vigor of the fast movements. Even in the andante Mr. Josten is forced soon to fall back on this same device. It is a pity that so much intellectual ability should have gone to so little purpose into a symphony, which is in our opinion a barren work.

After the intermission Dr. Koussevitzky conducted a supreb performance of the Franck Symphony. Previously we had been shown—if any one needed to be shown—the excellence of the strings in the Vivaldi and the marvelous ensemble in the Mendelssohn. In the Franck we heard the orchestra at its most dramatic and most poignant.

Note on New Symphony by Werner Josten

Tran. Nov. 12/36

Premiere to Be Given at the Week-End Concerts of Boston Orchestra

An important change of program for this week's Friday afternoon and Saturday evening symphony concerts replaces Cassela's edition of a Clementi Symphony with a considerably shorter work in the same form by Werner Josten, which will be conducted by its composer; and two shorter scores. One of these, the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's Octet, is familiar here in Mendelssohn's own orchestration which Koussevitzky will employ; the other, Debussy's arrangement for orchestra of two of Eric Satie's static and exquisite "Gymnopedies," needs only the reminder that the scholarly and witty Satie had the celebrated festival of ancient Sparta in mind, the Gymnopaedia, named for the dances of naked youths in honor of Apollo.

Mr. Josten's "Symphony in F," only recently completed, is being performed for the first time anywhere. The Boston orchestra has previously played other music of Mr. Josten, including his symphonic movement, "Jungle," and his Concerto Sacro.

Two germinating motives, heard throughout the three movements, form a fundamental theme of the whole symphony. The first of these, by far the more important, is composed of the ascending notes F, A-flat, B-flat, C; the second rises and falls through four more notes, E-flat, F, E-flat, C. The brief, energetic first movement is based almost wholly on the theme of the mottos which are constantly varied according to well established contrapuntal practices and precepts. The Andante is a rondo in B major at the end of which an extended transitional passage—allegro moderato—swells from pianissimo to fortissimo and introduces the Finale without pause. This third movement, mainly in F major, contributes the expected affirmation—both of man's struggle and man's motto theme. Writing in a consistently contemporary idiom, Professor Josten is formally reminiscent of Beethoven, harmonically of Stravinsky. Perhaps the two are not an odd pair.

Antonio Vivaldi's "Spring" Concerto which opens the program is the first of the little symphonic poems called "The Four Seasons" by their composer, who presumably supplied the sonnets that explain them. Lettered parts of the poems appear in the score at the beginning of the passages to which they apply. Here is program-music at an early and explicit stage—also at a highly poetic one. In it Vivaldi takes his place in a field that has been cultivated by Liszt and Strauss. But his illuminating accomplishment requires only an organ, cembalo, and strings. Molinari's edition of the work will be used at the first performance in Boston.

G. H. L. S.

MUSIC

Col. Nov. 14/36

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Symphony concerts last week dwelled in Olympian solitude with the genius of Gustav Mahler. For the concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening, they have descended to innocent pleasures of the valley, the newest of which is a Symphony in F by Werner Josten, conducted by the composer. Dr Koussevitzky begins the program with the descriptive concerto grosso called "Spring" out of the seasons cycle of four, by Vivaldi; continues with Debussy's orchestrations of the first and third "Gymnopedies" by Erik Satie, the orchestral version by Mendelssohn of the scherzo from his own Octet, Op 20, and concludes with the D minor Symphony of Cesar Franck.

These pieces of Satie and Mendelssohn might appear inconsequential for a Boston Symphony program, but further thought will uncover the fact that not only are they delightful, beautifully scored, but are in their way a test of virtuosity. Nothing less than a first-rank orchestra could make them sound as they did yesterday, with a luminous texture that fairly glowed. Mr Gillet's playing of the oboe solos in "Gymnopedies" was captivating. From beginning to end, the performances of Satie and Mendelssohn were governed by the utmost precision. As for Vivaldi, none but a grumpy cynic would deny the delicate craft involved in his naive but thoroughly charming depiction of gentle Spring and her birds, meadows and passing storms.

Mr Josten's work was played for the first time. Composed in the Summer just past, it lies in three movements, the second and third of which are connected. Two short motives form the basic substance, and stand as a sort of motto theme by which the composer evidently sets great store.

Mr Josten writes vigorous music which strides along under rhythmic impetus originated by Stravinsky, and which is partially characterized by a manner of writing for brass, reminiscent of Honegger. The harmonies, not unnaturally, are prevailingly dissonant, yet not without a show of simple chords. Like many another contemporary, Mr Josten has made no effort to obtain orchestral color; his choirs sound in blunt mass effects with little variety of timbre.

A number of academically interesting points may be found, although no single melodic or harmonic idea stands out in memory. It is the fashion of the times among composers to ignore emotional elements; Mr Josten has here offered no exceptions to the rule. In all probability this departure from emotional expression will prove to have been the greatest weakness of music written since the war. All masterpieces of the past, at least, have lived mainly by virtue of their emotional qualities, secondarily by the salience of their composers' thought.

This Symphony is cast in an idiom more general than personal, become thrice familiar in the past 10 years, and which is already old-fashioned. The music of Mendelssohn and Franck, flanking this score, seemed by comparison, to be new.

The lone Symphony of Franck used to be exceedingly popular, until it became hackneyed. At Symphony Hall it has been wisely retired for two years. Heard after a little rest, this distinctive masterpiece without equal among symphonies, exerts its familiar power.

Dr Koussevitzky's interpretation cannot be admired, because he consistently overplays it. Not only brass, but strings are forced at a sacrifice of pure tone and even of a texture which is really not opaque but marvelously transparent. Franck, by all accounts, was as far removed from the stormy temperament of the 19th century romantics as day from night. When attempts are made to dramatize his music, his essential qualities are lost.

Next week the orchestra goes to New York for its first visit of the season; the concerts in Symphony Hall, Nov 27 and 28, will be conducted by Richard Burgin. The program: Bach-Weiner: Toccata in C major; Hindemith: Symphony, "Mathis der Maler"; Kalinnikov: First Symphony.

C. W. D.

57

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 8 - 1936

Boston Symphony Next In Woolsey Hall Series

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Selects Sibelius Opus for Presentation Here November 16th

THE SECOND event of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series will take place in Woolsey Hall a week from Wednesday evening, November 18th. The occasion will be the first of the two concerts here this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, famed Russian leader of the great 110 piece orchestra, conducting.

Always to be relied upon to furnish music-lovers with a program of great variety and quality, Dr. Koussevitzky has planned an unusually appealing group of selections for the forthcoming occasion. The outstanding composition to be heard is the Sibelius Symphony No. 5 in E flat major, Op. 82, which will take up the entire second half of the evening of great music. The opening selection will be Haydn's Symphony in B-flat, No. 102, which will be followed by Debussy's "La Mer."

These three great works will undoubtedly combine in furnishing a concert that will meet with the approval of a tremendous number of music patrons, resulting in the usual audience that packs Woolsey Hall to the doors each time the great symphonic body performs here. Although it would be difficult to select the offering that will cause the most interest, the fact that Dr. Koussevitzky is one of the leading exponents in the presentation of Sibelius' writings causes his composition to stand out conspicuously on the evening's musical schedule.

The complete program, with the movements of each composition listed, is as follows:

HAYDN—Symphony in B-flat No. 102 (the Ninth of the London Series).
I. Largo; Allegro vivace.
II. Adagio.
III. Menuetto; Allegro, Trio.
IV. Finale: Presto.

DEBUSSY—"La Mer," three orchestral sketches.
I. De l'aube a midi sur la mer.
II. Jeux de vagues.
III. Dialogue de vent et de la mer.

SIBELIUS—Symphony No. 5 in E-flat major, Op.82.
I. (Tempo molto moderato.
II. (Allegromoderato, ma poco a poco stretto.
III. Andante mosso, quasi allegretto.
IV. Allegro molto.

Place your rent ad in The Register Classified Columns. A thousand times better than rent signs.—Adv.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 8 - 1936

RECENT RE

By JEROME D.

ALTHOUGH he composed the moveme symphony in 1822, Schubert was de formed. The efforts of his friend F published by Peters failed because the Le lend his name to "works by masters alre so it was not heard until 1865 when Herbe Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, having o brenner, first unfolded its enamoring pa concerts. It was not printed until 1867 by Spina.

The fact that the Graz musical society which had received the two movements as token of Schubert's appreciation for having been elected an honorary member never saw fit to acknowledge the gift, much less to consider making its contents known to the world, may have dissuaded Schubert from completing the symphony. For while there is no more conclusive evidence available that he intended to compose the customary additional two movements than the existence of a few measures of a projected scherzo, it seems more than likely that he would have done so had the stolid "Grazer" seen fit to risk experimenting with unfamiliar musical pabulum.

However, the unfinished symphony has suffered no neglect during the last half century, and the makers of phonographic records have certainly not been unaware of its existence. For not even the fifth symphony of Beethoven has been transferred to the disks so frequently. The latest addition to the lists is Victor's release of Serge Koussevitzky's interpretation with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Needless to say, the tonal texture achieved throughout the work in this flawlessly recorded version, is unexcelled in sleekness by any other orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky approaches the score with full cognizance of its conflicting lyric and dramatic aspects. He does not, however, strike a just pace for the chief subject of the andante movement until its second entrance. Its enunciation at the opening of the movement is in an adagio, rather than in the prescribed andante con moto.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 9 - 1936

As they Go

CHOCO, with a glistening blue bow holding a fringey forelock in place, headed the receiving line when the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony concerts went to Mrs. Henry Joralemon Davenport's home for tea the other day. Choco, a prize French poodle of richest cocoa hue, is named after Chocolat, the famous French clown. The name fits all the way around. He is a funmaker in his own right and cut a few capers while ushering the guests in and out.

* * *

NEW SET

Among the surprises plotted when the committee members put their heads together in Madam Chairman's drawing-room was the matter of a new set from which e Boston musicians will pipe r tunes this season. It is a like business, to which the my of Music fell heir some ago when the Philharmonic ooklyn from its calling list. you see it you may remark, e ease of one who knows, as constructed from plans y Mengleberg and that y the completed set delight the great Tos-y also buzz behind a d hand that the set, being given a trial run y the Boston orchestra's d and Manager Swin of ademy, is slightly more expe to erect for each perance than the old and weary and that the sponsors are ing to silk hats for dollars ead of rabbits to defray the st.

* * *

ATS

* * *

COMMERCIAL SIDE

A dozen new subcommittees have been formed to ensnare additional subscribers. Don't be surprised when all of your friends bounce on you at once. That Boston music is a bargain is the opinion of Robert Alfred Shaw, veteran culture patron, commenting on the commercial side of refinement. "We're getting it for about 50 cents on the dollar, when you talk bookkeeping," he confides.

* * *

PEANUT BUTTER

In keeping with hostess' idea of prompt dispatch, tea was served while the guests assembled, and if you didn't get there in time you were cheated out of the best peanut butter and bacon sandwiches in many seasons. Dish rattling out of the way, the committee was free to devote its ingenuity to business. "Boost Boston" was the text.

* * *

APPROVAL

As a compliment to everyone concerned, one of the truly delightful ladies of the committee, having a sally with this column, as the latter demolished another sandwich of the peanut-butter-and-bacon variety, whispered capriciously, "You always turn up at the right places, my dear!"

BANGOR, ME.
NEWS

NOV 10 1936

Honor Conferred on Boston Symphony Orchestra Conductor

BOSTON, Nov. 9—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received word today he had been named a commander of the Legion of Honor of France. The citation will be presented after the symphony concert next Friday afternoon. Dr. Koussevitzky, although Russian by birth, has long resided in Paris and has been instrumental in the development and recognition of new French musical leaders.

The orchestra also announced the appointments of former Governor Alvan T. Fuller and Richard C. Paine to the board of trustees. One appointment fills the vacancy caused by the recent resignation of William L. Phillips, new ambassador to Italy.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

NOV

Atty. B. W. Warren Reelected President Boston Symphony

Atty. Bentley W. Warren of Boston and Williamstown, director of the Holyoke Water Power company, has been re-elected president of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Former Governor Alvan T. Fuller of Massachusetts was elected to the board of trustees of this institution last week.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

NOV 10 1936

Koussevitzky Is Made French Commander

Boston, Nov. 9.—(AP.)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced today receipt of notification through the French consulate here of his elevation to the rank of the commander of the French Legion of Honor.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMERICAN

NOV 10 1936

WINS FRENCH HONOR

BOSTON, Nov. 9 (AP).—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced today receipt of notification of his elevation to the rank of the commander of the French Legion of Honor.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 10 1936

France Honors Koussevitzky

BOSTON, Nov. 9 (AP).—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced today his receipt of the notification through the French Consulate here of his elevation to the rank of commander in the French Legion of Honor.

He

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The sixth regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Werner Josten was the guest conductor in his new symphony, which received its first performance on this occasion. The full program was as follows:

Concerto No. 1 from "The Four Seasons" ("Spring") edited Molinari......Vivaldi
"Gymnopedies," orchestrated by Debussy ......Satie
Scherzo in G minor from the Octet Op. 20 (arranged for orchestra by the composer) ....Mendelssohn
Symphony in F..................Josten
Symphony in D minor..............Franck

Yesterday's concert provided curious and interesting music before the familiar strains of the Franck Symphony sounded forth and the audience once more knew precisely its bearings. The Vivaldi Concerto has no doubt been to some extent modernized by Mr. Molinari. At all events it could hardly have sounded in its day as it did yesterday with the full string choir of the Boston Symphony to deal with its straightforward qualities. It is certainly and in this form a charming work, of buoyant freshness. We only doubt the advisability of the thunderous contrasts between the solo violins and the whole string orchestra.

Saties "Gymnopedies" are pieces of exquisite sensibility and a simplicity that borders on the precious. Their mood is perfectly explained by the idea in the program. They are somewhat warmer even in Debussy's restrained orchestration than they are in the bare chillness of the piano. Nor does Mendelssohn's Scherzo from the Octet require much comment. It is spontaneous and delightful music, Mendelssohn at his best. Perhaps these pleasing short works did not lead up suitably to the acerbities of Mr. Josten's score; but it is difficult to suggest works that would have done so any better.

Mr. Josten, as fits a distinguished teacher and musician, is in no doubt about the manner and form of his musical expression. The new Symphony is concise and to the point. Its form is clear and well defined. The trouble is that there is too much manner to too little matter. Mr. Josten writes in a dissonant harmonic idiom, persistently so. Somewhat in the manner of Hindemith he does so in an established classical form. But this symphony is both self-conscious and cerebral to a painful degree.

There is very little that sounds natural in this work, unless it is the functioning of a logical mind on musical material regardless (except for the instrumentation) of the effect in actual performance. Such attraction as the symphony has resides in the rather equare vigor of the fast movements. Even in the andante Mr. Josten is forced soon to fall back on this same device. It is a pity that so much intellectual ability should have gone to so little purpose into a symphony, which is in our opinion a barren work.

After the intermission Dr. Koussevitzky conducted a supreb performance of the Franck Symphony. Previously we had been shown—if any one needed to be shown—the excellence of the strings in the Vivaldi and the marvelous ensemble in the Mendelssohn. In the Franck we heard the orchestra at its most dramatic and most poignant.

Note on New Symphony by Werner Josten

Premiere to Be Given at the Week-End Concerts of Boston Orchestra

An important change of program for this week's Friday afternoon and Saturday evening symphony concerts replaces Cassela's edition of a Clementi Symphony with a considerably shorter work in the same form by Werner Josten, which will be conducted by its composer; and two shorter scores. One of these, the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's Octet, is familiar here in Mendelssohn's own orchestration which Koussevitzky will employ; the other, Debussy's arrangement for orchestra of two of Eric Satie's static and exquisite "Gymnopedies," needs only the reminder that the scholarly and witty Satie had the celebrated festival of ancient Sparta in mind, the Gymnopaedia, named for the dances of naked youths in honor of Apollo.

Mr. Josten's "Symphony in F," only recently completed, is being performed for the first time anywhere. The Boston orchestra has previously played other music of Mr. Josten, including his symphonic movement, "Jungle," and his Concerto Sacro.

Two germinating motives, heard throughout the three movements, form a fundamental theme of the whole symphony. The first of these, by far the more important, is composed of the ascending notes F, A-flat, B-flat, C; the second rises and falls through four more notes, E-flat, F, E-flat, C. The brief, energetic first movement is based almost wholly on the theme of the mottos which are constantly varied according to well established contrapuntal practices and precepts. The Andante is a rondo in B major at the end of which an extended transitional passage—allegro moderato—swells from pianissimo to fortissimo and introduces the Finale without pause. This third movement, mainly in F major, contributes the expected affirmation—both of man's struggle and man's motto theme. Writing in a consistently contemporary idiom, Professor Josten is formally reminiscent of Beethoven, harmonically of Stravinsky. Perhaps the two are not an odd pair.

Antonio Vivaldi's "Spring" Concerto which opens the program is the first of the little symphonic poems called "The Four Seasons" by their composer, who presumably supplied the sonnets that explain them. Lettered parts of the poems appear in the score at the beginning of the passages to which they apply. Here is program-music at an early and explicit stage—also at a highly poetic one. In it Vivaldi takes his place in a field that has been cultivated by Liszt and Strauss. But his illuminating accomplishment requires only an organ, cembalo, and strings. Molinari's edition of the work will be used at the first performance in Boston.

G. H. L. S.

Col. 11/20

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Symphony concerts last week dwelled in Olympian solitude with the genius of Gustav Mahler. For the concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening, they have descended to innocent pleasures of the valley, the newest of which is a Symphony in F by Werner Josten, conducted by the composer. Dr Koussevitzky begins the program with the descriptive concerto grosso called "Spring" out of the seasons cycle of four, by Vivaldi; continues with Debussy's orchestrations of the first and third "Gymnopedies" by Erik Satie, the orchestral version by Mendelssohn of the scherzo from his own Octet, Op 20, and concludes with the D minor Symphony of Cesar Franck.

These pieces of Satie and Mendelssohn might appear inconsequential for a Boston Symphony program, but further thought will uncover the fact that not only are they delightful, beautifully scored, but are in their way a test of virtuosity. Nothing less than a first-rank orchestra could make them sound as they did yesterday, with a luminous texture that fairly glowed. Mr Gillet's playing of the oboe solos in "Gymnopedies" was captivating. From beginning to end, the performances of Satie and Mendelssohn were governed by the utmost precision. As for Vivaldi, none but a grumpy cynic would deny the delicate craft involved in his naive but thoroughly charming depiction of gentle Spring and her birds, meadows and passing storms.

Mr Josten's work was played for the first time. Composed in the Summer just past, it lies in three movements, the second and third of which are connected. Two short motives form the basic substance, and stand as a sort of motto theme by which the composer evidently sets great store.

Mr Josten writes vigorous music which strides along under rhythmic impetus originated by Stravinsky, and which is partially characterized by a manner of writing for brass, reminiscent of Honegger. The harmonies, not unnaturally, are prevailingly dissonant, yet not without a show of simple chords. Like many another contemporary, Mr Josten has made no effort to obtain orchestral color; his choirs sound in blunt mass effects with little variety of timbre.

A number of academically interesting points may be found, although no single melodic or harmonic idea stands out in memory. It is the fashion of the times among composers to ignore emotional elements; Mr Josten has here offered no exceptions to the rule. In all probability this departure from emotional expression will prove to have been the greatest weakness of music written since the war. All masterpieces of the past, at least, have lived mainly by virtue of their emotional qualities, secondarily by the salience of their composers' thought.

This Symphony is cast in an idiom more general than personal, become thrice familiar in the past 10 years, and which is already old-fashioned. The music of Mendelssohn and Franck, flanking this score, seemed by comparison, to be new.

The lone Symphony of Franck used to be exceedingly popular, until it became hackneyed. At Symphony Hall it has been wisely retired for two years. Heard after a little rest, this distinctive masterpiece without equal among symphonies, exerts its familiar power.

Dr Koussevitzky's interpretation cannot be admired, because he consistently overplays it. Not only brass, but strings are forced at a sacrifice of pure tone and even of a texture which is really not opaque but marvelously transparent. Franck, by all accounts, was as far removed from the stormy temperament of the 19th century romantics as day from night. When attempts are made to dramatize his music, his essential qualities are lost.

Next week the orchestra goes to New York for its first visit of the season; the concerts in Symphony Hall, Nov 27 and 28, will be conducted by Richard Burgin. The program: Bach-Weiner: Toccata in C major; Hindemith: Symphony, "Mathis der Maler"; Kalinnikov: First Symphony.

C. W. D.

14/36

L
hestra t week e with
For ernoon escendhe vala Symn, con-Kousse-ith the called ycle of ith De-rst and Satie, endels-is own ith the Franck.
Men-equen-ogram, ver the elight-are in Nothchestra ey did exture
s playnnope-
m be-nces of e gov-
As for cynic ft in-oughly Spring assing ed for the three ird of short ance, heme ently
music thmic nsky, rized
brass,
The prethout many n has estral mass mbre.
inter-alharry. It mong ele-ffered n all emohave mu-mas-have emo-the ught.
idiom come ears, oned.
and emed anck
, un-
Symreter a stersym-wer.
ation con-only at a of a aque nck, oved
t of day are his s to the hony con-pron C
First

SYMPHONY PRESENTS NEW WORK

Josten's Symphony for First Time Composer Conducting

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Was it because he has recently been made a commander of the Legion of Honor that Dr. Koussevitzky placed on the programme of this week's Symphony concerts the Symphony of Franck and the "Gymnopedies" of Satie as orchestrated by Debussy? As a whole, however, this present list is more than usually cosmopolitan, for Franck, although claimed by France, was born a Belgian and among his other companions are an Italian, a German and a German-born American.

LIST TWICE REVISED

"Off again, on again" was the case with one item on this list, the Symphony in F of Werner Josten. After the original announcement that this latest score by the Smith professor was to receive its first performances at the concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening it was stated that the composer, who was to conduct his own work, was ill, and for his Symphony was substituted that of Clementi, described in these columns last Sunday. But apparently Mr. Josten made a speedy recovery.

This twice-revised list finally contains, besides the pieces already mentioned, the "Spring" Concerto from Vivaldi's "The Four Seasons" and the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's youthful Octet for Strings as later orchestrated by the composer.

Vivaldi's Concertos

These Concertos of Vivaldi have been edited by Bernardino Molinari, the distinguished Italian conductor, and the one entitled "Summer" was played here in 1928. Each is an example of programme-music in the early 18th century manner, with much captioning, as in the Biblical Sonatas of Kuhnau. This "Spring" Concerto is naive, but wholly charming. There is, in fact, a warmer, richer texture than in much music of the period, due, in part, to the use of such then daring keys as E major and C sharp minor. Neither Bach nor Handel would for a moment have denied his indebtedness to this gifted Italian.

The admirable performance of this Concerto for strings, organ and piano was followed by a no less felicitous presentation of the tenuous but distinctive music of Satie, which Debussy scored with infinite tact, and of the ebullient Scherzo of Mendelssohn, introduced to us in 1935 by Adrian Boult. Thus far yesterday's concert provided unalloyed enjoyment.

Josten's Symphony

The Symphony of Professor Josten, who as composer has been represented here by his "Concerto Sacro" and the very different "Jungle," begins promisingly, even arrestingly, and holds the attention firmly through the first and second movements and at least part of the third. Perhaps upon a second hearing this Finale would seem better integrated and sustained. Of late we have heard but little orchestral music in the acidulous modern idiom, and the immediate effect of this Symphony was tonic and refreshing. Professor Josten has ideas and the skill with which to employ them. There is even in the second movement a hint of sentiment and of richness, a considerable concession in these days of musical austerities.

As conductor, Professor Josten seemed to get exactly what he wanted, and we can be sure that his Symphony sounded as he wished to have it sound.

Theatricalizing Franck

We are not so sure in the case of the Symphony of Franck. Perhaps Dr. Koussevitzky is right and those who differ with him wrong, but it is possible to feel that the indispensable Franckian qualities are euphony and luminosity. They were present yesterday, of course, particularly in the slow movement. There was also roughness and turgidity and even blatancy, where the conductor yielded to the ever-present temptation to theatricalize the music. But it cannot be said that the audience seemed at all averse to such procedure.

At the end there was a storm of applause.

Miscellany and American Novelty to Fill a Program

Trans. ~~Nov. 14/36~~

Boston Orchestra Plays Werner Josten's New Symphony Under Composer for First Time

By Moses Smith

This week's symphony program was arrived at only after a couple of changes. The result, usually to be expected from such an unsettling and re-settling process, is not precisely a unified or smoothly constructed affair. In detail the list traverses the Vivaldi "Spring" Concerto, revised by Molinari; Satie's "Gymnopedies," orchestrated by Debussy; the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's Octet as the composer rearranged it for orchestra; Werner Josten's new Symphony in F, and the Cesar Franck Symphony in D minor.

On superficial inspection this program seems to afford Dr. Koussevitzky an opportunity for relative pause before his arduous first trip to New York next week, especially when it is noted that the new Symphony was conducted yesterday afternoon (and will be led this evening) by the composer. But considering the extraordinary music-making over which the conductor has presided since the beginning of the symphonic season a little more than a month ago, no one would begrudge him the respite. As it was he directed yesterday to each of the numbers which he presented, the same careful, searching and inspiring effort which he is wont to expend over a masterpiece or the first performance of an important score.

* * *

Actually the first performance on yesterday's program was not of Dr. Koussevitzky's preparation but of the composer's. This Symphony of Mr. Josten is in three movements and is short. The middle movement is slow in pace; the other two movements brisk. There is no pause between the second and third movements, but, instead, a bridge-like passage which bears certain remarkable resemblances to the similarly placed section between the last two movements of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The resemblance is principally in method—a great orchestral swell from very quiet to very loud—and in mood, so far as the latter could be accurately determined at first hearing.

Mr. Josten seemed to be a competent conductor. The musicians under him are certainly a more-than-competent band. Therefore whatever faults the new work seemed to possess were inherent in it and were not due to the quality of performance, which seemed very good. These faults are principally structural. The composer implants his thematic material clearly and even strikingly. There is also evidence of some fertility of imagination in the process of developing the themes by the usual processes of repetition, imitation, inversion, polyphonic combination and so forth. But the movements as a whole lack balance and unity; tend to be episodic in character.

This is the more remarkable since the composer cultivates the contemporary fashion of brevity. Several times, at yesterday's performance, the music seemed to lose its way, most often at a time when an arresting passage had led the listener to await a more happy resolution. And there are some fine things in the Symphony. One of the best is the combination of the two main themes (which serve as mottoes for the Symphony) near the end of the first movement, when both are reiterated several times, one in more or less original form, the other inverted.

At the risk of being obvious, I must make the usual reservation about the futility of disposing of a work written in contemporary idiom at a single hearing (even though one is no longer stultified by the sound of one chord-block piled on another). Yesterday's audience, which was responsible for its opinion to none but itself, liked the piece rather more than might have been expected, and applauded the composer heartily.

* * *

The episodic character of the first part of yesterday's concert was not conducive to warmth of applause. And so, although the performances of the first three numbers under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction were characteristic and finely shaded, the response of the audience was relatively lethargic. The Mendelssohn Scherzo was presented with the delicacy of a light puff of wind. Even more gratifying was the orchestral fineness in the performance of the flavorsome music of Satie, exquisitely polished and dressed in the sensitive instrumentation of Debussy. The noble periods of Vivaldi were delivered with appropriate breadth; even to much breadth on occasion, it seemed, though the conductor was much more fortunate here than he has been in one or two of his Handelian excursions.

As to the Symphony by Franck, Dr. Koussevitzky—and his men at his call—brought about a performance of such intensity and splendor as might have been lavished on a new work, "first time." It was the sort of playing, I suppose, that the Symphony must have to exercise its hold these days even in, say, biennial performance. For it must be remembered that each hearing in the concert-hall must inevitably be multiplied by an indeterminate ratio due to auditions from the radio, to which one is subjected almost willy-nilly.

I wonder whether it is worth while lavishing all these pains and energy on the piece at this stage; whether it might not better be placed on the shelf for a few years at least. For if yesterday's performance was what the work "deserved" (and I express no doubt that it was), then the Symphony is too overwrought to hold its place in the affections of a more direct public. The music exhibits the composer rather too much with his heart on his sleeve; it has more than a suggestion of hysteria and—even worse—of a whine.

But here, too, I had perhaps small company yesterday, since the audience applauded at the end of the performance with the customary warmth.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

AFTER undergoing several alterations, the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's sixth pair of concerts (Nov. 13-14) finally appeared as follows: Vivaldi, "La Primavera," Concerto No. 1, from "The Four Seasons," edited by Bernardino Molinari; Satie, "Gymnopédies," orchestrated by Debussy; Mendelssohn, Scherzo in G minor from the Octet, op. 20, arranged for orchestra by the composer; Josten, Symphony in F; Franck, Symphony in D minor.

The Vivaldi item had its first performance at these concerts, and the Josten Symphony its first hearing anywhere. Commander Koussevitzky conducted except in the Josten Symphony, which was introduced by its composer.

Mr. Josten is professor of music at Smith College in Northampton, Mass., where he has attracted attention by his revivals of operas by Monteverdi and Handel. Two other works of his, "Jungle," and a Concerto Sacro for string orchestra and piano, have been played at concerts of the Boston orchestra.

This Symphony in F is built on a theme consisting of two motifs of four notes each. It is a short work in three movements, the first and last in sonata form and the middle one in rondo form. In style it is related to the composer's Concerto Sacro; that is, it imposes modernist harmonies and rhythms upon a classic form. It is, of course, clearly designed and competently made, by a light which seems to have been cast by the study lamp rather than by the fire of inspiration.

Satie's study lamp burned in distant and different surroundings, but it was still a study lamp. Its odor was apparent after the fresh breeze of Vivaldi's inspiration, just as that of Mr. Josten's wick was after Mendelssohn. Vivaldi's imagery may seem naïve to us today, but there can be no question of his originality. These pages of his contain music of an exquisite loveliness. We may say that Satie is to him as Louis David to Duccio.

Dr. Koussevitzky succeeded again in revitalizing the Franck Symphony. It is really extraordinary how his emotional, dramatic readings keep it alive. He rules out sentimentality, plays up the strong points, enhances the passages of mystery and wonder. The orchestra played gloriously for him in this as in the earlier numbers. The string tone in particular sounds more marvelous than ever after hearing string choirs less full-bodied and glowing.

L. A. S.

Symphony's Program

Ame nov 14

By RUTH MARSTERS

The illuminating performance of a varied program composed of works new and old, familiar and unfamiliar, made the Boston Symphony concert conducted by Serge Koussevitzky yesterday afternoon one long to be remembered.

The audience was immediately captivated at the outset by the performance of Vivaldi's Concerto No. 1, "La Primavera" (Spring) from "The Four Seasons" edited by Bernadino Molinari.

Unheard previously at these concerts, this music proved utterly delightful. The naive explicitness with which Vivaldi depicts the spring countryside is peculiarly refreshing. The music has a youthful charm and bubbling spontaneity that makes the present age look a little weary in comparison.

Eric Satie's "Gymnopedies," orchestrated by Debussy, followed in a sheerly breathtaking performance; its subtle perfume and the veiled visions it evokes in direct contrast to the sparkling lucidity of the Vivaldi.

Mendelssohn's Scherzo in G minor from the Octet, op. 20, was given a welcome performance.

The first half of the program was ended on the contemporary note—Werner Josten conducting the first performance of his new Symphony in F.

The Symphony is conventional in form, the first and third movements, Allegro vivace and Allegro giusto respectively, follow the sonata-allegro form; the second movement, Andante, the rondo form.

Individual traits appear in tonality and rhythm, the former sometimes obscure, the latter always vigorous. The music is straightforward, somewhat didactic, not always interesting.

Mr. Josten was well received.

NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

A Visiting Critic at The Symphony

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

WHEN the out-of-town critic attends a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, particularly a Friday matinée, the hall and the audience becomes for him a part of the show. In its issue of Oct. 25, Musical America features the opening of the symphony season in Philadelphia, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago and Boston. To Symphony Hall came Oscar Thompson, editor of the magazine and one of the ablest of American critics as well.

Mr. Thompson thinks the Boston symphony sounds better in Symphony Hall than in Carnegie Hall: "The ensemble and the structure are attuned, one to the other . . ." And for him here "the audiences remain distinctive . . . perhaps the best mannered to be encountered anywhere in America. For one thing," he adds, "they do not litter the steps and foyer with ticket envelopes and other bits of paper." But for all their good manners, he does not find them cold.

The "rush line" and the provision for feeding its numbers interested this visitor. He noted that some brought their own refreshment, but that most of the "rushers" made use of the lunch service in the hall, and he found that the whole proceeding was "handled in such a manner that those who arrive later will never know that there has been a rush line and that a considerable sum total of appetite has been appeased."

There follows then a discussion of the concert itself, mostly in terms of the highest praise. Mr. Thompson found Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony a bit too nervously intense, although he admitted that the performance had virtuoso elements of a striking character. For the performances of Haydn's Symphony in B-flat and Debussy's "La Mer" he had only the warmest commendation.

Koussevitzky Gets French Honors

Monitor, Nov. 10/36

The cross of Commander of the French Legion of Honor was awarded to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at a luncheon today, at the Hotel Touraine, sponsored by the New England Committee of the Franco-American Committee of the 1937 International Exhibition in Paris. The presentation was made by M. Francois de Tessan, French under secretary of state.

In a speech accompanying the presentation, M. de Tessan dwelt on the cultural and historical ties which bind the United States and France. He called the reciprocal trade treaties of President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Cordell Hull "the greatest single contribution toward world recovery and prosperity."

Enlarging on the subject of economic relationships between the two nations, M. de Tessan reminded Americans of the Paris World's Fair next year and expressed the hope that America would be conspicuously present at that exposition. In turn, he said, France "will gratefully and enthusiastically receive your invitation to participate in the marvelous and beautiful world's fair which your country is preparing for 1939."

FRENCH HO

Symphony Cond

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today became one of the few persons in the world to be honored as a Commander of the Legion of Honor by the French government.

In fitting ceremonies at a banquet at Hotel Touraine under the auspices of the Franco-American committee of Boston, Koussevitzky was given the ivory and gold star and the scarlet silk "cravat" of the citation.

Francois de Tessan, French under-secretary of state, made the presentation and described it as the "highest honor within the gift of France."

American Nov. 11/36

In making the presentation to the symphony conductor whom he termed "universally known," de Tassan said:

"Because of his eminence in music as an artist and interpreter, France delights in honoring those who have distinguished themselves not only within her own borders but outside them, in art, literature or science."

IMPORTANT CHANGE IN SYMPHONY PROGRAM

An important change has been announced in the first half of the program of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the concert this week on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The Cesar Franck Symphony in D minor will be played as announced in the second half of the program, and the Vivaldi Concerto, "Spring," will open the concert. Werner Josten, head of the music department at Smith College and well-known American composer, will conduct the first performance anywhere of his symphony in F. Two short works will be led by Dr. Koussevitzky also in this part of the program. They are Erik Satie's "Gymnopedies," in the orchestration by Debussy, and Mendelssohn's Scherzo in C minor from the Octet, in the orchestral version by the composer.

McCORMACK SINGS AT SYMPHONY TONIGHT

Tonight John McCormack makes his first appearance in two years when he sings in Symphony Hall. He will be assisted by Edwin Schneider who has been closely associated with the noted Irish tenor for many years. Tonight's engagement is announced as Mr. McCormack's only appearance in this city during the current season. Mr. McCormack's tour brings him to the Pacific coast. Many Irish folk songs are included in the attractive program for this evening.

5

Symphony in Gayest Mood

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

THE PROGRAM of the sixth regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening proved in performance an unmitigated success—whether one measures from the viewpoint or popular acclaim of artistic achievement.

Certainly there was to be found in the music presented that which could not but suit a variety of tastes. The calibre of performance would have commanded the attention of the most unsympathetic of listeners—had there been any.

The Vivaldi Concerto "La Primavera" (Spring) from the "Four Seasons" edited by Bernardino Molinari, which opened the program, had not previously been performed at these concerts.

It is utterly captivating music—naive with a charm that never cloys—as fresh as a spring freshet—as sparkling and as irresistibly buoyant.

Richard Burgin's playing of the solo violin passages, "dolce, expressive" in the gentle Largo which depicts the goatherd asleep with his faithful dog at his side "on the flowery meadow, amidst the rustling of leaves and plants," was all that could be desired.

* * *

IT WAS immediately obvious at the opening of the allegro that the orchestra was in top form—and so it continued throughout the afternoon's performance.

It is a long step from the poetry of Vivaldi to that of Eric Satie, Debussy-ized in the orchestration of "Gymnopedies"—the first with its objective concern with the painting of scenic details, the second with its preoccupation with essence distilled through the subjective mood it creates. (This despite the fact that the impudent Satie has been known to write music of which his expressed intention was to portray a lobster weeping.)

In "Gymnopedies" the atmosphere of the ancient Spartan ritual is so subtly evoked that one is ready to believe the nebulous waves of music have risen directly from the incense offered before the gods. Debussy's orchestration without doubt does much to enhance the piano music of Satie.

* * *

MENDELSSOHN'S Scherzo in G minor from the Octet, Op. 20 followed; music of happy airy grace performed with the same lightness and delicacy that made the Vivaldi memorable.

Directly preceding the intermission, Werner Josten took up the baton to conduct the first performance of his new Symphony in F, composed last summer in the wilds of Jaffrey, New Hampshire.

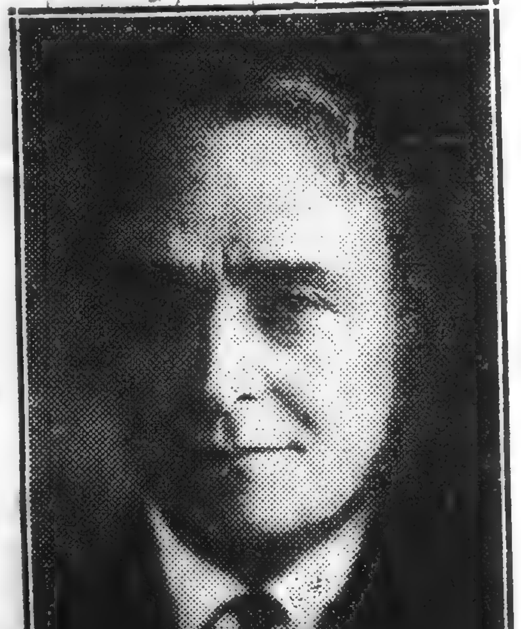
Written in three movements: Allegro vivace, Andante, and Allegro giusto, the Symphony departs from convention in tonality and rythmn rather than in form. (The first and third movements utilize the sonata-allegro form, the second the rondo form.) It is immensely straightforward music—the rhythms energizing—the whole possessed of tremendous vigour. A slightly barbaric tinge becomes especially predominant in the transition leading from the second to the third movements.

Mr. Josten was given a cordial reception.

The last half of the program brought Caesar Franck's beloved Symphony in D minor, climaxing all that had preceded it. There can be no question as to this music's wearing well, and it was given such a performance as to warrant the roar of applause that followed it.

Dr. Koussevitzky took the Allegro ma non troppo of both the first and the last movement at a rather livelier pace than in previous performances. The whole had that spontaneous surge, however, which alone imparts glowing vitality to the recreation of a master work, and which with the beauty and sonority of tone made the performance unforgettable.

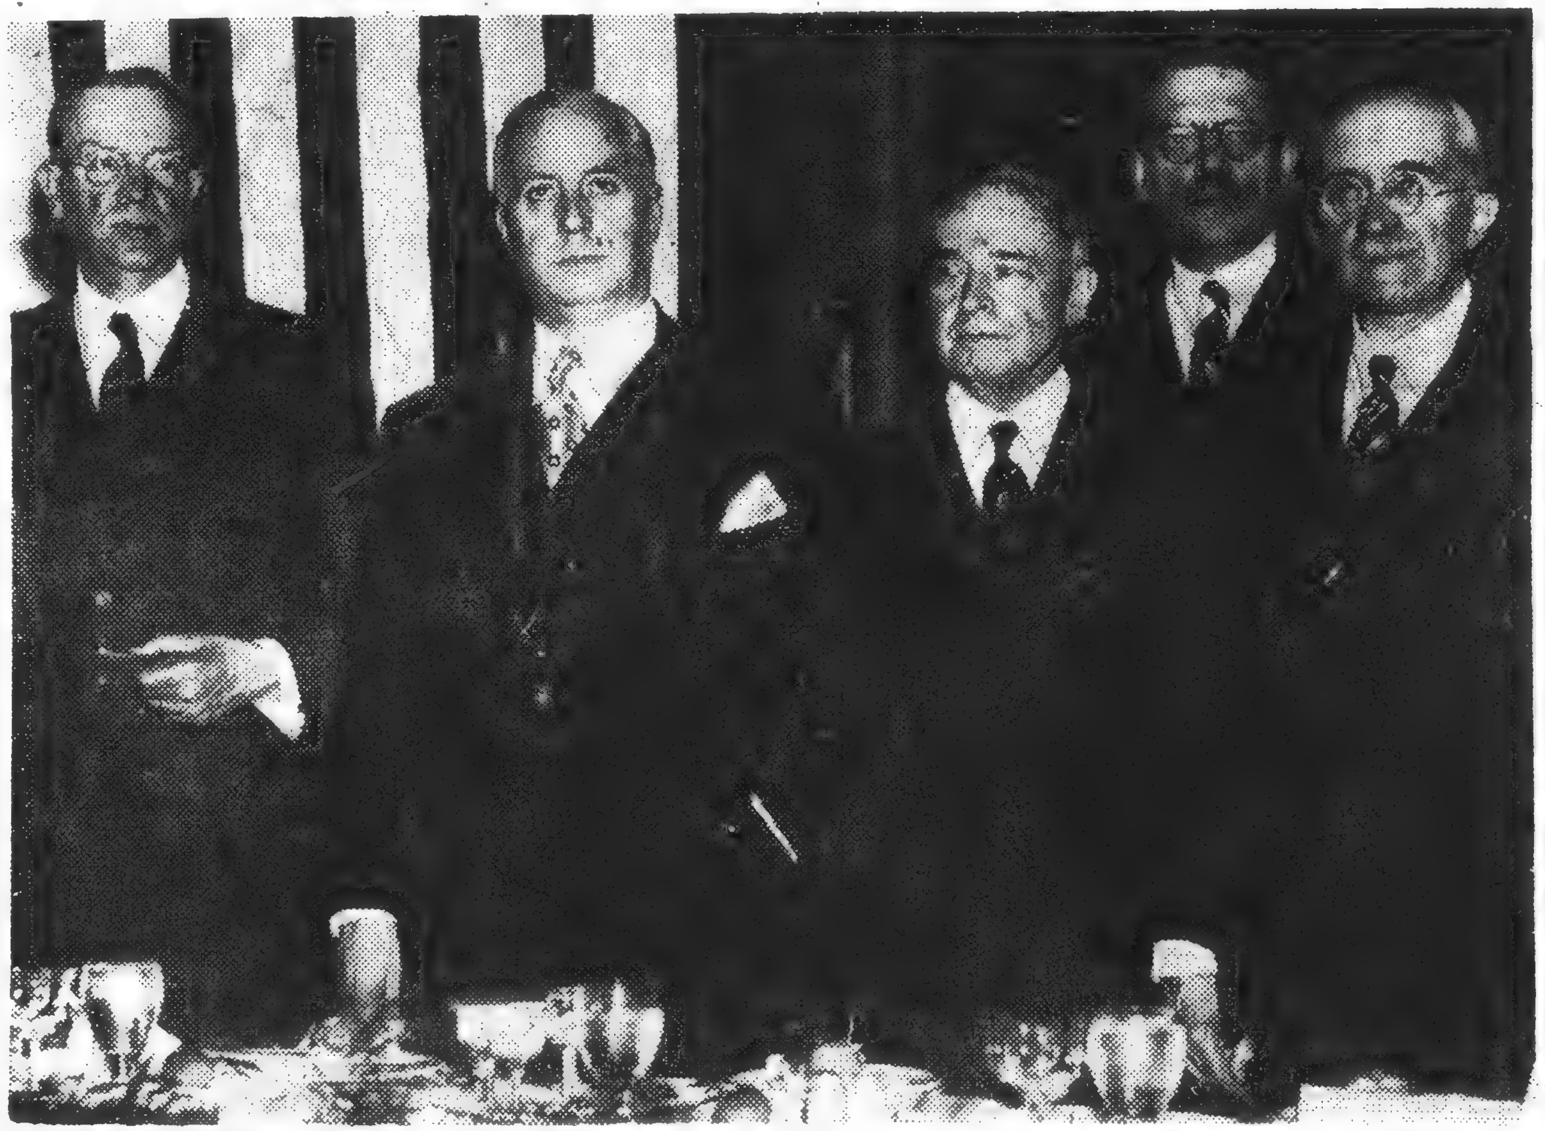
Honored by France



Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

Wed., Nov. 11/36

FRENCH ENVOY HONORED HERE



Francois de Tessan, French under-secretary of state, was guest of honor at a luncheon in the Hotel Touraine yesterday. Left to right: Mayor Mansfield, M. de Tessan; Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who was presented the cravat of commander of the Legion of Honor; Jacques Greber, and Prof. Andre Morize of Harvard.

U. S. IS LAUDED FOR TRADE PACT

Dr. Koussevitzky Given French Decoration at Meeting Here

President Roosevelt's policy of reciprocal trade agreements was termed the "greatest single contribution toward world recovery and prosperity," by Francois de Tessan, French under-secretary of state, at a luncheon in his honor at the Hotel Touraine yesterday.

The meeting, sponsored by the New England branch of the American committee of the 1937 International Exhibition in Paris, was featured by the presentation to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of the cravat of commander of the Legion of Honor, "the highest honor within the gift of the French nation."

Characterizing Dr. Koussevitzky "a great musician," universally known," M. de Tessan kissed the conductor on both cheeks and pinned about his neck the wide scarlet ribbon and medal designating the honor which had been conferred upon him.

"France likes to honor renowned artists all over the world," he said, "and in the name of the government of the republic, as a recompense for what you have done for art, I have the honor to confer upon you the cravat of commander of the Legion of Honor."

The luncheon proved to be a gathering of leading French citizens in Boston and of prominent Boston business men whose work has affiliated them in one way or another with the French government.

Prof. Andre Morize of Harvard was toastmaster, and seated with him at the head table were Eliot Wadsworth, president of the Boston Chamber of Commerce; E. Vezima, secretary of the St. Jean de Baptiste Society; Dr. and Mrs. Richard Strong; Allan Forbes, president of the State Street Trust Company, and Mrs. Forbes; Dr. and Mrs. Homer Gage of Worcester; Pierre Claudel, son of the former ambassador to the United States, and Mme. Claudel; Dr. and Mrs. Koussevitzky; Jean E. Maigret, French consul in Boston; Jacques Greber, architect of the exposition; Mayor Mansfield; H. A. Highman, secretary of the exposition and resident manager here of the French Line; Herbert Stone, vice-president of the Second National Bank of Boston, and K. Ledoux.

In his address, M. de Tessan stressed the bond that exists between Paris and Boston as seats of major revolutions in the history of the world.

He cited as steps toward the cementing of this bond, the reciprocal tariff and the monetary agreement reached last month by France and the United States.

"The Blum cabinet," he declared, "is convinced that France should not be a self-contained nation, should not lock herself behind a wall of economic nationalism.

"It should remain the eternal pride of your democracy that the enlightened leadership of President Roosevelt and his secretary of state, Cordell Hull, inaugurated a courageous policy of reciprocal trade agreements; they reopened channels of international trade. This was the greatest single contribution toward world recovery and prosperity.

"This trade agreement has already proven to be to the mutual advantage of both countries. It was the first agreement of its kind signed by the United States with one of the great European powers. It sets an example to the other lands of the world."

The Paris exposition, he explained, will afford a "synthesis of all the refinements and all the perfection of our great mechanical age."

A detailed description of the exposition was given by M. Greber, who told of the 250 acres which have been set aside for the fair, the night illuminations over the Seine and the participation by the various nations.

Mayor Mansfield extended a cordial welcome to the visiting Frenchmen.

"THANK YOU, SIR!"—says Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, as he receives the cravat of commander of Legion of Honor from Francois de Tessan, French under-secretary of state, at the Hotel Touraine

---

Dr. Koussevitzky Puts Music Above Insignia of Honor

Boston Still Holds Symphony Leader Is Foremost Among Great Conductors

First, of course, there is Toscanini. After that anybody can make his own choice of great symphonic conductors. Some say Stokowski, some are beginning to say Ormandy. Boston says Koussevitzky and has stuck to it for twelve years.

And now the Republic of France has made him Commander of the Legion of Honor. Possibly (but not probably, unless he has changed from the old days) he will wear his red ribbon now and again in Symphony Hall.

Koussevitzky sets not much store by the insignia of honor, nor by much else unless it be great music and a fine performance of music. Boston was a little upset when he took over the orchestra in 1924, dismissed many of the old personnel and replaced them with young blood. But Boston realized that it was he who made its orchestra once more a rival of the New York Philharmonic. Now he is a member of the Somerset Club.

Very few conductors in this world can do better by Sibelius and Stravinsky than Boston's conductor does. Koussevitzky himself has said more than once that the greatest music ever written is the first part of Beethoven's Ninth, and that the entire symphony is unsurpassed.

When he says things like that it is with a manner that tolerates no dispute. It must have been something of the same manner that he used to the new rulers of Soviet Russia in 1918 when they refused him permission to leave the country.

"You cannot leave," they told him. "Russia needs your music."

And Koussevitzky, who made no effort to conceal his contempt for the proletarian rule, replied that if he must stay he would retire from music and never play nor conduct another note in Russia. They let him go.

"I left," he said long afterward, "because of Lenin and Trotsky and the terrible things they did. I had a million dollars and they took it from me."

He had made his money as an artist. From boyhood he was master of the bull fiddle. He could, and can, draw from that deep-throated box music as sympathetic as Kreisler charms from the violin.

It was with the bass viol that he wooed Natalya Konstantinovna Ushkova. He saw her in the audience as he played a concert in Moscow. Their eyes met and he played (so he said afterward) to her alone. Two years later, in 1905, they were married. If you know where to look in Symphony Hall you may see her there some evening. She sits in the balcony by choice.

But Koussevitzky put away his bass viol in 1909. His wife helped him form an orchestra of his own, and in that first year as conductor he toured the Volga in a boat with eighty-five musicians, travelling 2300 miles and establishing his reputation.

Long after he had made Boston his home (he also has a place to live in Paris) he confessed that his first rehearsal here baffled him. Once he had recovered from his amazement to find his men smoking at rehearsal he banned smoking as "disrespectful to art." It was soon after that that dismissals began.

"If you want to sleep, go home and sleep," he told one veteran of the orchestra. At the next rehearsal there was another new man.

His art has been recognized in many quarters.

Election as Commander of the French Legion is only the latest of instances in which his art has been recognized in far places. Spain and England and Italy and Germany have decorated him. The Czar of Russia paid him honor. In 1929 Harvard University conferred upon him the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws.

vitzky
Above Honor

Symphony st Among ctors is Toscanini.

n make his phonic con-kowski, some rmandy. Bos-nd has stuck ic of France

nder of the bly (but not as changed will wear his ain in Sym-

much store nor, nor by great music
e of music.
et when he in 1924, disersonnel and g blood. But was he who more a rival rmonic. Now merset Club.
n this world
s and Straductor does.
has said
the great-is the first h, and that nsurpassed.
like that it tolerates no
been some-ner that he Soviet Rusrefused him
country.
ey told him.

o made no ntempt for plied that if retire from nor conduct
They let afterward, Trotsky and

did. I had hey took it

y as an arts master of d, and can,
reated box
as Kreisler

lot that he nevna Ush-
e audience in Moscow.
ayed (so he lone. Two were mar-to look in y see her sits in the away his wife helped ra of his ear as con-

a in a boat
, travelling
ng his rep-

Boston his e to live in t his first
n. Once he amazement t rehearsal isrespectful r that that home and ran of the rehearsal an. ognized in er of the e latest of t has been Spain and Germany

e Czar of 1929 Harpon him
Doctor of

Koussevitsky Awarded Highest French Honor

The cravat of commander of the Legion of Honor was formally bestowed on Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at noon today by M. Francois de Tessan, under secretary of state to the French government, after an address during which the French diplomat declared that the "enlightened leadership of President Roosevelt and his secretary of state, Cordell Hull," averted the calamity of a dire general economic war.

At a luncheon in the Renaissance room of the Hotel Touraine, attended by more than 300 distinguished scholars, bankers, leaders of business and cultural organizations, M. de Tessan clasped the scarlet ribbon and medal of the French decoration about the throat of Conductor Koussevitsky and sealed the presentation with kisses on both cheeks of the flushed and silent musician.

"In the name of the government of the republic, as recompense for what you have done, I have the honor of conferring the cravat of commander of the Legion of Honor," he recited in the official French phrases for such important occasions.

The principal address was supplemented by talks by M. Jacques Graber, architect for the 1937 Exposition Internationale in Paris, who said the French are trying to emulate the success of American industrial designers; by Prof. Andre Morize of Harvard University, toastmaster; by M. Jean-Etienne Maigret, French consul in Boston, and by Mayor Mansfield, who welcomed the distinguished visitors.

Among those at the head table were Eliot Wadsworth, president of the Boston Chamber of Commerce; Herbert Stone, vice-president of the Second National Bank; Mrs. Allan Forbes, wife of the president of the State Street Trust; Dr. Homer Gage and Mrs. Gage, of Worcester, noted philanthropists who have been themselves honored for their aid to French children after the war, and Pierre Claudel, son of former Ambassador Paul Claudel, with Mrs. Pierre Claudel.

PRAISES SECRETARY HULL

M. de Tessan, citing with gratitude the Hull reciprocal trade agreements as "the greatest single contribution toward world recovery and prosperity," pledged that:

"The present French government, presided over by a man of such intellectual distinction and animated by such human generosity as M. Leon Blum, is disposed to spare no effort to help in bringing about closer co-operation among the nations of the world.

"The Blum cabinet is convinced that France should not be a self-contained nation; should not lock herself behind a wall of economic nationalism. It feels that these barriers of trade create hatred, and that, on the contrary, a spirit of international co-operation should be fostered."

It is because France feels her responsibility to the nations of the world, he went on, that she has "adjusted the value of the franc . . . to re-establish an equilibrium between her internal prices and world prices." By lowering customs' tariffs by 15 to 20 per cent., he said, "France extends a frank invitation to other nations to act in an identical manner."

He repeated the invitation of France to all nations to take part in the 1937 exposition, promising that the fair will leaave nothing undone, nothing unsatisfied."

In a brief reference to the exchange of French professors with Harvard, the visitor said that "you have a permanent staff in your university of the elitte of our French professors."

The luncheon was arranged by the Franco-American committee of Boston for the 1937 exposition.

LEGION OF HONOR AWA

A trio pictured from the head table at the Franco-A mittee's luncheon today, at which M. Francois de Tessan, u of state of France (pictured at extreme left), awarded commander of the Legion of Honor to Dr. Serge Kous Andre Morize of Harvard University, toastmaster, is in Jacques Greber, internationally known architect, is at right.

HERE TO HONOR SYMPHONY LEADER

Francois de Tessan, left, and Jacques Greber, right, French statesman and architect, who will attend a luncheon at the Touraine Hotel at noon; when Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be decorated by the French government.

French Decoration to Be Given Today to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

Francois de Tessan, French under secretary of state, will present the cravat of commander of the Legion of Honor to Dr. Serge Kousevitsky, conducter of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at a luncheon in the Touraine at noon today.

M. de Tessan, also the editor of a European daily, arrived in Boston last night in company with Jacques Graber, city planner and architect in charge of the 1937 Exposition Internationale in Paris. They came from New York where they took part in the rededication of the Statue of Liberty.

Dr. Koussevitsky was chosen for the award, M. de Tessan said, because France recognizes his eminence in the world of music as equal in importance to that of artists outstanding in European cultural history.

M. de Tessan declared France rejoiced that the United States under the leadership of President Roosevelt was furnishing stimulation to liberal and democratic programs throughout the world.

ROOSEVELT AND BLUM

He compared the New Deal with the Leon Blum presidential program in France and said they were practically identical in ideals. Blum, he added, looked to Roosevelt for leadership, and all France sincerely hoped the United States would take the initiative in establishing world peace.

While insisting that the United States and French situations were similar in many ways, M. de Tessan said the one important difference was that France was handicapped in national security.

"You people over here," he explained, "have kindly, peaceful neighbors like the Canadians; but we in France have Spain on one side and Germany on the other. Peace of mind and confidence in security are impossible. We are compelled to look to our defense constantly."

SPANISH REBELLION

Mr. de Tessan expressed alarm at the violence of the Spanish rebellion, but said France could not hope to intervene unless Great Britain acted concurrently.

Today's luncheon, sponsored by the Franco-American committee of the 1937 international exhibition in Paris, will be attended by more than 300 persons, including a long list of Boston notables headed by Mayor Mansfield.

Besides M. de Tessan and M. Greber, the speakers will include Jean E. Maigret, French consul in Boston. M. Grever, who has been in America as the guest of the Franco-American committee, is the special representative of Edmund Labee, general commissioner of the Paris exhibition. He is famous in America as the planner of Fairmont park in Philadelphia and the architect of a number of estates in Florida and California.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

8 -1936

BEHIND THE SCENES

Boston Symphony Returns to the Air on Nov. 19—Town Meetings to Be Resumed as Public Forum.

FREQUENTLY radio is accused of spreading rumors. When the broadcasters investigate they generally find that listeners tuned-in after the program started or heard only a few words which they interpreted incorrectly because they missed what went ahead.

During a recent "Folio of Facts" broadcast from WOL, Washington, which was also handled by WMCA, New York, the announcer said:

"During the Battle of Jutland on May 31, 1916, two British cruisers, the Indefatigable and the Queen Mary, were sunk with 22,077 men within twenty minutes after the firing had started."

Within an hour more than 300 phone calls were received at WMCA. Listeners who heard, "the Indefatigable and Queen Mary were sunk with 22,077 men," rushed to inquire whether the new queen of the seas, H. M. S. Queen Mary, had met with disaster.

About Programs and People

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will return to the air on Nov. 19. Instead of broadcasting the entire series from Boston as in previous seasons, the orchestra will be heard in four Carnegie Hall concerts in New York; three from Sanders Theatre at Harvard University in Cambridge; three from Symphony Hall, Boston, and one from the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Nine of the "Pop" concerts in Boston also will be broadcast in May.

The twelve broadcasts scheduled during the orchestra's regular season will all be on Thursday evenings, except the three programs from Boston, which will be Thursday matinees. All twenty-one concerts will be presented over WJZ's coast-to-coast network.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
NOV 7 - 1936

60.

Music and Musicians

By W. J. HENDERSON

IT would be difficult to repress comment on the opening of the season of orchestral concerts. So let us take the easiest way. It is too soon to form any settled opinion of the conducting of John Barbiroli, the first of the Philharmonic-Syhphony Society's series of directors. He made his debut Thursday evening and the customary report of the concert appeared in the columns of The Sun. The description of his conducting summarized first impressions. There will be abundant time in which to give him more searching scrutiny. In his utterances immediately after arriving here he deprecated attempts to put him in the position of a successor to Toscanini. Unfortunately concertgoers will make comparisons. The Philharmonic set up a standard and a standard bearer.

But there is a more serious matter to be considered and the artistic results of the season will have to be the basis for the formation of an opinion on the subject. Regret has several times been expressed in this place that the Philharmonic is not under the direction of a single permanent conductor. It is the conviction of this observer, derived from long years of observation, that frequent change of directorship cannot work for the good of any orchestra.

When Wilhelm Gericke was the conductor of the Boston organization many music lovers shook their heads at his repressive methods. He shunned tempestuous performances and labored incessantly for perfection of finish. Consequently he was charged with a want of virility. But the answer was the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at that time, was unrivaled in tonal richness, clarity, balance, dignity of style and flawlessness of technic. It is true that he was not the first of its captains. But we may set aside George Henschel, who did the pioneer work of organization and clearing the ground. Gericke, who followed him, transformed a rather rough structure into an ornate edifice and paved the way for the brilliant achievements of Nikisch, one of the greatest conductors in orchestral history.

Nikisch was succeeded by Gericke, brought back to continue the work he had so well begun. After him the orchestra has had three important conductors, Muck, Monteux and Koussevitzky. Each of these was in sole command; there was no series of guests. If music lovers seek the secret of the splendor of tone and high level of finish which characterize performances of the great Boston organization let them ponder the advantages of following the artistic ideals of one mind.

* * * *

The Permanent Conductor.

THE writer has not had the good fortune to hear the Chicago Orchestra for some years, but reports of competent observers tell us that it is one of the great orchestras of this country—and that means, of the world. For Europe, to which so many music lovers hasten in the summer, and which they accept as always our superior, does not overshadow us in the field of orchestral music. Since the death of Theodore Thomas the Chicago institution has had just one director, Frederick Stock. Thirty years of lofty, artistic achievement are accredited to this master of the baton and the city of Chicago l to him and his men with sound financial support.
ıdelphia Orchestra reached its zenith of fame under the of Leopold Stokowski. It has not always maintained its der visiting directors. Its fortunes in the immediate closely watched. Eugene Ormandy is a highly talented viding he is given a free hand, can be counted on to keep ians in the front rank. Perhaps there is a foundation tent reports that the organization wavers under the f a multitude of counsels. But this is a condition which confronts every orchestra governed by a board of directors and the inevitable and very active auxiliaries.

The death of Ossip Gabrilowitsch deprived the Detroit Orchestra of the knowledge, experience and enthusiasm of a truly great musician. His position has been given to a gentleman from Italy, a competent wielder of the baton, but little known to American music lovers outside of Detroit. The writer would have been happier if a young American could have been found to succeed Mr. Gabrilowitsch, but American conductors seem to be hidden behind the shadows of celebrities from overseas. Is it incontestable that no American has a gift for conducting?

We should not like to believe that. It must be confessed that in music this country has not yet attained to the same level that it has in literature, painting and sculpture, but it would be difficult to determine exactly the reasons. One thing is certain, namely, that the development of native conductors will not be advanced by importation. It would probably be of immense benefit to the art if more young Americans were tried out as conductors of orchestras in the smaller towns in which they might earn permanent places and grow up with their bands and their publics.

Chicago Has the Secret.

TO return to the Philharmonic: Are we to suppose that the directors have in mind the possibility of discovering among their importations some one who can be engaged as permanent conductor? Let us hope that some such result will be brought about. Then perhaps these directors may find it to the advantage of their orchestras to try to focus public attention on the excellence of the orchestra itself and the beauty of the music which it performs. Alas, this last item involves doubt. Where is this music? Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart, Schumann—are we fated to dwell forever in the past or must we prostrate ourselves before the altars of Alban Berg and his kind?

Well, perhaps we would better postpone the music question and concentrate on orchestra and conductor. Since there seems to be a vast cloud of doubt obscuring the minds of the gods of local art, why would it not be a good idea to appoint an investigating committee to go out to Chicago and find out how they do the thing there? According to Olin Downes, who recently made a traveling survey of the orchestral field in the eastern half of the country, the Chicago Orchestra is self-supporting. A visiting committee might be commended for addressing the Chicago backers in the language of the people: "How do you get that way?"

It is not the business of reviewer of musical activities to formulate plans of management. But in the course of years one becomes satisfied that the sovereign people dearly loves a hero. And it does not express itself in the language of "Don Juan": "I want a hero, an uncommon want, since every day brings forth a new one." Year after year the musical public prostrates itself at the feet of Kreisler, Rachmaninoff, Hofmann and a dozen other favorites. It went to the opera season after season to acclaim Caruso. It goes now to bestow the blessings of its applause on Flagstad. When Anton Seidl was the conductor of the old Philharmonic he was regarded as sui generis. In Brooklyn there was a Seidl Society which apparently thought that he was the god of things as they ought to be.

The winter will provide arguments pro and con. All we actually know at present is that when the Philharmonic had Toscanini and several other conductors the box office waxed fat for only one of them, and for the others became almost as bare as Mother Hubbard's celebrated cupboard.

vitzky
Above Honor

Symphony
st Among ctors

e is Toscanini.
an make his mphonic conokowski, some rmandy. Bosand has stuck

lic of France
nder of the bly (but not as changed will wear his ain in Sym-

much store or, nor by great music ce of music.
et when he
in 1924, disersonnel and g blood. But was he who more a rival monic. Now merset Club.
this world and Straductor does.
has said
the great-the first th, and that unsurpassed.
like that it tolerates no
been some-ner that he Soviet Rusrefused him country.
ey told him.

made no ontempt for plied that if etire from nor conduct
They let afterward, Trotsky and

did. I had hey took it as an art-master of d, and can,

oated box
as Kreisler

viol that he ovna Ushaudience in Moscow.
ayed (so he alone. Two were mar-to look in ay see her sits in the away his wife helped of his ar as con-in a boat travelling g his rep-

Boston his to live in his first Once he mazement rehearsal isrespectful that that home and n of the rehearsal man. ognized in

of the e latest of t has been Spain and Germany
e Czar of 1929 Har-upon him
Doctor of

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Koussevitsky Awarded Highest French Honor

The cravat of commander of the Legion of Honor was formally bestowed on Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at noon today by M. Francois de Tessan, under secretary of state to the French government, after an address during which the French diplomat declared that the "enlightened leadership of President Roosevelt and his secretary of state, Cordell Hull," averted the calamity of a dire general economic war.

At a luncheon in the Renaissance room of the Hotel Touraine, attended by more than 300 distinguished scholars, bankers, leaders of business and cultural organizations, M. de Tessan clasped the scarlet ribbon and medal of the French decoration about the throat of Conductor Koussevitsky and sealed the presentation with kisses on both cheeks of the flushed and silent musician.

"In the name of the government of the republic, as recompense for what you have done, I have the honor of conferring the cravat of commander of the Legion of Honor," he recited in the official French phrases for such important occasions.

The principal address was supplemented by talks by M. Jacques Graber, architect for the 1937 Exposition Internationale in Paris, who said the French are trying to emulate the success of American industrial designers; by Prof. Andre Morize of Harvard University, toastmaster; by M. Jean-Etienne Maigret, French consul in Boston, and by Mayor Mansfield, who welcomed the distinguished visitors.

Among those at the head table were Eliot Wadsworth, president of the Boston Chamber of Commerce; Herbert Stone, vice-president of the Second National Bank; Mrs. Allan Forbes, wife of the president of the State Street Trust; Dr. Homer Gage and Mrs. Gage, of Worcester, noted philanthropists who have been themselves honored for their aid to French children after the war, and Pierre Claudel, son of former Ambassador Paul Claudel, with Mrs. Pierre Claudel.

PRAISES SECRETARY HULL

M. de Tessan, citing with gratitude the Hull reciprocal trade agreements as "the greatest single contribution toward world recovery and prosperity," pledged that:

"The present French government, presided over by a man of such intellectual distinction and animated by such human generosity as M. Leon Blum, is disposed to spare no effort to help in bringing about closer co-operation among the nations of the world.

"The Blum cabinet is convinced that France should not be a self-contained nation; should not lock herself behind a wall of economic nationalism. It feels that these barriers of trade create hatred, and that, on the contrary, a spirit of international co-operation should be fostered."

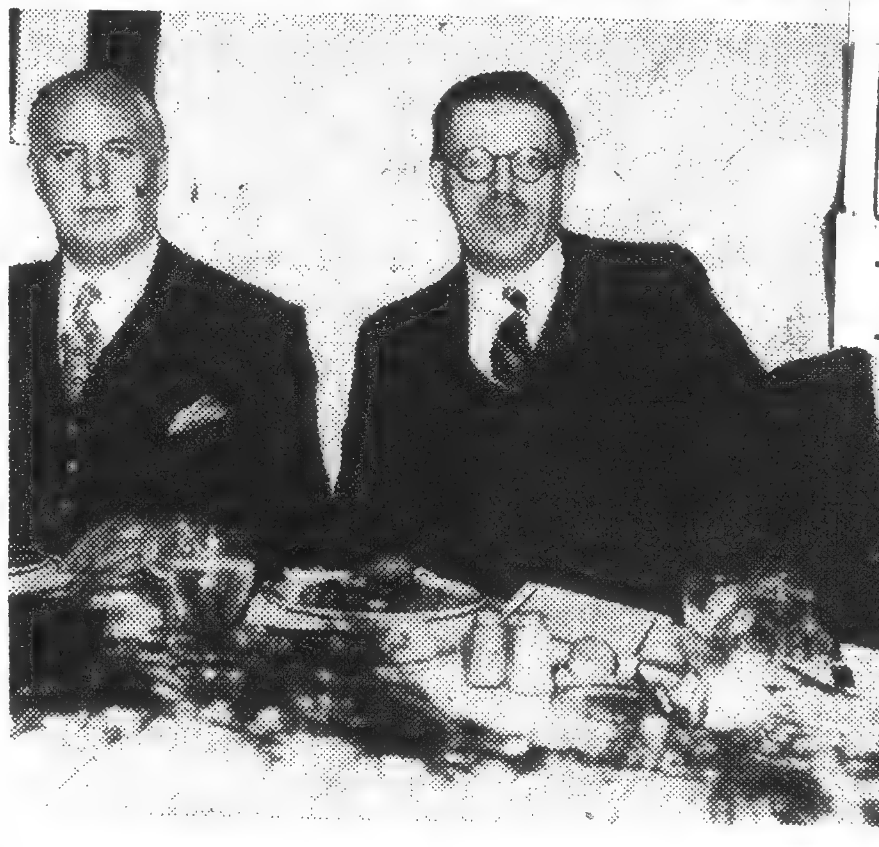
It is because France feels her responsibility to the nations of the world, he went on, that she has "adjusted the value of the franc . . . to re-establish an equilibrium between her internal prices and world prices." By lowering customs' tariffs by 15 to 20 per cent., he said, "France extends a frank invitation to other nations to act in an identical manner."

He repeated the invitation of France to all nations to take part in the 1937 exposition, promising that the fair will leaave nothing undone, nothing unsatisfied."

In a brief reference to the exchange of French professors with Harvard, the visitor said that "you have a permanent staff in your university of the elitte of our French professors."

The luncheon was arranged by the Franco-American committee of Boston for the 1937 exposition.

LEGION OF HONOR AWA



A trio pictured from the head table at the Franco-Americ mittee's luncheon today, at which M. Francois de Tessan, under-s of state of France (pictured at extreme left), awarded the c commander of the Legion of Honor to Dr. Serge Koussevitsk Andre Morize of Harvard University, toastmaster, is in center Jacques Greber, internationally known architect, is at right.

HERE TO HONOR SYMPHONY LEADER

Francois de Tessan, left, and Jacques Greber, right, French statesman and architect, who will attend a luncheon at the Touraine Hotel at noon, when Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be decorated by the French government.

French Decoration to Be Given Today to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

Francois de Tessan, French under secretary of state, will present the cravat of commander of the Legion of Honor to Dr. Serge Kousevitsky, conducter of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at a luncheon in the Touraine at noon today.

M. de Tessan, also the editor of a European daily, arrived in Boston last night in company with Jacques Graber, city planner and architect in charge of the 1937 Exposition Internationale in Paris. They came from New York where they took part in the rededication of the Statue of Liberty.

Dr. Koussevitsky was chosen for the award, M. de Tessan said, because France recognizes his eminence in the world of music as equal in importance to that of artists outstanding in European cultural history.

M. de Tessan declared France rejoiced that the United States under the leadership of President Roosevelt was furnishing stimulation to liberal and democratic programs throughout the world.

ROOSEVELT AND BLUM

He compared the New Deal with the Leon Blum presidential program in France and said they were practically identical in ideals. Blum, he added, looked to Roosevelt for leadership, and all France sincerely hoped the United States would take the initiative in establishing world peace.

While insisting that the United States and French situations were similar in many ways, M. de Tessan said the one important difference was that France was handicapped in national security.

"You people over here," he explained, "have kindly, peaceful neighbors like the Canadians; but we in France have Spain on one side and Germany on the other. Peace of mind and confidence in security are impossible. We are compelled to look to our defense constantly."

SPANISH REBELLION

Mr. de Tessan expressed alarm at the violence of the Spanish rebellion, but said France could not hope to intervene unless Great Britain acted concurrently.

Today's luncheon, sponsored by the Franco-American committee of the 1937 international exhibition in Paris, will be attended by more than 300 persons, including a long list of Boston notables headed by Mayor Mansfield.

Besides M. de Tessan and M. Greber, the speakers will include Jean E. Maigret, French consul in Boston. M. Grever, who has been in America as the guest of the Franco-American committee, is the special representative of Edmund Labee, general commissioner of the Paris exhibition. He is famous in America as the planner of Fairmont park in Philadelphia and the architect of a number of estates in Florida and California.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

8 [illegible] 1936

WJZ—Lum and Abner—Sketch
WABC—Irene Beasley, Songs; Trio
7:45-WOR—Sketch and Music
WJZ—Vivian Della Chiesa, Songs
WABC—Boake Carter, Commentator
8:00-WEAF—Reisman Orch.; Phil Duey, Baritone; Loretta Clemens, Songs; Sergeant Michael Donaldson, Guest
WOR—Studio Music
WJZ—Louise Massey, Songs; Westerners Quartet
WABC—Hammerstein's Music Hall; Lucy Laughlin, Soprano; Jerry

FREQUENTLY radio is accused of spreading rumors. When the broadcasters investigate they generally find that listeners tuned-in after the program started or heard only a few words which they interpreted incorrectly because they missed what went ahead.

During a recent "Folio of Facts" broadcast from WOL, Washington, which was also handled by WMCA, New York, the announcer said:

"During the Battle of Jutland on May 31, 1916, two British cruisers, the Indefatigable and the Queen Mary, were sunk with 22,077 men within twenty minutes after the firing had started."

Within an hour more than 300 phone calls were received at WMCA. Listeners who heard, "the Indefatigable and Queen Mary were sunk with 22,077 men," rushed to inquire whether the new queen of the seas, H. M. S. Queen Mary, had met with disaster.

About Programs and People

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will return to the air on Nov. 19. Instead of broadcasting the entire series from Boston as in previous seasons, the orchestra will be heard in four Carnegie Hall concerts in New York; three from Sanders Theatre at Harvard University in Cambridge; three from Symphony Hall, Boston, and one from the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Nine of the "Pop" concerts in Boston also will be broadcast in May.

The twelve broadcasts scheduled during the orchestra's regular season will all be on Thursday evenings, except the three programs from Boston, which will be Thursday matinees. All twenty-one concerts will be presented over WJZ's coast-to-coast network.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
NOV 7 - 1936

60.

Music and Musicians

By W. J. HENDERSON

IT would be difficult to repress comment on the opening of the season of orchestral concerts. So let us take the easiest way. It o soon to form any settled opinion of the conducting of John , the first of the Philharmonic-Syhphony Society's series of . He made his debut Thursday evening and the customary f the concert appeared in the columns of The Sun. The de of his conducting summarized first impressions. There will dant time in which to give him more searching scrutiny. In ances immediately after arriving here he deprecated attempts m in the position of a successor to Toscanini. Unfortunately pers will make comparisons. The Philharmonic set up a and a standard bearer.

there is a more serious matter to be considered and the sults of the season will have to be the basis for the formation ion on the subject. Regret has several times been expressed ace that the Philharmonic is not under the direction of a manent conductor. It is the conviction of this observer, om long years of observation, that frequent change of p cannot work for the good of any orchestra.

Wilhelm Gericke was the conductor of the Boston organi y music lovers shook their heads at his repressive methods. d tempestuous performances and labored incessantly for of finish. Consequently he was charged with a want of it the answer was the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at that nrivaled in tonal richness, clarity, balance, dignity of style and flawlessness of technic. It is true that he was not the first of its captains. But we may set aside George Henschel, who did the pioneer work of organization and clearing the ground. Gericke, who followed him, transformed a rather rough structure into an ornate edifice and paved the way for the brilliant achievements of Nikisch, one of the greatest conductors in orchestral history.

Nikisch was succeeded by Gericke, brought back to continue the work he had so well begun. After him the orchestra has had three important conductors, Muck, Monteux and Koussevitzky. Each of these was in sole command; there was no series of guests. If music lovers seek the secret of the splendor of tone and high level of finish which characterize performances of the great Boston organization let them ponder the advantages of following the artistic ideals of one mind.

* * * *

The Permanent Conductor.

THE writer has not had the good fortune to hear the Chicago Orchestra for some years, but reports of competent observers tell us that it is one of the great orchestras of this country—and that means, of the world. For Europe, to which so many music lovers hasten in the summer, and which they accept as always our superior, does not overshadow us in the field of orchestral music. Since the death of Theodore Thomas the Chicago institution has had just one director, Frederick Stock. Thirty years of lofty, artistic achievement are accredited to this master of the baton and the city of Chicago has responded to him and his men with sound financial support.

The Philadelphia Orchestra reached its zenith of fame under the sole direction of Leopold Stokowski. It has not always maintained its own level under visiting directors. Its fortunes in the immediate future will be closely watched. Eugene Ormandy is a highly talented man, and, providing he is given a free hand, can be counted on to keep the Philadelphians in the front rank. Perhaps there is a foundation for the persistent reports that the organization wavers under the uncertainties of a multitude of counsels. But this is a condition which confronts every orchestra governed by a board of directors and the inevitable and very active auxiliaries.

The death of Ossip Gabrilowitsch deprived the Detroit Orchestra of the knowledge, experience and enthusiasm of a truly great musician. His position has been given to a gentleman from Italy, a competent wielder of the baton, but little known to American music lovers outside of Detroit. The writer would have been happier if a young American could have been found to succeed Mr. Gabrilowitsch, but American conductors seem to be hidden behind the shadows of celebrities from overseas. Is it incontestable that no American has a gift for conducting?

We should not like to believe that. It must be confessed that in music this country has not yet attained to the same level that it has in literature, painting and sculpture, but it would be difficult to determine exactly the reasons. One thing is certain, namely, that the development of native conductors will not be advanced by importation. It would probably be of immense benefit to the art if more young Americans were tried out as conductors of orchestras in the smaller towns in which they might earn permanent places and grow up with their bands and their publics.

Chicago Has the Secret.

TO return to the Philharmonic: Are we to suppose that the directors have in mind the possibility of discovering among their importations some one who can be engaged as permanent conductor? Let us hope that some such result will be brought about. Then perhaps these directors may find it to the advantage of their orchestras to try to focus public attention on the excellence of the orchestra itself and the beauty of the music which it performs. Alas, this last item involves doubt. Where is this music? Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart, Schumann—are we fated to dwell forever in the past or must we prostrate ourselves before the altars of Alban Berg and his kind?

Well, perhaps we would better postpone the music question and concentrate on orchestra and conductor. Since there seems to be a vast cloud of doubt obscuring the minds of the gods of local art, why would it not be a good idea to appoint an investigating committee to go out to Chicago and find out how they do the thing there? According to Olin Downes, who recently made a traveling survey of the orchestral field in the eastern half of the country, the Chicago Orchestra is self-supporting. A visiting committee might be commended for addressing the Chicago backers in the language of the people: "How do you get that way?"

It is not the business of reviewer of musical activities to formulate plans of management. But in the course of years one becomes satisfied that the sovereign people dearly loves a hero. And it does not express itself in the language of "Don Juan": "I want a hero, an uncommon want, since every day brings forth a new one." Year after year the musical public prostrates itself at the feet of Kreisler, Rachmaninoff, Hofmann and a dozen other favorites. It went to the opera season after season to acclaim Caruso. It goes now to bestow the blessings of its applause on Flagstad. When Anton Seidl was the conductor of the old Philharmonic he was regarded as sui generis. In Brooklyn there was a Seidl Society which apparently thought that he was the god of things as they ought to be.

The winter will provide arguments pro and con. All we actually know at present is that when the Philharmonic had Toscanini and several other conductors the box office waxed fat for only one of them, and for the others became almost as bare as Mother Hubbard's celebrated cupboard.

61. ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH-HERALD
Nov. 8/36

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Return to the Radio

The world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Kousseviszky will return to the National Broadcasting Company's networks for its fifth season as an exclusive NBC feature in a series scheduled to begin Thursday, November 19.

Instead of broadcasting its entire series from Boston as in previous seasons, the orchestra, through special negotiations just completed, will be heard in four of its Carnegie Hall concerts in New York; four from the Sanders Theater at Harvard University in Cambridge, Mass.; three from Symphony Hall, Boston; and one from the Academy of Music in Brooklyn. Nine of the famous "pop" concerts in Boston also will be broadcast.

The "pop" conerts will be presented from Symphony Hall, Boston, on nine consecutive Thursday evenings from 8:30 to 9:30 p. m., EST, beginning May 6.

Recognized throughout the musical world as one of the finest symphonic organizations in existence, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has had the additional advantage of playing under the same conductor throughout its season for several years, thus perfecting an ensemble which critics have acclaimed without a peer.

WEST WARWICK, R. I.
PAWTUXET VALLEY TIMES

NOV 1 0 193

DIRECTOR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HONORED BY FRENCH LEGION OF HONOR

Boston, Mass., Nov. 10 (INS)—Honored by France for his emminence in the world of Music, Dr. Serge Kovsevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra today was presented the cravat of Commander of the Legion of Honor at a luncheon in his honor. Presentation was made by Francis De Tessan, French Under-Secretary of State who has been in America since the rededication of the Statue of Liberty in New York on its 50th anniversary.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

NOV 1 0 1936

Premiere of New Symphony Of Josten by Hub Orchestra

Smith Professor of Music to Conduct Famous Musical Organization in Own Work Friday and Saturday in Boston

NORTHAMPTON, Nov. 9 — The world premiere of the Symphony in F by Werner Josten, distinguished composer and professor of music at Smith College, will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, Friday and Saturday. This is a part of the regular Symphony Hall series, but on this occasion Mr. Josten will conduct his own symphony at the invitation of Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, who himself will conduct the rest of the program.

The Symphony in F is Mr. Josten's latest work, completed during the past summer. It is a work in three movements, in the conventional order of the fast-slow-fast: Allegro vivace, andante, allegro giusto; and is scored for full orchestra.

The Boston Symphony has frequently performed others of Mr. Josten's orchestral works. His symphonic movement "Jungle" was first performed by the Boston Symphony in 1929. It subsequently has been performed by other orchestras, notably the Philadelphia and Chicago Symphonies. The Boston Symphony has also performed, both in Boston and elsewhere, the "Concerto Sacro" for piano and string orchestra.

Besides the new Symphony in F, the "Concerto Sacro" and "Jungle," Mr. Josten's major orchestral works are the "Serenade" for orchestra, another work which Northampton audiences will remember as presented by the Cleveland Orchestra under Rodzinski—and the music for the ballets "Joseph and His Brethren," "Batouala" and "Endymion." The last has also been played by the Boston Symphony. "Endymion," "Joseph and His Brethren," and the "Concerto Sacro" were the three chosen for the program of the orchestral works of Werner Josten presented under the Composers' Forum series in New York on Oct. 28, with Mr. Josten conducting.

Werner Josten studied composition in Germany and Austria, chiefly under Rudolf Siegel, himself a pupil of Humperdinck, and made some special studies under Jacques-Dalcroze. He worked for several years in Paris, and at one time was conductor at the Munich Opera. After coming to America in 1921, Mr. Josten was appointed a member of the music department of Smith College in 1923, where he has ever since been a professor of music. During the present year, he is on sabbatical absence, residing for the present in Northampton and devoting his time to composing.

BURLINGTON, VT.
FREE PRESS

NOV 1 1 1936

Dr. Koussevitsky Receives Legion of Honor Medal

BOSTON, Nov. 10. (AP)—France bestowed the order of commander of the Legion of Honor upon Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, today at ceremonies marked by re-vowal of Franco-American friendship.

The noted conductor received the scarlet cravat and medal from Francois de Tessan, French under secretary of State, who presented it "in the name of the government of the republic as recompense for what you have done."

Dr. Koussevitsky, a native Russian, has been a long-time Paris resident and instrumental in increasing world recognition of French musical leaders.

M. De Tessan told the luncheon group of 300 leaders in Boston culture and business the "enlightened leadership of President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull" averted economic war.

He called Hull's trade policy the "greatest single contribution toward world recovery and prosperity," and said France and the United States were working under common ideals for world peace.

Other speakers included Jean Etienne Maierte, French consul at Boston; Prof. Andre Morize of Harvard University; Jacques Graber, architect for the 1937 exposition in Paris, and Mayor Frederick W. Mansfield of Boston.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
Nov. 10

Koussevitzky Honored

BOSTON—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was notified yesterday that he had been elevated to the grade of commander of the French Legion of Honor.

CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-EXAMINER

NOV 8 - 1936

'Unfinished' Symphony Is Put on Record

By Janet Gunn.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have recently made a Victor recording of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony. The eminent conductor "speaks" the idiom of the immortal Schubert gravely and simply.

With complete understanding he indicates the beautiful themes in varied orchestral and tonal shading, and the unassuming nobility of the composer's thought is evident in his natural and dignified exposition.

The second theme of the first movement has been popularized, and in song form is called "You Are My Song of Love." But not even its banal modern setting can destroy the lilting loveliness of its lyric line.

Music lovers throughout the world cherish the "Unfinished" Symphony for its tranquil beauty and peerless melodies. They value it all the more highly when they consider the merest happenstance that rescued this unique and lovely work from the waste basket and oblivion.

ZIT'S
NEW YORK CITY

NOV 7 - 1936

Boston Concerts Again Exclusively For NBC

The world-famius Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will return for its fifth season as an exclusive NBC feature in a series scheduled to start Thursday, November 19. Instead of broadcasting its entire series from Boston as in previous seasons, the orchestra, through special negotiations, will be heard in four of its concerts from Carnegie Hall, N. Y.; four from the Sanders Theatre at Harvard University; three from Symphony Hall, Boston; and one from the Academy of Music in Brooklyn. The "Pop" Concerts will be presented from Symphony Hall, Boston, on nine consecutive Thursday evenings, from 8:30 to 9:30 p. m., beginning May 6.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

NOV 1 0 1936

FRANCE WILL HONOR KOUSSEVITZKY TODAY

Boston, Nov. 9—(AP)—The French consulate announced tonight Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, would be made a commander of the Legion of Honor at a dinner in Boston tomorrow.

Francois de Tessan, French undersecretary of state, the consulate said, would come to Boston to present Dr Koussevitzky with the medal at a dinner sponsored by the Franco-American committee for the 1937 International exhibition in Paris.

Dr Koussevitzky, although a native Russian, has long resided in Paris, and has been instrumental in the development and recognition of French musical leaders.

Prof Jacques Greber, architect for the exhibition, and a member of de Tessan's party, also would be among those addressing the dinner, the consulate announced.

At the same time the Symphony orchestra announced former Gov Alva T. Fuller and Richard C. Paine had been appointed to its board of trustees. One fills the vacancy caused by the resignation of William L. Phillips, embassador-designate to Italy.

ST. PAUL, MINN.
DISPATCH
Nov. 10/36

N OF HONOR AWARD GRANTED KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston, Nov. 10—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, announced Monday receipt of notification through the French consulate here of his elevation to the rank of commander of the French Legion of Honor.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

NOV 1 0 1936

SMITH COLLEGE

JOSTEN'S NEW WORK TO BE HEARD AT BOSTON

World Premiere of 'Symphony in F' to Be Given Friday and Saturday

Northampton, Nov. 9—The world premiere of the "Symphony in F" by Werner Josten, distinguished composer and professor of music at Smith college, will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall, Boston, Friday and Saturday. This is a part of the regular Symphony hall series, but on this occasion Mr Josten will conduct his own symphony at the invitation of Dr Sergei Koussevitzky, who will conduct the rest of the program.

The "Symphony in F" is Mr Josten's latest work, completed during the past summer. It is a work in three movements, in the conventional order of fast-slow-fast: Allegro, vivace, andante, allegro giusto, and is scored for full orchestra.

The Boston Symphony has performed others of Mr Josten's orchestral works. His symphonic movement, "Jungle," was first performed by the Boston Symphony in 1929. It has subsequently been performed by other orchestras, notably the Philadelphia and Chicago symphonies. The Boston Symphony has also performed, both in Boston and elsewhere, the "Concerto Sacro" for piano and string orchestra. This work was first performed at Town hall, New York, in 1929, and has since been part of the repertory of almost all major orchestras in the country.

Besides the new symphony, the "Concerto Sacro," and "Jungle," Mr Josten's major orchestral works, are the "Serenade" for orchestra—another work which Northampton audiences will remember as presented by the Cleveland orchestra under Rodzinski—and the music for the ballets, "Joseph and His Brethren," "Batouala" and "Endymion." The last has also been played by the Boston Symphony.

Werner Josten studied composition in Germany and Austria, chiefly under Rudolf Siegel, himself a pupil of Humperdinck, and made some special studies under Jacques-Dalcroze. He worked for several years in Paris, and was at one time conductor at the Munich opera. After coming to America in 1921, Mr Josten was appointed a member of the music department of Smith college in 1923, where he has ever since been professor of music. During the present year he is on sabbatical absence, residing for the present in Northampton and devoting his time to composing.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

NOV 1 0 1936

HONORED BY FRANCE

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

BOSTON, Nov. 9 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received word today he had been named a commander of the Legion of Honor of France. The citation will be presented by Francois de Tessan, French Under-Secretary of State, at a dinner in Boston tomorrow.

Dr. Koussevitzky, although Russian by birth, has long resided in Paris and has been instrumental in the development and recognition of new French musical leaders.

The orchestra also announced the appointments of former Governor Alvan T. Fuller and Richard C. Paine to the board of trustes.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

BOSTON, Nov. 9 (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced today receipt of notification through the French consulate here of his elevation to the rank of the commander of the French Legion of Honor.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

NOV 1 0 1936

Dr. Koussevitzky Made Commander in Legion of Honor

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

BOSTON, Nov. 9 (U. P.).

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was notified today that he had been elevated to the grade of commander of the French Legion of Honor.

News of Orchestras

Bostonians Afield

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, are giving their first concerts of the season in New York and Brooklyn this week. This evening in Carnegie Hall the program consists of Haydn's Symphony in B-flat, Debussy's "La Mer" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Tomorrow evening in the Brooklyn Academy of Music the orchestra will play Mozart's Symphony in A major (K. 201), Stravinsky's "Baiser de la Fee" and the Symphony in D minor by Franck. The concert in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon will be devoted to Messiaen's "Les Offrandes oubliees," Mozart's Symphony in A major, "Don Juan" by Strauss and the Fifth Symphony by Sibelius.

The Haydn Symphony and part of "La Mer" will be broadcast directly from Carnegie Hall this evening on an NBC radio network, from 8.45 to 9.30. Word also reaches this department that the Carnegie Hall concerts in New York are entirely sold out for the season.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
10/3

LATE ARRIVALS AT CONCERT NOT TO BE SEATED

The Metropolitan rule of no seating between the movements of a symphony will be severely adhered to at the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra tonight at 8.30 at the Auditorium. The concert, which will be the first in a series presented by the Springfield Community Concert association in cooperation with the Junior league, will be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

New York concert managers anxious to get people to "get there on time" have made the ruling at symphony concerts that those who fail to arrive before the opening of the program must stay in the lobby. In the cast of a symphony in a number of movements, those who come late have to wait until the close of the symphony.

This drastic step is taken because of the commotion caused by droves of individuals being shown to their seats, while the conductor waits and has to interrupt the program. This has usually been the case in Springfield, and officials of the Community Concert association wish to request the public to be prompt.

Tonight's program, as those planned for the rest of the season, will be open only to those holding membership tickets in the association. It will be as follows:—

Symphony No 29 in A-major	Mozar
Elegie for 'cello and orchestra	Faur
Don Juan, tone poem	R. Straus
Second symphony	Brahm

Jean Bedetti, 'cellist, will be the soloist in the Faure selection.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

NOV 10 1936

LATE ARRIVALS AT CONCERT NOT TO BE SEATED

Rule Adopted for Boston Symphony Program Here —Jean Bedetti Will Be 'Cello Soloist

(Charcoal sketch by Jerome Brush)

The Metropolitan rule of no seating between the movements of a symphony will be severely adhered to at the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra tonight at 8.30 at the Auditorium. The concert, which will be the first in a series presented by the Springfield Community Concert association in cooperation with the Junior league, will be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

New York concert managers anxious to get people to "get there on time" have made the ruling at symphony concerts that those who fail to arrive before the opening of the program must stay in the lobby. In the cast of a symphony in a number of movements, those who come late have to wait until the close of the symphony.

This drastic step is taken because of the commotion caused by droves of individuals being shown to their seats, while the conductor waits and has to interrupt the program. This has usually been the case in Springfield, and officials of the Community Concert association wish to request the public to be prompt.

Tonight's program, as those planned for the rest of the season, will be open only to those holding membership tickets in the association. It will be as follows:—

Symphony No 29 in A-major .... Mozart
Elegie for 'cello and orchestra .... Faure
Don Juan tone poem .... R. Strauss
Second symphony .... Brahms

Jean Bedetti, 'cellist, will be the soloist in the Faure selection.

ALLENTOWN, PA.
CALL

Orchestras Now List Conductors

NEW YORK. (AP)—Symphony concerts are no longer being bought by the "pig in the poke" method. At least not in the east.

It used to be that subscribers to the hundreds of orchestral seasons throughout the country were expected to approach the box office, money in hand, sometime in the summer. They paid their money, received their tickets, and went home hoping that conductors would prepare decent programs for a change.

Now many of the major orchestras are not only listing their conductors, but telling in advance the soloists to be expected, the special events planned, and as definitely as possible the music to be played.

Partly, it is explained by orchestra managers, this is being done in an effort to attract patronage. Partly it is done in a spirit of fairness. And partly it is done because more and more the emphasis is being laid on the music itself rather than upon the prifa donna who does the conducting.

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony society led off with an announcement which listed in fair detail the music to be expected from its three guest conductors, and sketching in a general outline for John Barbirolli and Artur Rodzinski, the two "regular" conductors.

The Philadelphia orchestra said little about the actual music to be programmed, but it did list in detail the soloists to be heard, a most impressive list indeed. Later some of the music was announced.

But the Boston Symphony has gone farther than any up to date. Up in Boston Serge Koussevitzky has chosen and announced nearly all the major numbers to be played, and in the case of the soloists has even published whot work each will be heard in.

This extends even to the standard repertoire. And as usual, Dr. Koussevitzky has dug up a few new things. One is a violin concerto by Roger Sessions, which Albert Spalding will play for the first time; another is a symphony by one Shaporin.

NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
NEWS

NOV 10 193

KOUSEVITSKY HONORED

Boston, ~~Nov. 10~~ (INS)—Honored by France for his eminence in the world of music, Dr. Serge Kousevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today was presented the cravat of commander of the French Legion of Honor at a luncheon in his honor. Presentation was made by Francois de Tessan, French Under Secretary of State.

AKRON, O.
TIMES PRESS

NOV 10 1936

HONOR KOUSSEVITZKY

BOSTON, Nov. 10.—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had been notified today that he had been elevated to the grade of commander of the French Legion of Honor.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

NOV 10 1936

Serge Koussevitzky Honored.

By the Associated Press.

BOSTON, Nov. 10.—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced receipt of notification through the French Consulate here of his elevation to the rank of the commander of the French Legion of Honor.

BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN

NOV 10 1936

Symphony Conductor Honored

Boston, Nov. 9 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced today receipt of notification through the French Consulate here of his elevation to the rank of the commander of the French Legion of Honor.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

NOV 10 1936

Conductor Decorated.

Boston, Nov. 9 (AP).—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced today receipt of notification through the French consulate here of his elevation to the rank of the commander of the French Legion of Honor.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL

NOV 10 193

HONOR FOR CONDUCTOR.

BOSTON, Nov. 9 — (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, announced today receipts of notification through the French consulate here of his elevation to the rank of the commander of the French Legion of Honor.

NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS

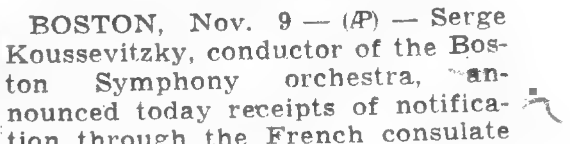
NOV 10 193

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER HONORED

BOSTON, Nov. 10 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced today receipt of notification through the French consulate here of his elevation to the rank of the commander of the French Legion or Honor.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

NOV 10 193



A large delegation of Holyoke people is expected to be present at the opening concer of the Springfield Community Concert Course this evening. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to come to Smith College next spring, is the attraction.

BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE

NOV 10 193

KOUSSEVITZY DECORATED.

BOSTON, Nov. 9.—(UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was notified to-day that he had been elevated to the grade of commander of the French legion of honor.

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

Nov. 10/36

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY HONORED BY FRANCE

Boston, Nov. 9-(AP)-Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received word today he had been named a commander of the Legion of Honor of France. The citation will be presented by Francois de Tessan, French Under-Secretary of State, at a dinner in Boston tomorrow. Dr. Koussevitzky, although Russian by birth, has long resided in Paris and has been instrumental in the development and recognition of new French musical loaders.

The orchestra also announced the appointments of former Governor Alvan T. Fuller and Richard C. Paine to the board of trustees. One appointment fills the vacancy caused by the recent resignation of William L. Phillips, new ambassador to Italy.

BANGOR, ME.
NEWS

NOV 11 1936

Honor Bestowed On Boston Symphony Orchestra Conductor

BOSTON, Nov. 10—(AP)—France bestowed the order of Commander of the Legion of Honor upon Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today at ceremonies marked by re-avowal of Franco-American friendship.

The noted conductor received the scarlet cravat and medal from Francois de Tessan, French under secretary of state, who presented it "in the name of the government of the republic as recompense for what you have done."

Dr. Koussevitsky, a native Russian, has been a long-time Paris resident and instrumental in increasing world recognition of French musical leaders.

The late King George of England made a hobby of rearing budgerigars, the beautiful Australian love birds.

M. de Tessan told the luncheon group of 300 leaders in Boston culture and business the "enlightened leadership of President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull" averted economic war.

He called Hull's trade policy the "greatest single contribution toward world recovery and prosperity," and said France and the United States were working under common ideals for world peace.

Other speakers included Jean Etienne Maierte, French consul at Boston; Prof. Andre Morize of Harvard university; Jacques Graber, architect for the 1937 exposition in Paris, and Mayor Frederick W. Mansfield of Boston.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

NOV

FRANCE HONORS KOUSSEVITSKY

Blum Official Praises U.S. Economic Policy at Boston Ceremony

BOSTON, Nov. 10 (AP)—France bestowed the order of commander of the Legion of Honor upon Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today at ceremonies marked by revowal of Franco-American friendship.

The noted conductor received the scarlet cravat and medal from Francois de Tessan, French under secretary of state, who presented it "in the name of the Government of the Republic as recompense for what you have done."

Dr. Kroussevitsky, a native Russian, has been a long-time Paris resident and instrumental in increasing world recognition of French musical leaders.

M. de Tessan told the luncheon group of 300 leaders in Boston culture and business the "enlightened leadership of President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull" averted economic war.

He called Hull's trade policy the "greatest single contribution toward world recovery and prosperity," and said France and the United States were working under common ideals for world peace.

Other speakers included Jean Etienne Maierte, French consul at Boston; Professor Andre Morize of Harvard University; Jacques Graber, architect for the 1937 exposition in Paris, and Mayor Frederick W. Mansfield of Boston.

NORWICH, CONN.
BULLETIN

NOV 11 193

in the next congress.

France bestowed the Order of Commander of the Legion of Honor upon Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Boston at ceremonies marked by re-avowal of Franco-American friendship.

PITTSFIELD, MASS
EAGLE

NOV 11 19

France Makes Dr. Koussevitzky Commander of Legion of Honor

Noted Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Who Appeared in Berkshire Last Summer Is Honored by French Government—Opens Springfield Concert Series Before Capacity Audience

France bestowed the order of commander of the Legion of Honor upon Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at ceremonies at the Hotel Touraine in Boston yesterday. The decoration is the highest honor within the gift of the French nation.

Dr. Koussevitzky has done much for French music and the "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris are events of major importance in the French capital.

Had Busy Day

The noted conductor who with his orchestra was applauded last summer at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival had a busy schedule yesterday. After the luncheon in Boston, he hopped a train for Springfield where he and the orchestra opened the Community Concert series before an audience that filled every available seat in the huge Municipal Auditorium.

Presentation by M. Tessan

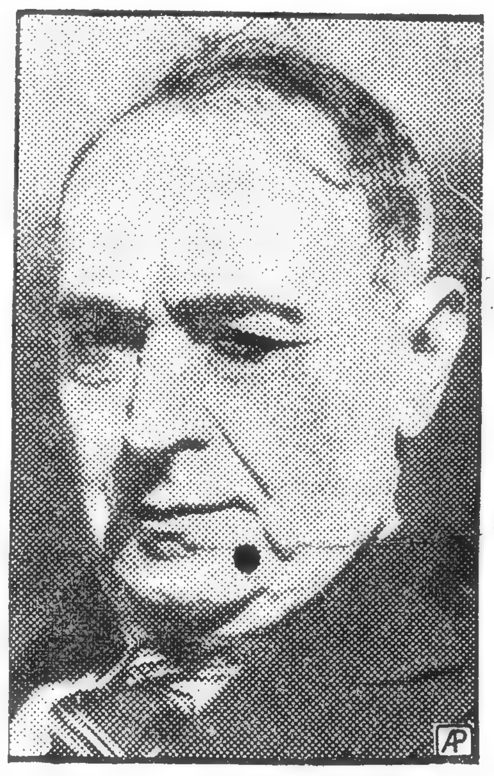
The meeting in Boston at which Dr. Koussevitzky was honored, was sponsored by the New England Branch of the American Committee of the 1937 International Exhibition in Paris. The presentation was made by Francis de Tessan, French Under Secretary of State.

Characterizing Dr. Koussevitzky "a great musician, universally known," M. de Tessan kissed the conductor on both cheeks and pinned about his neck the wide scarlet ribbon and medal designating the honor which had been conferred upon him.

"France likes to honor renowned artists all over the world," ~~he said~~, "and in the name of the government of the republic, as a recompense for what you have done for art, I have the honor to confer upon you the cravat of commander of the Legion of Honor."

The luncheon proved to be a gathering of leading French citizens in Boston and of prominent Boston business men whose work has affiliated them in one way or another with the French Government.

Professor Andre Morize of Harvard was toastmaster, and seated with him at the head table were Eliot Wadsworth, president of the Boston Chamber of Commerce; E. Vezima, secretary of the St. Jean de Baptiste Society; Dr. and Mrs. Richard Strong; Allan Forbes, president of the State Street Trust Company, and Mrs. Forbes; Dr. and Mrs. Homer Gage of Worcester; Pierre Claudel, son of the former Ambassador to the United States, and Mme. Claudel; Dr. and Mrs. Koussevitzky; Jean F. Maigret, French Consul in Boston; Jacques Greber, architect of the exhibition; Mayor Mansfield; H. A. Highman, secretary of the exposition and resident manager here of the French Line; Herbert Stone, vice-president of the Second National Bank of Boston and K. Ledoux.



AP

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
". . . A great musician . . . universally known"

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

NOV 11 193

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY IS HONORED BY FRANCE

BOSTON, Nov. 10 (AP)—France bestowed the order of Commander of the Legion of Honor upon Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here today at ceremonies marked by re-avowal of Franco-American friendship.

The noted conductor bowed his head for the scarlet cravat and medal as Francois de Tessan, French under secretary of state, presented it "in the name of the government of the republic as recompense for what you have done."

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

FRANCE BESTOWS HONOR ON DR. KOUSSEVITSKY

CEREMONIES MARKED BY RE-VOWAL OF FRANCO-AMERICAN FRIENDSHIP

Boston, Nov. 10-(AP)-France bestowed the order of Commander of the Legion of Honor upon Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today at ceremonies marked by re-vowal of Franco-American friendship.

The noted conductor received the scarlet cravat and medal from Francois de Tessan, French Under Secretary of State, who presented it "in the name of the Government of the Republic as recompense for what you have done."

Dr. Koussevitsky, a native Russian, has been a long-time Paris resident and instrumental in increasing world recogniton of French musical leaders.

M. de Tessan told the luncheon group of 300 leaders in Boston culture and business the "enlightened leadership of President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull" averted economic war.

He called Hull's trade policy the "greatest single contribution toward world recovery and prosperity," and said France and the United States were working under common ideals for world peace.

Other speakers included Jean Etienne Maierte, French Consul at Boston; Prof. Andre Morize of Harvard University; Jacques Graber, architect for the 1937 exposition in Paris, and Mayor Frederick W. Mansfield of Boston.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

NOV 1 1 1936

Koussevitzky Awarded French Legion Honor For Music Leadership

Boston, Nov. 10—(AP)—France bestowed the order of commander of the Legion of Honor upon Dr Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, here today at ceremonies marked by reavowal of Franco-American friendship.

The noted conductor bowed his head for the scarlet cravat and medal as Francois de Tessan, French undersecretary of state, presented it "in the name of the government of the republic as recompense for what you have done."

Dr Koussevitsky, a native Russian, has been a long-time Paris resident and instrumental in increasing world recognition of French musical leaders.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

NOV 1 1 1936

FRANCE HONORS KOUSSEVITSKY

Blum Official Praises U.S. Economic Policy at Boston Ceremony

BOSTON, Nov. 10 (AP)—France bestowed the order of commander of the Legion of Honor upon Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today at ceremonies marked by revowal of Franco-American friendship.

The noted conductor received the scarlet cravat and medal from Francois de Tessan, French under secretary of state, who presented it "in the name of the Government of the Republic as recompense for what you have done."

Dr. Kroussevitsky, a native Russian, has been a long-time Paris resident and instrumental in increasing world recognition of French musical leaders.

M. de Tessan told the luncheon group of 300 leaders in Boston culture and business the "enlightened leadership of President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull" averted economic war.

He called Hull's trade policy the "greatest single contribution toward world recovery and prosperity," and said France and the United States were working under common ideals for world peace.

Other speakers included Jean Etienne Maierte, French consul at Boston; Professor Andre Morize of Harvard University; Jacques Graber, architect for the 1937 exposition in Paris, and Mayor Frederick W. Mansfield of Boston.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

NOV 1 1 1936

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GIVE WORLD PREMIER OF "SYMPHONY IN F"

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the world premier of the "Symphony in F" by Werner Josten, distinguished composer and professor of music at Smith college, in Symphony Hall in Boston Friday and Saturday. Mr. Josten will conduct his own work at the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

The "Symphony in F" is Mr. Josten's latest work, completed last summer. It is in three movements, allegro, vivace, andante, allegro guisto, and is scored for full orchestra.

The Boston Symphony has performed others of Mr. Josten's orchestral works. His symphonic movement, "Jungle" was first performed by that organization in 1929, and it has also performed, bit in Biston and elsewhere, the "Concerto Sacro" for piano and string orshestras, and Mr. Josten's ballet score, "Endymion".

Discuss Symphony Plan

(Republican Staff Photo)

Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra and Atty Raymond T. King, president of the Springfield Communit Concert association, discussing the program of the Boston Symphon orchestra concert opening this season's series. Dr Koussevitzky wearing the French Legion of Honor ribbon with which he wa decorated at Boston yesterday.

NEW BEDFORD. MASS.
MERCURY

NOV 1 1 1936

FRANCE HONORS KOUSSEVITSKY

Blum Official Praises U.S. Economic Policy at Boston Ceremony

BOSTON, Nov. 10 (AP)—France bestowed the order of commander of the Legion of Honor upon Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today at ceremonies marked by revowal of Franco-American friendship.

The noted conductor received the scarlet cravat and medal from Francois de Tessan, French under secretary of state, who presented it "in the name of the Government of the Republic as recompense for what you have done."

Dr. Kroussevitsky, a native Russian, has been a long-time Paris resident and instrumental in increasing world recognition of French musical leaders.

M. de Tessan told the luncheon group of 300 leaders in Boston culture and business the "enlightened leadership of President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull" averted economic war.

He called Hull's trade policy the "greatest single contribution toward world recovery and prosperity," and said France and the United States were working under common ideals for world peace.

Other speakers included Jean Etienne Maierte, French consul at Boston; Professor Andre Morize of Harvard University; Jacques Graber, architect for the 1937 exposition in Paris, and Mayor Frederick W. Mansfield of Boston.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 1 1 1936

French Decoration Given Koussevitsky

Boston—(AP)—France bestowed the order of commander of the Legion of Honor on Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at ceremonies marked by reavowal of Franco-Aemrican friendship.

The noted conductor bowed his head for the scarlet cravat and medal as Francois De Tessan, French undersecretary of state, presented it "in the name of the government of the republic as recompense for what you have done."

Dr. Koussevitsky, a native Russian, has been a longtime Paris resident and instrumental in increasing world recognition of French musical leaders.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM

NOV 1 1 1936

DR. KOUSSEVITSKY HONORED BY FRANCE

BOSTON, Nov. 10.—(AP) France bestowed the order of Commander of the Legion of Honor upon Dr Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra here today at ceremonies marked by re-avowal of Franco-American friendship.

The noted conductor bowed his head for the Scarlet cravat and medal as Francois De Tessan, French Undersecretary of State, presented it "in the name of the government of the Republic as recompense for what you have done."

Dr. Koussevitsky, a native Russian, has been a long-time Paris resident and instrumental in increasing world recognition of French musical leaders.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

NOV 1 1 1936

CONCERT SEASON OPENS; THRONG AT AUDITORIUM

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Symphony in Brilliant Performance in Initial Community Concert

By Willard M. Clark

With more than 3800 people in attendance, the Springfield Community Concert Association, sponsored by the Springfield Junior League, opened its season last night in the Auditorium by presenting the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Last season the appearance of the Boston players was the highlight of the course and the performance last night was equally happy.

It is said that every seat in the Auditorium was filled last night and that the association was forced to return 75 applications because of lack of seats. This healthy state of affairs is due to two reasons, first the intensive effort of the solicitors from both the association and the league, and secondly the excellence of the attractions offered on the course.

The concert took on all the glamor of a gala performance. It was a brilliant audience listening to great music, superbly interpreted. It was interesting to note that the great majority of the audience arrived in time. Advance notice had been given that no one would be seated until the opening number was completed. The lobby of the Auditorium was no place to wait last night. Of course, there were a few stragglers, but there always will be and nine times out of 10 they will be occupying front row seats.

There is nothing new to write of the Boston Symphony Orchestra or its great conductor. It is one of the four great orchestras in the world and whether or not one puts it at the head of the list is entirely an individual matter. What is important, as far as last night's performance is concerned, is the fact that Dr. Koussevitzky continues to be a master program builder. Once again he proved his ability to group together an engrossing list of works.

The program opened with Mozart's "Symphony in A Major (K 201)." We have no record of this work ever having been played here before. In fact, it had its first hearing in Boston not many weeks ago. It seems strange the work has not been played more often. It is engaging, light and spirited, and provided a delightful opening for the program. It abounds in rhythmic difficulties but, as is usual with this orchestra, it was played with consummate skill.

There has been a constant demand for a soloist to appear with the orchestra but up to last night the idea had not been practical. Last night, Dr. Koussevitzky introduced that sterling first cellist, Jean Bedetti, who was heard in an "Elegie" by Faure. The work was originally written for cello and piano but was later orchestrated by the composer. Mr. Bedetti needs no introduction to Springfield. He has played here many times both as soloist and with various ensembles. He played the lovely Faure work with fine sensitivity and smooth, rich tone. His musicianship is a sheer delight. The orchestra provided ideal accompaniment.

The music of Strauss is a long, long way from the delicate beauties of Mozart and Faure, yet the rich scoring of "Don Juan" seemed not a bit out of place, its rich harmonies and insinuating appeal, melodically and harmonically, failing to dwarf what had gone before. The music was played with a sonority and daring contrast which almost lifted the audience from its seats. Strauss would have rejoiced in the richness of the strings and the gorgeous tone of the brass choir. Dr. Koussevitzky seemed to become Don Juan as he led his men through this musical portrait of that engaging figure of romance.

The program closed with the second symphony of Brahms. Of the four symphonies, the second is perhaps the easiest to grasp and has perhaps the most personal appeal. Its melodic beauty, its simple structure and the rhythmic and dynamic power in the final movement provide all that is needed. Its moods are not too subtle for comprehension. The audience had difficulty in restraining its applause after the charming third movement but made known its pleasure in no uncertain terms at the close of a truly inspired reading.

Dr. Koussevitzky shared the applause with his men, having them rise several times. Yesterday was a very busy day for the conductor. At noon in Boston he was decorated by the French government in a colorful ceremony. He has done a great deal for French music and the "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris are events of major importance in the French capital.

The second concert in the course will be given by Jascha Heifitz, violinist, on Dec. 11.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

NOV 1 1 1936

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HAS LARGE CROWD FOR CONCERT HERE

'Musical Revival' Hailed as Koussevitzky Is Applauded in First of Recital Series

By FRANCIS REGAL

An ideal program superbly given by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky made notable the opening, at the Auditorium last evening, of the series of community concerts. Thanks to the cooperation of the Junior league public support has surpassed even the splendid record of last year, and the amazing spectacle was presented of a hall packed to its capacity of 4000, with a great number excluded because the subscription list was full. The long-awaited musical revival is evidently at hand, and the audience must have included many who under the recently prevaling conditions have had few opportunities to hear a great orchestra directly, with no intervening mechanism.

The program was exactly what a program for a concert given under such conditions should be—a revelation to inexperienced listeners and a delight to all. First came Mozart's charming small-scale symphony in A-major, No 29, a work rarely heard until the Mozart revival brought out the neglected masterpieces from his prolific pen. This is lightly scored and was played with a somewhat reduced body of strings to fit more nearly the small force of winds. The symphony shows Mozart in one of his most captivating moods, and its gay and suave elegance was exquisitely brought out by the orchestra. From the first listeners was struck by the marvelous playing of the violins, which achieved a true collective pianissimo instead of pretending to play and leaving the tone to the f[illegible] desk. Each movement was made fascinating, and the whole work [illegible] the quintessence of a characteristic part of Mozart's genius. When [illegible] perfectly played as it was last n[illegible] it rivals in popularity the now o[illegible] worked "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik."

"Elegie" by Faure

This was followed by one of the finest of the not very numerous short works for violoncello and orchestra, the "Elegie" by Faure, played by Jean Bedetti, principal cellist [illegible] the orchestra. The inclusion of a solo number is fully justified both by the fewness of concerts at present and by the rarity of opportunities for hearing solo instruments with orchestra. This deeply emotional work by one of the most eminent of modern French composers is fairly familiar with piano accompaniment, [illegible] the orchestral score, the work of the composer, adds greatly to its eloquence and power. It is one of the finest works of its kind, and Mr Bedetti played it with earnest and moving intensity.

The most vivid orchestral coloring came in the tone poem "Don Juan," which many of the admirers of Richard Strauss regard as his most inspired work. If he has showed more creative ingenuity in certain of his later works and perhaps at times has achieved a more intense climax he has never surpassed this relatively early tone poem in freshness and spontaneity. The orchestration is, of course, of consummate mastery, and it was given a virtuoso performance last evening by Dr Koussevitzky and his musicians. The nobility of the horn solos and other exalted passages gave the audience a thrill.

Yet the true climax came in the superb performance of the sober and austere symphony by Brahms with which the program closed, No 2 in D-major. In America this was the first of the four symphonies by Brahms to win genuine popularity—doubtless because of the lyric character which worried those who had called his first symphony "the 10th symphony," to mark him as the heir to Beethoven. He was, in fact, no Beethoven, but himself, and his true self is expressed as richly and beautifully in this melodious but profound second symphony as in any of his work.

Its profundity and also its vital force are often slighted in performance, but Dr Koussevitzky brought out both in full measure. The deep was stirred as the finale moved on to its sure and steady culmination—as thrilling a building up of emotional intensity as ever he has achieved. Simplicity, dignity, restraint and power were all to be found in this superlative interpretation of one of the noblest of symphonies.

Altogether the concert was one of the finest that the Boston orchestra has ever given here, and it gained by the well-filled concert hall, which not only had its psychological effect but made fortissimo passages possible which in a half-empty hall might have had to be toned down. Such a concert is a fresh reminder of what a treasure the city has in so perfect an auditorium.

NORTHAMPT
GAZE

NOV 1 1

JOSTEN'S LATES
TO BE PLAYE

Boston Symphony
His "Symphon
Friday and

The world prem phony in F by W tinguished compos of music at Smith given by the Bost
chestra in Sympho
Friday and Satur
14. This is a pa
Symphony hall se occasion Mr. Jos his own symphon
tion of Dr. Serg who will himself of the program.

The Symphony
ten's latest work ing the past sum in three movem
ventional order
Allegro vivace, giusto, and is sc
chestra.

The Boston Sy quently perform
Josten's works. movement, "Jung formed by the in 1929 It has performed by notably the Phil cago Symphon Symphony has both in Boston
Concerto Sacro string orchestra first performed York, in 1929, part of the reper major orchestra
the Boston, Ph land, Cincinnat will be rememb
Boston Sympho generous in gi audiences an o works by Wern annual concert

Besides the F, the Concert
gle," Mr. Joste
tral works are orchestra, an Northampton member as pre land orchestra and the music seph and His and Sndymion been played b phony. It w that Endymio Brethren and were the thre gram of the Werner Joste
the Composer
New ork Oct. conducting.

Werner Jos
tion in Ger chiefly under self a pupil made some Jacques-Dalc
several years
one time con
Opera. After in 1921, Mr. a member of at Smith col he has ever of music. Du he is on sab ing in North his time to

SPRIN MOR

Koussevi
By

BOSTON, [illegible] the [illegible] egion Koussevitsk ton Symph at ceremon of Franco-
The noted for the sca Francois d secretary the name republic as have done."

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

NO[illegible]

JOSTEN'S LATEST WORK TO BE PLAYED IN BOSTON

Boston Symphony Will Perform His "Symphony in F" on Friday and Saturday

The world premiere of the Symphony in F by Werner Josten, distinguished composer and professor of music at Smith college, will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall, Boston, Friday and Saturday, Nov. 13 and 14. This is a part of the regular Symphony hall series, but on this occasion Mr. Josten will conduct his own symphony, at the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will himself conduct the rest of the program.

The Symphony in F is Mr. Josten's latest work, completed during the past summer. It in a work in three movements in the conventional order of fast-slow-fast: Allegro vivace, Andante, Allegro giusto; and is scored for full orchestra.

The Boston Symphony has frequently performed others of Mr. Josten's works. His symphonic movement, "Jungle," was fir performed by the Boston Symphony in 1929. It has subsequently been performed by other orchestras, notably the Philadelphia and Chicago Symphonies. The Boston Symphony has also performed, both in Boston and elsewhere, the Concerto Sacro for piano and string orchestra; this work was first performed at Town hall, New York, in 1929, and has since been part of the repertoire of almost all major orchestras in the country—the Boston, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Cincinnati and others. It will be remembers also that the Boston Symphony has been most generous in giving Northampton audiences an opportunity to hear works by Werner Josten in their annual concerts in this city.

Besides the new Symphony in F, the Concerto Sacro and "Jungle." Mr. Josten's major orchestral works are the Serenade for orchestra, another work which Northampton audiences will remember as presented by the Cleveland orchestra, under Rodzinski, and the music for the ballets, Joseph and His Brethren, Batouala and Sndymion. The last has also been played by the Boston Symphony. It will be remembered that Endymion, Joseph and His Brethren and the Concerto Sacro were the three chose for the program of the orchestral works of Werner Josten presented under the Composers' Forum series in New ork Oct. 28, with Mr. Josten conducting.

Werner Josten studied composition in Germany and Austria, chiefly under Rudolf Siegel, himself a pupil of Humperdinck, and made some special studies under Jacques-Dalcroze. He worked for several years in Paris, and was at one time conductor at the Munich Opera. After coming to America in 1921, Mr. Josten was appointed a member of the music department at Smith college, in 1923, where he has ever since been professor of music. During the present year he is on sabbatical absence, residing in Northampton and devoting his time to composing.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

NOV 1 1 1936

Koussevitsky Honored By French Government

BOSTON, Nov. 10 (AP)—France be[illegible] the order of commander of the Legion of Honor upon Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, here today at ceremonies marked by re-avowal of Franco-American friendship.

The noted conductor bowed his head for the scarlet cravat and medal as Francois de Tessan, French under secretary of state, presented it "in the name of the government of the republic as recompense for what you have done."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

NOV 1 1 1936

DOINGS in the THEATERS

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS COMMUNITY SERIES BRILLIANTLY

Koussevitsky's Band Presents Concert of Most Satisfying Caliber

In brilliant fashion, befitting alike the occasion, the orchestra, and the sponsor, the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the magical leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, opened the 1936-37 series of Community concerts last night in the Municipal Auditorium under the auspices of the Junior league.

The program was a well-balanced one, both in the program and in execution and the one disappointing feature remarked by a number was that the orchestra offered no encores despite the insistent applause of the 4000 members who crammed every available seat in the Auditorium. If that be a fault, it is indeed a minor one. Perhaps the conductor's busy day yesterday in Boston where he received the French Legion of Honor may have been the cause.

The announcement that the metropolitan rule of not allowing late comers to be seated during the playing of numbers was as welcome as it was well obeyed. Further evidence that Springfield is really growing up musically was noted by the refraining from applause between the movements of the opening Mozart symphony. Surely, the applause between the movements of the concluding Brahms symphony can be forgiven. With such music it was inevitable.

Little that is original can be said about the musicianship of the conductor and the orchestra which is one of the greatest in the country. Its proximity, too, gives it ties that are also endearing. It has been one of Springfield's special favorites.

The program opened with the infrequently heard Symphony in A major by Mozart. Written by a youth at the age of 18, it is scored chiefly for the string section with two oboes and horns which are rarely used. The music is sparkling, and more than once suggestive of dance music. The rhythmic portions of the Allegro are balanced by the more pensive Andante which sings itself none the less.

Welcome was the cello soloist, Jean Bedetti who next offered with orchestral background, the Faure "Elegie." He has played here before, but not with the orchestra in the Community series. The accompaniment to this poignant melody is usually played by the piano, but the full orchestra added immeasurable depth to the music. The playing was superb.

With as many interpretations as the title has counterparts in real life. "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss offers the average conductor innumberable difficulties, but Koussevitsky is no ordinary conductor. Heard last night, it is difficult to see why the music first attracted then repelled the friends of the composer. It is the story of the man seeking pleasure where he may, hoping to find all joys incarnated in one woman. The story is told in dramatic fashion, down to its final ashes.

The program concluded with the Symphony number two in D major, by Johannes Brahms. Although the music is not subtle, it achieves a thrilling variety of tone and coloring in the hands of the Boston orchestra. Here one finds a Brahms that is surely not the serious, sober composer of the C symphony. The melodic appeal of the music is strong and the audience took it to its heart.

The conductor shared the applause with his men, gracefully acknowledging the aid of his well-known concert master, Richard Burgin. The Community Concert association will next present Pascha Heifetz, violinist on December 11.

FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD-NEWS

NOV 1 2 1936

Koussevitsky Honored By French Government

BOSTON, Nov. 12. (AP)—France bestowed the order of commander of the Legion of Honor upon Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tuesday at ceremonies marked by revowal of Franco-American friendship.

The noted conductor received the scarlet cravat and medal from Francois de Tessan, French under secretary of state, who presented it "in the name of the Government of the Republic as recompense for what you have done."

NEW YORK MIRROR

NOV 1 3 1936

MUSIC

By JULIAN SEAMAN

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin the 51st season of the Boston orchestra in New York on Thursday evening, Nov. 19, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 21, in Carnegie Hall. The program:

Thursday Evening—Symphony in E flat, No. 102, Haydn; "La Mer," Debussy; Symphony No. 5 in C. Minor, Beethoven.

Saturday afternoon—"Les Offrandes Oubliees" ("The Forgotten Sacrifice"), Olivier Messiaen; Symphony in A (Koechel 201, No. 29), Mozart; "Don Juan," Richard Strauss; Symphony No. 5, in E flat, Sibelius.

Messiaen, whose score will be accorded a first New York performance, belongs to that group of four French composers who style themselves "Le Jeune France." The piece was first performed in America by Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston on Oct. 16. It was composed in 1931 and has been played several times in Paris.

The so-called "Four," reminiscent of the famous "Five" of St. Petersburg and the more recent "Six" in Paris, are Messiaen, Daniel Lesur, Yves Baudrier and Andre Jolivet. They have dedicated themselves "to the dissemination of works youthful, free, as far removed from revolutionary as from academic formulas."

CHRONICLE

Dr. Serge A. Koussevitsky of Brookline, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been made a commander of the French Legion of Honor, the highest rank in the order. The cravat denoting the rank was presented Dr. Koussevitsky by Francois de Tessan, French Under Secretary of State, at a luncheon at the Hotel Touraine Tuesday sponsored by the Franco-American Committee of the 1937 International Exhibition in Paris. Dr. Koussevitsky was made a knight in the Legion in 1924 and promoted to officer in 1930. Recognition by France of the local man comes as a result of his intimate association with that country and for his work in the cause of French music. Dr. Koussevitsky lived in Paris from 1918 to 1924 and still owns a home there.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 1 4 1936

SEASON TO BE OPENED BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky Again Will Direct Orchestra Friday Night at Academy Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will give the opening concert of its Brooklyn season next Friday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Dr. Koussevitzky will offer the following program:

Symphony in A-major (Koechel No. 201) ....Mozart
  Allegro moderato.
  Andante.
  Minuet.
  Finale: Allegro con spirito.
Divertimento from "Le Baiser de la fee" ....Stravinsky
  Allegorical Ballet
  Sinfonia.
  Danses Suisses: Valse.
  Scherzo.
Pas de deux.
  Adagio—Variation—Coda
INTERMISSION
Symphony in D-minor...........Franck
  Lento. Allegro non troppo.
  Allegretto.
  Allegro non troppo.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 1 3 1936

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY NEW WORK BY WERNER JOSTEN

Northampton Composer to Conduct Premiere in Hub City

Special to The Hartford Times

Northampton, Mass. — The world premiere of the "Symphony in F" by Werner Josten, distinguished composer and professor of music at Smith College, will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, tonight and Saturday.

This is a part of the regular Symphony Hall series but on this occasion Mr. Josten will conduct his own symphony, at the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who will himself conduct the rest of the program.

The "Symphony in F" is Mr. Josten's latest work, completed during the past summer. It has the conventional three movements: allegro vivace, andante, allegro giusto; and is scored for full orchestra.

Plays Works Often

The Boston Symphony has frequently performed others of Mr. Josten's orchestral works. His symphonic movement "Jungle" was first performed by the Boston Symphony in 1929. It has subsequently been performed by other symphony orchestras, notably the Philadelphia and Chicago Symphonies.

The Boston Symphony also has performed, both in Boston and elsewhere, the "Concerto Sacro" for piano and string orchestra. This work was first performed at Town Hall, New York, in 1929, and has since been a part of the repertoire of almost all major orchestras in the country.

Beside these, Mar. Josten's major orchestral works are the "Serenade" for orchestra and the music for the ballets "Joseph and His Brethren," "Batouala" and "Endymion."

Had Noted Teachers

Werner Josten studied composition in Germany and Austria, chiefly under Rudolf Siegel, himself a pupil of Humperdinck, and made some special studies under Jacques-Dalcroze. He worked for several years in Paris and was at one time conductor at the Munich Opera.

After coming to this country in 1921, Mr. Josten was appointed a member of the music department of Smith College in 1923, where he has ever since been professor of music. During the present year he is on sabbatical leave, residing for the present in Northampton and devoting his time to composing.

CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER

NOV 1 3 1936

'Unfinished' Leads November List of New Victor Discs

Boston Symphony's Schubert is Superb; Other Records in Review

Responding to what is referred to as an insistent demand, Victor has issued a new Musical Masterpiece set of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, the eighth, in B minor, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

Dr. Koussevitszky's interpretation, given the great boon of Higher Fidelity recording, is nothing radical. But it shows obvious careful study and preparation. Where the Philadelphia Orchestra has been acclaimed in certain recordings for its woodwinds and brasses, the Boston corps must go down in this and other sets as the epitome of string effects.

Themes well known everywhere seem to acquire new meaning in this new presentation. It seems that the orchestra and its conductor have caught the very essence of Schubert. On the odd side the same ensemble plays the Ballet Music from "Rosamunde" very beautifully indeed. This is the featured set for November and it should find a ready audience. (M-319).

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

NOV 1 4 1936

Victor Releases The "Unfinished" Symphony

That ever-popular orchestral masterpiece, Schubert's Symphony No. 8, in B minor—familiarly known as the "unfinished" symphony—has been recently released by the RCA-Victor Co. (14120-1-2-A) in a recording that for balance, clearness of tone and sheer beauty of sound doffs its figurative hat to few, if any, current wax performances. The work is supplemented by the same composer's overture to "Rosamunde," regarding the playing of which one subscribes to the same sentiments.

The orchestra is the Boston Symphony, conducted by its leader, Serge Koussevitzky, and right at the start let it be said that the distinguished Bostonians have left no stone unturned in bringing about a remarkable piece of music-making. The score has been followed with a gratifying adherence to tempi. And, in fact, this writer timed the performance, only to find that split seconds were shy of the twenty-two minutes traditionally alloted to its duration.

Dynamic gradations, ranging as they do from triple piano to crashing fortes, are there in glittering profusion, and the interpretation measures up to all the standards that this organization has set for itself.

Special mention may be made of the fascinatingly precise sixteenths played by the first and second violins in the first movement, and the sensuous utterance of the melody against them by the oboe and clarinet.

Of course, the lush theme that turned up several years ago in a musical comedy with the title "You are my song of love," also comes in for its share of warm and expert reading. From any standpoint both the symphony and the overture merit the attention of the discerning record buyer. R. C. B.

Season To Be Opened by Boston Symphony

Next Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will open its fifty-first season in New York. On that occasion the program, will consist of Haydn's symphony in B flat, No. 102; Debussy's "La Mer," and the fifth symphony of Beethoven.

On the following Saturday afternoon, also in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky will give a first local performance of "Les Offrandes oubliees," by Olivier Messiaen, who belongs to the group of four composers in Paris known as "La Jeune France." Mozart's symphony in A major, No. 29 (K.201); Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," and the fifth symphony of Sibelius will be the other numbers.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
UNION

NOV 1 4 1936

Hub Hears Symphony Composed at Jaffrey

BOSTON, Nov. 13—(A.P.)— The Boston's Symphony orchestra played for the first time today a Smith college professor's syndicated symphony designed to suggest the machine age.

The music entitled "Symphony in F," was composed at Jaffrey, N. H., last summer by Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith.

At the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, Josten was on the podium.

The machine age, with its attendant human energy and recklessness, was the dominant theme.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 1 5 1936

To Honor Koussevitzky

The Artists of Carnegie Hall will give an informal reception next Thursday night to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and Gerome Brush at the close of the first of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The reception will be held in the Carnegie Hall Art Gallery, where Mr. Brush's charcoal portraits of members of the Boston orchestra will be on exhibition from Thursday to Saturday.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

NOV 11 1936

JOSTEN'S LATEST WORK TO BE PLAYED IN BOSTON

Boston Symphony Will Perform His "Symphony in F" on Friday and Saturday

The world premiere of the Symphony in F by Werner Josten, distinguished composer and professor of music at Smith college, will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall, Boston, Friday and Saturday, Nov. 13 and 14. This is a part of the regular Symphony hall series, but on this occasion Mr. Josten will conduct his own symphony, at the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will himself conduct the rest of the program.

The Symphony in F is Mr. Josten's latest work, completed during the past summer. It in a work in three movements, in the conventional order of fast-slow-fast: Allegro vivace, Andante, Allegro giusto; and is scored for full orchestra.

The Boston Symphony has frequently performed others of Mr. Josten's works. His symphonic movement, "Jungle," was first performed by the Boston Symphony in 1929 .It has subsequently been performed by other orchestras, notably the Philadelphia and Chicago Symphonies. The Boston Symphony has also performed, both in Boston and elsewhere, the Concerto Sacro for piano and string orchestra; this work was first performed at Town hall, New York, in 1929, and has since been part of the repertoire of almost all major orchestras in the country—the Boston, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Cincinnati and others. It will be remembers also that the Boston Symphony has been most generous in giving Northampton audiences an opportunity to hear works by Werner Josten in their annual concerts in this city.

Besides the new Symphony in F, the Concerto Sacro and "Jungle," Mr. Josten's major orchestral works are the Serenade for orchestra, another work which Northampton audiences will remember as presented by the Cleveland orchestra, under Rodzinski, and the music for the ballets, Joseph and His Brethren, Batouala and Sndymion. The last has also been played by the Boston Symphony. It will be remembered that Endymion, Joseph and His Brethren and the Concerto Sacro were the three chose for the program of the orchestral works of Werner Josten presented under the Composers' Forum series in New ork Oct. 28, with Mr. Josten conducting.

Werner Josten studied composition in Germany and Austria, chiefly under Rudolf Siegel, himself a pupil of Humperdinck, and made some special studies under Jacques-Dalcroze. He worked for several years in Paris, and was at one time conductor at the Munich Opera. After coming to America in 1921, Mr. Josten was appointed a member of the music department at Smith college, in 1923, where he has ever since been professor of music. During the present year he is on sabbatical absence, residing in Northampton and devoting his time to composing.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

NOV 11 1936

Koussevitsky Honored By French Government

BOSTON, Nov. 10 (AP)—France be[illegible] the order of commander of the Legion of Honor upon Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, here today at ceremonies marked by re-avowa of Franco-American friendship.

The noted conductor bowed his head for the scarlet cravat and medal as Francois de Tessan, French under secretary of state, presented it "in the name of the government of the republic as recompense for what yo have done."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

NOV 11 1936

DOINGS in the THEATERS

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS COMMUNITY SERIES BRILLIANTLY

Koussevitsky's Band Presents Concert of Most Satisfying Caliber

In brilliant fashion, befitting alike the occasion, the orchestra, and the sponsor, the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the magical leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, opened the 1936-37 series of Community concerts last night in the Municipal Auditorium under the auspices of the Junior league.

The program was a well-balanced one, both in the program and in execution and the one disappointing feature remarked by a number was that the orchestra offered no encores despite the insistent applause of the 4000 members who crammed every available seat in the Auditorium. If that be a fault, it is indeed a minor one. Perhaps the conductor's busy day yesterday in Boston where he received the French Legion of Honor may have been the cause.

The announcement that the metropolitan rule of not allowing late comers to be seated during the playing of numbers was as welcome as it was well obeyed. Further evidence that Springfield is really growing up musically was noted by the refraining from applause between the movements of the opening Mozart symphony. Surely, the applause between the movements of the concluding Brahms symphony can be forgiven. With such music it was inevitable.

Little that is original can be said about the musicianship of the conductor and the orchestra which is one of the greatest in the country. Its proximity, too, gives it ties that are also endearing. It has been one of Springfield's special favorites.

The program opened with the infrequently heard Symphony in A major by Mozart. Written by a youth at the age of 18, it is scored chiefly for the string section with two oboes and horns which are rarely used. The music is sparkling, and more than once suggestive of dance music. The rhythmic portions of the Allegro are balanced by the more pensive Andante which sings itself none the less.

Welcome was the cello soloist, Jean Bedetti who next offered with orchestral background, the Faure "Elegie." He has played here before, but not with the orchestra in the Community series. The accompaniment to this poignant melody is usually played by the piano, but the full orchestra added immeasurable depth to the music. The playing was superb.

With as many interpretations as the title has counterparts in real life. "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss offers the average conductor innumberable difficulties, but Koussevitsky is no ordinary conductor. Heard last night, it is difficult to see why the music first attracted then repelled the friends of the composer. It is the story of the man seeking pleasure where he may, hoping to find all joys incarnated in one woman. The story is told in dramatic fashion, down to its final ashes.

The program concluded with the Symphony number two in D major, by Johannes Brahms. Although the music is not subtle, it achieves a thrilling variety of tone and coloring in the hands of the Boston orchestra. Here one finds a Brahms that is surely not the serious, sober composer of the C symphony. The melodic appeal of the music is strong and the audience took it to its heart.

The conductor shared the applause with his men, gracefully acknowledging the aid of his well-known concert master, Richard Burgin. The Community Concert association will next present Pascha Heifetz, violinist on December 11.

FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD-NEWS

NOV 12 1936

Koussevitsky Honored By French Government

BOSTON, Nov. 12, (AP)—France bestowed the order of commander of the Legion of Honor upon Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tuesday at ceremonies marked by revowal of Franco-American friendship.

The noted conductor received the scarlet cravat and medal from Francois de Tessan, French under secretary of state, who presented it "in the name of the Government of the Republic as recompense for what you have done."

NEW YORK MIRROR

NOV 13 1936

MUSIC

By JULIAN SEAMAN

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin the 51st season of the Boston orchestra in New York on Thursday evening, Nov. 19, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 21, in Carnegie Hall. The program:

Thursday Evening—Symphony in E flat, No. 102, Haydn; "La Mer," Debussy; Symphony No. 5 in C. Minor, Beethoven.

Saturday afternoon—"Les Offrandes Oubliees" ("The Forgotten Sacrifice"), Olivier Messiaen; Symphony in A (Koechel 201, No. 29), Mozart; "Don Juan," Richard Strauss; Symphony No. 5, in E flat, Sibelius.

Messiaen, whose score will be accorded a first New York performance, belongs to that group of four French composers who style themselves "Le Jeune France." The piece was first performed in America by Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston on Oct. 16. It was composed in 1931 and has been played several times in Paris.

The so-called "Four," reminiscent of the famous "Five" of St. Petersburg and the more recent "Six" in Paris, are Messiaen, Daniel Lesur, Yves Baudrier and Andre Jolivet. They have dedicated themselves "to the dissemination of works youthful, free, as far removed from revolutionary as from academic formulas."

CHRONICLE

Brookline Tras

Dr. Serge A. Koussevitsky of Brookline, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been made a commander of the French Legion of Honor, the highest rank in the order. The cravat denoting the rank was presented Dr. Koussevitsky by Francois de Tessan, French Under Secretary of State, at a luncheon at the Hotel Touraine Tuesday sponsored by the Franco-American Committee of the 1937 International Exhibition in Paris. Dr. Koussevitsky was made a knight in the Legion in 1924 and promoted to officer in 1930. Recognition by France of the local man comes as a result of his intimate association with that country and for his work in the cause of French music. Dr. Koussevitsky lived in Paris from 1918 to 1924 and still owns a home there.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 14 1936

SEASON TO BE OPENED BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky Again Will Direct Orchestra Friday Night at Academy Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will give the opening concert of its Brooklyn season next Friday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Dr. Koussevitzky will offer the following program:

Symphony in A-major (Koechel No, 201) ....Mozart
  Allegro moderato.
  Andante.
  Minuet.
  Finale: Allegro con spirito.
Divertimento from "Le Baiser de la fee" ....Stravinsky
  Allegorical Ballet
  Sinfonia.
  Danses Suisses: Valse.
  Scherzo.
  Pas de deux.
  Adagio—Variation—Coda
INTERMISSION
Symphony in D-minor..............Franck
  Lento. Allegro non troppo.
  Allegretto.
  Allegro non troppo.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 13 1936

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY NEW WORK BY WERNER JOSTEN

Northampton Composer to Conduct Premiere in Hub City

Special to The Hartford Times

Northampton, Mass. — The world premiere of the "Symphony in F" by Werner Josten, distinguished composer and professor of music at Smith College, will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, tonight and Saturday.

This is a part of the regular Symphony Hall series but on this occasion Mr. Josten will conduct his own symphony, at the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who will himself conduct the rest of the program.

The "Symphony in F" is Mr. Josten's latest work, completed during the past summer. It has the conventional three movements: allegro vivace, andante, allegro giusto; and is scored for full orchestra.

Plays Works Often

The Boston Symphony has frequently performed others of Mr. Josten's orchestral works. His symphonic movement "Jungle" was first performed by the Boston Symphony in 1929. It has subsequently been performed by other symphony orchestras, notably the Philadelphia and Chicago Symphonies.

The Boston Symphony also has performed, both in Boston and elsewhere, the "Concerto Sacro" for piano and string orchestra. This work was first performed at Town Hall, New York, in 1929, and has since been a part of the repertoire of almost all major orchestras in the country.

Beside these, Mar. Josten's major orchestral works are the "Serenade" for orchestra and the music for the ballets "Joseph and His Brethren," "Batouala" and "Endymion."

Had Noted Teachers

Werner Josten studied composition in Germany and Austria, chiefly under Rudolf Siegel, himself a pupil of Humperdinck, and made some special studies under Jacques-Dalcroze. He worked for several years in Paris and was at one time conductor at the Munich Opera.

After coming to this country in 1921, Mr. Josten was appointed a member of the music department of Smith College in 1923, where he has ever since been professor of music. During the present year he is on sabbatical leave, residing for the present in Northampton and devoting his time to composing.

CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER

NOV 13 1936

'Unfinished' Leads November List of New Victor Discs

Boston Symphony's Schubert is Superb; Other Records in Review

Responding to what is referred to as an insistent demand, Victor has issued a new Musical Masterpiece set of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, the eighth in B minor, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation, given the great boon of Higher Fidelity recording, is nothing radical. But it shows obvious careful study and preparation. Where the Philadelphia Orchestra has been acclaimed in certain recordings for its woodwinds and brasses, the Boston corps must go down in this and other sets as the epitome of string effects.

Themes well known everywhere seem to acquire new meaning in this new presentation. It seems that the orchestra and its conductor have caught the very essence of Schubert. On the odd side the same ensemble plays the Ballet Music from "Rosamunde" very beautifully indeed. This is the featured set for November and it should find a ready audience. (M-319).

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

NOV 14 1936

Victor Releases The "Unfinished" Symphony

That ever-popular orchestral masterpiece, Schubert's Symphony No. 8, in B minor—familiarly known as the "unfinished" symphony—has been recently released by the RCA-Victor Co. (14120-1-2-A) in a recording that for balance, clearness of tone and sheer beauty of sound doffs its figurative hat to few, if any, current wax performances. The work is supplemented by the same composer's overture to "Rosamunde," regarding the playing of which one subscribes to the same sentiments.

The orchestra is the Boston Symphony, conducted by its leader, Serge Koussevitzky, and right at the start let it be said that the distinguished Bostonians have left no stone unturned in bringing about a remarkable piece of music-making. The score has been followed with a gratifying adherence to tempi. And, in fact, this writer timed the performance, only to find that split seconds were shy of the twenty-two minutes traditionally alloted to its duration.

Dynamic gradations, ranging as they do from triple piano to crashing fortes, are there in glittering profusion, and the interpretation measures up to all the standards that this organization has set for itself.

Special mention may be made of the fascinatingly precise sixteenths played by the first and second violins in the first movement, and the sensuous utterance of the melody against them by the oboe and clarinet.

Of course, the lush theme that turned up several years ago in a musical comedy with the title "You are my song of love," also comes in for its share of warm and expert reading. From any standpoint both the symphony and the overture merit the attention of the discerning record buyer. R. C. B.

Season To Be Opened by Boston Symphony

Next Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will open its fifty-first season in New York. On that occasion the program will consist of Haydn's symphony in B flat, No. 102; Debussy's "La Mer," and the fifth symphony of Beethoven.

On the following Saturday afternoon, also in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky will give a first local performance of "Les Offrandes oubliees," by Olivier Messiaen, who belongs to the group of four composers in Paris known as "La Jeune France." Mozart's symphony in A major, No. 29 (K.201); Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," and the fifth symphony of Sibelius will be the other numbers.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
UNION

NOV 14 1936

Hub Hears Symphony Composed at Jaffrey

BOSTON, Nov. 13—(A.P.)— The Boston's Symphony orchestra played for the first time today a Smith college professor's syndicated symphony designed to suggest the machine age.

The music entitled "Symphony in F." was composed at Jaffrey, N. H., last summer by Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith.

At the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, Josten was on the podium.

The machine age, with its attendant human energy and recklessness, was the dominant theme.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 15 1936

To Honor Koussevitzky

The Artists of Carnegie Hall will give an informal reception next Thursday night to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and Gerome Brush at the close of the first of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The reception will be held in the Carnegie Hall Art Gallery, where Mr. Brush's charcoal portraits of members of the Boston orchestra will be on exhibition from Thursday to Saturday.

65.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 1 4 1936

Symphony's Guest Soloist

Albert Spalding comes to town and the Metropolitan Theatre along with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday, Nov. 24, for the second concert of the season. Mr. Spalding will be heard with the orchestra in a violin concerto of Mozart. Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, will conduct this concert. The program will open with Bach's Organ Toccata in C-Major, arranged for full orchestra by Leo Weiner, and the closing number will be the First Symphony of Kalinnikov in G-Minor, a work of the earlier Russian school.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

NOV 1 4 1936

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its fifty-first season in New York in this, the fifty-sixth, season of the orchestra, at a pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening at 8:45 and Saturday afternoon at 2:30.

Serge Koussevitzky announces the following program for the Thursday evening concert: Haydn's Symphony in B flat, No. 102; Debussy's orchestral sketches, "La Mer," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

At the concert of Saturday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky will give the first performance in New York of "Les Offrandes Oubliees" ("The Forgotten Sacrifice"), by Olivier Messiaen, who belongs to the group of four composers in Paris calling themselves "La Jeune France." The piece is in three parts—The Cross, The Sin, The Eucharist. Mozart's Symphony in A major No. 29 (K. 201), will open the program. This little-known symphony belongs to the composer's eighteenth year. Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," will also be played, and, in conclusion, the Fifth Symphony in E flat major by Jean Sibelius.

"Les Offrandes Oubliess" had its first American performance under Koussevitzky in Boston on October 16 last. Composed in 1931, it has been performed on several occasions in Paris, notably at a concert last summer given by "La Jeune France" on June 3. "La Jeune France" (consisting of Olivier Messiaen, Daniel-Lesur, Yves Baudrier, Andre Jolivet) have dedicated themselves "to the dissemination of works youthful, free, as far removed from revolutionary formulas as from academic formulas."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

NOV 1 4 1936

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE THURSDAY AND SATURDAY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its fifty-first season in New York (the fifty-sixth season of the orchestra) at a pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening at 8:45 and Saturday afternoon at 2:30, November 19 and 21.

Serge Koussevitzky announces the following program for the Thursday evening concert: Haydn's Symphony in B flat, No. 102; Debussy's orchestral sketches, "La Mer," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

At the concert of Saturday afternoon, Mr. Koussevitzky will give the first performance in New York of "Les Offrandes Oubliees" ("The Forgotten Sacrifices"), by Olivier Messiaen, who belongs to the group of four composers in Paris calling themselves "La Jeune France." Mozart's Symphony in A major, No. 29 (K. 201), will be on the program. Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," will also be played, and in conclusion the Fifth Symphony in E flat major by Jean Sibelius.

The orchestra will give the opening concert of its Brooklyn season Friday evening, November 20, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, offering Mozart's A major Symphony (Koechel No. 201); Divertimento from "Le Baiser de la Fee," of Stravinsky, and the Franck D minor Symphony.

KEENE, N. H.
SENTINEL

Boston, Nov. 14, (AP)—A syncopated symphony designed to suggest the machine age which Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith college, composed at Jaffrey, N. H., last summer was played for the first time here yesterday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Josten conducted the orchestra at the request of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the famous musical organization.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 1 5 1936

Serge Koussevitzky rehearsing Boston Symphony Orchestra for its New York concerts this week.

BANGOR, ME.
NEWS

NOV 1 4 1936

Boston Symphony Plays Composition By Smith Professor

BOSTON, Nov. 13—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra played for the first time today a Smith college professor's syncopated eymphony designed to suggest the machine age.

The music entitled "Symphony in F," was composed at Jaffrey, N. H., last summer by Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith.

At the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the orchestra, Josten was on the podium.

The machine age, with its attendant human energy and recklessness, was the dominant theme.

Dr. Loussevitsky, who was conducting for the first time since receiving the order of Commander of the Legion of Honor last Tuesday, in conducting the rest of the program, has selected composers from Italy, France, Germany and America.

AUGUSTA, ME.
KENNEBEC JOURNAL

NOV 1 4 1936

Portray Machine Age in Symphony

Boston, Nov. 13.—(AP)—The Boston's Symphony Orchestra played for the first time today a Smith College professor's syncopated symphony designed to suggest the machine age.

The music entitled "Symphony in F," was composed at Jaffrey, N. H., last summer, by Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith.

At the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, Josten was on the podium.

The machine age, with its attendant human energy and recklessness was the dominant theme.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who was conducting for the first time since receiving the order of commander of the Legion of Honor last Tuesday, in conducting the rest of the program, had selected composers from Italy, France, Germany and America.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

NOV 1 4 1936

Hub Hears Symphony Composed at Jaffrey

BOSTON, Nov. 14.—(A.P.) — The Boston's Symphony orchestra played for the first time Friday a Smith college professor's syndicated symphony designed to suggest the machine age.

The music entitled "Symphony in F," was composed at Jaffrey, N. H., last summer by Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith.

At the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, Josten was on the podium.

The machine age, with its attendant human energy and recklessness, was the dominant theme.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

11/14/36

BOSTON SYMPHONY

BOSTON, Nov. 13 (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra played for the first time today a Smith College professor's syncopated symphony designed to suggest the machine age.

The music, a Symphony in F, was composed at Jaffrey, N. H., last Summer by Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith.

At the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, Josten conducted.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who received the order of commander of the Legion of Honor last Tuesday, for the rest of the program selected composers from Italy, France, Germany and America.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

NOV 1 4 1936

BOSTON, Nov. 14—(A.P.)—A syncopated symphony designed to suggest the machine age which Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith college, composed at Jaffrey, N. H., last summer was played for the first time here yesterday by the Boston symphony orchestra. Josten conducted the orchestra at the request of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the famous musical organization.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

NOV 1 4 1936

Boston Symphony In Woolsey Next Week

A TRADITION at Woolsey Hall in New Haven, the Boston Symphony orchestra will be on its stage again next Wednesday night at 8:30 with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

Dr. Koussevitzky will open the program with Haydn's Symphony in B-flat No. 102, one of the last that this composer wrote and included in a set which he composed for performance in London. Claude Debussy's three orchestral sketches, "La Mer," will be the second number. Debussy utilizes the full color resources of the modern orchestra for these pictorial sketches in what is described as his most full bodied score.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY NEWS

NOV 1 5 1936

BOSTON BAND OPENS HERE IN TWO CONCERTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, will open its fifty-first New York season with a pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall this week.

The Thursday evening program is made up of numbers by Haydn, Debussy and Beethoven, while the Saturday afternoon bill introduces locally "Les Offrandes Oubliees" ("The Forgotten Sacrifice") by the young French composer, Olivier Messiaen.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 1 5 1936

Music o

Berlioz's Fantastic Sy Meyrowitz—Bac

Victor replaces an early recordin of Schubert's B minor symphony b Stokowski and the Philadelphian with one by Koussevitzky and th Bostonians. The Stokowski record ing, made before he had ceased t exert any check on an apparently unborn tendency toward vulgar extravagance, seems to me preferable to the newer Koussevitzky version, superior though this is as a recording. Koussevitzky's performance of the first movement seems to miss the point entirely; it is curiously indifferent and obtuse. I should like to believe that this impression reflected at least in part the state of mind in which I listened to the records, but the fact that I found the second movement as satisfying as the first had been the reverse argues against this possibility. The Koussevitzky recording covers five sides of three discs; the sixth side is given over to the ballet music from "Rosamunde," charmingly played.

The gentlemen at Camden con-

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 1 5 1936

RECENT G

By COMPTON PAKENHAM

ROM the addition of La

What novelty attaches to Victor Album M-319 lies in the fact that the Schubert "Unfinished" it contains is played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky—sufficient excuse even for another recording, and more than a guarantee that the next will not be required for some years to come. It may be remembered that the last domestic release of this work came from Columbia (Masterworks Album 216) something over a year ago and that it was by the London Symphony Orchestra under Sir Henry Wood. In that Sir Henry dwelt affectionately, not more, on the lyric qualities of the symphony. Between these two all should find one version to satisfy them.

For, in the manner of his recent set of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, Koussevitzky tightens up the first movement, respects Schubert's explicit but seldom noticed direction—andante con moto—in the second, and thus mercifully suppresses the odors prevalent at blossom time. The result is the cleanest and certainly the most im-

INFORMATION OBSCURED

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 15 1936

ORCHESTRA TO GIVE STRAVINSKYBALLET

Boston Musicians Will Offer 'The Fairy's Kiss' at First Concert on Friday.

MISS BARNES IS HOSTESS

Little Known Symphony From Mozart's Youth Will Also Be a Program Feature.

Miss Phyllis Barnes will be hostess in the committee box at the opening concert of the 1936-37 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening in the opera house of the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Other boxholders for the opening concert are Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., H. A. Hennessey and the Adelphi Alumnae Association.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, will present the first performance in Greater New York of Stravinsky's Divertimento Ballet, "The Fairy's Kiss," the only performance of the work to be given here as the feature of the program on Friday evening. The orchestral suite was conducted by Stravinsky himself in performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in their home cities.

The program will open with Mozart's symphony in A, "Koechel Two Hundred One," a little known symphony belonging to the composer's eighteenth year. Cesar Franck's symphony in G minor will conclude the program.

The series of five concerts to be held next Friday evening, Friday evening, Jan. 8; Thursday evening, Feb. 11; Friday evening, March 12, and Friday evening, April 2, is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Edward C. Blum, president of board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, R. Huntington Woodman, chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee, Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman. Mrs. Blum is serving as chairman of boxes this season. Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow is membership chairman of the Brooklyn Committee, and Miss Virginia Marvin is chairman of the Junior League Committee.

The Brooklyn Citizens Committee made public yesterday the dates and subscription prices for the season of grand opera by the Metropolitan Opera Association at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Five performances will be given Tuesday evenings: Dec. 29, Jan. 12, Feb. 2, Feb. 23 and March 30.

Subscriptions will be received tomorrow and the seats allotted, according to application, after Tuesday, Dec. 1.

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS IN NEW YORK

No. Concert Cancelled in Half Century

NEW YORK, Nov. 19 (AP)—The Boston Symphony tonight began the second half century of its concert seasons in New York. In all that time no concert ever has been cancelled.

Only two have been postponed, one by a death, and the other by the blizzard of 1888.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky played a Haydn symphony in B flat, the ninth of the London series, so-called; Debussy's "La Mer," and Beethoven's fifth symphony, a favorite of the conductor's.

As usual, the orchestra will come five times to New York, playing twice here and once in Brooklyn at each

---

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 15 1936

Conductor of the Boston Symphony

Which will open its season at the Brooklyn Academy Friday and at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday aften

---

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

Boxholders for Season's First Symphony Concert; Series' Subscribers Named

Boxholders for the opening concert of the 1936-37 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn at the Academy of Music Friday evening, will be Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., H. A. Hennessey and the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association. Miss Phyllis Barnes will be the hostess in the committee box at this concert.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past 10 years, has selected a notable program to open his eleventh season at the head of this great orchestra. The feature of the first concert will be the first performance in Greater New York of Stravinsky's Divertimento Ballet, "The Fairy's Kiss," which will be the only performance of the work to be given in this locality. The orchestral suite was conducted by Stravinsky in performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in their home cities, when the composer visited America two seasons ago. The program will open with Mozart's Symphony in A; "Koechel Two Hundred One," a little known symphony belonging to the composer's eighteenth year. Cesar Franck's symphony in G Minor concludes the program.

This series of five concerts is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman.

For the 1936-37 season Mrs. Blum is serving as chairman of boxes, Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow as membership chairman of the Brooklyn committee and Miss Virginia Marvin as chairman of the Junior League committee.

Among the subscribers are Dr. Joseph D. Allen, Juan A. Almirall, Lloyd Almirall, John Anderson, Charles D. Atkins, Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Miss Frances Coutts, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, Mrs. Frank L. Babbott, Walter H. Crittenden, Dr. John H. Denbigh, Mrs. Charles L. Babcock Jr., Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mrs. G. R. Butler, Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mrs. Guy DuVal, S. R. Estey, Mrs. Merrill N. Foote, Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. Charles Franklin, Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Miss Emily Goetz, Miss Louise Goetze, Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, Mrs. J. Morton Halstead, Mrs. William Peter Hamilton, Walter Hammitt, Mrs. James M. Hills, H. A. Ingraham, Dr. William A. Jewett, Mrs. Frederick L. Johanns, Ralph Jonas, Jacob C. Klinck, David H. Lanman, Mrs. John E. Leech, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Dr. William H. Lohman, Mrs. W. W. Marshall, Dr. Edwin P. Maynard Jr., Dr. Raymond B. Miles, Miss Ida A. Mollenhauer, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Frank H. Parsons, Mrs. Charles E. Perkins, J. H. Post, Charles E. Potts, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Richardson Pratt, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. G. William Rasch, Mrs. Frank Reynolds, Mrs. Donald Ross, Mrs. John D. H. Schulz, Mrs. Helen W. Seeley, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons, Mrs. William Slater, Mrs. Harold I. Small, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith, Porter Steele, Miss Marion J. Terry, Thornton C. Thayer, Carl H. Tollefsen, Mrs. Walter Truslow.

John T. Underwood, Mrs. James P. Warbasse, Mrs. Edwin C. Ward, Mrs. Walter F. Wells, Mrs. George N. Whittlesey, Mrs. Mary O. Whitton, Surrogate George A. Wingate, R. Huntington Woodman, Charles S. Adams, Miss Elizabeth Adams, Mrs. Frederick Addinsell, Mrs. H. R. Barnes, Miss Julia B. Anthony, Miss Dorothy L. Betts, Miss Mary L. Braman, Dr. Cornelia C. Brandt, Roscoe C. E. Brown, Mrs. Samuel T. Brown, Miss Mary E. Butterick, Gordon W. Colton, Mrs. W. G. Creamer, Mrs. James C. Cropsey, Sidney W. Davidson, Charles A. Decker, Mrs. W. L. Douglas, Miss Amy Dunlap, Miss M. B. Fairbanks, Mrs. M. H. Fawcett, Dr. David Feiner, Mrs. Carl Fique, Miss H. F. Fischer, E. P. Goodrich, Mrs. R. P. Griffin.

Dr. Lawrence Guion, Mrs. H. C. Harriott, Mrs. S. M. Harrisson, Miss G. P. Hart, Miss M. Alina Hatfield, Mrs. Edward Haynes, Dr. Henry T. Hotchkiss, Mrs. O. P. Humpstone, Miss Amy L. Huntington, Mrs. H. V. Kaltenborn, Mrs. C. D. Killian, Mrs. Ralph Kirkman, Miss B. M. Kitching, Miss J. M. Langthorne, Mrs. Winfield Scott, Mrs. E. R. Mayer, Mrs. W. J. Merrill, Miss M. Louise Munson, Miss Helen Pfeiffer, Miss E. H. Pigot, Miss Charlotte Lucy Potter, Mrs. E. W. Putnam, Miss S. M. Read, Miss Lillian M. Roehrig, Miss M. L. Rossiter, Mrs. F. R. Schepmoes, Carl G. Schmidt, John H. Shearman, Miss G. E. Skinner, Charles Small, Mrs. W. C. Spelman, Mrs. Edward G. Sperry, Robert H. Staniford, Dr. E. K. Tanner, Hiram A. Tuttle, Francis Jay Underhill.

Miss Frances E. White, Miss H. H. White, Mrs. Arthur Windels, Miss Frances E. Woodward, Philip Youtz, Mrs. William H. Ziegler, Mrs. William McKinley Barber, Miss Mary Branstad, Dr. George L. Buist, Mrs. O. M. Clark, Mrs. George S. Frank, Mrs. William B. Greenman, Mrs. Roy Hart, Dr. Tasker Howard, Philip A. Hubert, Halsted James, Almet R. Latson Jr., Benjamin R. C. Low, Clifford E. Paige, Dr. E. Clifford Place, Mrs. C. D. Pollock, Miss Catherine E. Recknagel, H. W. Richter, Miss Jessie H. Righter, Mrs. J. H. Schumann, Mrs. John L Spance Jr. and H. J. Swann.

* * *

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
NOV 15 1936

66.

Boston Symphon

Boxholders for the opening concert of the 1936-37 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn at the Academy of Music next Friday evening, will be Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. Thomas E. Murray, jr., H. A. Hennessey and the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association. Miss Phyllis Barnes will be the hostess in the committee box at this concert.

This series of five concerts, which will be held on Friday evening, Nov. 20; Friday evening, Jan. 8; Thursday evening, Feb. 11; Friday evening, March 12, and Friday evening, April 2, is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the Board of Trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman.

For the 1936-37 season Mrs. Blum is serving as chairman of boxes, Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow as membership chairman of the Brooklyn Committee and Miss Virginia Marvin, as chairman of the Junior League Committee.

Among the subscribers are: J. D. Allen, Juan A. Almirall, Lloyd Almirall, John Anderson, Charles D. Atkins, Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Miss Frances Coutts, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, Mrs. Frank L. Babbott, Walter H. Crittenden, Dr. John H. Denbigh, Mrs. Charles L. Babcock jr., Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mrs. G. R. Butler, Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mrs. Guy DuVal, S. R. Estey, Mrs. Merrill N. Foote, Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. Charles Franklin, Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Miss Emily Goetz, Miss Louise Goetz, Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. M. P. Goodfellow, Mrs. J. Morton Halstead, Mrs. William Peter Hamilton, Walter Hammitt, Mrs. James M. Hills, H. A. Ingraham, Dr. William A. Jewett.

Mrs. Frederick L. Johanns, Ralph Jonas, Jacob C. Klinck, David H. Lanman, Mrs. John E. Leech, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Dr. William H. Lohman, Mrs. W. W. Marshall, Dr. Edwin P. Maynard, jr., Dr. Raymond B. Miles, Miss Ida A. Mollenhauer, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Frank H. Parsons, Mrs. Charles E. Perkins, J. H. Post, Charles E. Potts, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Richardson Pratt, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. G. William Rasch, Mrs. Frank Reynolds, Mrs. Donald Ross, Mrs. John Schulz, Mrs. Helen W. Seeley, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons, Mrs. William Slater, Mrs. Harold I. Small, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith, Porter Steele, Marion J. Terry, Thornton C. Thayer, Carl H. Tollefson, Mrs. Walter Truslow.

John T. Underwood, Mrs. James P. Warbasse, Mrs. Edwin C. Ward, Mrs. Walter F. Wells, Mrs. George N. Whittlesey, Mrs. Mary O. Whitton, Surrogate George A. Wingate, R. Huntington Woodman, Charles S. Adams, Miss Elizabeth Adams, Mrs. Frederick Addinsell, Mrs. H. R. Barnes, Miss Julia B. Anthony, Miss Dorothy L. Betts, Miss Mary L. Braman, Dr. Cornelia C. Brandt, Roscoe C. E. Brown, Mrs. Samuel T. Brown, Miss Mary E. Butterick, Gordon W. Colton, Mrs. W. G.

Concert, Friday

Creamer, Mrs. James C. Cropsey, Sidney W. Davidson, Charles A. Decker, Mrs. W. L. Douglas, Miss Amy Dunlap, Miss M. B. Fairbanks, Mrs. M. H. Fawcett, Dr. David Feiner, Mrs. Carl Fique, Miss H. F. Fischer, E. P. Goodrich, Mrs. R. P. Griffin, Dr. Lawrence Guion, Mrs. H. C. Harriott, Mrs. S. M. Harrisson, Miss G. P. Hart, Miss M. Alina Hatfield, Mrs. Edward Haynes, Dr. Henry T. Hotchkiss, Mrs. O. P. Humpstone, Miss Amy L. Huntington, Mrs. H. V. Kaltenborn, Mrs. C. D. Killian, Mrs. Ralph Kirkman, Miss B. M. Kitching.

Miss J. M. Langthorne, Mrs. Winfield Scott, Mrs. E. R. Mayer, Mrs. W. J. Merrill, Miss M. Louise Munson, Miss Helen Pfeiffer, Miss E. H. Pigot, Miss Charlotte Lucy Potter, Mrs. E. W. Putnam, Miss S. M. Read, Miss Lillian M. Roehrig, Miss M. L. Rossiter, Mrs. F. R. Schepmoes, Carl G. Schmidt, John H. Shearman, Miss G. E. Skinner, Charles Small, Mrs. W. C. Spelman, Mrs. Edward G. Sperry, Robert H. Staniford, Dr. E. K. Tanner, Hiram A. Tuttle, Francis Jay Underhill, Miss Frances E. White, Miss H. H. White, Mrs. Arthur Windels, Miss Frances E. Woodward, Philip Youtz, Mrs. William H. Ziegler, Mrs. William McKinley Barber, Miss Mary Branstad, Dr. George L. Buist, Mrs. O. M. Clark, Mrs. George S. Frank, Mrs. William B. Greenman, Mrs. Roy Hart, Dr. Tasker Howard, Philip A. Hubert, Halsted James, A. R. Latson, jr., Benjamin R. C. Low, William Clifford E. Paige, Dr. E. Clifford Place, Mrs. C. D. Pollock, Miss Catherine E. Recknagel, H. W. Richter, Miss Jessie H. Righter, Mrs. J. H. Schumann, Mrs. John L. Spence, jr., and H. J. Swann.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
NOV 15 1936

anizations

ng This Week With M w night in Town Hall; Hulda Lashan-d Friday in Carnegie Hall; Serge Koussday and Saturday

Boston Symphony Programs

For his first Carnegie Hall program of the season, next Thursday night, Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the works which opened the orchestra's Boston season in Symphony Hall on October 9-10; Haydn's symphony in B flat, No. 102, the ninth of the London series; Debussy's "La Mer" and Beethoven's fifth symphony.

The Boston Symphony's Saturday afternoon program in Carnegie Hall will include the first performance here of music by Olivier Messiaen, a French composer born at Avignon on December 10, 1908, who is one of a group of Parisian composers who call themselves "La Jeune France." The thers are Daniel-Lesur, Yves Bau-r and Andre Jolivet. The work be heard Saturday, "Les Offrandes" ubliées" to be heard Saturday, "Les ubliées" (The Forgotten Sacrifice) is n three sections, "The Cross," "The Sin" and "The Eucharist." According John Burk's program notes, this as first played in Paris in one of the Concerts Straram" on February 19, 31, and has had several later performances by other French orchestras. was introduced to America by the Boston Symphony this fall in its home concerts of October 16-17.

Mozart's early symphony in A, No. 29 (K. 201), Strauss's "Don Juan" and Sibelius's fifth symphony complete Dr. Koussevitzky's program. The program for the season's first Brooklyn concert, Friday night at the Academy of Music, includes the Mozart symphony, a divertimento from Stravinsky's allegorical ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fée," and Cesar Franck's symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ON RADIO TONIGHT

The Boston Symphony orchestra will open its 51st season in New York in Carnegie hall tonight. A great audience will greet the orchestra and its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, since both the Thursday evening series and the Saturday afternoon series in the historic hall have been fully subscribed for the season of five pairs of concerts. Tonight's concert will be broadcast over a national network. This will be the first time that a performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra, playing in Carnegie hall, will have been heard on the air. Of the program which will include Haydn's Symphony in B flat, No. 102, Debussy's "La Mer," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the Symphony of Haydn and the first section of the score of Debussy will be broadcast. This will be the first in a series of 12 broadcasts of Boston Symphony performances on Thursdays, from Carnegie hall; the Academy of Music, Brooklyn; Sanders Theater, Cambridge, and Symphony hall, Boston. Tonight's concert will be heard over the local WBZ station from 8:45 to 9:30.

Nov. Herald 19

LEO LITWIN AWARDED NEW YORK RECITAL

Leo Litwin, Boston pianist, in competition with 27 pianists from all parts of the country, was last week awarded the first prize in the annual contest given by the MacDowell Club of New York. The award is a New York recital with all expenses paid. Among the judges were Edwin Hughes, widely known music editor and critic and Sigismund Stojowski, celebrated pianist. Mr. Litwin will give his New York recital this season under the auspices of the MacDowell Club of New York.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

66.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 15 1936

ORCHESTRA TO GIVE STRAVINSKYBALLET

Boston Musicians Will Offer 'The Fairy's Kiss' at First Concert on Friday.

MISS BARNES IS HOSTESS

Little Known Symphony From Mozart's Youth Will Also Be a Program Feature.

Miss Phyllis Barnes will be hostess in the committee box at the opening concert of the 1936-37 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening in the opera house of the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Other boxholders for the opening concert are Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., H. A. Hennessey and the Adelphi Alumnae Association.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, will present the first performance in Greater New York of Stravinsky's Divertimento Ballet, "The Fairy's Kiss," the only performance of the work to be given here as the feature of the program on Friday evening. The orchestral suite was conducted by Stravinsky himself in performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in their home cities.

The program will open with Mozart's symphony in A, "Koechel Two Hundred One," a little known symphony belonging to the composer's eighteenth year. Cesar Franck's symphony in G minor will conclude the program.

The series of five concerts to be held next Friday evening, Friday evening, Jan. 8; Thursday evening, Feb. 11; Friday evening, March 12, and Friday evening, April 2, is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Edward C. Blum, president of board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, R. Huntington Woodman, chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee, Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman. Mrs. Blum is serving as chairman of boxes this season. Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow is membership chairman of the Brooklyn Committee, and Miss Virginia Marvin is chairman of the Junior League Committee.

The Brooklyn Citizens Committee made public yesterday the dates and subscription prices for the season of grand opera by the Metropolitan Opera Association at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Five performances will be given Tuesday evenings: Dec. 29, Jan. 12, Feb. 2, Feb. 23 and March 30.

Subscriptions will be received tomorrow and the seats allotted, according to application, after Tuesday, Dec. 1.

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS IN NEW YORK

No Concert Cancelled in Half Century

Herald Nov 20

NEW YORK, Nov. 19 (AP)—The Boston Symphony tonight began the second half century of its concert seasons in New York. In all that time no concert ever has been cancelled.

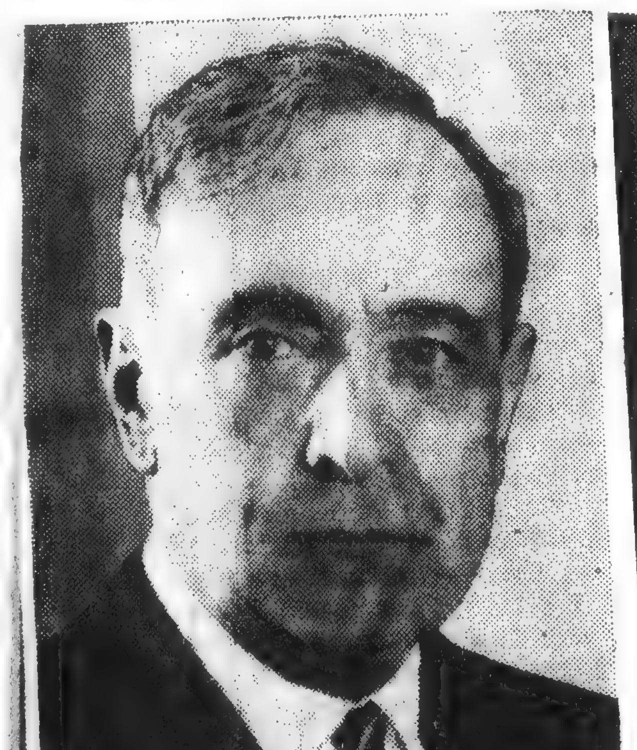
Only two have been postponed, one by a death, and the other by the blizzard of 1888.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky played a Haydn symphony in B flat, the ninth of the London series, so-called; Debussy's "La Mer," and Beethoven's fifth symphony, a favorite of the conductor's.

As usual, the orchestra will come five times to New York, playing twice here and once in Brooklyn at each trip.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
NOV 15 1936

anizations



w night in Town Hall; Hulda Lashan- d Friday in Carnegie Hall; Serge Kous- sday and Saturday

ng This Week With Mc

Boston Symphony Programs

For his first Carnegie Hall program of the season, next Thursday night, Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the works which opened the orchestra's Boston season in Symphony Hall on October 9-10; Haydn's symphony in B flat, No. 102, the ninth of the London series; Debussy's "La Mer" and Beethoven's fifth symphony.

The Boston Symphony's Saturday afternoon program in Carnegie Hall will include the first performance here of music by Olivier Messiaen, a French composer born at Avignon on December 10, 1908, who is one of a group of Parisian composers who call themselves "La Jeune France." The thers are Daniel-Lesur, Yves Bau- er and Andre Jolivet. The work be heard Saturday, "Les Offrandes ubliées" to be heard Saturday, "Les ubliées" (The Forgotten Sacrifice) is n three sections, "The Cross," "The in" and "The Eucharist." According John Burk's program notes, this as first played in Paris in one of the oncerts Straram" on February 19, 31, and has had several later per- ormances by other French orchestras. was introduced to America by the Boston Symphony this fall in its home concerts of October 16-17.

Mozart's early symphony in A, No. 29 (K. 201), Strauss's "Don Juan" and Sibelius's fifth symphony complete Dr. Koussevitzky's program. The program for the season's first Brooklyn concert, Friday night at the Academy of Music, includes the Mozart symphony, a divertimento from Stravinsky's allegorical ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fée," and Cesar Franck's symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ON RADIO TONIGHT

The Boston Symphony orchestra will open its 51st season in New York in Carnegie hall tonight. A great audience will greet the orchestra and its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, since both the Thursday evening series and the Saturday afternoon series in the historic hall have been fully subscribed for the season of five pairs of concerts. Tonight's concert will be broadcast over a national network. This will be the first time that a performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra, playing in Carnegie hall, will have been heard on the air. Of the program which will include Haydn's Symphony in B flat, No. 102, Debussy's "La Mer," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the Symphony of Haydn and the first section of the score of Debussy will be broadcast. This will be the first in a series of 12 broadcasts of Boston Symphony performances on Thursdays, from Carnegie hall; the Academy of Music, Brooklyn; Sanders Theater, Cambridge, and Symphony hall, Boston. Tonight's concert will be heard over the local WBZ station from 8:45 to 9:30.

Nov. Herald 19

LEO LITWIN AWARDED NEW YORK RECITAL

Leo Litwin, Boston pianist, in competition with 27 pianists from all parts of the country, was last week awarded the first prize in the annual contest given by the MacDowell Club of New York. The award is a New York recital with all expenses paid. Among the judges were Edwin Hughes, widely known music editor and critic and Sigismund Stojowski, celebrated pianist. Mr. Litwin will give his New York recital this season under the auspices of the MacDowell Club of New York.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
NOV 15 1936

Conductor of the Boston Symphony

Which will open its season at the Brooklyn Academy Friday and at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday after

---

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

Boxholders for Season's First Symphony Concert; Series' Subscribers Named

Boxholders for the opening concert of the 1936-37 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn at the Academy of Music Friday evening, will be Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., H. A. Hennessey and the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association. Miss Phyllis Barnes will be the hostess in the committee box at this concert.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past 10 years, has selected a notable program to open his eleventh season at the head of this great orchestra. The feature of the first concert will be the first performance in Greater New York of Stravinsky's Divertimento Ballet, "The Fairy's Kiss," which will be the only performance of the work to be given in this locality. The orchestral suite was conducted by Stravinsky in performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in their home cities, when the composer visited America two seasons ago. The program will open with Mozart's Symphony in A; "Koechel Two Hundred One," a little known symphony belonging to the composer's eighteenth year. Cesar Franck's symphony in G Minor concludes the program.

This series of five concerts is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman.

For the 1936-37 season Mrs. Blum is serving as chairman of boxes, Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow as membership chairman of the Brooklyn committee and Miss Virginia Marvin as chairman of the Junior League committee.

Among the subscribers are Dr. Joseph D. Allen, Juan A. Almirall, Lloyd Almirall, John Anderson, Charles D. Atkins, Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Miss Frances Coutts, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, Mrs. Frank L. Babbott, Walter H. Crittenden, Dr. John H. Denbigh, Mrs. Charles L. Babcock Jr., Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mrs. G. R. Butler, Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mrs. Guy DuVal, S. R. Estey, Mrs. Merrill N. Foote, Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. Charles Franklin, Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Miss Emily Goetz, Miss Louise Goetze, Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, Mrs. J. Morton Halstead, Mrs. William Peter Hamilton, Walter Hammitt, Mrs. James M. Hills, H. A. Ingraham, Dr. William A. Jewett, Mrs. Frederick L. Johanns, Ralph Jonas, Jacob C. Klinck, David H. Lanman, Mrs. John E. Leech, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Dr. William H. Lohman, Mrs. W. W. Marshall, Dr. Edwin P. Maynard Jr., Dr. Raymond B. Miles, Miss Ida A. Mollenhauer, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Frank H. Parsons, Mrs. Charles E. Perkins, J. H. Post, Charles E. Potts, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Richardson Pratt, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. G. William Rasch, Mrs. Frank Reynolds, Mrs. Donald Ross, Mrs. John D. H. Schulz, Mrs. Helen V. Seeley, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons, Mrs. William Slater, Mrs. Harold I. Small, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith, Porter Steele, Miss Marion J. Terry, Thornton C. Thayer, Carl H. Tollefsen, Mrs. Walter Truslow.

John T. Underwood, Mrs. James P. Warbasse, Mrs. Edwin C. Ward, Mrs. Walter F. Wells, Mrs. George N. Whittlesey, Mrs. Mary O. Whitton, Surrogate George A. Wingate, R. Huntington Woodman, Charles S. Adams, Miss Elizabeth Adams, Mrs. Frederick Addinsell, Mrs. H. R. Barnes, Miss Julia B. Anthony, Miss Dorothy L. Betts, Miss Mary L. Braman, Dr. Cornelia C. Brandt, Roscoe C. E. Brown, Mrs. Samuel T. Brown, Miss Mary E. Butterick, Gordon W. Colton, Mrs. W. G. Creamer, Mrs. James C. Cropsey, Sidney W. Davidson, Charles A. Decker, Mrs. W. L. Douglas, Miss Amy Dunlap, Miss M. B. Fairbanks, Mrs. M. H. Fawcett, Dr. David Feiner, Mrs. Carl Fique, Miss H. F. Fischer, E. P. Goodrich, Mrs. R. P. Griffin.

Dr. Lawrence Guion, Mrs. H. C. Harriott, Mrs. S. M. Harrisson, Miss G. P. Hart, Miss M. Alina Hatfield, Mrs. Edward Haynes, Dr. Henry T. Hotchkiss, Mrs. O. P. Humpstone, Miss Amy L. Huntington, Mrs. H. V. Kaltenborn, Mrs. C. D. Killian, Mrs. Ralph Kirkman, Miss B. M. Kitching, Miss J. M. Langthorne, Mrs. Winfield Scott, Mrs. E. R. Mayer, Mrs. W. J. Merrill, Miss M. Louise Munson, Miss Helen Pfeiffer, Miss E. H. Pigot, Miss Charlotte Lucy Potter, Mrs. E. W. Putnam, Miss S. M. Read, Miss Lillian M. Roehrig, Miss M. L. Rossiter, Mrs. F. R. Schepmoes, Carl G. Schmidt, John H. Shearman, Miss G. E. Skinner, Charles Small, Mrs. W. C. Spelman, Mrs. Edward G. Sperry, Robert H. Staniford, Dr. E. K. Tanner, Hiram A. Tuttle, Francis Jay Underhill.

Miss Frances E. White, Miss H. H. White, Mrs. Arthur Windels, Miss Frances E. Woodward, Philip Youtz, Mrs. William H. Ziegler, Mrs. William McKinley Barber, Miss Mary Branstad, Dr. George L. Buist, Mrs. O. M. Clark, Mrs. George S. Frank, Mrs. William B. Greenman, Mrs. Roy Hart, Dr. Tasker Howard, Philip A. Hubert, Halsted James, Almet R. Latson Jr., Benjamin R. C. Low, Clifford E. Paige, Dr. E. Clifford Place, Mrs. C. D. Pollock, Miss Catherine E. Recknagel, H. W. Richter, Miss Jessie H. Righter, Mrs. J. H. Schumann, Mrs. John L. Spance Jr. and H. J. Swann.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
NOV 15 1936

Boston Symphon

Boxholders for the opening concert of the 1936-37 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn at the Academy of Music next Friday evening, will be Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. Thomas E. Murray, jr., H. A. Hennessey and the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association. Miss Phyllis Barnes will be the hostess in the committee box at this concert.

This series of five concerts, which will be held on Friday evening, Nov. 20; Friday evening, Jan. 8; Thursday evening, Feb. 11; Friday evening, March 12, and Friday evening, April 2, is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the Board of Trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman.

For the 1936-37 season Mrs. Blum is serving as chairman of boxes, Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow as membership chairman of the Brooklyn Committee and Miss Virginia Marvin, as chairman of the Junior League Committee.

Among the subscribers are: J. D. Allen, Juan A. Almirall, Lloyd Almirall, John Anderson, Charles D. Atkins, Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Miss Frances Coutts, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, Mrs. Frank L. Babbott, Walter H. Crittenden, Dr. John H. Denbigh, Mrs. Charles L. Babcock, jr., Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mrs. G. R. Butler, Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mrs. Guy DuVal, S. R. Estey, Mrs. Merrill N. Foote, Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. Charles Franklin, Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Miss Emily Goetz, Miss Louise Goetz, Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. M. P. Goodfellow, Mrs. J. Morton Halstead, Mrs. William Peter Hamilton, Walter Hammitt, Mrs. James M. Hills, H. A. Ingraham, Dr. William A. Jewett.

Mrs. Frederick L. Johanns, Ralph Jonas, Jacob C. Klinck, David H. Lanman, Mrs. John E. Leech, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Dr. William H. Lohman, Mrs. W. W. Marshall, Dr. Edwin P. Maynard, jr., Dr. Raymond B. Miles, Miss Ida A. Mollenhauer, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Frank H. Parsons, Mrs. Charles E. Perkins, J. H. Post, Charles E. Potts, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Richardson Pratt, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. G. William Rasch, Mrs. Frank Reynolds, Mrs. Donald Ross, Mrs. John Schulz, Mrs. Helen W. Seeley, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons, Mrs. William Slater, Mrs. Harold I. Small, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith, Porter Steele, Marion J. Terry, Thornton C. Thayer, Carl H. Tollefson, Mrs. Walter Truslow.

John T. Underwood, Mrs. James P. Warbasse, Mrs. Edwin C. Ward, Mrs. Walter F. Wells, Mrs. George N. Whittlesey, Mrs. Mary O. Whitton, Surrogate George A. Wingate, R. Huntington Woodman, Charles S. Adams, Miss Elizabeth Adams, Mrs. Frederick Addinsell, Mrs. H. R. Barnes, Miss Julia B. Anthony, Miss Dorothy L. Betts, Miss Mary L. Braman, Dr. Cornelia C. Brandt, Roscoe C. E. Brown, Mrs. Samuel T. Brown, Miss Mary E. Butterick, Gordon W. Colton, Mrs. W. G.

y Concert, Friday

Creamer, Mrs. James C. Cropsey, Sidney W. Davidson, Charles A. Decker, Mrs. W. L. Douglas, Miss Amy Dunlap, Miss M. B. Fairbanks, Mrs. M. H. Fawcett, Dr. David Feiner, Mrs. Carl Fique, Miss H. F. Fischer, E. P. Goodrich, Mrs. R. P. Griffin, Dr. Lawrence Guion, Mrs. H. C. Harriott, Mrs. S. M. Harrisson, Miss G. P. Hart, Miss M. Alina Hatfield, Mrs. Edward Haynes, Dr. Henry T. Hotchkiss, Mrs. O. P. Humpstone, Miss Amy L. Huntington, Mrs. H. V. Kaltenborn, Mrs. C. D. Killian, Mrs. Ralph Kirkman, Miss B. M. Kitching.

Miss J. M. Langthorne, Mrs. Winfield Scott, Mrs. E. R. Mayer, Mrs. W. J. Merrill, Miss M. Louise Munson, Miss Helen Pfeiffer, Miss E. H. Pigot, Miss Charlotte Lucy Potter, Mrs. E. W. Putnam, Miss S. M. Read, Miss Lillian M. Roehrig, Miss M. L. Rossiter, Mrs. F. R. Schepmoes, Carl G. Schmidt, John H. Shearman, Miss G. E. Skinner, Charles Small, Mrs. W. C. Spelman, Mrs. Edward G. Sperry, Robert H. Staniford, Dr. E. K. Tanner, Hiram A. Tuttle, Francis Jay Underhill, Miss Frances E. White, Miss H. H. White, Mrs. Arthur Windels, Miss Frances E. Woodward, Philip Youtz, Mrs. William H. Ziegler, Mrs. William McKinley Barber, Miss Mary Branstad, Dr. George L. Buist, Mrs. O. M. Clark, Mrs. George S. Frank, Mrs. William B. Greenman, Mrs. Roy Hart, Dr. Tasker Howard, Philip A. Hubert, Halsted James, A. R. Latson, jr., Benjamin R. C. Low, William Clifford E. Paige, Dr. E. Clifford Place, Mrs. C. D. Pollock, Miss Catherine E. Recknagel, H. W. Richter, Miss Jessie H. Righter, Mrs. J. H. Schumann, Mrs. John L. Spence, jr., and H. J. Swann.

67.

At Auditorium for Boston Symphony Concert

Springfield Union Photo

Parties entering the Auditorium for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. Left, Mr. and Mrs. Richmond Lewis. Center, Mrs. Karl Alderman of Holyoke, secretary of the Holyoke Community Concert Association. Right, Mrs. Charles J. Bellamy and daughter, Mary Jean.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

CONCERTS THIS WEEK

Globe, Nov [illegible]

Symphony Hall

JAN SMETERLIN, pianist, at 3:30 this afternoon. Mr Smeterlin has become a favorite pianist in Boston, especially noted for his performances of Chopin, to whose music he will confine himself today. The numbers are as follows:

Fantasy, Op 49; Impromptu, Op 36; Two Mazurkas, Op 36, No. 2, and Op 33, No. 2; Ballade, Op 23; Prelude, Op 28, No. 15; Sonata in B-flat minor; Three Etudes, Op 10, No. 2; Op 25, Nos, 5 and 11; Andante spianato and Grande Polonaise Brillante.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at 2:30 Friday and 8:15 Saturday. Seventh program, to be conducted by Richard Burgin. The orchestral transcription of Bach's Organ Toccata in C major, made in 1927 by the Hungarian composer, Leo Weiner, will have first performances in Boston. Mr Burgin will repeat a striking score which he introduced to this city two seasons ago: the instrumental "Symphony" drawn by Hindemith from his opera "Matthias the Painter." The "Symphony" created a good impression at that time. It consists of three movements, "Angelic Concert," "Entombment" and "Temptation of St Anthony." Matthias Gruenewald, the subject of the opera, was a 16th Century Rhenish painter, whose most notable surviving work is the tryptich created for the altar piece of Isenheim at Colmar, Alsace. These three pictures, in fact, inspired the music of Hindemith's "Symphony." The remaining number is the First Symphony by Kalinnikov, introduced here 15 years ago and not since repeated. Kalinnikov was a Russian who died at the height of his career, in 1900. He professed the faith of the Moscow school of music in the days when leading musicians of that city differed sharply from the esthetic creed of St Petersburg. This program will also be played at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, next Thursday at 8, Mr Burgin conducting.

TYLER, TEXAS
COURIER-TIMES

NOV 19 1936

Boston Symphony

Another of radio's outstanding features will return to the air at 7:45 p. m. when the world-famous Boston Symphony orchestra inaugurates its fifth season of broadcasts. The programs will come from Carnegie hall in New York and will be carried over the NBC Blue network (probably WENR or WMAQ). Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will again conduct and two noted masterworks of symphonic literature will be performed, Haydn's B Flat Symphony No. 102, the ninth on his "London Symphonies" and DeBussy's "La Mer."

B.

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST

NOV 14 1936

'Unfinished' Leads November List of New Victor Discs

Boston Symphony's Schubert is Superb; Other Records in Review

◆

Responding to what is referred to as an insistent demand, Victor has issued a new Musical Masterpiece set of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, the eighth, in B minor, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

Dr. Koussevitszky's interpretation, given the great boon of Higher Fidelity recording, is nothing radical. But it shows obvious careful study and preparation. Where the Philadelphia Orchestra has been acclaimed in certain recordings for its woodwinds and brasses, the Boston corps must go down in this and other sets as the epitome of string effects.

Themes well known everywhere seem to acquire new meaning in this new presentation. It seems that the orchestra and its conductor have caught the very essence of Schubert. On the odd side the same ensemble plays the Ballet Music from "Rosamunde" very beautifully indeed. This is the featured set for November and it should find a ready audience. (M-319).

Quartet pre-

DAVENPORT, IA.
Democrat & Ledger

NOV 15 1936

BOSTON ORCHESTRA BEGINS BROADCASTS ON THURSDAY

The world famous Boston Symphony orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky will return to the National Broadcasting networks for its fifth season as an exclusive NBC feature on Thursday.

Instead of broadcasting its entire series from Boston, the orchestra will be heard in four of its Carnegie hall concerts in New York, three from the Sanders theater at Harvard university, three from Symphony hall, Boston and one from the Academy of Music in Brooklyn. Nine of the famous "pop" concerts in Boston also will be broadcast.

The 12 concerts scheduled during the regular season will be on Thursday evenings, except the three Boston programs which will be Thursday matinees. The "pop" concerts will be presented in a post-season series beginning on May 6.

11-2

Throng Fills Auditorium for First Concert

(Continued from First Page)

the association and the league, and secondly the excellence of the attractions offered on the course.

The concert took on all the glamor of a gala performance. It was a brilliant audience listening to great music, superbly interpreted. It was interesting to note that the great majority of the audience arrived in time. Advance notice had been given that no one would be seated until the opening number was completed. The lobby of the Auditorium was no place to wait last night. Of course, there were a few stragglers, but there always will be and nine times out of 10 they will be occupying front row seats.

There is nothing new to write of the Boston Symphony Orchestra or its great conductor. It is one of the four great orchestras in the world and whether or not one puts it at the head of the list is entirely an individual matter. What is important, as far as last night's performance is concerned, is the fact that Dr. Koussevitzky continues to be a master program builder. Once again he proved his ability to group together an engrossing list of works.

The program opened with Mozart's "Symphony in A Major (K 201)." We have no record of this work ever having been played here before. In fact, it had its first hearing in Boston not many weeks ago. It seems strange the work has not been played more often. It is engaging, light and spirited, and provided a delightful opening for the program. It abounds in rhythmic difficulties but, as is usual with this orchestra, it was played with consummate skill.

There has been a constant demand for a soloist to appear with the orchestra but up to last night the idea had not been practical. Last night, Dr. Koussevitzky introduced that sterling first cellist, Jean Bedetti, who was heard in an "Elegie" by Faure. The work was originally written for cello and piano but was later orchestrated by the composer. Mr. Bedetti needs no introduction to Springfield. He has played here many times both as soloist and with various ensembles. He played the lovely Faure work with fine sensitivity and smooth, rich tone. His musicianship is a sheer delight. The orchestra provided ideal accompaniment.

It is a long, long way from the music of Strauss, yet the richly orchestrated music of "Don Juan" seemed to follow quite naturally the delicate brightness of Mozart and Faure. Even its rich scoring and insinuating appeal, melodically and harmonically, failed to dwarf what had gone before. The music was played with a sonority and daring contrast which almost lifted the audience from its seats. Strauss would have rejoiced in the richness of the strings and the gorgeous tone of the brass choir. Dr. Koussevitzky seemed to become Don Juan as he led his men through this musical portrait of that engaging figure of romance.

The program closed with the second symphony of Brahms. Of the four symphonies, the second is perhaps the easiest to grasp and has perhaps the most personal appeal. Its melodic beauty, its simple structure and the rhythmic and dynamic power in the final movement provide all that is needed. Its moods are not too subtle for comprehension. The audience had difficulty in restraining its applause after the charming third movement but made known its pleasure in no uncertain terms at the close of a truly inspired reading.

Dr. Koussevitzky shared the applause with his men, having them rise several times. Yesterday was a very busy day for the conductor. At noon in Boston he was decorated by the French government in a colorful ceremony. He has done a great deal for French music and the "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris are events of major importance in the French capital.

The second concert in the course will be given by Jascha Heifitz, violinist, on Dec. 11.

Continuing Disagreement

Conducting the first concert of the third week of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony season in Carnegie Hall the other evening, John Barbirolli was again the recipient of mixed comment from the principal reviewers of the New York press. Lawrence Gilman of the Herald Tribune was a strong minority of one in his principal contention that the conductor led a "most moving, lucid and eloquently faithful performance" of "Don Quixote," by Strauss. The other four reviews at hand were less complimentary toward the proceedings and even adversely critical of part of them, with varying degrees of astringency. In particular, the presentation of the Sixth Brandenburg Concerto of Bach was criticized as lacking in clarity and precision in the playing of the parts. The playing of the first of the Haydn "London" Symphonies was, on the other hand, well received.

Olin Downes of the Times wrote that "with every wish to fully evaluate Mr. Barbirolli's accomplishments, it must be said that his performances fell considerably below the excellent readings of a Beethoven overture and symphony he had given the preceding week—performances which thus far represent the high-water mark of his achievement in this city." Transcript, [illegible]

Bostonians Afield

At the recital which Isabel French, soprano of this city, gave in Town Hall, New York, the other evening, a new song, "Little Men", by Paul Mimart, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was so well liked by the audience that the singer repeated it. The program also included "The Tree and the Image" by Mabel Daniels, Boston composer.

Trans. Nov. [illegible]

Unassuming Confidence

RICHARD BURGIN

Concert-Master and Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Who Will Direct the Concerts of Next Thursday, Friday and Saturday

Hindemith and Kalinnikov Symphonies to Be Given

Her, Nov. 22/36

By ALEXANDER W. WILLIAMS

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts this week offers two interesting symphonic revivals. One is a new work that Mr. Burgin conducted in December, 1934; the other was written in the late 19th century and was performed by the Boston Symphony in 1921 but never since that date. The former is Paul Hindemith's symphony Mathis der Maler (Matthias the Painter); the other is Basil Kalinnikov's symphony No. 1 in G minor. It should be added that the latter was played at a concert by the People's Symphony Orchestra (Fabien Sevitzky, conductor) in February, 1935.

Kalinnikov was the son of a Russian police official and was born in the provinces in 1866. He went to Moscow and worked in great poverty at music. Finally he obtained the post of second conductor of Italian opera in Moscow in 1893, and held it for only a year when he was forced to leave for the south of Russia by definite signs of tuberculosis. He devoted the remainder of his sad life to composition and died in 1901. His most famous work was this first symphony, first performed in Kiev in 1897, a success in Vienna in 1898 and well received in the many cities in which it was subsequently played. Kalinnikov wrote one other symphony, a suite, two intermezzi and two symphonic poems for orchestra and other works.

The program-notes for the performance of this symphony in Philadelphia in 1911 contain a detailed description of the score, which is too long to quote in full. The commentator finds that the symphony is very Slavic in character and writes: "It begins with a theme that is individual from the first bar and has moreover in a brief range a touch of ancient (or barbarous) mode. The theme is instantly followed by a strange kind of chromatic chant that swells from soft notes to a loud burst." The English horn has the melody of the andante against a "pulsing" background. "In the scherzo is clearly the vein of primitive Slav dance, with that touch of ancient mode that we feel at the beginning of the symphony. The finale is throughout in a sustained high key of joyous expression, while withal in closest relation with the foregoing movement."

Philip Hale in his criticism of the concert of 1921 in this paper had this to say: "It is customary to say when a composer is thus fated that his works show a melancholy akin to despair. This has been said of many in various walks of life. The fact remains that some do not thus betray physical weakness and mental perturbation. Now in Kalinnikov's symphony certain themes and phrases are tinged with melancholy, but it is not a personal lamentation, never a wail, never a shriek, as is the case with many pages of Tchaikovsky; there is no suggestion of sullen, morose despair, as in the pages of Brahms. There is the melancholy that so often characterizes the Russian folk song, though the words of the song may be anything but somber. Kalinnikov's themes are often simple, but they make a direct appeal through honesty of sentiment and expression. He had a sense of grace and beauty. He could be ingenious in harmonic and orchestral treatment without seeming merely a haphazard experimenter." So much for the Kalinnikov symphony, a work evidently to be anticipated with pleasure.

MATHIS DER MALER

Hindemith's music is not usually associated with delight, but it has much to offer. Few modern composers, which is saying a good deal, have been so roundly and persistently condemned as Hindemith. His music, by some odd chance, has been played frequently in England. Also by an odd chance he composed the music that the B. B. C. orchestra played after the death of George V. But, if we may trust the majority of the critics in London, Hindemith is sorely hated in that country, which has in the past been so friendly to foreign composers. Most of them write contemptuously of his "facile spinning of dissonant counterpoint," and thereby infer that his work is totally uninspired. Hindemith has also had his troubles with the present government of Germany, difficulties over this Mathis der Maler symphony and which still continue.

Mr. Ernest Newman, who has been particularly hostile towards Hindemith, was not entirely appeased by the rather less discordant pages of Mathis der Maler. However, he did say: "It is always interesting and sometimes powerful; but the more Hindemith abandons his atonalism and his academic counterpoint (new style) and thinks in the ordinary idiom, the more evident it becomes that he has not emerged as far out of the familiar German rut as he has been trying all these years to make us believe."

The Mathis der Maler symphony, which Mr. Burgin will conduct on Friday and Saturday, is based, as those who heard it will remember, on three paintings of the Isenheim altar piece by Matthias Grunewald, which now hang in the museum at Colmar in Alsace. One of the paintings, "The Angelic Concert," was reproduced in the most recent program-book of the Boston Symphony The others are "The Entombment" and "The Temptation of Saint Anthony." The pictures are not really program music but indicate a spiritual affinity with the movements of the symphony.

This symphony was produced here in a season which offered some extremely interesting modern music, including Alban Berg's "Lulu" suite, Szymanowsky's violin concerto, Malipiero's violin concerto and symphony, Stravinsky's "Persephone." Naturally people held widely differing opinions over this music, but Hindemith's symphony surely did not suffer by comparison. A composer who is writing an opera, as Hindemith has done with Mathis der Maler, is wise to let the music that he is composing be heard in another form. Otherwise he will have a long wait before his opera is produced. One would not say that the Mathis der Maler symphony was particularly operatic. We recall it as a work of a great deal more originality than Mr. Newman is willing to allow. It was obviously a work that needed a second performance, so that we may look forward to it again with lively interest.

Herald Nov. 22/36

Richard Burgin, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will conduct the orchestra's regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts this week as well as the Thursday evening concert in Sanders Theater, Harvard University.

SAN DIEGO, CAL.
TRIBUNE

NOV 19 1936

The world-famous Boston Symphony orchestra, under direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will return to the NBC-KFSD network tonight at 6 for its fifth season as an exclusive NBC feature.

Recognized throughout the musical world as one of the finest symphonic organizations in existence, the Boston symphony has had the additional advantage of playing under the same conductor throughout its season for several years, thus perfecting an ensemble which critics have acclaimed without a peer.

* * *

Audiences for Three Orchestras in Two Cities

Koussevitzky and the Boston Band Before Assemblage Of Manhattanites

NEW YORK

A strange city is a strange culture. In it one may learn many lessons and discover a multitude of truths that one should have known before. Thus a trip to Philadelphia to hear the celebrated Philadelphia Orchestra perform in its own Academy of Music under Leopold Stokowski is a repaying undertaking. Go the following evening to a regular concert of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony in Carnegie Hall under its new conductor, John Barbirolli, and you have an invaluable standard of comparison. On the third day return to Carnegie to hear Dr. Serge Koussevitzky direct the opening of the New York season of the Boston Symphony. For a Bostonian this may prove an even greater stimulation, since New York does not take its five concerts for granted as Boston often does its twenty-four. Judging from the proceedings of Thursday night this opening was a social occasion of the season as well as a musical one.

* * *

Arriving at the Hall on West Fifty-seventh street some fifteen minutes before the quarter-to-nine beginning, the visiting observer is first impressed by the characteristic urbanity and the exceptional grooming of the New York audience. The sea of opera hats, the warm glow of fur and velvet, the glitter of jewels—all point to the renaissance of elegance, the care and well-being of metropolitan living.

Whether the city loves Koussevitzky better than Boston, as it protests, is not for the present writer to argue. But it is a fact that hardly an empty seat can be found in the immense house when the music begins, and that there are sixty-odd people standing at the rear of the floor. Others are sitting in the luxurious lounge where they may examine Gerome Brush's charcoal drawings of the Boston musicians while they listen to the opening symphony in amplified transmission from the closed auditorium. This is a solution to the problem of late-comers, who are warned by forbidding placards that no one may enter the concert room until the conclusion of the entire first number, whether it be symphony or overture.

The conductor is recalled thrice after the Haydn B-flat, and there is an ovation after Debussy's "La Mer." The applause on the whole, however, is no more vigorous than we are accustomed to hear at Symphony Hall, which has long since exploded the traditional cliche about Bostonian coldness and restraint in such matters.

There seems to be nothing in the familiar allegation that our orchestra "plays better" when on tour: the orchestra played on Thursday quite as we customarily hear it at home, the only difference being that the Huntington avenue hall rounds the tone and produces it with a resonance that is at once finer and more beautiful than Carnegie Hall can do, despite its obvious acoustical distinction. The editor of this department has suggested that the principal reason for the excitement of critics in New York as well as other cities is that they are not used to hearing the Boston Symphony. It is difficult to disagree with him.

* * *

Mr. Barbirolli's listeners were not such a numerous company, there being far more empty seats than his musicianly conducting deserved. It was encouraging, nevertheless, to note that his audience's enthusiasm was far greater than that of his critics, who seem constantly bent on comparing him with his predecessor, on the one hand, and proclaiming the stupidity of the comparison, on the other.

A young man who has far to go, but who is peculiarly fitted for building something permanent out of a much-abused orchestra, Mr. Barbirolli merits the esteem of all who are building the future of his admirable orchestra. A gathering of only slightly smaller brilliance listened intently, took refreshment sparingly, and looked with interest upon the magnificent screens on exhibition in the gallery-lounge.

* * *

Barbirolli and Stokowski as They Impress Resident Concert Attendants

Philadelphia is another matter. The Academy of Music looks like a railway terminal on the outside, but has the distinguished interior of a German court theater of the seventeenth century. Despite numerous brightly colored posters made by school childen to publicize Philadelphia's eminently successful "Youth Concerts," this eighty-year-old hall maintains its dignity in the lobby in a vain attempt to atone for its exterior. But as proof that age breeds unconventionality rather than its opposite, the stage boasts a blue curved sounding-board and the same extraordinary silver podium that came to Boston with this orchestra last spring. The effect is not so much that of a bull in a china shop as of Hollywood invading the East.

The Tuesday evening concerts correspond roughly to Boston's Mondays with the difference that the series includes ten instead of six concerts and that it tends to be more rather than less popular than the longer series. Of the Academy's thirty-one hundred seats, twenty-eight hundred were filled to hear Stokowski's first concert of the season. The audience, somewhat less fashionable than New York, but more so than an ordinary symphony assembly in Boston, is ready to go on its knees to its conductor, who, in his turn, is prepared to go to any lengths to supply it with excited and indignant but always worshipful conversation.

After some Bach-Stokowski and the Brahms No. 2 we heard some music which was provocatively listed as "Das Rheingold" by Wagner—"freely transcribed for orchestra by Leopold Stokowski!" Raised arms and a cold back discouraged applause that this excellent orchestra richly deserved, and it was forced to turn its attentions to the Second Hungarian Rhapsody of Liszt, although there are few short scores better calculated to injure the majesty of Wagner's Rhine. Returning to the stage in a storm of applause, the conductor seemed to consider words necessary, so he made the following speech:

"It is a great pleasure to be guest conductor of your magnificent orchestra. I have heard wonderful things about this orchestra, but they are all true. We are sorry you did not like the Wagner, so we will try to please you with some Bach."

Tremendous applause, of course, and encore Bach-Stokowski. . . . Encore everything but honest music-making and honest conducting. With Ormandy, now the principal Philadelphian conductor, it is a different matter. But more of him, perhaps, on another occasion.

GEORGE H. L. SMITH

CITIZEN

36

Boston Symphony Orchestra Returns To Air Waves Tonight

Famous Musical Organization To Broadcast Program Over WJZ at 8:45 o'Clock From Carnegie Hall—Cordell Hull To Speak

Another of radio's outstanding features returns to the air tonight when the world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra inaugurates its fifth season of broadcasts.

This program, to be heard over WJZ from 8:45 to 9:30 o'clock, will be broadcast from Carnegie Hall in New York where the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be playing the first of its annual subscription series of New York concerts.

Secretary of State Cordell Hull and Dr. Jose Carlos de Macedo Soares, Minister of Foreign Affairs of Brazil, will discuss a phase of the Pan-American Peace Conference during a broadcast from Rio de Janeiro from 10:30 to 11 P. M. over WJZ.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

NOV 19 1936

Music [illegible]penings In New [illegible]ork Thursday

Special to The News.

NEW YORK, Nov. 18.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be presented in concert at 8:45 p.m. Thursday at Carnegie Hall. The program:

Symphony in B Flat, No. 102 (ninth of the London Series) .... Haydn
"La Mer," Three Orchestral Sketches .... Debussy
Symphony No. 5, in C Minor, Op. 67 .... Beethoven

A Brahms program will be given by the Coolidge Quartet at 3:30 p.m. at Columbia University, and Frederick Buldrini will give a violin recital at the Town Hall at 3 p.m.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

NOV 19 1936

Boston Symphony Returns to Radio

And speaking of serious music, this is the night the Boston Symphony Orchestra returns to the air-waves via NBC-WBZ at 8.45. Tonight's program will be broadcast from Carnegie Hall in New York, where the orchestra will be playing the first of its annual subscription series of Manhattan concerts. With Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, two noted masterworks of symphonic literature will be performed: Hayden's B. Flat Symphony, No. 102, and Debussy's "La Mer." During its current series, the orchestra will broadcast four programs from Carnegie Hall, four from the Sanders Theater at Harvard University, three from Symphony Hall, one from the Academy of Music in Brooklyn, and nine of its famous "Pop" concerts from Symphony Hall.

* * *

Rapt Crowd Hears Boston Symphony

Hartford, Conn.

Koussevitzky and His Players Wring 'Bravos' From Audience With Brilliant Performance

Nov. 18/36

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, was presented in the second concert of the Bushnell series at the Memorial auditorium, Tuesday night. The program:

Symphony in B flat (Ninth London) Haydn
Divertimento, "Baiser de la Fee" Stravinsky
Symphony No. 5 in C Minor Beethoven

About a year ago there was in Hartford a sort of sotto voce cry faintly to be heard throughout the musical quarters of the city, calling for four appearances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during our customary season of six concerts. Had the members of last night's audience been polled just at the end of the performance, the four-times-Boston movers would doubtless have found a constituency numerous enough to swing the deal. In this reviewer's four years of local concert going, it was the first time that "Bravos" were heard at the close of any musical event. Granted that they were rather timid Bravos, but nevertheless there they were—the bravest applause yet to be heard here.

Since Mr. Toscanini left the New York, writers and commentators upon music around the country have suddenly focused their attention and adulation on the Boston and Dr. Koussevitzky. They have called it the greatest extant musical body, pointed the explanatory finger at the fact that no other orchestra has worked so long with one conductor, and generally pressed wreaths upon the brows of Dr. Koussevitzky and his men, one and all. Strange discovery— when so many of us could have told them that long, long ago. Maeterlinck has a little story for these discoverers, called "The Bluebird."

Virtuosity Stands Out.

Last night's performance was one of the really superb events in the city's musical annals, a brilliant piece of program-making spectacularly set out. Hundreds of reviews have expounded the peculiar and special qualities of the Boston and its Imperator, and I refer you to the compendium they would make, for detailed analyses. But if they were all sifted, their common adulation would be summed up in the term "virtuosity," virtuosity of individual players, of choirs, of the whole orchestra, and most of all, a kind of reading that ever calls out of any score, its most brilliant, most faceted, flashing sides. In fact, so gleamingly exploited is each phrase as it comes along, that it seems a fragment of music existing all alone in the world, isolated in a sort of momentary glory, and then paradoxically absorbed into the crystalline whole.

As an expression of dignity, simplicity, poise and spirit, last night's performance and embodiment of the Ninth London was an apotheosis of the symphonic Haydn. It had all the open frankness, the directness of this often trivialized composer, whose writing if not utterly deep, seizes you with its inescapable sincerity and realism.

As Flowing As Sea.

In performance, the Symphony was flecked with as many changing lights, as many changing tones and flowing rhythms as the surface of a sea. It had a continual swell and cadence, and a fine-figured spray, continually passing through and above it. Out of the adagio, Dr. Koussevitzky made a sad little bourgeois German song, but after all such was its composer, and I daresay tears came readily to Papa Haydn's eyes on occasion in the good old German fashion. In the subsequent movement there was the most marvelous trilling between strings and woodwinds, one of the glories of performance of the whole evening. It was all beautiful, clear, clean, spontaneous Haydn throughout.

"Igor, you are only a villain," Debussy once said to Stravinsky. Before the "Baiser de la Fee" began, someone nearby said, "I suppose this is going to be terribly noisy." Igor, my villain, how you fooled that person. Your fay certainly gave a kiss like that from a child who had just been licking a chocolate peppermint. "Baiser" is one great big birthcake, "Greetings from Igor to the New Romantics" iced pinkly out on top, a miracle of instrumentation, a melodic dessert, a cloying delight, and as magnificently performed last night as—well, as the Boston can perfect all modern scores. Almost too good to be true.

Last night's Fifth Beethoven was a huge performance, in which Dr. Koussevitzky made this C Minor Symphony seem the true candidate for the otherwise bestowed title of "Eroica." It was of imperial dimension in tone, in brilliance, in stature, and time and again it rose and shook a mailed fist in the audience's face, much as Beethoven or Napoleon might have. I doubt if it was an intensively introspect presentation, but it had certainly a regal musicality about it, and lightning flashed over its highly chased bronze surface. In fact the modelling of the score, dynamically and rhythmically, was of extraordinary variety and vitality, and, shone with an amazing technical splendor. The second movement was the most memorable of the four, for power and a kind of rugged poignance, though personally I shall long remember the overwhelming beauty with which the first theme of the third section rose up out of faintly humming strings at its final appearance just before the "bridge."

T. H. P.

Koussevitzky Offers Fifth By Beethoven

Hart. Times
Nov. 18/36

Bostonians Are Also Heard in Haydn And Stravinsky

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

After as many concerts as the Boston Symphony Orchestra has played in Hartford it would appear that one ought to know just what to expect, and having expected it, suffer just that little disappointment with which anticipation hazes over the gloss of hopes held too high.

Once again last night at Bushnell Memorial these players, in the second event of the current orchestral series, demonstrated that their peerlessness is a self-renewing essence which somehow belittles even the doting memory. There are so few things in the world like that; yet a parallel, oddly enough, confronted us on this very occasion. Commonplace of music that it is, when was there even an adequate performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony that did not beggar our recollections of its beauty and power?

An "Interpretation"

Perhaps a good many persons wondered just why Serge Koussevitzky elected to present The Fifth. They may have been mollified to a degree by the fact that the rest of the program comprised Stravinsky's suite from Le Baiser de la Fee and a lesser known Haydn Symphony, the ninth of the Salomon set in B flat. If it has come to the point where a conductor must have a reason for giving the C minor of Beethoven, then the same persons who would insist upon a reason would hardly be satisfied with just another "interpretation" for that is what it was, there being a good deal of Koussevitzky in this Beethoven.

So what? The type of mind which, with a collector's musty zeal, catalogues "interpretations" probably took note of the explosive fortissimo opening, taken in strictest time, of the lingering pace of the andante and of the sharply marked dynamic contrasts. Such a mind, nevertheless, could apprehend several marvelously built transitions, in particular the seemingly idle conceit which ends the third movement, like so much magician's abracadabra, the force of which is never apparent until the gates of glory swing open on the final allegro. But any mind whatsoever could not have failed to be moved by this Koussevitzky's Beethoven.

An Exquisite Haydn

The Haydn symphony was simply Haydn. All the elegance the savor, and the surface humors that the master brought with him from the Esterhazy court to England lived again in this sparkling performance. The rollicking fun of the presto almost fashioned syllables of the spoken word. The gently pathetic slow movement was equally appealing in its own way but, unlike the Frenchmen in the London of 1794, the audience saved up its applause until the end of the symphony.

Writing of Haydn adagios a commentator of that day reported: "Passages often occur which render it impossible to listen to them without becoming excited. We are altogether carried away, and forced to applaud with hand and mouth. This is especially the case with Frenchmen, of whom we have so many here that all public places are filled with them. You know that they have great sensibility, and cannot restrain their transports, so that in the midst of the finest passages in soft adagios they clap their hands in loud applause and thus mar the effect."

To watch Koussevitzky conduct such a work as this is a lesson in music appreciation. The melting phrase, the piquant repartee, the reproach, the reply and a burst of gaiety are the reflections of a galvanic baton, an eloquent face seen occasionally in profile and such a expressive gestures as the business of shaking music out of his sleeve.

Ballet Music

He was not quite the visual realization which the Stravinsky music required, however, for Stravinsky's ballet conceptions betray their origin in spite of orchestral dress. This particular pastiche, Le Basier de la Fee, is avowedly Tschaikowskian even to the point of direct quotation although the orchestration would probably have bewildered the author of the tunes.

The effectiveness of the divertissement was entirely dependent upon the unapproachable skill with which the Boston players took their parts, oftentimes in solo. Koussevitzky made the score flawlessly transparent and fully maintained his reputation as an American exponent of Stravinsky.

One might almost say that Boston Symphony concerts have become Koussevitzky concerts. Although he is the first to recognize and acknowledge the incomparable resources which his men deliver, it is he who renews their artistic puissance at every concert. In this he follows a long line of illustrious leaders, for the history of the Boston orchestra is simply the record of a responsive ensemble living up to men like Gericke and P. ur, Seidl and Nikisch, Muck and now Koussevitzky.

PITTSFIELD, MASS
EAGLE

Nov. 18/36

Koussevitzky Portrait on View.

Among the paintings of Alexander Jacovleff in the Robert C. Vose Galleries in Copley Square, Boston, is a portrait of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who appeared at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival last summer.

Boston Symphony Concert

Koussevitsky Offers Haydn, Debussy and Beethoven Works to Open Season.

N. Y. Sun
Nov. 20/36

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its fifty-first season in this city with the concert of last evening in Carnegie Hall. It was a concert to be held long in lively remembrance. There was not a moment when the hearer did not feel glad that Boston was sufficiently close to New York to permit of regular visits from this group of virtuosi led by a conductor of authority, enthusiasm and understanding.

One sometimes is lost in wonder at the glory of the tone of the Boston orchestra, so rich, so lucent, so filled with delicate qualities and withal so virile and forthright. And with the tone go finish, precision, unanimity and infinite elasticity. It is a great orchestra and is greatly directed.

Last evening's program was compact, yet generous. There were three numbers, of which the first was Haydn's B flat symphony, No. 102. Hearing this composition as it was performed last night one is tempted to revise all his conceptions of Haydn. Rubinstein's lofty condescensions, his pat on the back for the genial old gentleman who brought his beloved Viennese every day a musical lollipop, becomes ridiculous. This is no mere stick of candy but a beautifully fashioned score, full of fancy, touched with gentle humor, ascending at times to regions of stormy emotion and at others descending to levels of elegant sentiment, but always with the grace of a courtly period and the occasional naivete of a humble mind, and all conveyed with such a mastery of the fundamentals of orchestration one can hardly believe that since the work was written Berlioz and Wagner revolutionized the art of instrumentation.

There have been few orchestral performances in this town so nearly approaching utter perfection as that of the Haydn symphony last evening. Not a detail was slurred, not a minor nuance neglected, not a single fragment of episodic character obscured, yet all was knit firmly into a strong and satisfying whole. The exquisitely poetic treatment of the broad introduction, the polished delivery of the slow movement, the impressiveness of Haydn's sudden modulations and exclamatory outbursts—which must have disturbed the sedate music lovers of London in 1795—and the scintillant finale, all were played with extraordinary smoothness and finesse. The audience was quick to perceive the excellence of the performance and its applause, given liberally to the conductor, increased in volume when the orchestra stood to receive the approbation of the public. If any one entertained a doubt about the genius of Haydn he must have had it painlessly extracted by the performance of this B flat symphony last evening.

The second number on the list was Debussy's tripartite orchestral sketch, with the title "La Mer." Here again the virtuosity of the orchestra was displayed splendidly. The music had the glow, the mystic glamour, the melting of tones and fusing of instrumental parts needed for a compelling evocation of its magic. Mr. Koussevitzky had not now to demonstrate his command of the Debussy idiom. He has long been known as one of the foremost exponents of this highly individual method of expression.

The concert came to its conclusion with Beethoven's fifth symphony. Thus the first concert of the new season presented three works, one representing the best thought of the early classical period, another the rich product of the impressionistic delineation almost created by Debussy, and the third the day of the crossing of the bridge between the two eras. There was no novelty. The Boston organization infrequently comes without one, but Mr. Koussevitzky is reserving it for tomorrow afternoon, when we shall learn something about the late adventurings of young France. We may hazard the conjecture that even then we shall not forget the preaching of the gospel according to Haydn.

BARBIROLLI GIVES VARIED PROGRAM

N. Y. Times

Little Known Haydn Symphony Is Revived in Concert at Carnegie Hall.

HULDA LASHANSKA SINGS

She Is Soloist With Philharmonic —Symphony in Solo Cantata by Handel.

[From Final Edition of Yesterday's TIMES.]

By OLIN DOWNES

Mr. Barbirolli and the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra presented their third midweek program last night in Carnegie Hall. It consisted, for the orchestra, of the Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 6, in B flat; the delightful symphony of Haydn, infrequently played, numbered 1 in the catalogue of the series of twelve which Haydn composed for the manager, Salomon, for performance in London, and Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Quixote."

Between the symphonic compositions Mme. Hulda Lashanska sang with orchestral accompaniment the beautitful air from Handel, arranged by Siegfried Ochs, with the German text, which reads "Dank sei dir, Herr," which is one of the composer's solo cantatas, and three songs by Hugo Wolf. It was a well-balanced program, but it was not a particularly fortunate occasion.

With every wish to fully evaluate Mr. Barbirolli's accomplishments, it must be said that his performances fell considerably below the excellent readings of a Beethoven overture and symphony he had given the preceding week—performances which thus far represent the high-water mark of his achievement in this city.

Haydn Symphony Appeals

The playing of Bach was muddy in tone, not clean-cut or transparent in style. The best movement was the last, which had a well-chosen tempo and an effective contrast of the briskly rhythmed first subject and the flying countertheme. The slow movement did not hang well together or say very much. The first movement was not rhythmically firm and precise, and the "imitations" of the theme often were not clear.

It was a pleasure to hear a Haydn symphony which is not among the best known, and it is to be wished that more conductors would emulate Mr. Barbirolli in thus departing from the beaten track. We have yet to know a single Haydn symphony which is not replete with genius. Many of them remain on the shelves and some have yet to be made known to the public.

The poorest orchestral performance in the course of an undistinguished evening was that of Strauss's tone poem. It was tame, inadequate to the composer's conception, unrevealing of his masterly counterpoint and instrumentation. We did not hear what was in the score in sonority, color, or meaning. Perhaps this is only a score for the now contemned virtuoso conductor. It is certainly not the task for one with no better grasp of its contents than Mr. Barbarolli showed last night. The introduction lost its significance. In the course of the variations certain inescapable effects came through; as a rule the music was trivialized, or, to put it more plainly, not fully comprehended.

Solo Playing Is Excellent

The performance disclosed some excellent solo playing; above all, the solo performance of Zoltan Kurthy, the first viola player. Joseph Schuster, the new first 'cellist of the orchestra, gave under the circumstances a good account of himself. His tone is much richer and has considerably more sensibility in it than that of his predecessor. But he could not, apparently, sing out his phrases because the pace taken was usually too fast for him properly to do so. Hence the 'cello part last night was also in places without its proper measure of saliency and significance. The phrases of the first tuba, well taken care of in point of tone quality and technique, were also hurried.

Mme. Lashanska was extremely nervous. This cannot account wholly for an artificial tone quality, bad intonation, which grew worse rather than better as the evening went on, and an interpretation that suffered from the conditions of the moment.

NEWS
Arlington Mass.
NOV 12 1936

Easy Now To Know Famous Musicians

"What I wouldn't give to be personally acquainted with one of the world's famous musical artists." Who has not said that? Now comes a simple means of realizing the ambition—and not in respect to one musical celebrity, but more than a hundred.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he conducts, are rated by authorities as either the greatest conductor and the greatest orchestra in the world, or as among the three greatest. Certainly that makes Koussevitzky and his men a group with whom acquaintanceship would be an enviable distinction. And now anyone may feel on friendly footing with all of them simply by turning the pages of a very engaging book. It contains sketches of Koussevitzky and his musicians made from life by a noted artist, Gerome Brush. Each of the 108 members of the world-famous orchestra was sketched in action—the first time such a thing has been achieved with the Boston Symphony or any other great orchestra. With each portrait Mr. Brush also provides a word-sketch written by himself, which gives intimate sidelights on the personality and career of each man. The book has been designed by a celebrated typographical designer, D. B. Updike, and beautifully printed at the Merrymount Press, Boston. Yet despite all these distinctions, the volume costs but $1.50. The title is, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1936." It may be ordered from Symphony Hall, Boston.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NOV 14 1936

CONCERT RECORDS

A New "Unfinished" —Local Repressings

WHAT the album collector has needed was an up-to-date recording job on Schubert's B-minor symphony, and Victor has supplied it (Victor set M-319). The performance is by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony—a clean, sturdy presentation, not as poetic as it might be, but not as sentimental as it usually is. Dr. Koussevitzky evidently isn't up on the fable that Schubert didn't finish the symphony because he was jilted or didn't live long enough, so the music appears without any soft-headed implications.

From Bac
Philha
Un

8,239 concer phony Society conductor: as shanska, sopra

1. Bach..Bran
B-flat ma
2. Handel....
(Editio
H
3. Haydn..Sym
H., No. 97)
4. Wolfe.....
(a) Gebet; (
H
5. Strauss.."D ations on acter, Op.
Solo ce
Solo v

WEDNESDA Symphon
rection of Jo the presence soloists—one mentalists fr
the Orchestra
Hulda Lasha program with ality and he instrumentalis Schuster, the of the cello
Kurthy, leade
Mme. Lash
both halves o sic first part,
To the first
Handel aria
Brandenburg able C major which stands group of "Lon its surprising procedure and second part tributed three the accompan chestra. The "Gebet," the sioned "Verb blithe, exube
first and thir
Wolf himself,
Marx.

Mme. Lash songs with their poetic tations and Always her fe emotional cen tion, and gave sympathetic,
She felt and tion and devo lovely passage liegt h on the hue a in his orches lized at this use of the sol borgenheit," ing of Wolf's felicities to rich and delic
the word "W music begins apex of inten
It should shanska was conductor. We Barbirolli prov paniment suc
of but very se

Mr. Barbiro to a close wit ing, lucid, a performances symphonic m ote," which N
From the be was conceived of Strauss's breathed its its every tongue, open its beauty an
Mr. Barbiro
sic, with its ness, its pi manity and though no for some ye Richard Str form in the that his mus astounding dusty relics
But perha
rolli had bee had pertinac them—in c leagues of h ski, Beecham merous othe maestri. Po
sists upon (whatever le

69

Rapt Crowd Hears Boston Symphony

Hartford, Conn.

Koussevitzky and His Players Wring 'Bravos' From Audience With Brilliant Performance

Nov. — 18/36

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, was presented in the second concert of the Bushnell series at the Memorial auditorium, Tuesday night. The program:

Symphony in B flat (Ninth London): Haydn
Divertimento, "Baiser de la Fee" Stravinsky
Symphony No. 5 in C Minor Beethoven

About a year ago there was in Hartford a sort of sotto voce cry faintly to be heard throughout the musical quarters of the city, calling for four appearances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during our customary season of six concerts. Had the members of last night's audience been polled just at the end of the performance, the four-times-Boston movers would doubtless have found a constituency numerous enough to swing the deal. In this reviewer's four years of local concert going, it was the first time that "Bravos" were heard at the close of any musical event. Granted that they were rather timid Bravos, but nevertheless there they were—the bravest applause yet to be heard here.

Since Mr. Toscanini left the New York, writers and commentators upon music around the country have suddenly focused their attention and adulation on the Boston and Dr. Koussevitzky. They have called it the greatest extant musical body, pointed the explanatory finger at the fact that no other orchestra has worked so long with one conductor, and generally pressed wreaths upon the brows of Dr. Koussevitzky and his men, one and all. Strange discovery— when so many of us could have told them that long, long ago. Maeterlinck has a little story for these discoverers, called "The Bluebird."

Virtuosity Stands Out.

Last night's performance was one of the really superb events in the city's musical annals, a brilliant piece of program-making spectacularly set out. Hundreds of reviews have expounded the peculiar and special qualities of the Boston and its Imperator, and I refer you to the compendium they would make, for detailed analyses. But if they were all sifted, their common adulation would be summed up in the term "virtuosity," virtuosity of individual players, of choirs, of the whole orchestra, and most of all, a kind of reading that ever calls out of any score, its most brilliant, most faceted, flashing sides. In fact, so gleamingly exploited is each phrase as it comes along, that it seems a fragment of music existing all alone in the world, isolated in a sort of momentary glory, and then paradoxically absorbed into the crystalline whole.

As an expression of dignity, simplicity, poise and spirit, last night's performance and embodiment of the Ninth London was an apotheosis of the symphonic Haydn. It had all the open frankness, the directness of this often trivialized composer, whose writing if not utterly deep, seizes you with its inescapable sincerity and realism.

As Flowing As Sea.

In performance, the Symphony was flecked with as many changing lights, as many changing tones and flowing rhythms as the surface of a sea. It had a continual swell and cadence, and a fine-figured spray, continually passing through and above it. Out of the adagio, Dr. Koussevitzky made a sad little bourgeois German song, but after all such was its composer, and I daresay tears came readily to Papa Haydn's eyes on occasion in the good old German fashion. In the subsequent movement there was the most marvelous trilling between strings and woodwinds, one of the glories of performance of the whole evening. It was all beautiful, clear, clean, spontaneous Haydn throughout.

"Igor, you are only a villain," Debussy once said to Stravinsky. Before the "Baiser de la Fee" began, someone nearby said, "I suppose this is going to be terribly noisy." Igor, my villain, how you fooled that person. Your fay certainly gave a kiss like that from a child who had just been licking a chocolate peppermint. "Baiser" is one great big birthcake, "Greetings from Igor to the New Romantics" iced pinkly out on top, a miracle of instrumentation, a melodic dessert, a cloying delight, and as magnificently performed last night as—well, as the Boston can perfect all modern scores. Almost too good to be true.

Last night's Fifth Beethoven was a huge performance, in which Dr. Koussevitzky made this C Minor Symphony seem the true candidate for the otherwise bestowed title of "Eroica." It was of imperial dimension in tone, in brilliance, in stature, and time and again it rose and shook a mailed fist in the audience's face, much as Beethoven or Napoleon might have. I doubt if it was an intensively introspect presentation, but it had certainly a regal musicality about it, and lightning flashed over its highly chased bronze surface. In fact the modelling of the score, dynamically and rhythmically, was of extraordinary variety and vitality, and, shone with an amazing technical splendor. The second movement was the most memorable of the four, for power and a kind of rugged poignance, though personally I shall long remember the overwhelming beauty with which the first theme of the third section rose up out of faintly humming strings at its final appearance just before the "bridge."

T. H. P.

Koussevitzky Offers Fifth By Beethoven

Hart. Times
Nov. — 18/36

Bostonians Are Also Heard in Haydn And Stravinsky

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

After as many concerts as the Boston Symphony Orchestra has played in Hartford it would appear that one ought to know just what to expect, and having expected it, suffer just that little disappointment with which anticipation hazes over the gloss of hopes held too high.

Once again last night at Bushnell Memorial these players, in the second event of the current orchestral series, demonstrated that their peerlessness is a self-renewing essence which somehow belittles even the doting memory. There are so few things in the world like that; yet a parallel, oddly enough, confronted us on this very occasion. Commonplace of music that it is, when was there even an adequate performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony that did not beggar our recollections of its beauty and power?

An "Interpretation"

Perhaps a good many persons wondered just why Serge Koussevitzky elected to present The Fifth. They may have been mollified to a degree by the fact that the rest of the program comprised Stravinsky's suite from Le Baiser de la Fee and a lesser known Haydn Symphony, the ninth of the Salomon set in B flat. If it has come to the point where a conductor must have a reason for giving the C minor of Beethoven, then the same persons who would insist upon a reason would hardly be satisfied with just another "interpretation" for that is what it was, there being a good deal of Koussevitzky in this Beethoven.

So what? The type of mind which, with a collector's musty zeal, catalogues "interpretations" probably took note of the explosive fortissimo opening, taken in strictest time, of the lingering pace of the andante and of the sharply marked dynamic contrasts. Such a mind, nevertheless, could apprehend several marvelously built transitions, in particular the seemingly idle conceit which ends the third movement, like so much magician's abracadabra, the force of which is never apparent until the gates of glory swing open on the final allegro. But any mind whatsoever could not have failed to be moved by this Koussevitzky's Beethoven.

An Exquisite Haydn

The Haydn symphony was simply Haydn. All the elegance the savor, and the surface humors that the master brought with him from the Esterhazy court to England lived again in this sparkling performance. The rollicking fun of the presto almost fashioned syllables of the spoken word. The gently pathetic slow movement was equally appealing in its own way but, unlike the Frenchmen in the London of 1794, the audience saved up its applause until the end of the symphony.

Writing of Haydn adagios a commentator of that day reported: "Passages often occur which render it impossible to listen to them without becoming excited. We are altogether carried away, and forced to applaud with hand and mouth. This is especially the case with Frenchmen, of whom we have so many here that all public places are filled with them. You know that they have great sensibility, and cannot restrain their transports, so that in the midst of the finest passages in soft adagios they clap their hands in loud applause and thus mar the effect."

To watch Koussevitzky conduct such a work as this is a lesson in music appreciation. The melting phrase, the piquant repartee, the reproach, the reply and a burst of gaiety are the reflections of a galvanic baton, an eloquent face seen occasionally in profile and such a expressive gestures as the business of shaking music out of his sleeve.

Ballet Music

He was not quite the visual realization which the Stravinsky music required, however, for Stravinsky's ballet conceptions betray their origin in spite of orchestral dress. This particular pastiche, Le Basier de la Fee, is avowedly Tschaikowskian even to the point of direct quotation although the orchestration would probably have bewildered the author of the tunes.

The effectiveness of the divertissement was entirely dependent upon the unapproachable skill with which the Boston players took their parts, oftentimes in solo. Koussevitzky made the score flawlessly transparent and fully maintained his reputation as an American exponent of Stravinsky.

One might almost say that Boston Symphony concerts have become Koussevitzky concerts. Although he is the first to recognize and acknowledge the incomparable resources which his men deliver, it is he who renews their artistic puissance at every concert. In this he follows a long line of illustrious leaders, for the history of the Boston orchestra is simply the record of a responsive ensemble living up to men like Gericke and Paur, Seidl and Nikisch, Muck and now Koussevitzky.

Boston Symphony Concert

Koussevitzky Offers Haydn, Debussy and Beethoven Works to Open Season.

N.Y. Sun Nov. 20/36

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its fifty-first season in this city with the concert of last evening in Carnegie Hall. It was a concert to be held long in lively remembrance. There was not a moment when the hearer did not feel glad that Boston was sufficiently close to New York to permit of regular visits from this group of virtuosi led by a conductor of authority, enthusiasm and understanding.

One sometimes is lost in wonder at the glory of the tone of the Boston orchestra, so rich, so lucent, so filled with delicate qualities and withal so virile and forthright. And with the tone go finish, precision, unanimity and infinite elasticity. It is a great orchestra and is greatly directed.

Last evening's program was compact, yet generous. There were three numbers, of which the first was Haydn's B flat symphony, No. 102. Hearing this composition as it was performed last night one is tempted to revise all his conceptions of Haydn. Rubinstein's lofty condescensions, his pat on the back for the genial old gentleman who brought his beloved Viennese every day a musical lollipop, becomes ridiculous. This is no mere stick of candy but a beautifully fashioned score, full of fancy, touched with gentle humor, ascending at times to regions of stormy emotion and at others descending to levels of elegant sentiment, but always with the grace of a courtly period and the occasional naivete of a humble mind, and all conveyed with such a mastery of the fundamentals of orchestration one can hardly believe that since the work was written Berlioz and Wagner revolutionized the art of instrumentation.

There have been few orchestral performances in this town so nearly approaching utter perfection as that of the Haydn symphony last evening. Not a detail was slurred, not a minor nuance neglected, not a single fragment of episodic character obscured, yet all was knit firmly into a strong and satisfying whole. The exquisitely poetic treatment of the broad introduction, the polished delivery of the slow movement, the impressiveness of Haydn's sudden modulations and exclamatory outbursts—which must have disturbed the sedate music lovers of London in 1795—and the scintillant finale, all were played with extraordinary smoothness and finesse. The audience was quick to perceive the excellence of the performance and its applause, given liberally to the conductor, increased in volume when the orchestra stood to receive the approbation of the public. If any one entertained a doubt about the genius of Haydn he must have had it painlessly extracted by the performance of this B flat symphony last evening.

The second number on the list was Debussy's tripartite orchestral sketch, with the title "La Mer." Here again the virtuosity of the orchestra was displayed splendidly. The music had the glow, the mystic glamour, the melting of tones and fusing of instrumental parts needed for a compelling evocation of its magic. Mr. Koussevitzky had not now to demonstrate his command of the Debussy idiom. He has long been known as one of the foremost exponents of this highly individual method of expression.

The concert came to its conclusion with Beethoven's fifth symphony. Thus the first concert of the new season presented three works, one representing the best thought of the early classical period, another the rich product of the impressionistic delineation almost created by Debussy, and the third the day of the crossing of the bridge between the two eras. There was no novelty. The Boston organization infrequently comes without one, but Mr. Koussevitzky is reserving it for tomorrow afternoon, when we shall learn something about the late adventurings of young France. We may hazard the conjecture that even then we shall not forget the preaching of the gospel according to Haydn.

BARBIROLLI GIVES VARIED PROGRAM

N.Y. Times

Little Known Haydn Symphony Is Revived in Concert at Carnegie Hall.

Nov. 20/36

HULDA LASHANSKA SINGS

She Is Soloist With Philharmonic —Symphony in Solo Cantata by Handel.

[From Final Edition of Yesterday's Times.]

By OLIN DOWNES

Mr. Barbirolli and the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra presented their third midweek program last night in Carnegie Hall. It consisted, for the orchestra, of the Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 6, in B flat; the delightful symphony of Haydn, infrequently played, numbered 1 in the catalogue of the series of twelve which Haydn composed for the manager, Salomon, for performance in London, and Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Quixote."

Between the symphonic compositions Mme. Hulda Lashanska sang with orchestral accompaniment the beautitful air from Handel, arranged by Siegfried Ochs, with the German text, which reads "Dank sei dir, Herr," which is one of the composer's solo cantatas, and three songs by Hugo Wolf. It was a well-balanced program, but it was not a particularly fortunate occasion..

With every wish to fully evaluate Mr. Barbirolli's accomplishments, it must be said that his performances fell considerably below the excellent readings of a Beethoven overture and symphony he had given the preceding week — performances which thus far represent the high-water mark of his achievement in this city.

Haydn Symphony Appeals

The playing of Bach was muddy in tone, not clean-cut or transparent in style. The best movement was the last, which had a well-chosen tempo and an effective contrast of the briskly rhythmed first subject and the flying countertheme. The slow movement did not hang well together or say very much. The first movement was not rhythmically firm and precise, and the "imitations" of the theme often were not clear.

It was a pleasure to hear a Haydn symphony which is not among the best known, and it is to be wished that more conductors would emulate Mr. Barbirolli in thus departing from the beaten track. We have yet to know a single Haydn symphony which is not replete with genius. Many of them remain on the shelves and some have yet to be made known to the public.

The poorest orchestral performance in the course of an undistinguished evening was that of Strauss's tone poem. It was tame, inadequate to the composer's conception, unrevealing of his masterly counterpoint and instrumentation. We did not hear what was in the score in sonority, color, or meaning. Perhaps this is only a score for the now contemned virtuoso conductor. It is certainly not the task for one with no better grasp of its contents than Mr. Barbarolli showed last night. The introduction lost its significance. In the course of the variations certain inescapable effects came through; as a rule the music was trivialized, or, to put it more plainly, not fully comprehended.

Solo Playing Is Excellent

The performance disclosed some excellent solo playing; above all, the solo performance of Zoltan Kurthy, the first viola player. Joseph Schuster, the new first 'cellist of the orchestra, gave under the circumstances a good account of himself. His tone is much richer and has considerably more sensibility in it than that of his predecessor. But he could not, apparently, sing out his phrases because the pace taken was usually too fast for him properly to do so. Hence the 'cello part last night was also in places without its proper measure of saliency and significance. The phrases of the first tuba, well taken care of in point of tone quality and technique, were also hurried.

Mme. Lashanska was extremely nervous. This cannot account wholly for an artificial tone quality, bad intonation, which grew worse rather than better as the evening went on, and an interpretation that suffered from the conditions of the moment.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
Nov. EAGLE 18/36

K ssevitzky Portrait on View.

Among the paintings of Alexander Jacovleff in the Robert C. Vose Galleries in Copley Square, Boston, is a portrait of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who appeared at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival last summer.

NEWS
Arlington Mass
NOV 12 1936

Easy Now To Know Famous Musicians

"What I wouldn't give to be personally acquainted with one of the world's famous musical artists." Who has not said that? Now comes a simple means of realizing the ambition—and not in respect to one musical celebrity, but more than a hundred.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he conducts, are rated by authorities as either the greatest conductor and the greatest orchestra in the world, or as among the three greatest. Certainly that makes Koussevitzky and his men a group with whom acquaintanceship would be an enviable distinction. And now anyone may feel on friendly footing with all of them simply by turning the pages of a very engaging book. It contains sketches of Koussevitzky and his musicians made from life by a noted artist, Gerome Brush. Each of the 108 members of the world-famous orchestra was sketched in action—the first time such a thing has been achieved with the Boston Symphony or any other great orchestra. With each portrait Mr. Brush also provides a word-sketch written by himself, which gives intimate sidelights on the personality and career of each man. The book has been designed by a celebrated typographical designer, D. B. Updike, and beautifully printed at the Merrymount Press, Boston. Yet despite all these distinctions, the volume costs but $1.50. The title is, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1936." It may be ordered from Symphony Hall, Boston.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NOV 14 1936

CONCERT RECORDS

A New "Unfinished" —Local Repressings

WHAT the album collector has needed was an up-to-date recording job on Schubert's B-minor symphony, and Victor has supplied it (Victor set M-319). The performance is by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony—a clean, sturdy presentation, not as poetic as it might be, but not as sentimental as it usually is. Dr. Koussevitzky evidently isn't up on the fable that Schubert didn't finish the symphony because he was jilted or didn't live long enough, so the music appears without any soft-headed implications.

N. Y. Trib. Nov 2 [illegible]

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

From Bach to Strauss at the Philharmonic's Concert Under Barbirolli

8,239 concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York, John Barbirolli conductor; assisting artist, Hulda Lashanska, soprano. At Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Bach..Brandenburg Concerto No. 6, in B-flat major.
2. Handel....Arioso, "Dank sei dir, Herr" (Edition of Siegfried Ochs)
   Hulda Lashanska
3. Haydn..Symphony in C major (B. and H. No. 97).

Intermission

4. Wolfe...........Songs with orchestra (a) Gebet; (b) Verborgenheit; (c) Er ist's
   Hulda Lashanska
5. Strauss..."Don Quixote"; Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, Op. 35.
   Solo cello: Joseph Schuster
   Solo viola: Zoltan Kurthy

WEDNESDAY night's Philharmonic Symphony concert under the direction of John Barbirolli rejoiced in the presence of no fewer than three soloists—one singer, and two instrumentalists from the first stands of the Orchestra. The singer was Mme. Hulda Lashanska, who adorned the program with her gracious personality and her musical feeling. The instrumentalists were Mr. Joseph Schuster, the Orchestra's new leader of the cello section, and Mr. Zoltan Kurthy, leader of the violas.

Mme. Lashanska contributed to both halves of the program: its classic first part, and its romantic second. To the first she added an exalted Handel aria between the dark-hued Brandenburg No. 6 and that remarkable C major Symphony of Haydn's which stands as No. 1 among the group of "London" Symphonies, with its surprising subtleties of harmonic procedure and expressiveness. To the second part Mme. Lashanska contributed three songs by Hugo Wolf, the accompaniments scored for orchestra. These were the devotional "Gebet," the poignant and impassioned "Verborgenheit," and the blithe, exuberant "Er ist's." The first and third were orchestrated by Wolf himself, the second by Joseph Marx.

* * *

Mme. Lashanska sang all three songs with true comprehension of their poetic and imaginative connotations and their musical moods. Always her feeling penetrated to the emotional center of Wolf's conception, and gave it voice; always it was sympathetic, veracious, and unforced. She felt and conveyed the resignation and devoutness of "Gebet"—the lovely passage, "Doch in der Mitten . . . liegt holdes Bescheiden," took on the hue and pattern which Wolf in his orchestral setting has subtilized at this point by his exquisite use of the solo violin. And in "Verborgenheit," one of the most piercing of Wolf's songs, she accomplished felicities to be remembered—as the rich and delicate color of the voice at the word "Wonne," just before the music begins to mount toward its apex of intensity.

It should be said that Mme. Lashanska was most fortunate in her conductor Wednesday night; for Mr. Barbirolli provided her with an accompaniment such as all singers dream of but very seldom hear.

* * *

Mr. Barbirolli brought the concert to a close with one of the most moving, lucid, and eloquently faithful performances of Richard Strauss's symphonic masterpiece, "Don Quixote," which New York has ever heard. From the beginning to the end it was conceived in the essential vein of Strauss's marvelous creation, breathed its native air, summoned its every implication, spoke its tongue, opened a dozen pathways to its beauty and its truth.

Mr. Barbirolli approached this music, with its irony, its wit, its tenderness, its pity, its searching humanity and its fabulous art, as though no one had told him that for some years now the music of Richard Strauss is no longer good form in the best musical society—that his music dates: that those once astounding and triumphant scores are dusty relics of a fading past.

But perhaps, after all, Mr. Barbirolli had been told these things and had pertinaciously declined to credit them—in common with such colleagues of his as Toscanini, Stokowski, Beecham, Koussevitzky, and numerous other deluded and obstinate maestri. Possibly Mr. Barbirolli insists upon believing that Strauss (whatever level of inspiration he may inhabit at his honorable present age),

Hulda Lashanska

Soprano soloist with Philharmonic-Symphony gave us in his earlier years half a dozen masterworks that deeply marked the art of music, and that "Don Quixote" remains the greatest and most endearing of them all.

* * *

This music is nearly forty years old; it has been known to New York for thirty-two. Almost every conductor who has visited us since 1904 has had a try at it. Yet Mr. Barbirolli gave us an account of it Wednesday night that set the work before us with persuasive authenticity and a clarity that brought great names to mind as one sought for comparisons and touchstones.

The polyphonic web was luminous and transparent. The phrasing was at all points sensitive, apt, revealing. The tempi were generously broad and spacious, so that light and air and warmth entered the spaces of the score. The great Third Variation, in which Don Quixote expatiates upon the glory of a life of chivalry, speaking nobly of ideal things, is often hurried, so that its breath is shortened, its spaciousness confined and crowded. Wednesday night the rapturous and soaring phrases, so touching in their futile passion of belief, said their say, and opened the waters of the spirit by their pitiful ardor, their valorous tenderness, the splendor of their conviction that life and the world are what we wish they were.

* * *

From the very first bars, "ritterlich und galant," with the flute climbing so bravely into its imagined kingdom of the mind, the world of Don Quixote fell about us, and we were part of it until the end—that world which is so far from us, mist-enwrapped, incredible, absurd: the world of the lovable, crack-brained dreamer and his shrewd, gluttonous, earth-bound squire. "They go forth alone, in a wide, murmurous land." It is late afternoon in a world that is chivalrous, noble, and very fair; in which knight-errantry is gloriously worth-while. "The distant peaks are touched with the sun's slanting light. . . . Never was the world so wide, nor the gestures so eternal."

* * *

Wednesday night, stirred and kindled by the magnificent playing of the orchestra and of the two admirable soloists who embodied so vividly the deluded dreamer and his faithful aide, we realized that this was our world, too—very near to us, very actual, touched with the infinite pathos and glory of man's idealism and valor and unconquerable hope.

GREENFIELD, MASS.
Recorder-Gazette

NOV 14 1936

SYNCOPATED SYMPHONY

BOSTON (AP)—A syncopated symphony designed to suggest the machine age which Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith college, composed at Jaffrey, N. H., last summer was played for the first time here yesterday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Josten conducted the orchestra at the request of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the famous musical organization.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 16 1936

DR. W. L. CHAPMAN DEAD IN 63RD YEAR

Won Recognition in Medical and Surgical Fields by Ability as X-Ray Expert.

MUSIC CRITIC FOR YEARS

Achieved Prominence as Inventor of Photographic Developer. Victim of Stroke

Dr. W. Louis Chapman, 62, who for many years won recognition in the fields of medicine and surgery by his ability as an X-ray expert, and, who for six years was music critic for the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin, died at 3:05 o'clock yesterday afternoon at his home, 249 Thayer street. Dr. Chapman died as a result of a stroke suffered Thursday.

As widely known for his musical ability as for his medical researches which resulted in the publication of many treatises, Dr. Chapman was a member of many medical and musical organizations, among which were the American Medical Association, Rhode Island State Medico-Legal Society, Providence Medical Society, Providence Engineering Society, Rhode Island School of Design, Boston chapter of the Guild of Organists, past president of the Rhode Island Federation of Music Clubs, and a contributing editor to the Rhode Island Medical Journal. He was on the staff of St. Joseph's Hospital.

Dr. Chapman is survived by his wife, the former Geneva H. Jefferds, whom he married in 1920; a brother, Rev. Michael Andrew Chapman of Lafayette, Ind.; and a sister, Mrs. Ernest Diehl of Brookline, Mass.

Funeral Wednesday

Funeral services will be held at noon Wednesday at the home. Dr. Augustus M. Lord, pastor-emeritus of the First Congregational Church, Unitarian, will officiate. Burial will be at the convenience of the family at the Swan Point Cemetery.

* * *

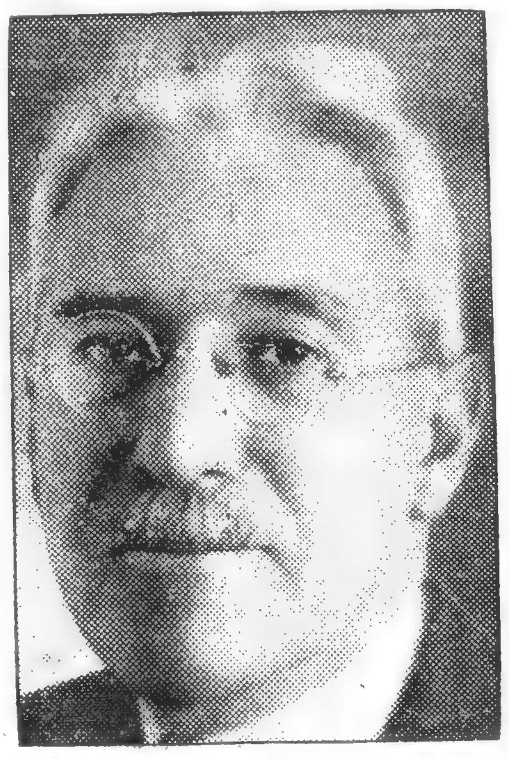
Dr. Chapman was graduated from the Boston University School of Medicine in 1897. He had for two years attended the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. He achieved wide prominence as the inventor of the universal photographic developer, widely used in the photographic industry.

Since 1930, Dr. Chapman had been lecturer for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club. He held musical positions with Grace Church and the First Congregational (Unitarian) Church. He was an honorary member of the Chopin Club, and was a former singer at the Immaculate Conception Church, in Boston, under Augusta Rotoli.

Gained Acclaim for Research

Dr. Chapman gained wide acclaim for his medical research as early as 1907 when the College of Physicians of Philadelphia awarded him the Alvarenga prize for his essay on "Post Operative Phlebitis, Thrombosis and Embolism." The prize was given for the best essay of the year on any medical subject. At that time, it was pointed out that Dr. Chapman

Dr. W. L. Chapman



Providence Physician, X-Ray Expert and Former Music Critic of the Providence Journal, Dead Following Apoplectic Shock. He Was 62 Years Old.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 15 1936

Music Lovers Crowd Halls For Symphonies

Major Operations on Orchestras Fails to Hurt Box Office

By Associated Press

NEW YORK, Nov. 14.—New York hears its young-old philharmonic-symphony society throughout the winter. It also hears 10 concerts each per winter from Serge Koussevitzky's Boston symphony, and from Leopold Stokowski's Philadelphia orchestra.

Two of these three orchestra have undergone major operations this fall. Many patrons and many observers and most managers stroked their beards in the spring, and came out with the idea that these major operations would most likely reduce audiences this winter. They were wrong.

Philadelphia's noble band "lost" Stokowski, to the movies.

They picked Eugene Ormandy. Hitherto, the Philadelphia has played to packed houses in New York. This winter it is doing the same.

The Philharmonic is, however, even more astonished. Last spring Arturo Toscanini departed these shores forever. The Philharmonic directors at once set their sails to fit what they thought would be a period of calm—they cut down the season six weeks, and expected reduced business.

But they didn't get reduced business; business is better. John Barbirolle, the young Italian-French-English conductor, is doing well at the box office.

CHELSEA, MASS.
EVE. RECORD

NOV 17 1936

WORD-SKETCH OF SYMPHONY

"What I wouldn't give to be personally acquainted with one of the world's famous musical artists!" Who has not said that? Now comes a simple means of realizing the ambition—and not in respect to one musical celebrity, but more than a hundred.

Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he conducts, are rated by authorities as either the greatest conductor and the greater orchestra in the world, or as among the three greatest. Certainly that makes Koussevitzky and his men a group with whom acquaintanceship would be an enviable distinction. And now anyone may feel on friendly footing with all of them simply by turning the pages of a very engaging book. It contains sketches of Koussevitzky and his musicians made from life by a noted artist, Gerome Brush.

Each of the 108 members of the world-famous orchestra was sketched in action—the first time such a thing has been achieved with the Boston Symphony or any other great orchestra. With each portrait Mr. Brush also provides a word-sketch written by himself, which gives intimate sidelights on the personality and career of each man. The book has been designed by a celebrated typographical designer, D. E. Updike, and beautifully printed at the Merrymount Press, Boston. The title is "The Boston Symphony Orchestra,

---

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

'Fifth Symphony' Will Feature Concert Tonight

Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony" is the feature of the program in which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Bushnell Memorial tonight in the second event of the Bushnell Concert Series, starting at 8:15 o'clock. Other numbers on the program are Haydn's "Symphony in B Flat, No. 102," and the divertimento from Stravinsky's tuneful ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fee," (The Fairy's Kiss.)

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 21 1936

Boston Orchestra Opens Season Here; Subscribers Are Guests At Reception After Concert

A large audience filled the Brooklyn Academy of Music last evening for the opening of the fifty-first season here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Serge Kaussevitzky, conductor, opened the series of five concerts to be given in the borough during the winter and spring with Mozart's Symphony in A major No. 29 (Koechel No. 201), Franck's Symphony in D minor and the first performance in Greater New York of Stravinsky's Divertimento from "Le Baiser de la Fee."

Following the performance the Brooklyn Committee for the concerts held a reception in the ballroom of the Academy to view the work of the art classes of Broolyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. The exhibit was organized by the recently formed Art Students Committee, headed by Mrs. Robert E. Blum.

Miss Phyllis Barnes, hostess in the committee box, entertained as her guests at the concert Miss Berenice Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Edward McGratty, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Edgar Chunasero, Jr., Purcell B. Robertson and Kenneth Meytrott.

Mrs. William H. Good's box guests included Mr. and Mrs. Edwin H. Denby, Miss Mary Campbell, Miss Mary Osborne Polak, Horace Mann, Albert Donovan and Hugh Clark.

In Mrs. Benjamin Prince's box were Mrs. Jessica Lozier Payne, Alfred E. Drake, Miss Helen Wright, Theodore Fitch and Harold Henry.

The box of the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association, of which Mrs. Roy M. Hart is president, was occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Hart, Miss Adeline Pettit and Miss Jeannette Wheldon. Other boxholders were Mrs. Thomas E. Murray, Jr., and H. A. Hennessey.

The second program of the series will be given on Friday evening, Jan. 8, with Albert Spalding, violiniest, as soloist.

The concert are presented here under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president; the Brooklyn committee, Mrs. enry J. Davenport, acting chairman, and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, R. Tuntington Woodman, president.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

SYMPHONY CONCERT CHANGES ANNOUNCED

Werner Josten, Smith College Music Head, to Conduct Own Piece for First Time.

At the last moment it develops that another change has been made in the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this afternoon and Saturday evening. Werner Josten, head of the music department at Smith college, will conduct the first performance anywhere of his own Symphony in F. The Cesar Franck symphony remains on the program as announced previously, as does the Vivaldi Concerto, "Spring." The program will be rounded out, however, with two short numbers, Satie's "Gymnopedies" and Mendelssohn's Scherzo in C minor from the Octet, in the orchestral version made by the composer himself.

S. R. F.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL

Boston Symphony to Start Fifth Season

THE Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will return to NBC for its fifth season beginning next Thursday evening. Recognized throughout the musical world as one of the finest symphonic organizations in existence, the Boston Symphony has had the additional advantage of playing under the same conductor throughout its season for several years, thus perfecting an ensemble which critics have acclaimed.

M. Y. Trib. Nov. 20/36

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

From Bach to Strauss at the Philharmonic's Concert Under Barbirolli

8,239 concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York, John Barbirolli conductor; assisting artist, Hulda Lashanska, soprano. At Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Bach..Brandenburg Concerto No. 6, in B-flat major.
2. Handel....Arioso, "Dank sei dir, Herr" (Edition of Siegfried Ochs)
   Hulda Lashanska
3. Haydn..Symphony in C major (B. and H., No. 97).

Intermission

4. Wolfe............Songs with orchestra (a) Gebet; (b) Verborgenheit; (c) Er ist's
   Hulda Lashanska
5. Strauss.."Don Quixote"; Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, Op. 35.
   Solo cello: Joseph Schuster
   Solo viola: Zoltan Kurthy

Hulda Lashanska

Soprano soloist with Philharmonic-Symphony

WEDNESDAY night's Philharmonic Symphony concert under the direction of John Barbirolli rejoiced in the presence of no fewer than three soloists—one singer, and two instrumentalists from the first stands of the Orchestra. The singer was Mme. Hulda Lashanska, who adorned the program with her gracious personality and her musical feeling. The instrumentalists were Mr. Joseph Schuster, the Orchestra's new leader of the cello section, and Mr. Zoltan Kurthy, leader of the violas.

Mme. Lashanska contributed to both halves of the program: its classic first part, and its romantic second. To the first she added an exalted Handel aria between the dark-hued Brandenburg No. 6 and that remarkable C major Symphony of Haydn's which stands as No. 1 among the group of "London" Symphonies, with its surprising subtleties of harmonic procedure and expressiveness. To the second part Mme. Lashanska contributed three songs by Hugo Wolf, the accompaniments scored for orchestra. These were the devotional "Gebet," the poignant and impassioned "Verborgenheit," and the blithe, exuberant "Er ist's." The first and third were orchestrated by Wolf himself, the second by Joseph Marx.

* * *

Mme. Lashanska sang all three songs with true comprehension of their poetic and imaginative connotations and their musical moods. Always her feeling penetrated to the emotional center of Wolf's conception, and gave it voice; always it was sympathetic, veracious, and unforced. She felt and conveyed the resignation and devoutness of "Gebet"—the lovely passage, "Doch in der Mitten . . . liegt holdes Bescheiden," took on the hue and pattern which Wolf in his orchestral setting has subtilized at this point by his exquisite use of the solo violin. And in "Verborgenheit," one of the most piercing of Wolf's songs, she accomplished felicities to be remembered—as the rich and delicate color of the voice at the word "Wonne," just before the music begins to mount toward its apex of intensity.

It should be said that Mme. Lashanska was most fortunate in her conductor Wednesday night; for Mr. Barbirolli provided her with an accompaniment such as all singers dream of but very seldom hear.

* * *

Mr. Barbirolli brought the concert to a close with one of the most moving, lucid, and eloquently faithful performances of Richard Strauss's symphonic masterpiece, "Don Quixote," which New York has ever heard. From the beginning to the end it was conceived in the essential vein of Strauss's marvelous creation, breathed its native air, summoned its every implication, spoke its tongue, opened a dozen pathways to its beauty and its truth.

Mr. Barbirolli approached this music, with its irony, its wit, its tenderness, its pity, its searching humanity and its fabulous art, as though no one had told him that for some years now the music of Richard Strauss is no longer good form in the best musical society—that his music dates: that those once astounding and triumphant scores are dusty relics of a fading past.

But perhaps, after all, Mr. Barbirolli had been told these things and had pertinaciously declined to credit them—in common with such colleagues of his as Toscanini, Stokowski, Beecham, Koussevitzky, and numerous other deluded and obstinate maestri. Possibly Mr. Barbirolli insists upon believing that Strauss (whatever level of inspiration he may inhabit at his honorable present age) gave us in his earlier years half a dozen masterworks that deeply marked the art of music, and that "Don Quixote" remains the greatest and most endearing of them all.

* * *

This music is nearly forty years old; it has been known to New York for thirty-two. Almost every conductor who has visited us since 1904 has had a try at it. Yet Mr. Barbirolli gave us an account of it Wednesday night that set the work before us with persuasive authenticity and a clarity that brought great names to mind as one sought for comparisons and touchstones.

The polyphonic web was luminous and transparent. The phrasing was at all points sensitive, apt, revealing. The tempi were generously broad and spacious, so that light and air and warmth entered the spaces of the score. The great Third Variation, in which Don Quixote expatiates upon the glory of a life of chivalry, speaking nobly of ideal things, is often hurried, so that its breath is shortened, its spaciousness confined and crowded. Wednesday night the rapturous and soaring phrases, so touching in their futile passion of belief, said their say, and opened the waters of the spirit by their pitiful ardor, their valorous tenderness, the splendor of their conviction that life and the world are what we wish they were.

* * *

From the very first bars, "ritterlich und galant," with the flute climbing so bravely into its imagined kingdom of the mind, the world of Don Quixote fell about us, and we were part of it until the end—that world which is so far from us, mist-enwrapped, incredible, absurd: the world of the lovable, crack-brained dreamer and his shrewd, gluttonous, earth-bound squire. "They go forth alone, in a wide, murmurous land." It is late afternoon in a world that is chivalrous, noble, and very fair; in which knight-errantry is gloriously worth-while. "The distant peaks are touched with the sun's slanting light. . . . Never was the world so wide, nor the gestures so eternal."

* * *

Wednesday night, stirred and kindled by the magnificent playing of the orchestra and of the two admirable soloists who embodied so vividly the deluded dreamer and his faithful aide, we realized that this was our world, too—very near to us, very actual, touched with the infinite pathos and glory of man's idealism and valor and unconquerable hope.

GREENFIELD, MASS.
Recorder-Gazette

NOV 14 1936

SYNCOPATED SYMPHONY

BOSTON (AP)—A syncopated symphony designed to suggest the machine age which Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith college, composed at Jaffrey, N. H., last summer was played for the first time here yesterday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Josten conducted the orchestra at the request of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the famous musical organization.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 16 1936

DR. W. L. CHAPMAN DEAD IN 63RD YEAR

Won Recognition in Medical and Surgical Fields by Ability as X-Ray Expert.

MUSIC CRITIC FOR YEARS

Achieved Prominence as Inventor of Photographic Developer. Victim of Stroke

Dr. W. Louis Chapman, 62, who for many years won recognition in the fields of medicine and surgery by his ability as an X-ray expert, and, who for six years was music critic for the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin, died at 3:05 o'clock yesterday afternoon at his home, 249 Thayer street. Dr. Chapman died as a result of a stroke suffered Thursday.

As widely known for his musical ability as for his medical researches which resulted in the publication of many treatises, Dr. Chapman was a member of many medical and musical organizations, among which were the American Medical Association, Rhode Island State Medico-Legal Society, Providence Medical Society, Providence Engineering Society, Rhode Island School of Design, Boston chapter of the Guild of Organists, past president of the Rhode Island Federation of Music Clubs, and a contributing editor to the Rhode Island Medical Journal. He was on the staff of St. Joseph's Hospital.

Dr. Chapman is survived by his wife, the former Geneva H. Jefferds, whom he married in 1920; a brother, Rev. Michael Andrew Chapman of Lafayette, Ind.; and a sister, Mrs. Ernest Diehl of Brookline, Mass.

Funeral Wednesday

Funeral services will be held at noon Wednesday at the home. Dr. Augustus M. Lord, pastor-emeritus of the First Congregational Church, Unitarian, will officiate. Burial will be at the convenience of the family at the Swan Point Cemetery.

* * *

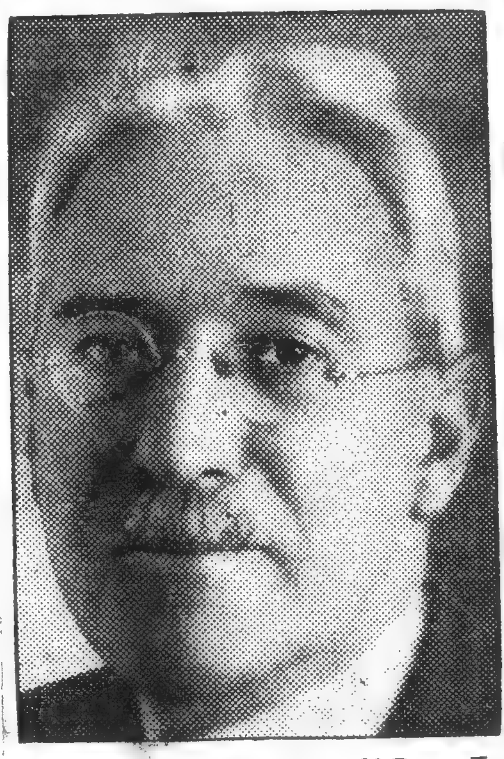
Dr. Chapman was graduated from the Boston University School of Medicine in 1897. He had for two years attended the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. He achieved wide prominence as the inventor of the universal photographic developer, widely used in the photographic industry.

Since 1930, Dr. Chapman had been lecturer for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club. He held musical positions with Grace Church and the First Congregational (Unitarian) Church. He was an honorary member of the Chopin Club, and was a former singer at the Immaculate Conception Church, in Boston, under Augusta Rotoli.

Gained Acclaim for Research

Dr. Chapman gained wide acclaim for his medical research as early as 1907 when the College of Physicians of Philadelphia awarded him the Alvarenga prize for his essay on "Post Operative Phlebitis, Thrombosis and Embolism." The prize was given for the best essay of the year on any medical subject. At that time, it was pointed out that Dr. Chapman

Dr. W. L. Chapman



Providence Physician, X-Ray Expert and Former Music Critic of the Providence Journal, Dead Following Apoplectic Shock. He Was 62 Years Old.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 15 1936

Music Lovers Crowd Halls For Symphonies

Major Operations on Orchestras Fails to Hurt Box Office

By Associated Press

NEW YORK, Nov. 14.—New York hears its young-old philharmonic-symphony society throughout the winter. It also hears 10 concerts each per winter from Serge Koussevitzky's Boston symphony, and from Leopold Stokowski's Philadelphia orchestra.

Two of these three orchestra have undergone major operations this fall. Many patrons and many observers and most managers stroked their beards in the spring, and came out with the idea that these major operations would most likely reduce audiences this winter. They were wrong.

Philadelphia's noble band "lost" Stokowski, to the movies.

They picked Eugene Ormandy. Hitherto, the Philadelphia has played to packed houses in New York. This winter it is doing the same.

The Philharmonic is, however, even more astonished. Last spring Arturo Toscanini departed these shores forever. The Philharmonic directors at once set their sails to fit what they thought would be a period of calm—they cut down the season six weeks, and expected reduced business.

But they didn't get reduced business; business is better. John Barbirolle, the young Italian-French-English conductor, is doing well at the box office.

CHELSEA, MASS.
EVE. RECORD

NOV 17 1936

WORD-SKETCH OF SYMPHONY

"What I wouldn't give to be personally acquainted with one of the world's famous musical artists!" Who has not said that? Now comes a simple means of realizing the ambition —and not in respect to one musical celebrity, but more than a hundred.

Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he conducts, are rated by authorities as either the greatest conductor and the greater orchestra in the world, or as among the three greatest. Certainly that makes Koussevitzky and his men a group with whom acquaintanceship would be an enviable distinction. And now anyone may feel on friendly footing with all of them simply by turning the pages of a very engaging book. It contains sketches of Koussevitzky and his musicians made from life by a noted artist, Gerome Brush.

Each of the 108 members of the world-famous orchestra was sketched in action—the first time such a thing has been achieved with the Boston Symphony or any other great orchestra. With each portrait Mr. Brush also provides a word-sketch written by himself, which gives intimate sidelights on the personality and career of each man. The book has been designed by a celebrated typographical designer, D. E. Updike, and beautifully printed at the Merrymount Press, Boston. The title is "The Boston Symphony Orchestra,

---

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT Nov 17/36

'Fifth Symphony' Will Feature Concert Tonight

Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony" is the feature of the program in which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Bushnell Memorial tonight in the second event of the Bushnell Concert Series, starting at 8:15 o'clock. Other numbers on the program are Haydn's "Symphony in B Flat, No. 102," and the divertimento from Stravinsky's tuneful ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fee," (The Fairy's Kiss.)

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 21 1936

Boston Orchestra Opens Season Here; Subscribers Are Guests At Reception After Concert

A large audience filled the Brooklyn Academy of Music last evening for the opening of the fifty-first season here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Serge Kaussevitzky, conductor, opened the series of five concerts to be given in the borough during the winter and spring with Mozart's Symphony in A major No. 29 (Koechel No. 201), Franck's Symphony in D minor and the first performance in Greater New York of Stravinsky's Divertimento from "Le Baiser de la Fee."

Following the performance the Brooklyn Committee for the concerts held a reception in the ballroom of the Academy to view the work of the art classes of Broolyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. The exhibit was organized by the recently formed Art Students Committee, headed by Mrs. Robert E. Blum.

Miss Phyllis Barnes, hostess in the committee box, entertained as her guests at the concert Miss Berenice Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Edward McGratty, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Edgar Chunasero, Jr., Purcell B. Robertson and Kenneth Meytrott.

Mrs. William H. Good's box guests included Mr. and Mrs. Edwin H. Denby, Miss Mary Campbell, Miss Mary Osborne Polak, Horace Mann, Albert Donovan and Hugh Clark.

In Mrs. Benjamin Prince's box were Mrs. Jessica Lozier Payne, Alfred E. Drake, Miss Helen Wright, Theodore Fitch and Harold Henry.

The box of the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association, of which Mrs. Roy M. Hart is president, was occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Hart, Miss Adeline Pettit and Miss Jeannette Wheldon. Other boxholders were Mrs. Thomas E. Murray, Jr., and H. A. Hennessey.

The second program of the series will be given on Friday evening, Jan. 8, with Albert Spalding, violiniest, as soloist.

The concert are presented here under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president; the Brooklyn committee, Mrs. enry J. Davenport, acting chairman, and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, R. Tuntington Woodman, president.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

13/36

SYMPHONY CONCERT CHANGES ANNOUNCED

Werner Josten, Smith College Music Head. to Conduct Own Piece for First Time.

At the last moment it develops that another change has been made in the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this afternoon and Saturday evening. Werner Josten, head of the music department at Smith college, will conduct the first performance anywhere of his own Symphony in F. The Cesar Franck symphony remains on the program as announced previously, as does the Vivaldi Concerto, "Spring." The program will be rounded out, however, with two short numbers, Satie's "Gymnopedies" and Mendelssohn's Scherzo in C minor, from the Octet, in the orchestral version made by the composer himself.

S. R. F.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL /36

Boston Symphony to Start Fifth Season

THE Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will return to NBC for its fifth season beginning next Thursday evening. Recognized throughout the musical world as one of the finest symphonic organizations in existence, the Boston Symphony has had the additional advantage of playing under the same conductor throughout its season for several years, thus perfecting an ensemble which critics have acclaimed.

71

PREMIERE IS GIVEN OF MESSIAEN WORK

Nov 22/36

'Les Offrandes Oubliees' Has Its First Performance Here Under Koussevitzky.

N.Y.

MOZART ITEM PRESENTED

Symphony in A Major Has Air of Novelty—Strauss, Sibelius on Carnegie Hall Program.

By OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, which has never distinguished itself more signally in its New York visits than during the last week, gave its second concert of the Autumn season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The program was unusually interesting. It did not state what previous performances of the Mozart symphony in A major, No. 29, had been given in this city. To the last decade of concert-goers in this city, it is in all probability a novelty, and it is perfectly charming.

The modern novelty of the occasion followed, the first New York performance of "Les Offrandes oubliées," a "méditation symphonique" by one of the young men of France, Olivier Messiaen. This work, in three sections, professes to embody in tones spiritual expressions of Catholicism. Far indeed is it from the "meditations religieuses" of other and Massenetisn days.

Then came the tone-poem, still a work of flaming youth, by Richard Strauss—his "Don Juan," and the concert ended with the crashing grandeurs of Sizelius's Fifth Symphony.

Strauss Tone-Poem Thrills

Even today the furious onslaught of the opening measures of Strauss's tone-poem, which is nearly half a century old, takes the listener aback, as later pages can still sweep him from his feet by reason of the consuming sensuousness and intensity of expression. But a hundred times more, if he listens receptively, will he be taken about about the opening theme of Mozart's adorable symphony. Why is this so? Ask the secret of a perfume or explain the irresistible force of the growing violet! It is transcendent beauty, this music, and also youth. It moves on winged feet, and with a certain divine coquettry. There is no inextricable rhythmic complication, or harmonic novelty about it, but there is the sense of complete and joyous miracle.

In this symphony by the 18-year-old Mozart there are no experimental pages, no hesitation, and, so far as a single hearing proves, no fault whatever of instrumental combinations and balances. If we did not know in advance that an 18-year-old was the creator of it, we might not be prompted to find in the score, as sole evidence of the composer's youth, a certain extreme conciseness, as in the brevities of "codas" at the end of some of the movements. There is not, for example, such amplitude and masterly summation as in the codas of the great G minor and C major symphonies. The young composer, with a plenitude of inspiration, fills the classic mold, and stops, in good time. He could have spoken longer, and might have done so in later years. But this is speculation, and does not matter anyhow, for the symphony is a glorious flight, and sheer beauty fills the form.

Music Played Memorably

The music would not have fallen on our ears so memorably if it had not been played so well. The singing of the strings in the andante communicated something that is not communicable either in spoken words or cold type. It was flawless, radiant and warm—not a cold classicism, not the pleasing formality of an eighteenth century melodic line, but a pure and ardent youthful song, wonderfully conveyed. There is no need to go on with the chronicles of the symphony, except to say that it does not flag in a single movement, and that the orchestra, in the course of the performance, did not abate by one jot or tittle the distinction of style with which it introduced the opening movement.

And Mr. Koussevitzky accomplished what he did with a finish and economy of baton technic which could serve as a model for any conductor. No one who judges a conductor's qualities by the eye would have had the remotest conception of his remarkable feat.

Oliver Messiaen, born at Avignon in 1908, belongs to a young group of Frenchmen now designated, among musicians, as "La jeune France." Just after the war we had in Paris the scintillant "Six," young composers who proclaimed the wit of Jean Cocteau, the glories of Brazilian jazz and Gounod. In various ways exalted smartness, elaborate vulgarity and neo-clasicism. In the music heard yesterday there is manifestation of something more earnest and something which aims, at least, at the expression of deeper feeling.

The melodic line of the music heard yesterday is simple and clear. Catholic mysticism might be found in his opening and closing movements, which are in a devout vein. There is also the suggestion of the Christian primitive in the austerity of the harmonization.

Work is In Three Movements

The three movements are called respectively "The Cross," "The Sin," and "The Eucharist." The energetic middle movement is for this listener the least convincing. The opening theme promises well, but might sound to a matter-of-fact ear as if a good melody had been given the wrong harmonization. In other words, it is a little hard to believe in the naturalness of this harmonic writing. The last movement made the best impression yesterday.

There was a very finished, a brilliant performance of Strauss's music. For this writer it was too finished, not brutal enough, not sufficiently abandoned in its sweep, and with too much top and too little middle and bottom of orchestral tone. This, of course, is largely a matter of taste. Others, and in all probability Mr. Koussevitsky himself, would feel that the vulgarities and excesses of the music gained by such discriminating treatment. The audience responded with vehement applause.

The Sibelius symphony, however, was the balance and climax of the concert which had begun with Mozart. Here was another kind of a musical form, vast and, at first, apparently inchoate. Then the music accumulates, endlessly, inexorably, and a master's formal intention begins to become evident. The symphony grows from modest beginnings, where the actual material is concerned. The tripping theme of the scherzo movement becomes the basis of a remarkable passacaglia. The murmurings and the rustlings as of wind, the curious calls and other insignia of Sibelius lead finally to those passages of savage splendor which represent one of the greatest pages of modern music. There is dissonance for you! There is the catastrophic clash of line and of harmonic bodies, brought about not merely by the accumulation of sound but by the conflict of powerful and purely musical elements. Here we are near to the sublime. Here Mr. Koussevitzky's performance also reached its climax, in a passage superbly prepared and driven home.

The dimensions of the audience, its quality of its enthusiasm, bespoke the merits of the occasion.

E, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1936 N.Y. Herald Tribune

Koussevitzky Opens Saturday Concert Series

Introduces Composition of Messaien Here With the Boston Symphony

Offers Work by Mozart

Strauss and Sibelius Also on Afternoon Program

By Francis D. Perkins

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra met their Saturday afternoon subscribers for the first time this season yesterday in Carnegie Hall, where the conductor began his diversified program with an early symphony by Mozart in A major, written in Salzburg when the composer was eighteen, and the first performance here of "Les Offrandes Oubliees," by Olivier Messaien, one of the four young French composers who style themselves collectively "La Jeune France." The rest of the concert was devoted to familiar works by the two best-known septuagenarians among modern composers, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" and the fifth symphony of Jean Sibelius.

The appearance of "Les Offrandes Oubliées" on the program, five weeks after its first American hearing in Boston, served as a reminder that there is now a generation of French composers junior to that represented zy Honegger, Milhaud, Poulenc, Auric and the others regarded not so very many years ago as representatives of the latest tendencies in Gallic music. "Les Offrandes" is probably the first major work by a member of this youngest French generation to be made known here. The other three composers of "La Jeune France," Daniel-Lesure, Yves Baudrier and André Jolivet are thus far only names to us, as most of the other composers cited by Gilbert Chase in an articlue "Some Young French Composers" in the current issue of the London "Musical Times"—Marcel Delannoy, Henry Barraud and Jean Francaix, for instance.

Expresses Catholic Mysticism

Messiaen, who is not quite twenty-eight, studied at the Paris Conservataoire with Marcel Dupre and Paul Dukas, but his aesthetic background according to Mr. Chase, is that of the Paris Schola Cantorium. "His music," states this writer, "is for the most part impregnated with religious mysticism, based on Catholic theology," and Mr. Burke's program notes quote a similar statement, that the composer "aims primarily to express with the utmost possibility of emotion and sincerity the truths of the Catholic faith."' The verbal description attached to the score and the designations of its three sections, "La Croix," "Le Croix," "Le Péche," "L'Eucharists," and, indeed, the music itself, bear out this description.

"Les Offrandes" was played last June in Paris at the first joint concert of "La Jeune France," but its publication and first performance had taken place five years before. At a first hearing, it impresses as deeply felt, sincere and devoted music, the work of one who has meditated much on the events and mysteries which inspire it. According to Mr. Burk's notes, Florent Schmitt, writing in the Paris "Temps," admitted a frank preference for the section representing sin, but yesterday it seemed that Messiaen's most individual and cogent music was in the first part and the last, with its meditative muted strings. "Le Pécheé" was expressed in a more conventional and familiar manner, and without the benefit of program note, one might have mistaken its theme as a representation of mechanical speed, such as Honegger's "Pacific 231." It is true that it also suited the phrase, "in a race breathless, frantic, without release" in the description in the score, but this points to one of the difficulties involved in program music.

Individuality Noted

The other sections gave a certain impression of individuality and the harmonic basis of "L'Eucharistie" provided a characteristic flavor, although it would take further hearing of Messiaen's music to tell whether the principles on which his work is said to be based tend to limit its range of color and thereby its ultimate interest.

The Mozart symphony, his twenty-ninth and the 201st item in the Kochel catalogue, has had only one other production here during the last ten or twelve years, by the Philharmonic-Symphony under Mr. Toscannini in November, 1931. It is brief, taking only fifteen minutes to play, but is remarkable for its revelation of an already well-developed musical individuality; the themes and their treatment are essentially Mozartian throughout, and the lyrically serious andante could cause renewed astonishment at the earliness of the flowering of Mozart's genius, although this has long been one of the best-known facts of musical history.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his admirable orchestra were in their best form, and successfully realized the contrasted atmosphere of both these works, while another memorable feature of the concert was the imposing proclamation of the close of the Sibelius symphony.

Meanwhile Gerald Tracy, a young pianist from Denver who has already played here in 1933 and 1934, was giving his third New York recital at Town Hall with a program that included Bach's toccata in D major and Schubert's sonata, Op. 53, in the same key; Brahms's Handel Variations and Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin."

Mr. Tracy's playing again gave an impression of good technical grounding and ample digital skill and fleetness, with a vigor generally kept well in hand. In the Schubert sonata he often, while not consistently, set forth the romantic expressiveness of many of its measures, but could not prevent it from seeming rather long. The Ravel suite was well executed, with laudable clarity of detail, although the interpreter missed some of the underlying pensiveness of some of its sections, such as the Forlane. He was warmly received by a good-sized audience.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

NOV 14 1936

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS JOSTEN OPUS

Boston, Nov. 13—(AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra played for the first time today a Smith college professor's syncopated symphony designed to suggest the machine age.

The music, a symphony in F, was composed at Jaffrey, N. H., last summer by Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith.

At the invitation of Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, Josten conducted. The machine age, with its attendant human energy and recklessness, provided the theme.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

NOV 14 1936

Smith College

JOSTEN LEADS ORCHESTRA IN HIS OWN OPUS

Smith College Professor Is Handed Koussevitzky's Baton for Symphony in F.

BOSTON, Nov. 13 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra played for the first time today a Smith College professor's syncopated symphony designed to suggest the machine age.

The music, a symphony in F, was composed at Jaffrey, N. H., last summer by Warner Josten, professor of music at Smith.

At the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, Josten conducted.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who received the order of Commander of the Legion of Honor last Tuesday, for the rest of the program selected composers from Italy, France, Germany and America.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 14 1936

Koussevitzky Chooses Haydn And Beethoven

Stravinsky Also on Boston's Program For Tuesday

TWO GREAT standard composers and a modern composer in a new mood are included in the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at the Bushnell Memorial Tuesday evening under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

For this concert, the second event of the Bushnell Concert Series, the following program has been announced:

Haydn, Stravinsky, Beethoven

"Symphony in B flat, No. 102" (Ninth of the London series) by Franz Josef Haydn; Divertimento from the allegorical ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fee," by Igor Stravinsky; and "Symphony 5 in C minor," by Beethoven.

To the Hartford public, who may remember the savage dissonances of "Le Sacre du Printemps," Stravinsky's new work is expected to be a pleasant surprise. This music, which has been described as "mild and lovely," represents the famous Igor in a different mood.

The Haydn symphony is in the familiar tuneful tradition of the composer, who is famed as the "father of the symphony." His wealth of invention and his great clarity gave him a rank among the first composers of all time. In the words of Charles O'Connell, Haydn "brought to bear upon the 'bones' of the sonata structure the products of his own fertile imagination, and developed the structure from a stiff and attenuated skeleton to a full-bodied, richly-colored and musically satisfying entity.... He took the best from the world of music as he saw it, and made of it a firm structure upon which the greater men who came after him built so proudly."

"Le Baiser de la Fee," (The Fairy's Kiss) was composed by Stravinsky for Ida Rubenstein in 1928. Stravinsky has expressed his pleasure in conducting this music in that it embodies a method of orchestral writing new to him and easily conveyed to its audience in a first hearing.

Tschaikowsky's "Wiegenlied im Sturm" constitutes the fundamental motive of the ballet. Stravinsky, on an introductory page to his score, thus briefly gives the plot to the ballet: "A Fairy has marked with her mysterious kiss a young man in his childhood. She withdraws him from life on the day of his greatest happiness to possess him and thus preserve this happiness forever. Again she gives him the kiss."

Olin Downs Comments

Of Beethoven's "Fifth," the famous symphony that brings the program to a close, Olin Downes has written:

"I hardly know where to begin in speaking of this masterpiece. I suppose it is the most revolutionary symphony that ever was written. It was the composer, Robert Schumann, who said that revolution could be confined within the four walls of a symphony and the police be none the wiser.

"Beethoven's revolution opens with the famous motive of four notes, of which he is supposed to have said: 'Thus fate knocks at the door.' It has never been proved that Beethoven originated this phrase, but it expresses the music. These four notes, those imperious knocks of destiny on the door are proclamation of a new man and a new day. Nothing could be more blunt, impatient, imperious and unsafe for the established order. Wth that roar of rage Beethoven strides upon the scene, and his mien is terrible."

THE MICROPHONE
BOSTON, MASS.

Nov. 20/36

This and That

By Morris Hastings

THE PROGRAM for that portion of the Boston Symphony concert, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, to be broadcast from New York City over the NBC WJZ network on November [illegible]

[illegible]

(Continued from Page 1)

18th Century which a literary critic recently has described brilliantly as a century for those "who prefer a way of life to life itself."

But musicians of the 20th Century hear HAYDN's music somewhat differently. They recognize in the best of his symphonies (he wrote more than a hundred of them) certain surprising musical strokes that foretell the music of BEETHOVEN, who was for a short time a pupil of HAYDN's.

And in some of the slow movements of his symphonies and of his chamber music there is a feeling of subjective expression that is more closely akin to the romanticism of the 19th Century than to the classicism of the 18th.

Always, whether it is in the classic or romantic vein, HAYDN's music is possessed of an amiability and a vitality that keeps it eternally buoyant and loveable.

The secret of that buoyancy perhaps may be found in the fact that HAYDN was of peasant stock, although he was so fastidious a gentleman that he never sat down to compose without first putting on his best suit and his best wig.

His most vigorous music is redolent of the joyousness of the countryside and its people.

CONCORD, N. H.
Monitor & N. H. Patriot

NOV 14 1936

Play Symphony

BOSTON, Nov. 14 (AP)—A syncopated symphony designed to suggest the machine age which Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith College, composed at Jaffrey, N. H., last summer was played for the first time here yesterday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Josten conducted the orchestra at the request of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the famous organization.

71

PREMIERE IS GIVEN OF MESSIAEN WORK

Nov 22/36

'Les Offrandes Oubliees' Has Its First Performance Here Under Koussevitzky.

N. Y. Times

MOZART ITEM PRESENTED

Symphony in A Major Has Air of Novelty—Strauss, Sibelius on Carnegie Hall Program.

By OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, which has never distinguished itself more signally in its New York visits than during the last week, gave its second concert of the Autumn season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The program was unusually interesting. It did not state what previous performances of the Mozart symphony in A major, No. 29, had been given in this city. To the last decade of concert-goers in this city, it is in all probability a novelty, and it is perfectly charming.

The modern novelty of the occasion followed, the first New York performance of "Les Offrandes oubliées," a "méditation symphonique" by one of the young men of France, Olivier Messiaen. This work, in three sections, professes to embody in tones spiritual expressions of Catholicism. Far indeed is it from the "meditations religieuses" of other and Massenetism days.

Then came the tone-poem, still a work of flaming youth, by Richard Strauss—his "Don Juan," and the concert ended with the crashing grandeurs of Sizelius's Fifth Symphony.

Strauss Tone-Poem Thrills

Even today the furious onslaught of the opening measures of Strauss's tone-poem, which is nearly half a century old, takes the listener aback, as later pages can still sweep him from his feet by reason of the consuming sensuousness and intensity of expression. But a hundred times more, if he listens receptively, will he be taken about about the opening theme of Mozart's adorable symphony. Why is this so? Ask the secret of a perfume or explain the irresistible force of the growing violet! It is transcendent beauty, this music, and also youth. It moves on winged feet, and with a certain divine coquettry. There is no inextricable rhythmic complication, or harmonic novelty about it, but there is the sense of complete and joyous miracle.

In this symphony by the 18-year-old Mozart there are no experimental pages, no hesitation, and, so far as a single hearing proves, no fault whatever of instrumental combinations and balances. If we did not know in advance that an 18-year-old was the creator of it, we might not be prompted to find in the score, as sole evidence of the composer's youth, a certain extreme conciseness, as in the brevities of "codas" at the end of some of the movements. There is not, for example, such amplitude and masterly summation as in the codas of the great G minor and C major symphonies. The young composer, with a plenitude of inspiration, fills the classic mold, and stops, in good time. He could have spoken longer, and might have done so in later years. But this is speculation, and does not matter anyhow, for the symphony is a glorious flight, and sheer beauty fills the form.

Music Played Memorably

The music would not have fallen on our ears so memorably if it had not been played so well. The singing of the strings in the andante communicated something that is not communicable either in spoken words or cold type. It was flawless, radiant and warm—not a cold classicism, not the pleasing formality of an eighteenth century melodic line, but a pure and ardent youthful song, wonderfully conveyed. There is no need to go on with the chronicles of the symphony, except to say that it does not flag in a single movement, and that the orchestra, in the course of the performance, did not abate by one jot or tittle the distinction of style with which it introduced the opening movement.

And Mr. Koussevitzky accomplished what he did with a finish and economy of baton technic which could serve as a model for any conductor. No one who judges a conductor's qualities by the eye would have had the remotest conception of his remarkable feat.

Oliver Messiaen, born at Avignon in 1908, belongs to a young group of Frenchmen now designated, among musicians, as "La jeune France." Just after the war we had in Paris the scintillant "Six," young composers who proclaimed the wit of Jean Cocteau, the glories of Brazilian jazz and Gounod. In various ways exalted smartness, elaborate vulgarity and neo-clasisicism. In the music heard yesterday there is manifestation of something more earnest and something which aims, at least, at the expression of deeper feeling.

The melodic line of the music heard yesterday is simple and clear. Catholic mysticism might be found in his opening and closing movements, which are in a devout vein. There is also the suggestion of the Christian primitive in the austerity of the harmonization.

Work is In Three Movements

The three movements are called respectively "The Cross," "The Sin," and "The Eucharist." The energetic middle movement is for this listener the least convincing. The opening theme promises well, but might sound to a matter-of-fact ear as if a good melody had been given the wrong harmonization. In other words, it is a little hard to believe in the naturalness of this harmonic writing. The last movement made the best impression yesterday.

There was a very finished, a brilliant performance of Strauss's music. For this writer it was too finished, not brutal enough, not sufficiently abandoned in its sweep, and with too much top and too little middle and bottom of orchestral tone. This, of course, is largely a matter of taste. Others, and in all probability Mr. Koussevitsky himself, would feel that the vulgarities and excesses of the music gained by such discriminating treatment. The audience responded with vehement applause.

The Sibelius symphony, however, was the balance and climax of the concert which had begun with Mozart. Here was another kind of a musical form, vast and, at first, apparently inchoate. Then the music accumulates, endlessly, inexorably, and a master's formal intention begins to become evident. The symphony grows from modest beginnings, where the actual material is concerned. The tripping theme of the scherzo movement becomes the basis of a remarkable passacaglia. The murmurings and the rustlings as of wind, the curious calls and other insignia of Sibelius lead finally to those passages of savage splendor which represent one of the greatest pages of modern music. There is dissonance for you! There is the catastrophic clash of line and of harmonic bodies, brought about not merely by the accumulation of sound but by the conflict of powerful and purely musical elements. Here we are near to the sublime. Here Mr. Koussevitzky's performance also reaches its climax, in a passage superbly prepared and driven home. The dimensions of the audience, its quality of its enthusiasm, bespoke the merits of the occasion.

E, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1936 N.Y. Herald Tribune

Koussevitzky OpensSaturday Concert Series

Introduces Composition of Messaien Here With the Boston Symphony

Offers Work by Mozart

Strauss and Sibelius Also on Afternoon Program

By Francis D. Perkins

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra met their Saturday afternoon subscribers for the first time this season yesterday in Carnegie Hall, where the conductor began his diversified program with an early symphony by Mozart in A major, written in Salzburg when the composer was eighteen, and the first performance here of "Les Offrandes Oubliees," by Olivier Messaien, one of the four young French composers who style themselves collectively "La Jeune France." The rest of the concert was devoted to familiar works by the two best-known septuagenarians among modern composers, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" and the fifth symphony of Jean Sibelius.

The appearance of "Les Offrandes Oubliées" on the program, five weeks after its first American hearing in Boston, served as a reminder that there is now a generation of French composers junior to that represented zy Honegger, Milhaud, Poulenc, Auric and the others regarded not so very many years ago as representatives of the latest tendencies in Gallic music. "Les Offrandes" is probably the first major work by a member of this youngest French generation to be made known here. The other three composers of "La Jeune France," Daniel-Lesure, Yves Baudrier and André Jolivet are thus far only names to us, as most of the other composers cited by Gilbert Chase in an articlue "Some Young French Composers" in the current issue of the London "Musical Times"—Marcel Delannoy, Henry Barraud and Jean Francaix, for instance.

Expresses Catholic Mysticism

Messiaen, who is not quite twenty-eight, studied at the Paris Conservataoire with Marcel Dupre and Paul Dukas, but his aesthetic background, according to Mr. Chase, is that of the Paris Schola Cantorium. "His music," states this writer, "is for the most part impregnated with religious mysticism, based on Catholic theology," and Mr. Burke's program notes quote a similar statement, that the composer "aims primarily to express with the utmost possibility of emotion and sincerity the truths of the Catholic faith." The verbal description attached to the score and the designations of its three sections, "La Croix," "Le Croix," "Le Péche," "L'Eucharists," and, indeed, the music itself, bear out this description.

"Les Offrandes" was played last June in Paris at the first joint concert of "La Jeune France," but its publication and first performance had taken place five years before. At a first hearing, it impresses as deeply felt, sincere and devoted music, the work of one who has meditated much on the events and mysteries which inspire it. According to Mr. Burk's notes, Florent Schmitt, writing in the Paris "Temps," admitted a frank preference for the section representing sin, but yesterday it seemed that Messiaen's most individual and cogent music was in the first part and the last, with its meditative muted strings. "Le Péchée" was expressed in a more conventional and familiar manner, and without the benefit of program note, one might have mistaken its theme as a representation of mechanical speed, such as Honegger's "Pacific 231." It is true that it also suited the phrase, "in a race breathless, frantic, without release" in the description in the score, but this points to one of the difficulties involved in program music.

Individuality Noted

The other sections gave a certain impression of individuality and the harmonic basis of "L'Eucharistie" provided a characteristic flavor, although it would take further hearing of Messiaen's music to tell whether the principles on which his work is said to be based tend to limit its range of color and thereby its ultimate interest.

The Mozart symphony, his twenty-ninth and the 201st item in the Kochel catalogue, has had only one other production here during the last ten or twelve years, by the Philharmonic-Symphony under Mr. Toscanini in November, 1931. It is brief, taking only fifteen minutes to play, but is remarkable for its revelation of an already well-developed musical individuality; the themes and their treatment are essentially Mozartian throughout, and the lyrically serious andante could cause renewed astonishment at the earliness of the flowering of Mozart's genius, although this has long been one of the best-known facts of musical history.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his admirable orchestra were in their best form, and successfully realized the contrasted atmosphere of both these works, while another memorable feature of the concert was the imposing proclamation of the close of the Sibelius symphony.

Meanwhile Gerald Tracy, a young pianist from Denver who has already played here in 1933 and 1934, was giving his third New York recital at Town Hall with a program that included Bach's toccata in D major and Schubert's sonata, Op. 53, in the same key; Brahms's Handel Variations and Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin."

Mr. Tracy's playing again gave an impression of good technical grounding and ample digital skill and fleetness, with a vigor generally kept well in hand. In the Schubert sonata he often, while not consistently, set forth the romantic expressiveness of many of its measures, but could not prevent it from seeming rather long. The Ravel suite was well executed, with laudable clarity of detail, although the interpreter missed some of the underlying pensiveness of some of its sections, such as the Forlane. He was warmly received by a good-sized audience.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

NOV 14 1936

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS JOSTEN OPUS

Boston, Nov. 13—(AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra played for the first time today a Smith college professor's syncopated symphony designed to suggest the machine age.

The music, a symphony in F, was composed at Jaffrey, N. H., last summer by Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith.

At the invitation of Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, Josten conducted. The machine age, with its attendant human energy and recklessness, provided the theme.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
ORNING UNION

NOV 14 1936

Smith College

JOSTEN LEADS ORCHESTRA IN HIS OWN OPUS

Smith College Professor Is Handed Koussevitzky's Baton for Symphony in F.

BOSTON, Nov. 13 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra played for the first time today a Smith College professor's syncopated symphony designed to suggest the machine age.

The music, a symphony in F, was composed at Jaffrey, N. H., last summer by Warner Josten, professor of music at Smith.

At the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, Josten conducted.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who received the order of Commander of the Legion of Honor last Tuesday, for the rest of the program selected composers from Italy, France, Germany and America.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 14 1936

Koussevitzky Chooses Haydn And Beethoven

Stravinsky Also on Boston's Program For Tuesday

TWO GREAT standard composers and a modern composer in a new mood are included in the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at the Bushnell Memorial Tuesday evening under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

For this concert, the second event of the Bushnell Concert Series, the following program has been announced:

Haydn, Stravinsky, Beethoven

"Symphony in B flat, No. 102" (Ninth of the London series) by Franz Josef Haydn; Divertimento from the allegorical ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fee," by Igor Stravinsky; and "Symphony 5 in C minor," by Beethoven.

To the Hartford public, who may remember the savage dissonances of "Le Sacre du Printemps," Stravinsky's new work is expected to be a pleasant surprise. This music, which has been described as "mild and lovely," represents the famous Igor in a different mood.

The Haydn symphony is in the familiar tuneful tradition of the composer, who is famed as the "father of the symphony." His wealth of invention and his great clarity gave him a rank among the first composers of all time. In the words of Charles O'Connell, Haydn "brought to bear upon the 'bones' of the sonata structure the products of his own fertile imagination, and developed the structure from a stiff and attenuated skeleton to a full-bodied, richly-colored and musically satisfying entity. . . . He took the best from the world of music as he saw it, and made of it a firm structure upon which the greater men who came after him built so proudly."

"Le Baiser de la Fee," (The Fairy's Kiss) was composed by Stravinsky for Ida Rubenstein in 1928. Stravinsky has expressed his pleasure in conducting this music in that it embodies a method of orchestral writing new to him and easily conveyed to its audience in a first hearing.

Tschaikowsky's "Wiegenlied im Sturm" constitutes the fundamental motive of the ballet. Stravinsky, on an introductory page to his score, thus briefly gives the plot to the ballet: "A Fairy has marked with her mysterious kiss a young man in his childhood. She withdraws him from life on the day of his greatest happiness to possess him and thus preserve this happiness forever. Again she gives him the kiss."

Olin Downs Comments

Of Beethoven's "Fifth," the famous symphony that brings the program to a close, Olin Downes has written:

"I hardly know where to begin in speaking of this masterpiece. I suppose it is the most revolutionary symphony that ever was written. It was the composer, Robert Schumann, who said that revolution could be confined within the four walls of a symphony and the police be none the wiser.

"Beethoven's revolution opens with the famous motive of four notes, of which he is supposed to have said: 'Thus fate knocks at the door.' It has never been proved that Beethoven originated this phrase, but it expresses the music. These four notes, those imperious knocks of destiny on the door are proclamation of a new man and a new day. Nothing could be more blunt, impatient, imperious and unsafe for the established order. Wth that roar of rage Beethoven strides upon the scene, and his mien is terrible."

THE MICROPHONE
BOSTON, MASS.

Nov. 20/36

This and That

By Morris Hastings

THE PROGRAM for that portion of the Boston Symphony concert, directed by Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, to be broadcast from New York City over the NBC-WJZ network on November 19 from 8.45 to 9.30 P. M., consists of HAYDN'S B-flat Symphony and DEBUSSY'S "La Mer" (The Sea).

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The HAYDN Symphony is one of a half-dozen which he wrote at the commission of SALOMON, a London impresario, during the Austrian composer's second visit to England in the season of 1794-95. An eminent English musicologist has called it one of HAYDN'S greatest orchestral works.

The story of HAYDN'S sojourn in England is a gratifying one. The composer, then more than 60 years old, was received with the enthusiasm usually accorded a conquering hero.

One admirer stole the Austrian's snuff-box as a souvenir. A hosier presented him with a set of stockings, each pair embroidered with a theme from various HAYDN symphonies. The composer was deluged with so many invitations for dinners and receptions that he declined all except those from titled folk.

For years HAYDN was considered a composer of "pretty" or "dainty" or "charming" symphonies. His music was looked upon as the perfect flower of the 18th Century which a literary critic recently has described brilliantly as a century for those "who prefer a way of life to life itself."

(Continued from Page 1)

But musicians of the 20th Century hear HAYDN'S music somewhat differently. They recognize in the best of his symphonies (he wrote more than a hundred of them) certain surprising musical strokes that foretell the music of BEETHOVEN, who was for a short time a pupil of HAYDN'S.

And in some of the slow movements of his symphonies and of his chamber music there is a feeling of subjective expression that is more closely akin to the romanticism of the 19th Century than to the classicism of the 18th.

Always, whether it is in the classic or romantic vein, HAYDN'S music is possessed of an amiability and a vitality that keeps it eternally buoyant and loveable.

The secret of that buoyancy perhaps may be found in the fact that HAYDN was of peasant stock, although he was so fastidious a gentleman that he never sat down to compose without first putting on his best suit and his best wig.

His most vigorous music is redolent of the joyousness of the countryside and its people.

CONCORD, N. H.
Monitor & N. H. Patriot

NOV 14 1936

Play Symphony

BOSTON, Nov. 14 (AP)—A syncopated symphony designed to suggest the machine age which Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith College, composed at Jaffrey, N. H., last summer was played for the first time here yesterday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Josten conducted the orchestra at the request of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the famous [illegible] organization.

Koussevitzky Offers Fifth By Beethoven

Hartford Times – Nov. 18/

Bostonians Are Also Heard in Haydn And Stravinsky

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

After as many concerts as the Boston Symphony Orchestra has played in Hartford it would appear that one ought to know just what to expect, and having expected it, suffer just that little disappointment with which anticipation hazes over the gloss of hopes held too high.

Once again last night at Bushnell Memorial these players, in the second event of the current orchestral series, demonstrated that their peerlessness is a self-renewing essence which somehow belittles even the doting memory. There are so few things in the world like that; yet a parallel, oddly enough, confronted us on this very occasion. Commonplace of music that it is, when was there even an adequate performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony that did not beggar our recollections of its beauty and power?

An "Interpretation"

Perhaps a good many persons wondered just why Serge Koussevitzky elected to present The Fifth. They may have been mollified to a degree by the fact that the rest of the program comprised Stravinsky's suite from Le Baiser de la Fee and a lesser known Haydn Symphony, the ninth of the Salomon set in B flat. If it has come to the point where a conductor must have a reason for giving the C minor of Beethoven, then the same persons who would insist upon a reason would hardly be satisfied with just another "interpretation" for that is what it was, there being a good deal of Koussevitzky in this Beethoven.

So what? The type of mind which, with a collector's musty zeal, catalogues "interpretations" probably took note of the explosive fortissimo opening, taken in strictest time, of the lingering pace of the andante and of the sharply marked dynamic contrasts. Such a mind, nevertheless, could apprehend several marvelously built transitions, in particular the seemingly idle conceit which ends the third movement, like so much magician's abracadabra, the force of which is never apparent until the gates of glory swing open on the final allegro. But any mind whatsoever could not have failed to be moved by this Koussevitzky's Beethoven.

An Exquisite Haydn

The Haydn symphony was simply Haydn. All the elegance the savor, and the surface humors that th master brought with him from th Esterhazy court to England live again in this sparkling performance. The rollicking fun of the presto almost fashioned syllables of the spoken word. The gently pathetic slow movement was equally appealing in its own way but, unlike the Frenchmen in the London of 1794, the audience saved up its applause until the end of the symphony.

Writing of Haydn adagios a commentator of that day reported: "Passages often occur which render it impossible to listen to them without becoming excited. We are altogether carried away, and forced to applaud with hand and mouth. This is especially the case with Frenchmen, of whom we have so many here that all public places are filled with them. You know that they have great sensibility, and cannot restrain their transports, so that in the midst of the finest passages in soft adagios they clap their hands in loud applause and thus mar the effect."

To watch Koussevitzky conduct such a work as this is a lesson in music appreciation. The melting phrase, the piquant repartee, the reproach, the reply and a burst of gaiety are the reflections of a galvanic baton, an eloquent face seen occasionally in profile and such a expressive gestures as the business of shaking music out of his sleeve.

Ballet Music

He was not quite the visual realization which the Stravinsky music required, however, for Stravinsky's ballet conceptions betray their origin in spite of orchestral dress. This particular pastiche, Le Basier de la Fee, is avowedly Tschaikowskian even to the point of direct quotation although the orchestration would probably have bewildered the author of the tunes.

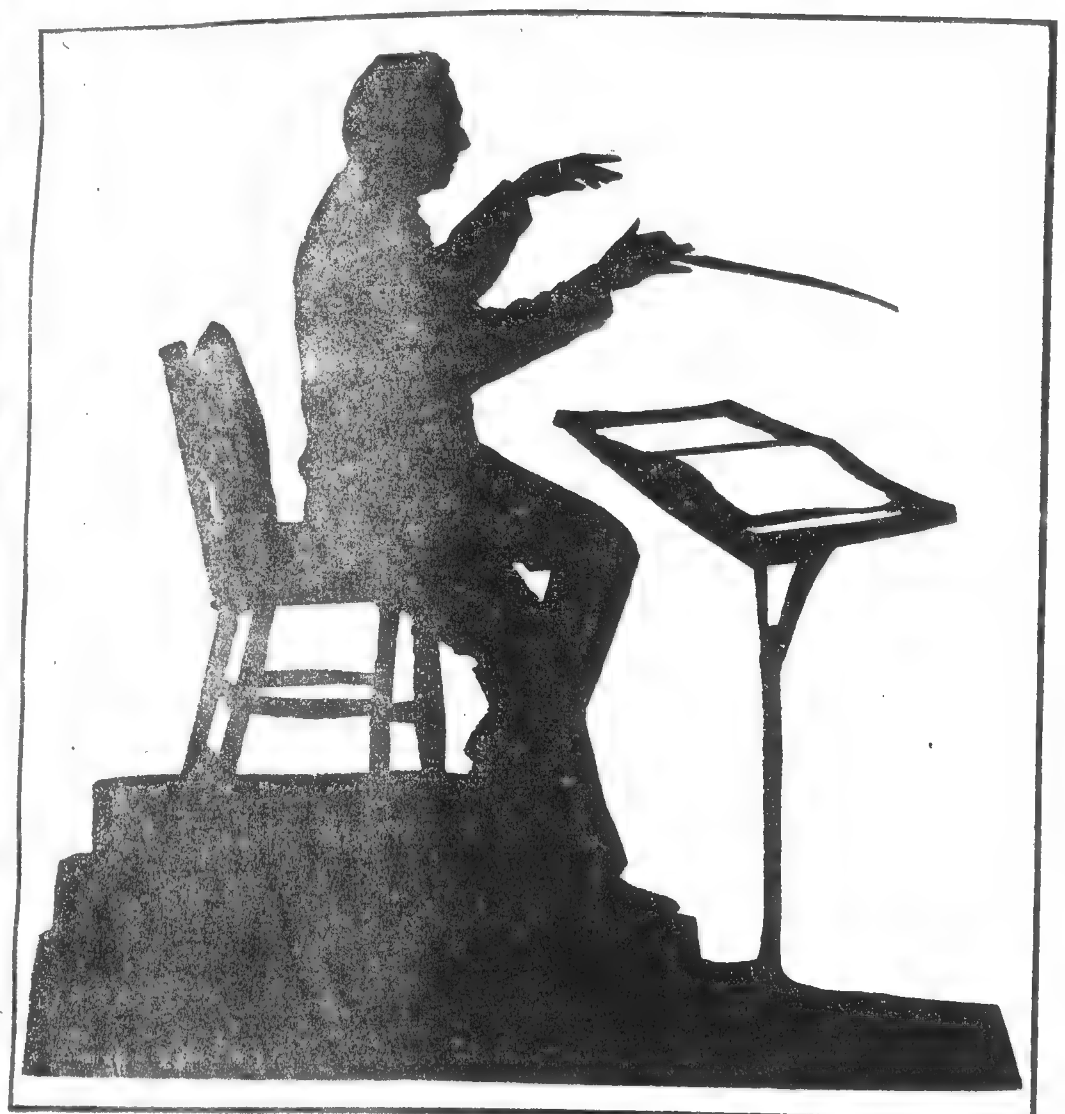
The effectiveness of the divertissement was entirely dependent upon the unapproachable skill with which the Boston players took their parts, oftentimes in solo. Koussevitzky made the score flawlessly transparent and fully maintained his reputation as an American exponent of Stravinsky.

One might almost say that Boston Symphony concerts have become Koussevitzky concerts. Although he is the first to recognize and acknowledge the incomparable resources which his men deliver, it is he who renews their artistic puissance at every concert. In this he follows a long line of illustrious leaders, for the history of the Boston orchestra is simply the record of a responsive ensemble living up to men like Gericke and Paur, Seidl and Nikisch, Muck and now Koussevitzky.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 1 5 1936

Boston Symphony In Woolsey Hall Concert



An unusual study of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

WITH Sibelius' Symphony No. 5 in E-flat major, Op. 82, as the featured selection, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make their first appearance of the season here in Woolsey Hall this coming Wednesday evening, the event being the second offering of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series under the auspices of the Yale University School of Music.

Still another symphony, Haydn's B-flat No. 102, the Ninth of the London Series, will be heard at the same performance, and Debussy's "La Mer" (The Sea), one of the most interesting compositions in all the field of symphonic literature, will round out one of the finest evenings of great music ever presented locally by the famous Boston orchestra of one hundred and ten musicians. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will, as usual, be the conductor.

The appeal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to music-lovers of this vicinity is a powerful one. So great is the interest in the noted organizatin and its distinguished Russian conductor that seats have been at a premium at all of their concerts here in the past several years. Next Wednesday's concert will be no exception and already an audience that will tax the capacity of the spacious Woolsey Hall is assured.

The Woolsey Hall Series schedule for this season equals any that have been given in the past. Fritz Kreisler has already appeared for the first concert, and the Don Cossack Russian Male Chorus will mark the third fine musical occasion on December 8. After the first of the year will come in order Lotte Lehmann, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, on January 12th; Josef Hofmann, pianist, February 17th, and again the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season's finale on March 10th.

New Haven has long been looked to as the musical center of Connecticut, and the great patronage of the Woolsey Concert Series for this as well as the past several seasons bears out this opinion Last year more than four-fifths of the auditorium was subscribed to before the first concert. This year less than a hundred tickets were available for sale to the individual events. When one realizes that Woolsey Hall compares in size with the larger concert halls of the East, including such auditoriums as Carnegie Hall in New York and Symphony Hall in Boston, the attendance at these great musical events to the cultural life of this vicinity can best be estimated.

The order of selections for Wednesday evening is as follows:

Haydn ....
...... Symphony in B-flat No. 102
(Ninth of the London Series)
I. Largo; Allegro vivace
II. Adagio
III. Menuetto; Allegro; Trio
IV. Finale: Presto
DeBussy ....
"La Mer," Three Orchestral Sketches
I. De l'aube a midi sur la mer
II. Jeux de vagues
III. Dialogue du vent et de mer
Sibelius ....
Symphony No. 5 in E-flat mojor, Op. 82
I. Tempo molto moderato
II. Allegro moderato. ma poco a poco stetto
III. Andante mosso, quasi allegretto
IV. Allegro molto

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

1936

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS HERE NOV. 24

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its season in Carnegie Hall, New York, in the coming week, and on Tuesday, Nov. 24, will give the second concert of the season at the Metropolitan theatre, Providence, at which Albert Spalding will appear as soloist with the orchestra. Mr. Spalding, who is later to appear with the orchestra in Boston, is to be heard at the Providence concert in a violin concerto of Mozart. Richard Burgin, the concertmaster and assistant conductor of the orchestra, will conduct this concert. Mr. Burgin will open the program with the Organ Toccata of Johann Sebastian Bach in C major, which has been arranged for full orchestra by Leo Weiner. The closing number will be the First Symphony of Kalinnikov in G minor, a melodious work of the earlier Russian school.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

Boston Symphony Resumes Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will begin its fifth season as an excellent NBC feature on Thursday, Nov. 19, from 8:45 to 9:30 p. m., E. S. T., over KDKA. The concert will be broadcast from Carnegie Hall, New York City.

For this initial program of his broadcast series Dr. Koussevitsky has programmed the Haydn Symphony No. 104 in B Flat Major, and Claude Debussy's tone poem, "La Mer." The second concert, on the following week, will be the first of a Boston Symphony Orchestra series to be broadcast from the stage of historic Sanders Theater at Harvard University.

OTTAWA, CAN.
CITIZEN

Nov. 11/36

France Honors Musician

(Associated Press.)

BOSTON, Nov. 10.—France bestowed the order of commander of the legion of honor upon Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra here today.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

NOV 20 1936

Haydn Leads in Program at Carnegie

Boston Symphony Gives Masterly Performance Under Koussevitzky.

By PITTS SANBORN.

Artistically a Haydn symphony in B flat, the ninth of the twelve he wrote for Salomon of London, was the feature of the season's first Carnegie Hall concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening.

The work itself is from the first measure to the last a richly charged expression of its composer's genius, and the performance accorded it by Serge Koussevitzky and his men was admirably calculated to bring out its beauties.

Throughout, the orchestra had balance, tone, flexibility, polish, everything, in fact, an orchestra should have, and Mr. Koussevitzky conducted with sympathy and relish. Altogether the occasion was worthy of Haydn and a delight to appreciative listeners. A capacity house applauded the performance enthusiastically.

* * *

Headed the Program.

Haydn headed the program. Next came Debussy. Again the orchestral execution was magnificent, but Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of the three sketches collectively entitled "La Mer" was decidedly personal. Lyrical passages were emphasized to the point of sentimentality, and in contrast the tumults kicked up by the wind grew quickly into young hurricanes. Toward the end of the aqueous experience St. Simeon stepped down from the pillar and forgot himself in St. Vitus.

After a discreet intermission for chatter and smoke, the latter worthy resumed control in the remaining number of the concert, Beethoven's symphony No. 5, in C minor, op. 67. With the first hammer-blow of fate the storm clouds burst wide open, and then the rocks were rended and the waters raved.

* * *

Reading Idiosyncratic.

The reading was nothing if not idiosyncratic. Only an orchestra of surpassing virtuosity like the Boston band of great renown could have come through the ordeal unscathed.

The Bostonians did so proudly, their colors borne aloft in noble exultation. And, after all, who is not entitled to his own Beethoven?

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

NOV 8 - 1936

Boston Symphony Concerts on Air

Fifth Season of Broadcasts to Start Nov. 19

The world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will return to the National Broadcasting Company's networks for its fifth season as an exclusive NBC feature in a series scheduled to begin Thursday, Nov. 19.

Instead of broadcasting its entire series from Boston as in previous seasons, the orchestra, through special negotiations just completed, will be heard in four of its Carnegie Hall concerts in New York; four from the Sanders Theater at Harvard University in Cambridge; three from Symphony Hall, Boston; and one from the Academy of Music in Brooklyn. Nine of the famous "Pop" Concerts in Boston also will be broadcast.

The "Pop" Concerts will be presented from Symphony Hall, Boston, on nine consecutive Thursday evenings, from 8:30 to 9:30 p. m., beginning May 6.

The 12 broadcasts scheduled during the orchestra's regular season will all be on Thursday evenings, except the three programs from Boston which will be Thursday matinees.

All 21 programs will be presented over the coast-to-coast NBC-Blue Network.

Boston Symphony Impressive Here In Haydn's Music

By WINTHROP SARGEANT.

A large audience turned out last night at Carnegie Hall for the opening of the Boston Symphony's fifty-first New York season. At the conductor's stand was the familiar figure of Serge Koussevitzky. Last of the major orchestras to make a local bow this Winter, the Bosotn organization exhibited its usual freshness and pliancy.

A well-chosen program began with Haydn's Symphony in B Flat, No. 102, and continued with Debussy's "La Mer."

It has been quite a week, not only for Haydn symphonies, but for those particular late Haydn symphonies that belong to the so-called "Salomon group." At the Philharmonic concerts of Wednesday evening and yesterday afternoon John Barbirolli conducted what is usually known as the first of the series which Haydn wrote for the London impresario between 1791 and 1795. Last night's Haydn was No. 9 of the same vintage.

It is a characteristically melodious, subtle and (for its time) even a daring work. The art of writing for stringed instruments as Haydn and his pupil Mozart knew it has remained a lost one since their time. The lucidity of phrasing that they inherited from the early Italians was something that got buried in the brilliancy and ponderousness of the romantic composers. The ninth of the "Salomon" symphonies is one particularly rich in effective string writing. And in the string sections of the Boston symphony Mr. Koussevitzky had an unsurpassed instrument for the delineation of its phrases. The clarity and style with which the first violins infused the final movement were of a sort uncommon in the ordinary run of symphony concerts.

Debussy's three-part, impressionistic tone poem, "La Mer," has been familiar to us in a number of interpretations. Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of it last night was cautious and objective rather than inspired. But the delicate balances of tone color and dynamics were so admirably held in hand that some allowance could be made for a lack of vigor in the climactic passages. Altogether, if not a brilliant performance, it was a revealing and solidly-knit one. The audience greeted it warmly.

The concert was brought to a close with the thrice-familiar and durable C Minor Symphony of Beethoven. The performance had the refinement and finish that usually accompany this work at the hands of the Bostonians.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

NOV 14 1936

Spalding Will Play with Hub Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its season in Carnegie Hall, New York, in the coming week, and on Tuesday, November 24, will give the second concert of the season at the Metropolitan Theatre, Providence, at which Albert Spalding will appear as soloist with the orchestra. Mr. Spalding, who is later to appear with the orchestra in Boston, is to be heard at the Providence concert in a violin concerto of Mozart. Richard Burgin, the concertmaster and assistant conductor of the orchestra, will conduct this concert. Mr. Burgin will open the programme with the Organ Toccata of Johann Sebastian Bach in C major, which has been arranged for full orchestra by Leo Weiner. The closing number will be the First Symphony of Kalinnikov in G minor, a melodious work of the earlier Russian school.

MONTREAL, CANADA
STAR

11/36

DR. S. KOUSSEVITZKY HONORED BY FRANCE

BOSTON, Nov. 11—(U. P.)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received the cravat of commander of the French Legion of Honor at a luncheon here yesterday.

The presentation was by Francois de Tessan, French Under-Secretary of State, who said Dr. Koussevitzky's "eminence in the world of music is equal in importance to that of artists outstanding in European cultural history."

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

NOV 1 4 1936

Recorded Music

UNFINISHED SYMPHONY

A beloved romantic symphony and new exotic music are featured in records released by Victor this month. The old favorite is Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" in B Minor, the best recording of the work to date, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky (M-319, $6.50). This is an unusually successful album from the standpoint of authenic transferring of orchestral tone, for the various choirs of the ensemble retain to a remarkable degree their natural tonal qualities. It is a good performance, too, sharply high-lighted by dramatic contrasts in volume. The performance ranges from gentle lyricism to rich, almost overpowering use of the full orchestra. Some may prefer a more consistently serene performance, altho the interpretation is always in good taste.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 1 4 1936

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS NEW NUMBER

Boston—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra played for the first time a Smith College professor's syncopated symphony designed to suggest the machine age.

The music, a symphony in F, was composed at Jaffrey, N. H., last summer by Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith.

At the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, Josten conducted.

DEL RIO, TEXAS
NEWS

HONORS SYMPHONY HEAD

BOSTON, Nov. 12. (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced today receipt of notification through the French consulate here of his elevation to the rank of the commander of the French Legion of Honor.

LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER

mphony of the Machine Age

BOSTON, Nov. 14 (AP)—A syncopated symphony designed to suggest the machine age which Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith college, composed at Jaffrey, N. H., last summer was played for the first time here yesterday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Josten conducted the orchestra at the request of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the famous musical organization.

FITCHBURG, MASS.
SENTINEL

on Symphony Plays Opera Composed at Jaffrey

BOSTON, Nov. 14 (AP)—A syncopated symphony designed to suggest the machine age and which Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith college, composed at Jaffrey, N. H., last summer, was played for the first time here yesterday by the Boston symphony orchestra.

Josten conducted the orchestra at the request of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the famous musical organization.

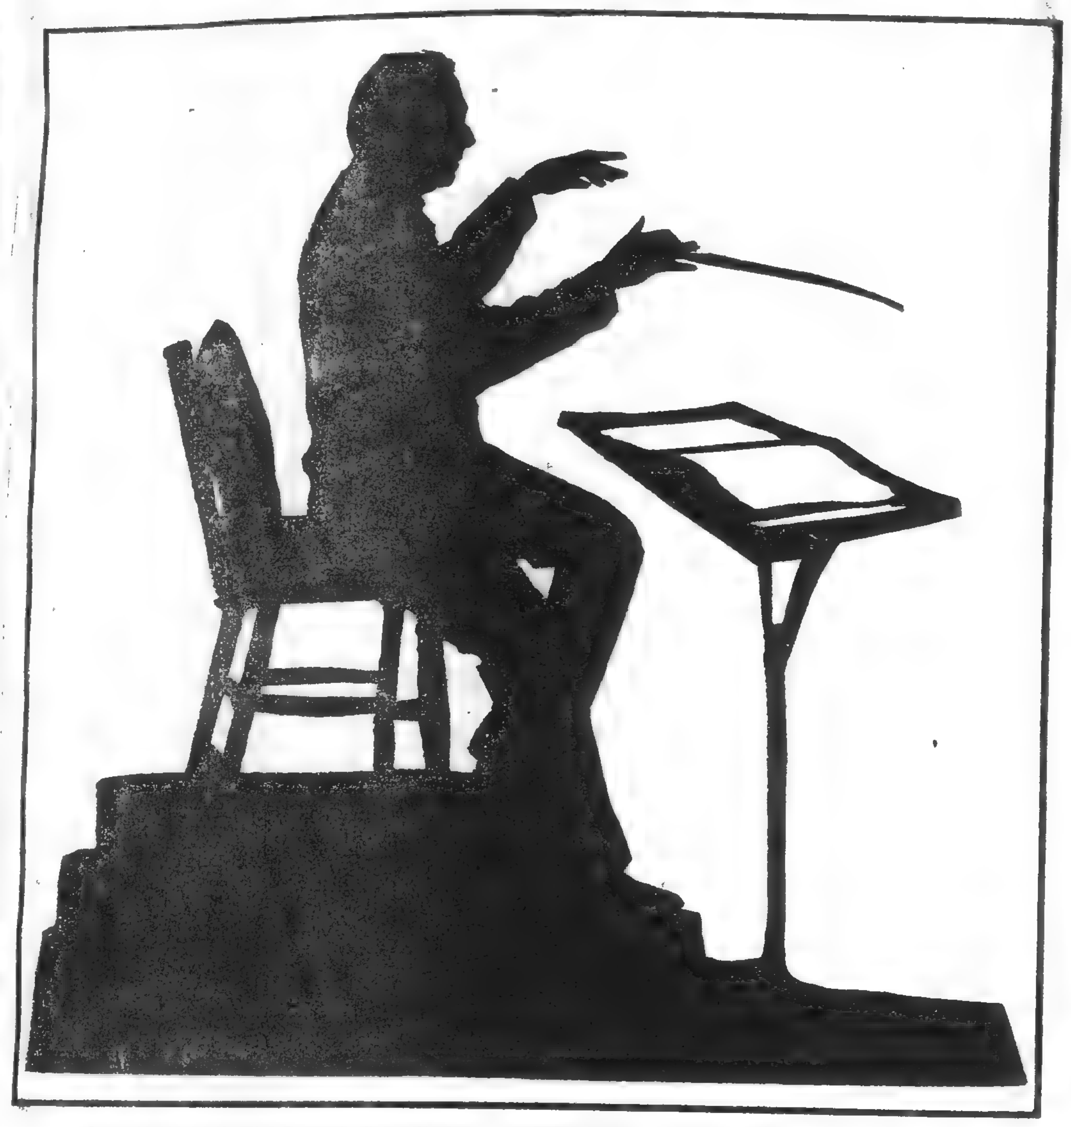
BRATTLEBORO, VT.
REFORMER

BOSTON, Nov. 14 (AP).—A syncopated symphony designed to suggest the machine age which Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith college, composed at Jaffrey, N. H., las summer was played for the first tim here yesterday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Josten conducte the orchestra at the request of D Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the famous musical organization.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 15 1936

Boston Symphony In Woolsey Hall Concert



An unusual study of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

WITH Sibelius' Symphony No. 5 in E-flat major, Op. 82, as the featured selection, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make their first appearance of the season here in Woolsey Hall this coming Wednesday evening, the event being the second offering of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series under the auspices of the Yale University School of Music.

Still another symphony, Haydn's B-flat No. 102, the Ninth of the London Series, will be heard at the same performance, and Debussy's "La Mer" (The Sea), one of the most interesting compositions in all the field of symphonic literature, will round out one of the finest evenings of great music ever presented locally by the famous Boston orchestra of one hundred and ten musicians. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will, as usual, be the conductor.

The appeal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to music-lovers of this vicinity is a powerful one. So great is the interest in the noted organizatin and its distinguished Russian conductor that seats have been at a premium at all of their concerts here in the past several years. Next Wednesday's concert will be no exception and already an audience that will tax the capacity of the spacious Woolsey Hall is assured.

The Woolsey Hall Series schedule for this season equals any that have been given in the past. Fritz Kreisler has already appeared for the first concert, and the Don Cossack Russian Male Chorus will mark the third fine musical occasion on December 8. After the first of the year will come in order Lotte Lehmann, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, on January 12th; Josef Hofmann, pianist, February 17th, and again the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season's finale on March 10th.

New Haven has long been looked to as the musical center of Connecticut, and the great patronage of the Woolsey Concert Series for this as well as the past several seasons bears out this opinion. Last year more than four-fifths of the auditorium was subscribed to before the first concert. This year less than a hundred tickets were available for sale to the individual events. When one realizes that Woolsey Hall compares in size with the larger concert halls of the East, including such auditoriums as Carnegie Hall in New York and Symphony Hall in Boston, the attendance at these great musical events to the cultural life of this vicinity can best be estimated.

The order of selections for Wednesday evening is as follows:

Haydn ....
...... Symphony in B-flat No. 102
(Ninth of the London Series)
I. Largo; Allegro vivace
II. Adagio
III. Menuetto; Allegro; Trio
IV. Finale: Presto
DeBussy ....
"La Mer," Three Orchestral Sketches
I. De 'aube a midi sur la mer
II. Jeux de vagues
III. Dialogue du vent et de mer
Sibelius ....
Symphony No. 5 in E-flat mojor, Op. 82
I. Tempo molto moderato
II. Allegro moderato, ma poco a poco stetto
III. Andante mosso, quasi allegretto
IV. Allegro molto

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

NOV 14 1936

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS HERE NOV. 24

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its season in Carnegie Hall, New York, in the coming week, and on Tuesday, Nov. 24, will give the second concert of the season at the Metropolitan theatre, Providence, at which Albert Spalding will appear as soloist with the orchestra. Mr. Spalding, who is later to appear with the orchestra in Boston, is to be heard at the Providence concert in a violin concerto of Mozart. Richard Burgin, the concertmaster and assistant conductor of the orchestra, will conduct this concert. Mr. Burgin will open the program with the Organ Toccata of Johann Sebastian Bach in C major, which has been arranged for full orchestra by Leo Weiner. The closing number will be the First Symphony of Kalinnikov in G minor, a melodious work of the earlier Russian school.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

Boston Symphony Resumes Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will begin its fifth season as an excellent NBC feature on Thursday, Nov. 19, from 8:45 to 9:30 p. m., E. S. T., over KDKA. The concert will be broadcast from Carnegie Hall, New York City.

For this initial program of his broadcast series Dr. Koussevitsky has programmed the Haydn Symphony No. 104 in B Flat Major, and Claude Debussy's tone poem, "La Mer." The second concert, on the following week, will be the first of a Boston Symphony Orchestra series to be broadcast from the stage of historic Sanders Theater at Harvard University.

OTTAWA, CAN.
Nov. CITIZEN 11/36

France Honors Musician

(Associated Press.)

BOSTON, Nov. 10.—France bestowed the order of commander of the legion of honor upon Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra here today.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

NOV 20 1936

Haydn Leads in Program at Carnegie

Boston Symphony Gives Masterly Performance Under Koussevitzky.

By PITTS SANBORN.

Artistically a Haydn symphony in B flat, the ninth of the twelve he wrote for Salomon of London, was the feature of the season's first Carnegie Hall concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening.

The work itself is from the first measure to the last a richly charged expression of its composer's genius, and the performance accorded it by Serge Koussevitzky and his men was admirably calculated to bring out its beauties.

Throughout, the orchestra had balance, tone, flexibility, polish, everything, in fact, an orchestra should have, and Mr. Koussevitzky conducted with sympathy and relish. Altogether the occasion was worthy of Haydn and a delight to appreciative listeners. A capacity house applauded the performance enthusiastically.

* * *

Headed the Program.

Haydn headed the program. Next came Debussy. Again the orchestral execution was magnificent, but Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of the three sketches collectively entitled "La Mer" was decidedly personal. Lyrical passages were emphasized to the point of sentimentality, and in contrast the tumults kicked up by the wind grew quickly into young hurricanes. Toward the end of the aqueous experience St. Simeon stepped down from the pillar and forgot himself in St. Vitus.

After a discreet intermission for chatter and smoke, the latter worthy resumed control in the remaining number of the concert, Beethoven's symphony No. 5, in C minor, op. 67. With the first hammer-blow of fate the storm clouds burst wide open, and then the rocks were rended and the waters raved.

* * *

Reading Idiosyncratic.

The reading was nothing if not idiosyncratic. Only an orchestra of surpassing virtuosity like the Boston band of great renown could have come through the ordeal unscathed.

The Bostonians did so proudly, their colors borne aloft in noble exultation. And, after all, who is not entitled to his own Beethoven?

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

NOV 8 - 1936

Boston Symphony Concerts on Air

Fifth Season of Broadcasts to Start Nov. 19

The world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will return to the National Broadcasting Company's networks for its fifth season as an exclusive NBC feature in a series scheduled to begin Thursday, Nov. 19.

Instead of broadcasting its entire series from Boston as in previous seasons, the orchestra, through special negotiations just completed, will be heard in four of its Carnegie Hall concerts in New York; four from the Sanders Theater at Harvard University in Cambridge; three from Symphony Hall, Boston; and one from the Academy of Music in Brooklyn. Nine of the famous "Pop" Concerts in Boston also will be broadcast.

The "Pop" Concerts will be presented from Symphony Hall, Boston, on nine consecutive Thursday evenings, from 8:30 to 9:30 p. m., beginning May 6.

The 12 broadcasts scheduled during the orchestra's regular season will all be on Thursday evenings, except the three programs from Boston which will be Thursday matinees.

All 21 programs will be presented over the coast-to-coast NBC-Blue Network.

Boston Symphony Impressive Here In Haydn's Music

By WINTHROP SARGEANT.

A large audience turned out last night at Carnegie Hall for the opening of the Boston Symphony's fifty-first New York season. At the conductor's stand was the familiar figure of Serge Koussevitzky. Last of the major orchestras to make a local bow this Winter, the Bosotn organization exhibited its usual freshness and pliancy.

A well-chosen program began with Haydn's Symphony in B Flat, No. 102, and continued with Debussy's "La Mer."

It has been quite a week, not only for Haydn symphonies, but for those particular late Haydn symphonies that belong to the so-called "Salomon group." At the Philharmonic concerts of Wednesday evening and yesterday afternoon John Barbirolli conducted what is usually known as the first of the series which Haydn wrote for the London impresario between 1791 and 1795. Last night's Haydn was No. 9 of the same vintage.

It is a characteristically melodious, subtle and (for its time) even a daring work. The art of writing for stringed instruments as Haydn and his pupil Mozart knew it has remained a lost one since their time. The lucidity of phrasing that they inherited from the early Italians was something that got buried in the brilliancy and ponderousness of the romantic composers. The ninth of the "Salomon" symphonies is one particularly rich in effective string writing. And in the string sections of the Boston symphony Mr. Koussevitzky had an unsurpassed instrument for the delineation of its phrases. The clarity and style with which the first violins infused the final movement were of a sort uncommon in the ordinary run of symphony concerts.

Debussy's three-part, impressionistic tone poem, "La Mer," has been familiar to us in a number of interpretations. Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of it last night was cautious and objective rather than inspired. But the delicate balances of tone color and dynamics were so admirably held in hand that some allowance could be made for a lack of vigor in the climactic passages. Altogether, if not a brilliant performance, it was a revealing and solidly-knit one. The audience greeted it warmly.

The concert was brought to a close with the thrice-familiar and durable C Minor Symphony of Beethoven. The performance had the refinement and finish that usually accompany this work at the hands of the Bostonians.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

NOV 14 1936

Spalding Will Play with Hub Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its season in Carnegie Hall, New York, in the coming week, and on Tuesday, November 24, will give the second concert of the season at the Metropolitan Theatre, Providence, at which Albert Spalding will appear as soloist with the orchestra. Mr. Spalding, who is later to appear with the orchestra in Boston, is to be heard at the Providence concert in a violin concerto of Mozart. Richard Burgin, the concertmaster and assistant conductor of the orchestra, will conduct this concert. Mr. Burgin will open the programme with the Organ Toccata of Johann Sebastian Bach in C major, which has been arranged for full orchestra by Leo Weiner. The closing number will be the First Symphony of Kalinnikov in G minor, a melodious work of the earlier Russian school.

MONTREAL, CANADA
Nov. STAR 11/36

DR. S. KOUSSEVITZKY HONORED BY FRANCE

BOSTON, Nov. 11—(U. P.)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received the cravat of commander of the French Legion of Honor at a luncheon here yesterday.

The presentation was by Francois de Tessan, French Under-Secretary of State, who said Dr. Koussevitzky's "eminence in the world of music is equal in importance to that of artists outstanding in European cultural history."

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

NOV 14 1936

Recorded Music

UNFINISHED SYMPHONY

A beloved romantic symphony and new exotic music are featured in records released by Victor this month. The old favorite is Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" in B Minor, the best recording of the work to date, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky (M-319, $6.50). This is an unusually successful album from the standpoint of authenic transferring of orchestral tone, for the various choirs of the ensemble retain to a remarkable degree their natural tonal qualities. It is a good performance, too, sharply high-lighted by dramatic contrasts in volume. The performance ranges from gentle lyricism to rich, almost overpowering use of the full orchestra. Some may prefer a more consistently serene performance, altho the interpretation is always in good taste.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 14 1936

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS NEW NUMBER

Boston—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra played for the first time a Smith College professor's syncopated symphony designed to suggest the machine age.

The music, a symphony in F, was composed at Jaffrey, N. H., last summer by Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith.

At the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, Josten conducted.

DEL RIO, TEXAS
NEWS

NOV 12 1936

HONORS SYMPHONY HEAD

BOSTON, Nov. 12. (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced today receipt of notification through the French consulate here of his elevation to the rank of the commander of the French Legion of Honor.

LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER

Nov 14/36

mphony of the Machine Age

BOSTON, Nov. 14 (AP)—A syncopated symphony designed to suggest the machine age which Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith college, composed at Jaffrey, N. H., last summer was played for the first time here yesterday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Josten conducted the orchestra at the request of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the famous musical organization.

FITCHBURG, MASS.
Nov. SENTINEL 14/36

on Symphony Plays Opera Composed at Jaffrey

BOSTON, Nov. 14 (AP)—A syncopated symphony designed to suggest the machine age and which Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith college, composed at Jaffrey, N. H., last summer, was played for the first time here yesterday by the Boston symphony orchestra.

Josten conducted the orchestra at the request of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the famous musical organization.

BRATTLEBORO, VT.
Nov REFORMER 14/36

BOSTON, Nov. 14 (AP).—A syncopated symphony designed to suggest the machine age which Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith college, composed at Jaffrey, N. H., las summer was played for the first tim here yesterday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Josten conducte the orchestra at the request of D Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the famous musical organization.

73.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

NOV 1 5 1936

THE HARTFORD COURANT

Left—DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Bushnell Memorial Tuesday evening in second event of the Bushnell Concert Series.

BURLINGTON, VT.
FREE PRESS

NOV 14 1936

"SYMPHONY IN F" IS GIVEN A TRIAL

BOSTON. Nov. 13. (AP)—The Boston's symphony orchestra played for the first time today a Smith College professor's syncopated symphony designed to suggest the machine age.

The music entitled "Symphony In F." was composed at Jaffrey, N. H., last summer, by Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith.

At the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, Josten was on the podium.

The machine age, with its attendant human energy and recklessness was the dominant theme.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

NOV 1 5 1936

Easy Now to Know Famed Musicians

"What I wouldn't give to be personally acquainted with one of the world's famous musical artists!" Who has not said that? Now comes a simple means of realizing the ambition—and not in respect to one musical celebrity, but more than a hundred.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra, which he conducts, are rated by authorities as either the greatest conductor and the greatest orchestra in the world, or as among the three greatest. Certainly that makes Koussevitzky and his men a group with whom acquaintanceship would be an enviable distinction. And now anyone may feel on friendly footing with all of them simply by turning the pages of a very engaging book. It contains sketches of Koussevitzky and his musicians made from life by a noted artist, Gerome Brush. Each of the one hundred and eight members of the world-famous orchestra was sketched in action—the first time such a thing has been achieved with the Boston Symphony, or any other great orchestra. With each portrait Mr. Brush also provides a word-sketch written by himself, which gives intimate sidelights on the personality and career of each man. The book has been designed by a celebrated typographical designer, D. B. Updike, and beautifully printed at the Merrymount Press, Boston. Yet despite all these distinctions, the volume costs but $1.50. The title is, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1936." It may be ordered from Symphony Hall, Boston.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

NOV [illegible] 1936

Unfinished Symphony Critics Have Made Little Progress

Concert Audiences Strong for Schubert Work Despite Attempts to Divert Attention to Other Orchestral Masterpieces.

By Jay Walz.

There probably isn't a music critic or program annotator who hasn't heard the call to belittle the "Unfinished" Symphony. And many have heeded.

They have heard the popular piece so often they think it's time to be passing to greater symphonic accomplishments, and they'd like the crowd to follow. Yet in 100 years they have had little success. About the time they have noted progress in diverting interest to some other masterpiece, along comes a request program—the votes pour in and the commentators dive into their Schubertiana volumes for something new to say about the symphony Schubert started and never completed.

After all that's been said and written about the symphony's lack of power and all-'round orchestral merit, it is still possible to poll the concert audiences and find that the "Unfinished" is still well entrenched as a favorite.

Record audiences are pretty much the same. They give the Schubert No. 8 in B Minor (the catalogue's name for the "Unfinished") more wear than almost any other album, and many collectors stock up on it periodically.

Is Good Test Piece.

Record companies bring out a new "Unfinished" every so often, and explain they have acted as a result of advances in the science of phonograph reproduction. This is undoubtedly the case, and certainly they could pick no better "test" piece with which to demonstrate improved methods. Yet so persistent is the demand for this album it would go on selling with, or without, better work in the recording studios.

The new recording, featured by Victor this month serves everyone's purpose. It most certainly shows what has been accomplished in the laboratory. Compare it with any previous "Unfinished" you have, and note the resonance in the tones, the fullness of orchestral color (you may think it has been given too much), and the amount of the actual music that has been captured on the disc.

Some may be particularly interested in this new album, M-319, because it's done by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Koussevitzky is no routine conductor. Those who count on him for original tonal turns here and there will not be let down here, although he seems to have done nothing so radical as to be objectionable to the most devoted Schubertian.

Not Accidental.

What Koussevitzky has done in this interpretation is not accidental. He has worked it over after a thorough study. When the orchestra played it in Boston a few months ago the performance proved quite a sensation. On the records the Koussevitzky touch seems to have heightened the climaxes a lot. I don't think it's out of the spirit of Schubert, but it may be beyond the letter of the score. Koussevitzky commands a much more powerful orchestra than Schubert ever dreamed of, and he may be taking advantage of his facilities—just as is the Victor Co.

The album has a pleasant added subject on the odd side of the last disc. Schubert's ballet music from "Rosamunde" would be a bit simple for the modern dance, but it is not long enough ever to be tiresome.

On a single record Victor offers a new interpretation of part of the most familiar of the Bach Brandenburg concertos, the No. 2. Cortot conducts the Ecole Normale Chamber Orchestra in a brisk, yet scholarly, performance of the spirited first movement.

A Columbia disc of selections from Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffman" is decidedly appealing. Sir Thomas Beecham conducts the London Philharmonic in this. Orchestra and leader enjoy their work here, and so will the listener, particularly if, like us, he has a sentimental attachment for Offenbach's opera.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

MUSIC

by

H. Earle Johnson

CONCERT prospects for the immediate week, and beyond, are most interesting. Tomorrow evening will mark the second appearance in New Haven of Ralph Leonard Kirkpatrick, harpsichordist, who made a successful debut last season. Whereas his former recital was entirely devoted to the works of J. S. Bach, Mr. Kirkpatrick will now present a varied program, which includes those of Scarlatti, Purcell, Rameau, and Couperin in addition to others by Bach and Handel. Those who recall the unusually fine interpretation of the so-called "Goldberg" variations will be anxious to hear Mr. Kirkpatrick in the rarely-heard works of the French school. The program followsw::

G. F. Handel—Chaconne in G major.

J. S. Bach—Partita in C minor

J. P. Rameau—L'Entretein des Muses.

Claude Daquin—Les Vents en Courroux.

Francois Couperin—Les Vergers Fleuris.

Henry Purcell—Suites in G minor and G major.

J. S. Bach—Fantasy in C minor; Fugue from the "Musical Offering."

D. Scarlatti—Three Sonatas.

* * *

For the second concert in the Woolsey series on Wednesday evening, the Boston Symphony will play the same program to be given the next evening in Carnegie Hall, New York. It is a program quite representative of Dr. Koussevitsky's interests, for no conductor today is more successful with the work of Debussy, and none in this country has done more to introduce and establish the symphonies by Jan Sibelius. The program, as announced, comprises these items:

Haydn—Symphony in B flat, (ninth in the Salomon set).

Debussy—Symphonic Poem "La Mer."

Sibelius—Symphony No. 5.

These works have already been played in Boston this season and mark the highlights of the series thus far in Symphony Hall.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

NOV 1 5 1936

Beethoven's 'Mighty 5th' On Program

Boston Symphony Will Perform Superb Work in Concert at Bushnell Hall Tuesday

The famous "Fifth Symphony" of Beethoven is the feature of the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, at the Bushnell Memorial this Tuesday evening, in the second event of the current Bushnell Concert Series.

The program opens with the tuneful Haydn Symphony in B-flat No. 102 (the ninth of the London Series). The second composition on the Boston list is the divertimento from Igor Stravinski's allegorical ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fee" (The Kiss of Faith.) The Beethoven symphony completes the program.

The Haydn Symphony listed here is one of the last that the great composer wrote. It is in Haydn's finest style.

"Stravinsky's "Le Baiser de la Fee" is based upon melodies from Tschaikowski and dedicated to the memory of this composer by Stravinsky. It was composed in 19[illegible] and performed in France as a ballet production in that year. Stravinsky gives an indication of the plot on his score: "A fairy has marked with her mysterious kiss a young man in his childhood. She withdraws him from life on the day of his greatest happiness to possess him and thus preserve this happiness forever. Again she gives him the kiss." The orchestral suite was conducted by Stravinsky in performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Chicago Orchestra each in its own city, when the composer visited America two seasons ago.

Charles O'Connell in "The Victor Book of the Symphony" writes of the Beethoven "Fifth":

"Here is the potent and concentrated and ultimate distillation of the genius that was Beethoven. This symphony is compounded of all that was the essential man and the essential music. Incredibly condensed and powerful, the forces that moved this strange and wonderful man are here focussed upon and welded into one superb structure.

"The god-like, yet so human [illegible] that possessed him; the tenderness and warmth that sometimes escaped from him; the wry and [illegible] and harsh humor that flicked and stung like scorpions; the [illegible] courage, the impatience, and [illegible] the heroic and unreasoning defiance that breathed hotly from [illegible] of his utterances—all [illegible] stripped of concealment [illegible] are here in this mighty [illegible]prehensible and human music.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Spalding Will Play Concerto

Albert Spalding will appear as soloist at the next Boston Symphony Orchestra concert here, Tuesday night, Dec. 1, in the Metropolitan Theatre. He will play a violin concerto of Mozart. And in place of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, Richard Burgin, the orchestra's concertmaster and assistant conductor, will conduct.

He will open with Johann Sebastian Bach's Organ Toccata in C-major, arranged for full orchestra by Leo Weiner. The closing number will be the First Symphony of Kalinnikov in G minor, a melodious work of the earlier Russian school.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 1 9 19[illegible]

Portraits of Players on View

In connection with the season's first New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, tonight and Saturday afternoon, the collection of Gerome Brush's charcoal portraits of each of the instrumentalists of the orchestra will be exhibited today, tomorrow and Saturday in the Art Gallery of Carnegie Hall.

73.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

NOV 15 1936

THE HARTFORD COURANT

Left—DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Bushnell Memorial Tuesday evening in second event of the Bushnell Concert Series.

BURLINGTON, VT.
FREE PRESS

NOV 14 1936

"SYMPHONY IN F" IS GIVEN A TRIAL

BOSTON, Nov. 13. (AP)—The Boston's symphony orchestra played for the first time today a Smith College professor's syncopated symphony designed to suggest the machine age.

The music entitled "Symphony In F." was composed at Jaffrey, N. H., last summer, by Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith.

At the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, Josten was on the podium.

The machine age, with its attendant human energy and recklessness was the dominant theme.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

NOV 15 1936

Easy Now to Know Famed Musicians

"What I wouldn't give to be personally acquainted with one of the world's famous musical artists!" Who has not said that? Now comes a simple means of realizing the ambition—and not in respect to one musical celebrity, but more than a hundred.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra, which he conducts, are rated by authorities as either the greatest conductor and the greatest orchestra in the world, or as among the three greatest. Certainly that makes Koussevitzky and his men a group with whom acquaintanceship would be an enviable distinction. And now anyone may feel on friendly footing with all of them simply by turning the pages of a very engaging book. It contains sketches of Koussevitzky and his musicians made from life by a noted artist, Gerome Brush. Each of the one hundred and eight members of the world-famous orchestra was sketched in action—the first time such a thing has been achieved with the Boston Symphony or any other great orchestra. With each portrait Mr. Brush also provides a word-sketch written by himself, which gives intimate sidelights on the personality and career of each man. The book has been designed by a celebrated typographical designer, D. B. Updike, and beautifully printed at the Merrymount Press, Boston. Yet despite all these distinctions, the volume costs but $1.50. The title is, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1936." It may be ordered from Symphony Hall, Boston.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

NOV 15 1936

Unfinished Symphony Critics Have Made Little Progress

Concert Audiences Strong for Schubert Work Despite Attempts to Divert Attention to Other Orchestral Masterpieces.

By Jay Walz.

There probably isn't a music critic or program annotator who hasn't heard the call to belittle the "Unfinished" Symphony. And many have heeded.

They have heard the popular piece so often they think it's time to be passing to greater symphonic accomplishments, and they'd like the crowd to follow. Yet in 100 years they have had little success. About the time they have noted progress in diverting interest to some other masterpiece, along comes a request program—the votes pour in and the commentators dive into their Schubertiana volumes for something new to say about the symphony Schubert started and never completed.

After all that's been said and written about the symphony's lack of power and all-'round orchestral merit, it is still possible to poll the concert audiences and find that the "Unfinished" is still well entrenched as a favorite.

Record audiences are pretty much the same. They give the Schubert No. 8 in B Minor (the catalogue's name for the "Unfinished") more wear than almost any other album, and many collectors stock up on it periodically.

Is Good Test Piece.

Record companies bring out a new "Unfinished" every so often, and explain they have acted as a result of advances in the science of phonograph reproduction. This is undoubtedly the case, and certainly they could pick no better "test" piece with which to demonstrate improved methods. Yet so persistent is the demand for this album it would go on selling with, or without, better work in the recording studios.

The new recording, featured by Victor this month serves everyone's purpose. It most certainly shows what has been accomplished in the laboratory. Compare it with any previous "Unfinished" you have, and note the resonance in the tones, the fullness of orchestral color (you may think it has been given too much), and the amount of the actual music that has been captured on the disc.

Some may be particularly interested in this new album, M-319, because it's done by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Koussevitzky is no routine conductor. Those who count on him for original tonal turns here and there will not be let down here, although he seems to have done nothing so radical as to be objectionable to the most devoted Schubertian.

Not Accidental.

What Koussevitzky has done in this interpretation is not accidental. He has worked it over after a thorough study. When the orchestra played it in Boston a few months ago the performance proved quite a sensation. On the records the Koussevitzky touch seems to have heightened the climaxes a lot. I don't think it's out of the spirit of Schubert, but it may be beyond the letter of the score. Koussevitzky commands a much more powerful orchestra than Schubert ever dreamed of, and he may be taking advantage of his facilities—just as is the Victor Co.

The album has a pleasant added subject on the odd side of the last disc. Schubert's ballet music from "Rosamunde" would be a bit simple for the modern dance, but it is not long enough ever to be tiresome.

On a single record Victor offers a new interpretation of part of the most familiar of the Bach Brandenburg concertos, the No. 2. Cortot conducts the Ecole Normale Chamber Orchestra in a brisk, yet scholarly, performance of the spirited first movement.

A Columbia disc of selections from Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffman" is decidedly appealing. Sir Thomas Beecham conducts the London Philharmonic in this. Orchestra and leader enjoy their work here, and so will the listener, particularly if, like us, he has a sentimental attachment for Offenbach's opera.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 15 1936

MUSIC

by

H. Earle Johnson

CONCERT prospects for the immediate week, and beyond, are most interesting. Tomorrow evening will mark the second appearance in New Haven of Ralph Leonard Kirkpatrick, harpsichordist, who made a successful debut last season. Whereas his former recital was entirely devoted to the works of J. S. Bach, Mr. Kirkpatrick will now present a varied program, which includes those of Scarlatti, Purcell, Rameau, and Couperin in addition to others by Bach and Handel. Those who recall the unusually fine interpretation of the so-called "Goldberg" variations will be anxious to hear Mr. Kirkpatrick in the rarely-heard works of the French school. The program followsw::

G. F. Handel—Chaconne in G major.

J. S. Bach—Partita in C minor.

J. P. Rameau—L'Entretein des Muses.

Claude Daquin—Les Vents en Courroux.

Francois Couperin—Les Vergers Fleuris.

Henry Purcell—Suites in G minor and G major.

J. S. Bach—Fantasy in C minor; Fugue from the "Musical Offering."

D. Scarlatti—Three Sonatas.

* * *

For the second concert in the Woolsey series on Wednesday evening, the Boston Symphony will play the same program to be given the next evening in Carnegie Hall, New York. It is a program quite representative of Dr. Koussevitsky's interests, for no conductor today is more successful with the work of Debussy, and none in this country has done more to introduce and establish the symphonies by Jan Sibelius. The program, as announced, comprises these items:

Haydn—Symphony in B flat, (ninth in the Salomon set).

Debussy—Symphonic Poem "La Mer."

Sibelius—Symphony No. 5.

These works have already been played in Boston this season and mark the highlights of the series thus far in Symphony Hall.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

NOV 15 1936

Beethoven's 'Mighty 5th' On Program

Boston Symphony Will Perform Superb Work in Concert at Bushnell Hall Tuesday

The famous "Fifth Symphony" of Beethoven is the feature of the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, at the Bushnell Memorial this Tuesday evening, in the second event of the current Bushnell Concert Series.

The program opens with the tuneful Haydn Symphony in B-flat No. 102 (the ninth of the London Series). The second composition on the Boston list is the divertimen to from Igor Stravinski's allegorical ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fee" (the Kiss of Faith.) The Beethoven symphony completes the program.

The Haydn Symphony listed here is one of the last that the great composer wrote. It is in Haydn's finest style.

"Stravinsky's "Le Baiser de la Fee" is based upon melodies from Tschaikowski and dedicated to the memory of this composer by Stravinsky. It was composed in 1928 and performed in France as a ballet production in that year. Stravinsky gives an indication of the plot on his score: "A fairy has marked with her mysterious kiss a young man in his childhood. She withdraws him from life on the day of his greatest happiness to possess him and thus preserve this happiness forever. Again she gives him the kiss." The orchestral suite was conducted by Stravinsky in performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Chicago Orchestra, each in its own city, when the composer visited America two seasons ago.

Charles O'Connell in "The Victor Book of the Symphony" writes thus of the Beethoven "Fifth":—

"Here is the potent and concentrated and ultimate distillation of the genius that was Beethoven. This symphony is compounded of all that was the essential man and the essential music. Incredibly condensed and powerful, the forces that moved this strange and wonderful man are here focussed upon and welded into one superb structure.

"The god-like, yet so human rages that possessed him; the tenderness and warmth that sometimes radiated from him; the wry and wicked and harsh humor that flicked and stung like scorpions; the superb courage, the impatience, and finally the heroic and unreasoning defiance that breathed hotly from so many of his utterances—all are here stripped of concealment . . . . All are here in this mighty, this comprehensible and human music."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 15 1936

Spalding Will Play Concerto

Albert Spalding will appear as soloist at the next Boston Symphony Orchestra concert here, Tuesday night, Dec. 1, in the Metropolitan Theatre. He will play a violin concerto of Mozart. And in place of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, Richard Burgin, the orchestra's concertmaster and assistant conductor, will conduct.

He will open with Johann Sebastian Bach's Organ Toccata in C-major, arranged for full orchestra by Leo Weiner. The closing number will be the First Symphony of Kalinnikov in G-minor, a melodious work of the earlier Russian school.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 19 1936

Portraits of Players on View

In connection with the season's first New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, tonight and Saturday afternoon, the collection of Gerome Brush's charcoal portraits of each of the instrumentalists of the orchestra will be exhibited today, tomorrow and Saturday in the Art Gallery of Carnegie Hall.

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

NOV 17 1936

Symphony Orchestras Have Major Operations

By JOHN SELBY

NEW YORK, Nov. 16 (AP)—New York hears its young-old philharmonic-symphony society throughout the winter. It also hears 10 concerts each per winter from Serge Koussevitzky's Boston symphony, and from Leopold Stokowski's Philadelphia orchestra.

Two of these three ochestras have undergone major operations this fall. Many patrons and many observers and most managers stroked their beards in the spring, and came out with the idea that these major operations would most likely reduce audiences this winter they were wrong.

Philadelphia's noble band "lost" Stokowski. That is, Stokowski became so enamored of the movies and their mass possibilities that he asked his directors to elect a permanent conductor for three years, leaving him free to conduct as little as he chose.

The picked Eugene Ormandy. Hitherto, the Philadelphia has played to packed houses in New York. This winter it is doing the same. And last Tuesday, when Stokowski came to town with an all-Russian program which included Sergei Rachmaninoff's brand new third symphony, the last minute people just didn't get into Carnegie hall.

More Astonished

The Philharmonic is, however, even more astonished. Last spring Arturo Toscanini departed these shores forever, saying among other things, it is declared, that the Philharmonic is the greatest orchestra ever assembled. The Philharmonic directors at once set their sails to fit what they thought would be a period of calm—they cut down the season six weeks, and expected reduced business.

But they didn't get reduced business; business is better. Subscription sales are actually ahead of last winter. John Barbirolli, the young Italian-French-English conductor, is not only doing well at the box office, he is doing well on the podium.

Makes Friends

Partly this is musical ability, partly the public's curiosity, and (oddly enough) partly tact. No musician ever stood in hotter shoes than Barbirolli a week and three days ago when he began the first piece he ever conducted on American soil—Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture. Many thoughtless persons, even a reviewer or so, had spoken of him as an "unknown" chosen to "replace" Toscanini.

Barbirolli extricated himself from his hot spot nearly by frankly admitting wonder at being chosen, by disclaiming any intention of "replacing" anybody, by declaring that he was a young man trying to make a living. He had won the men of the orchestra. Now he seems to be winning the public.

Koussevitzky brings his Bostonese to town for the first time this season next Thursday. He always plays to packed houses, and he never yet has engineered a publicity stunt to pack them. By now he is accustomed to being pointed out as the supreme American example of what a superlative orchestra can accomplish when left to one conductor through a period of years.

PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
HERALD-TIMES

NOV 18 1936

BOOK REVIEW

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

An attractive new volume to reach the Herald's book reviewer is entitled "Boston Symphony Orchestra 1936". This volume will appeal greatly to those persons who are acquainted with the Boston Symphony, its membership, its traditions, and the superb musical genius which is incorporated in the concerts presented at Symphony Hall in Boston.

This volume is made up of charcoal drawings of the orchestra members with biographical sketches, the work of Jerome Brush, and is printed by the Merrymount Press of Boston.

An appreciation by Edward Weeks, incorporated in the book, truly states that Gerome Brush has performed a public service. "He has singled out the black and white keys of one of the greatest instruments in the world. With the strokes of his crayon and the sympathy of his pen he has brought to light the individuality of the one hundred and nine members of the Boston Symphony."

"Each musician sat for him in the little room that houses the Casadesus Collection; each played for him a solo in order to banish the last vestige of self-consciousness, and from each he has drawn comments, bits of personal history, and the gleam of aspirations which are characteristic."

This volume, with its unusually fine portrait charcoal drawings, and its short and fascinating biographical sketches, should enlarge our power of musical appreciation and allow us to realize in the Symphony concerts not alone an impersonal harmony but also to know something of the performers.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

NOV 19 1936

The Lively Arts

By T. H. PARKER

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky stood on the Bushnell Memorial podium as a Commander of the French Legion of Honor Tuesday night, as you may or may not have known. The ivory and gold star, and the scarlet "Cravat" were conferred on him exactly one week ago by Francois de Tessan, French under Secretary of State, who described it as the highest honor that France can convey. Dr. Koussevitzky received the distinction "because he is universally known for his eminence in music, as an artist and an interpreter, and because France delights in honoring those who have distinguished themselves not only within her own borders, but outside them in art, literature or science."

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 19 1936

I'm All Ears . .

Boston Symphony Tonight "This Week" Editor Talks Cassel Exclusively Yank

Another big three orchestra is added to our winter fare when the Boston Symphony opens its fifth air season tonight, from 8:45 to 9:30. You may have it through WEBR.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct twelve regular concerts and nine of the Pop variety. Tonight's program includes Debussy's "La Mer" and the Haydn Symphony No. 104 in B Flat Major.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

NOV 15 1936

Recordings of 'Unfinished' Mellow, Poetic

Capture Simple, Lyrical Beauty of Famous Schubert Symphony

BECAUSE Schubert's "Unfinished" is the most frequently played of symphonies, because one of its themes underwent a rhythmical transformation and emerged as a popular "hit," because the beauties of the work are thought to lie close to the surface and to be unworthy for that reason of the attention of "intellectual" musicians, this magical B minor has disappeared almost completely from the regular subscription programs of the country's first rate orchestras.

It is interesting, therefore, to find one of these very orchestras, the Boston Symphony, reviving the "Unfinished" for Victor's musical masterpiece series. Interesting, too, to find the Victor people releasing it as their featured November album.

The reasons are not far to seek. All of the statements made about the "Unfinished" at the top of this column are true, yet the conclusion to which they seem to point is false. The B minor symphony has not lost all its bloom through too much handling, the essential rightness of its melodies has not been compromised by mayhem. You have only to hear a performance such as Serge Koussevitzky and Boston orchestra give it in this latest pressing to realize that the work will outlive by decades and even centuries both the musicians who have pounced upon its store and the sophisticates who profess to be tired of it.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra treat the symphony simply, letting its fragrant romanticism make its own impression. There is little drama, no attempt whatever to sacrifice lyrical atmosphere to a lust for effectiveness. All the songlike beauty of the "Unfinished" is scrupulously guarded against even a suggestion of the theatrical.

These tunes have a curious magic about them even after innumerable hearings. When the cellos drift in with the Schubert version of "Song of Love" [some old fogies still prefer it to the modern], it is quite possible that you will be able to recapture something of the gasping excitement of your first hundred experiences with this remarkable melody.

The tone qualities of the Boston Symphony orchestra require no comment. And Victor's technicians have done a good job of reproducing it on wax.

Because Schubert did not finish the "Unfinished" symphony [his reasons have never been discovered], these records make a small album. To eke out six sides, an excerpt from the "Rosamunde" ballet music is added.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 20 1936

Boston Symphony Opens Series Of Five Boro Concerts Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first concert of the series of five in the Academy of Music, this evening at 8:30.

Serge Koussevitzky will then give the first performance in Greater New York of Igor Stravinsky's Divertimento from the ballet "Le Baiser de la Fee" (..The Fairy's Kiss"). The programme will open with Mozart's Symphony in A Major No. 29 (K. 201). This little known symphony belongs to the composer's eighteenth year. The programme will close with Cesar Franck's Symphony in D Minor.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 18 1936

Koussevitzky Offers Fifth By Beethoven

Bostonians Are Also Heard in Haydn And Stravinsky

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

After as many concerts as the Boston Symphony Orchestra has played in Hartford it would appear that one ought to know just what to expect, and having expected it, suffer just that little disappointment with which anticipation hazes over the gloss of hopes held too high.

Once again last night at Bushnell Memorial these players, in the second event of the current orchestral series, demonstrated that their peerlessness is a self-renewing essence which somehow belittles even the doting memory. There are so few things in the world like that; yet a parallel, oddly enough, confronted us on this very occasion. Commonplace of music that it is, when was there even an adequate performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony that did not beggar our recollections of its beauty and power?

An "Interpretation"

Perhaps a good many persons wondered just why Serge Koussevitzky elected to present The Fifth. They may have been mollified to a degree by the fact that the rest of the program comprised Stravinsky's suite from Le Baiser de la Fee and a lesser known Haydn Symphony, the ninth of the Salomon set in B flat. If it has come to the point where a conductor must have a reason for giving the C minor of Beethoven, then the same persons who would insist upon a reason would hardly be satisfied with just another "interpretation" for that is what it was, there being a good deal of Koussevitzky in this Beethoven.

So what? The type of mind which, with a collector's musty zeal, catalogues "interpretations" probably took note of the explosive fortissimo opening, taken in strictest time, of the lingering pace of the andante and of the sharply marked dynamic contrasts. Such a mind, nevertheless, could apprehend several marvelously built transitions, in particular the seemingly idle conceit which ends the third movement, like so much magician's abracadabra, the force of which is never apparent until the gates of glory swing open on the final allegro. But any mind whatsoever could not have failed to be moved by this Koussevitzky's Beethoven.

An Exquisite Haydn

The Haydn symphony was simply Haydn. All the elegance the savor, and the surface humors that the master brought with him from the Esterhazy court to England lived again in this sparkling performance. The rollicking fun of the presto almost fashioned syllables of the spoken word. The gently pathetic slow movement was equally appealing in its own way but, unlike the Frenchmen in the London of 1794, the audience saved up its applause until the end of the symphony.

Writing of Haydn adagios a commentator of that day reported: "Passages often occur which render it impossible to listen to them without becoming excited. We are altogether carried away, and forced to applaud with hand and mouth. This is especially the case with Frenchmen, of whom we have so many here that all public places are filled with them. You know that they have great sensibility, and cannot restrain their transports, so that in the midst of the finest passages in soft adagios they clap their hands in loud applause and thus mar the effect."

To watch Koussevitzky conduct such a work as this is a lesson in music appreciation. The melting phrase, the piquant repartee, the reproach, the reply and a burst of gaiety are the reflections of a galvanic baton, an eloquent face seen occasionally in profile and such a expressive gestures as the business of shaking music out of his sleeve.

Ballet Music

He was not quite the visual realization which the Stravinsky music required, however, for Stravinsky's ballet conceptions betray their origin in spite of orchestral dress. This particular pastiche, Le Basier de la Fee, is avowedly Tschaikowskian even to the point of direct quotation although the orchestration would probably have bewildered the author of the tunes.

Cont.

The effectiveness of the divertissement was entirely dependent upon the unapproachable skill with which the Boston players took their parts, oftentimes in solo. Koussevitzky made the score flawlessly transparent and fully maintained his reputation as an American exponent of Stravinsky.

One might almost say that Boston Symphony concerts have become Koussevitzky concerts. Although he is the first to recognize and acknowledge the incomparable resources which his men deliver, it is he who renews their artistic puissance at every concert. In this he follows a long line of illustrious leaders, for the history of the Boston orchestra is simply the record of a responsive ensemble living up to men like Gericke and Paur, Seidl and Nikisch, Muck and now Koussevitzky.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

NOV 19 1936

This Happens in Woolsey Hall: Audience Dull to Sibelius

TO AN audience which appeared most of the time only dully aware, Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony orchestra presented last night the second concert in New Haven's Woolsey Hall series.

After the finished playing of a Haydn symphony had aroused delighted applause at the beginning of the program, the audience sank into a lethargy which lasted through the remainder of the evening, during Debussy's "La Mer" and Sibelius' Fifth Symphony.

The Haydn symphony was without doubt the most thoroughly vital number on the program, and perhaps the only piece of general appeal. The audience appeared to feel ill at ease during the other compositions and hardly to know when the last number on the program, the Sibelius, had come to an end. The Haydn symphony is one of "papa Haydn's" latest works, one of the so-called London symphonies written during an engagement in London in which he was required to compose a new symphony for each weekly performance. It is a monument to the tremendous amount of musical material which Haydn had at his fingertips and to his extraordinary ability to present what he had to say in a clear and vital fashion.

On almost any Boston symphony program one may expect to hear a Sibelius symphony. Koussevitsky is famed as no other conductor in America as a patron of the contemporary composer and in the past few years had devoted considerable time to the explication of Sibelius' work.

In spite of Koussevitsky's backing, however, there is question as to its value. Some tend to regard Sibelius' symphonies as frankly decadent—as returning to an outmoded musical vocabulary and saying little that is really new. Others remind us, however, that Sibelius is well over 70, that he belongs really to the generation of Richard Strauss and Debussy and must be compared with them rather than with the younger group of composers of the generation of Stravinsky and Hindemith.

Koussevitsky's plan, to hammer way at the public consciousness until the composer's style has finally penetrated, is an efficient way of educating the public to the point where it can judge for itself whether Sibelius can stand in the company of the great symphonists.

The performance of the orchestra was clear cut and precise as ever. It was an entirely adequate presentation and needs no other comment.

—SUSAN BREUL

MEMPHIS, TENN.
Commercial Appeal

John McCormack, famous Irish singer beloved by two generations of Americans, will be the guest of Rudy Vallee's Variety Hour over WLW at 7 o'clock tonight. The singer is on a concert tour of America.

Another of radio's outstanding features returns to NBC-WMC at 7:45 o'clock this evening when the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra inaugurates its fifth season of broadcasts exclusively over NBC. The program will be broadcast from Carnegie Hall in New York where the orchestra now is appearing. With Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, two noted works of symphonic literature will be performed, Haydn's B Flat Symphony No. 102, the ninth of his "London Symphonies," and DeBussy's "La Mer."

END

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

NOV 18 1936

Rapt Crowd Hears Boston Symphony

Koussevitzky and His Players Wring 'Bravos' From Audience With Brilliant Performance

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, was presented in the second concert of the Bushnell series at the Memorial auditorium, Tuesday night. The program:

Symphony in B flat (Ninth London) Haydn
Divertimento, "Baiser de la Fee" Stravinsky
Symphony No. 5 in C Minor Beethoven

About a year ago there was in Hartford a sort of sotto voce cry faintly to be heard throughout the musical quarters of the city, calling for four appearances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during our customary season of six concerts. Had the members of last night's audience been polled just at the end of the performance, the four-times-Boston movers would doubtless have found a constituency numerous enough to swing the deal. In this reviewer's four years of local concert going, it was the first time that "Bravos" were heard at the close of any musical event. Granted that they were rather timid Bravos, but nevertheless there they were—the bravest applause yet to be heard here.

Since Mr. Toscanini left the New York, writers and commentators upon music around the country have suddenly focused their attention and adulation on the Boston and Dr. Koussevitzky. They have called it the greatest extant musical body, pointed the explanatory finger at the fact that no other orchestra has worked so long with one conductor, and generally pressed wreaths upon the brows of Dr. Koussevitzky and his men, one and all. Strange discovery— when so many of us could have told them that long, long ago. Maeterlinck has a little story for these discoverers, called "The Bluebird."

Virtuosity Stands Out.

Last night's performance was one of the really superb events in the city's musical annals, a brilliant piece of program-making spectacularly set out. Hundreds of reviews have expounded the peculiar and special qualities of the Boston and its Imperator, and I refer you to the compendium they would make, for detailed analyses. But if they were all sifted, their common adulation would be summed up in the term "virtuosity," virtuosity of individual players, of choirs, of the whole orchestra, and most of all, a kind of reading that ever calls out of any score, its most brilliant, most faceted, flashing sides. In fact, so gleamingly exploited is each phrase as it comes along, that it seems a fragment of music existing all alone in the world, isolated in a sort of momentary glory, and then paradoxically absorbed into the crystalline whole.

As an expression of dignity, simplicity, poise and spirit, last night's performance and embodiment of the Ninth London was an apotheosis of the symphonic Haydn. It had all the open frankness, the directness of this often trivialized composer, whose writing if not utterly deep, seizes you with its inescapable sincerity and realism.

As Flowing As Sea.

In performance, the Symphony was flecked with as many changing lights, as many changing tones and flowing rhythms as the surface of a sea. It had a continual swell and cadence, and a fine-figured spray, continually passing through and above it. Out of the adagio, Dr. Koussevitzky made a sad little bourgeois German song, but after all such was its composer, and I daresay tears came readily to Papa Haydn's eyes on occasion in the good old German fashion. In the subsequent movement there was the most marvelous trilling between strings and woodwinds, one of the glories of performance of the whole evening. It was all beautiful, clear, clean, spontaneous Haydn throughout.

"Igor, you are only a villain." Debussy once said to Stravinsky. Before the "Baiser de la Fee" began, someone nearby said, "I suppose this is going to be terribly noisy." Igor, my villain, how you fooled that person. Your fay certainly gave a kiss like that from a child who had just been licking a chocolate peppermint. "Baiser" is one great big birthcake, "Greetings from Igor to the New Romantics" iced pinkly out on top, a miracle of instrumentation, a melodic dessert, a cloying delight, and as magnificently performed last night as—well, as the Boston can perfect all modern scores. Almost too good to be true.

Last night's Fifth Beethoven was a huge performance, in which Dr. Koussevitzky made this C Minor Symphony seem the true candidate for the otherwise bestowed title of "Eroica." It was of imperial dimension in tone, in brilliance, in stature, and time and again it rose and shook a mailed fist in the audience's face, much as Beethoven or Napoleon might have. I doubt if it was an intensively introspect presentation, but it had certainly a regal musicality about it, and lightning flashed over its highly chased bronze surface. In fact the modelling of the score, dynamically and rhythmically, was of extraordinary variety and vitality, and, shone with an amazing technical splendor. The second movement was the most memorable of the four, for power and a kind of rugged poignance, though personally I shall long remember the overwhelming beauty with which the first theme of the third section rose up out of faintly humming strings at its final appearance just before the "bridge."

T. H. P.

Salem Mass.

SYMPHONY BOOK

Interesting sketches and notes about Serge Koussevitky and the Boston Symphony orchestra members are contained in a new book by the noted artist, Gerome Brush. Each of the 108 members of the world-famous orchestra was sketched in action—the first time such a thing has been achieved with the Boston Symphony or any other great orchestra

With each portrait Mr. Brush also provides a word-sketch written by himself, which gives intimate sidelights on the personality and career of each man. The book has been designed by the celebrated typographical designer, D. B. Updike and printed at the Merrymount Press, Boston.

Quite a few of the musicians listed in the book are well known in Greater Salem through performance at the Ames hall winter concerts, and otherwise. Fernand Gillet first oboist, married Miss Marie-Laure Audet, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Audet of this city.

Among members of the Symphony who have appeared here as soloists are Yves Chardon, Daniel Eisler, Enrico Fabrizio, Rolland Tapley, Einar Hansen, Nicholas Kassman, Samuel J. Leibovici, Vincent Howard Mariotti, Rosario Mazzeo, Louis M. Speyer and others.

MISCELLANEOUS NEWS

Christmas music in Greater Salem churches will be as elaborate and impressive as in past years. A number of choirs have already begun rehearsals.

Miss Rita Laplante, whose work on the piano has attracted favorable comment from Boston Symphony orchestra players, is studying at the New England Conservatory of Music. She is a pupil of Mrs. Fernand Gillet (Marie-Laure Audet), and made her first public appearance at a recital in Academy hall two years ago at the age of 14.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

NOV 21 1936

Orchestra Opens Brooklyn Series

The visiting Boston Symphony Orchestra, having launched its new Manhattan season on Thursday night in Carnegie Hall, opened a parallel series of concerts in Brooklyn at the Academy of Music last evening.

Serge Koussevitzky began a tripartite program with Mozart's A major symphony, No. 29 (K. 201). Scored almost entirely for string choir (two oboes and two horns are the only other instruments called for), the richly melodious and compactly knit work earned a capital performance. It all sounded very small, but within its compass beautifully precise and lucid in every phrase.

Next came a quasi-novelty—a four-part "Divertimento" from Stravinsky's "allegorical" ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fee," which resulted from a proposal of Ida Rubinstein's in 1927 that Stravinsky write a ballet for her. It was first performed at the Paris Opera in November, 1928, and later the composer fashioned an orchestral suite from it.

The ballet is based on a story by Hans Christian Andersen. An Ice Maiden bestows on a child a magic kiss that brings him great happiness. The score is dedicated to Tschaikowsky, and the ballet is "allegorical" in that Tschaikowsky's genius, to quote Stravinsky, "has in like degree marked the score with a destined kiss."

There is a whimsical, gracious, and delicately witty quality about these pieces that owes something to Tschaikowsky,

As concluding number, the orchestra played the D-Minor Symphony of Cesar Frank, and a fine reading it was in matters of tone, balance, rhythmic drive and dramatic intensity.

L. B.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 19 1936

Music

BOSTON SYMPHONY SUPERB IN CONCERT AT WOOLSEY HALL

The program which Dr. Koussevitsky chose for presentation in Woolsey Hall las tevening could hardly have been more happily arranged. It was typical, not only of Dr. Kousevitsky's especial interests (such as will find his name linked for all time with owt out of the three composers represented), but of the need which New Haven audiences keenly sense for a modicum of 20th century music in the course of the season. This implies no slight on our own orchestra, of which we have reason to be proud this season; but few can question the fact that no other orchestra in the world today is prepared to offer the music of Debussy and Sibelius with the power an dauthority displayed by The Boston Symphony in this, the 56th year of it sdistinguished history. To hear them play "La Mer" and Sibelius' Fifth Symphony under the direction of Dr. Koussevitsky is to experience the full statement of these two scores, although it may take many hearings for us to comprehend the beauty and power contained in them.

Nor did it seem, last evening, as though Haydn had ever received his due at the hands of any other orchestra. The Symphony in question (No. 102, Ninth of the London set)—so interesting as excellence of its day in comparison with the Sibelius of today—is one of Dr. Koussevitsky's recent excavations. But how could any conductor have passed it by? It is less complex in its many-hued cast than the tone-poem which followed, but, withal, a precious jewel, equally bright. The employment of a reduced orchestra would have approached the proper balance of instrumentation required by the period, although in Haydns day the proportion of oboes would have been so large as to affect us disagreeably should that custom be revived for us.

Orchestra Superb

"La Mer" represents the culmination of Debussy's theories expressed i an orchestral work, and it is his most elaborate; like all impressionistic music, it does not lend itself to analysis. One wonders how so astute a critic as Ernest Walker could cite this work as "a rather tired version of ideas more freshly expressed in the Nocturnes." The orchestra, in top form, seemingly more superb than ever before, was at once marvelously thrilling, and deeply moving; certainly, one must exclaim, art can reveal no more of imaginative beauty than has been expressed in these pages and brought forth by the minds of this inspired group! The hand of genius inscribed such pages, and they were read with enlightened eyes to an audience which, quite evidently, was sensitively responsive. No human barrier stays the expression of mind when served by music.

either Debussy or Sibelius (if we are to rightly interpret those phases of their lives which have become known) reached the fullness of his art without mental fight; there is plentiful implication of struggle in both "La Mer" and the Fifth Symphony. It has been aptly expressed in relation to two great composers of century and a half ago that, with Mozart, the struggle preceded creation, whereas struggle was apparent in the music of Beethoven. Relatively, this might be applied to the music of composers under discussion. In a world more kind, the twentieth century composer had less to combat in his relation to the world, but the peace with ones inner purpose and formation of an artistic credo must beattained in every age and clime.

Program Acclaimed

The local color of Sibelius music has been overstressed i nexplanation of the Symphonies, but here there is simplicity and comparative gaiety which cultivate popular appreciation more readily than any other of his Symphonies, excepting the First. The performance again transcended the understanding of any humble listener to find appreciable defect or lack in any of its parts. Profound thankfulness was a willing substitute. Dr. Koussecitsky and the Boston orchestra, all friends of long standing, have served us well. The uncertain condition of orchestra life in New York should make more plain than ever before the constancy toward the highest ideal maintained by this orchestra, an dthat the light of understanding has not been removed from that city, as many suppose.

H. EARLE JOHNSON

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 20 1936

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

The Boston Symphony Opens Its New York Season at Carnegie Hall

First New York concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Haydn.....Symphony in B-flat, No. 102
    - I. Largo: Allegro vivace.
    - II. Adagio.
    - III. Menuetto: Allegro; Trio.
    - IV. Finale; Presto.
2. Debussy.."La Mer," Three Orchestral Sketches.
    - I. De l'aube a midi sur la mer.
    - II. Jeux de vagues.
    - III. Dialogue du vent et de la mer.

Intermission

8. Beethoven..Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67.
    - I. Allegro con brio.
    - II. Andante con moto.
    - III. Allegro: Trio.
    - IV. Allegro.

Serge Koussevitzky

Conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra here

THE first Boston Symphony concert of the season is always an exhilarating occasion for musical New Yorkers. There are the memories of eventful years, reaching backward through Monteux, Muck, Paur, Gericke, Nikisch, and the rest—memories of salient musical personalities, and of a virtuoso orchestra, dazzling, suave, electric, with an attack like the crack of a whip and a string-tone that incited connoisseurs and critics to the desperate invention of extravagant metaphors.

There are, too, those lively expectations aroused by the present attainments of a great and successful organization: a brilliant band of players, equal to the delivery of any score; a wide-visioned, fertile-minded leader, a master of discipline and effect, planning wisely and adventurously his policies and programs, searching the past, the present, and the future for his material.

There is, finally, the audience, in itself a joyous and heartening spectacle; for it is one of the choicest gatherings of musical cognoscenti to be found in this or any other town.

* * *

So, one attends with happiness; looks—listens; and remembers those brooding words out of the past: "Your old men shall dream dreams, your young men shall see visions." From such are audiences gathered: those with memories, those with visions, those with both. They form the quickening substance of a musical public and a living culture. Fortunate the music-makers who can assemble such bodies of responsive hearers; and fortunate the hearers!

* * *

Thus there was ozone in the atmosphere last night, and warm expectancy, and the excitement of recognition and renewal. Mr. Koussevitzky was greeted as an old and tried friend of whom much was expected—and received. As for the necromantic orchestra, it had only to sound the opening B-flat unison of the Haydn Symphony which began the program, had only to exhibit the tone of those legendary strings in the singing phrase that followed it, to make us aware that one of the greatest company of musicians in the world was playing again for our delight.

* * *

Throughout the performance of this symphony (which the exuberant Sir Donald Tovey insists upon regarding as one of Haydn's three greatest instrumental works), the men and leader were at the top of their form. The symphony is certainly one of Haydn's most extraordinary works, one in which the harmonic and instrumental inventions of today were slyly anticipated almost a century and a half ago. Haydn, the innovator, the man of deep feeling and passionate intensity, speaks to us from the Adagio, with its beautiful ornateness and expressiveness, its muted trumpets, its rich and complex and engrossing fabric. And in this movement we heard the most sensitive and masterly playing of last evening's concert—here Mr. Koussevitzky and his players were at their irresistible best.

* * *

The Haydn symphony was followed by Debussy's "La Mer," which is almost, in a sense, the special property of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; for the work was introduced to America by Karl Muck almost thirty years ago—to the exceeding dislike, by the way, of most of its hearers.

But no one, hearing it last night, would have dreamt that in 1907, indignant music-lovers wrote letters of passionate protest after hearing Debussy's heterodox work, and that contemptuous critics dismissed this magical evocation of sun and winds and waters as "music of the barnyard," full of harsh cries and ugly clamors. For when the orchestra came last night to the marvelous, resplendent close of the last movement, with Debussy's ocean making mighty music beneath the radiant thunders of the noonday sun, the men and their leader were applauded as clamorously as though they had offered the audience some masterpiece as familiar and beloved as Beethoven's Fifth Symphony—which, by the way, they played after the intermission, as only Mr. Koussevizky plays it, companioned by his faithful and devout musicians.

It was an evening of propitious deeds, an evening to be remembered.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
NOV 21 1936

Brooklyn Symphony Orchestra Gives Concert Here To-morrow

The Brooklyn Symphony Orchestra a unit of the WPA Federal Music Project will give a free concert at the Brooklyn Museum, Eastern parkway, to-morrow at 4 p. m. The orchestra will be under the direction of Dr. Modeste Alloo. Preceding the concert Rober Leech Bedell will give an organ recital in the Museum at 2:30.

Dr. Alloo, was formerly a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, associate conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra under Ysaye, and a member of the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music and of the University of California.

Thursday afternoon at 3 p. m. the Manhattan Concert Band, will give a free WPA concert at the Museum, with Anthony Giammateo conducting and Lily Wolmers, soprano, and Egidio Morra, euphonium Dayer, as soloists.

Post Nov

SYMPHONY'S FRIENDS

The Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now two thousand strong, is seeking recruits to its number. In other words, each and every one of us is invited, nay urged, to become a member of an organization composed of the socially and culturally elect, the annual dues to be set at our own figure. As a member of the Friends we may then help to sustain, even to make possible, the institution which most distinctively represents Boston to the world at large. Unfortunately, in the very nature of things, a great symphony orchestra cannot be wholly self-supporting. None ever has been.

Not only the thousands who regularly or occasionally attend its concerts or those who listen in when the orchestra is one the air, but every Bostonian or near-Bostonian jealous of the city's prestige might feel here a sense of obligation. Even a nominal sum paid yearly will discharge it. Save for the unpaid taxes on Symphony Hall, last year's budget has been balanced. It is understood that all contributions by the orchestra's "friends" will be applied to the costs of its operation.

76.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEW YORK JOURNAL

NOV 20 1936

—Music in Review—

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

—By H

What ripe enjoyment the superb Boston Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, can give! The Bostonian's fifty-first season here was ushered in last evening before the usual large and representative subscription audience. Three important works were presented: a Haydn symphony, Debussy's "La Mer," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

The Haydn which Dr. Koussevitzky selected is one from the same group of twelve symphonies which the composer wrote during his London period after he had reached the height of his powers, and from which Mr. Barbirolli had selected one for the Wednesday evening concert of the Philharmonic. It brought therefore into juxtaposition the two conductors via the same medium and gave one a curious sense of comparison.

The Boston conductor is an acknowledged master, with his years of experience giving added security. Brilliant beyond compare, subtle and cannily all-hearing as he leads the manifold instrument which a modern symphony orchestra is. He gave a distinguished reading of the Haydn, finished and polished to the last degree. Yet the fluent curve of many a phrase brought before one the fact, already noted repeatedly, that Mr. Barbirolli often achieves as nice a turn of phrase, indicating one of the phases of his conducting as a young man which promises much for the future.

The wistful imaginativeness of the Debussy sea pieces was caught and held with the adroitness for mood setting that Dr. Koussevitzky never fails to project. The noble reading of the great Fifth Symphony of Beethoven was the crown of the evening.

A reception was held in the lounge of Carnegie Hall after the concert for the exhibition of charcoal drawings by Gerome Brush of the 109 members of the orchestra and their leader. The drawings have been collected and published in book form.

A most promising debut recital yesterday afternoon was that of Frederick Buldrini. He is a winner of the Naumburg Musical Foundation Prize, and has reached a stage of artistic maturity that indicates he will go far. Showing his undoubted talent as a small boy, his parents sent him to Italy where he studied until 1930. Returning here there came a fellowship at Juilliard.

He is twenty now, a tall athletic young fellow bearing his honors modestly. He has just been accepted for the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra where he will occupy a desk immediately behind the concertmaster.

Young Buldrini selected a heavy program for his debut. The opening Brahms Sonata found him weighted down by consciousness of his audience, so his playing then was lackadaisical. Furthermore, he suffered from having an amateurish accompanist, Miss Irene Botts, who labored under the delusion that the sonata was a piano solo. With his second number, the Dohnanyi violin concerto, he began to emerge, and with the third movement he asserted himself, forgetting his audience under the emotional stress of the stirring music.

He has a carefully nurtured technic and innate musical feeling which but needs more public playing to reach its full expression. He was vigorously applauded by the large audience that included all the young members of the Mozart Sinfonietta and Wesley Sontag, their leader, with whom Buldrini has played, and who were out in full force to cheer him on.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS OPENING HERE

Debussy's 'La Mer' Presented Under Serge Koussevitzky at Carnegie Hall.

HAYDN WORK ON PROGRAM

B-Flat Symphony, 9th London Series — Concert Brings Vigorous Applause.

By OLIN DOWNES

The unsurpassed Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its singularly gifted leader, Serge Koussevitzky, returned to New York last night to give its opening concert of the season in this city in Carnegie Hall.

The event proved to be one of the memorable concerts in the annals of orchestral performance in this community. The performance of Haydn's B-flat symphony, the ninth of the London set, would have reflected glory enough, because of its tonal beauty and transparency, its technical finish, its mercurial flow of melody and wit, upon any orchestra and any leader. But the matchless moment was the interpretation of Debussy's "La mer."

Carnegie Hall audiences know this music well. They have become acquainted with its mysterious beauty under the best possible auspices. It is one of Toscanini's chef-d'oeuvres. The statement is self-explanatory, yet one is moved to say that last night we heard a new and marvelously evocative conception of the music, one not more full-blooded or effective in the exterior sense, but more glamorous and imaginative, more subtle and poetical in coloring, and of the two the most intimately related to the composer's thought.

Each Measure a Masterpiece

Koussevitzky's realization of the music is rich beyond description in marvel of detail, so that each measure seemed last night a masterpiece, an instant expected but awaited with a certain suspense. The deep chorale chanted in the orchestra toward the close of the opening movement was as the predestined fulfillment of some drama, mysterious and mighty beyond words. Always there were ebb and flow, whispers and clamors, of the elements, and a rhythm as fluctuating as the tides. Nothing was fixed, rhythms dissolved into rhythms, colors into colors, and yet there was a grand form.

It would be only fitting to mention the technical details of an incomparable orchestral performance, in [illegible] Last night the music began as distantly and mysteriously as the echo in a shell. The whole first movement was a gradual awakening, and flooding with light. Every second the orchestral color was changing like that of a cloud or the tints of the reflected sky.

A Breath-Taking Climax

The second movement is the scherzo of the winds and the deep; a flashing play of strange sounds and figurations, and Dr. Koussevitzky is deeply aware of the secret of Debussy's wind instruments. Prismatic orchestral effects accompanied a fantastic dance. This movement was of a higher tension than the dawn music, and an accumulating excitement, and was thus the bridge to the exultant finale.

There was the proud sweep, the sensuous call, and the wild coursing of the white-maned steeds of the sea. The climax, long and masterfully held in reserve, was breathtaking, and the audience relieved its excitement in crashing applause. It may be possible for another conductor and another orchestra, sometime, somewhere, to equal this revelation of Debussy's tone-poem, but it is gravely to be doubted. The audience last night in Carnegie Hall heard one of the greatest summits of instrumental interpretation of which the present day is capable.

Beethoven's Fifth symphony brought the concert to an end, when the sonority of the orchestra became as powerful and massive as it had been opalescent, and the eternal verities uttered by the greatest hero in music struck fire from those who listened and those who played. There was an immense audience, a packed house, salvos for orchestra and conductor, no more than just recognition of their deeds.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

NOV 20 1936

WORDS AND MUSIC

Boston Symphony Concert Here Rates a Panegyric

Sheer Elegance of Dr. Koussevitzky's Performance Enthralls Capacity Carnegie Hall Audience

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

THE Boston Symphony gave its first concert of the season at Carnegie Hall last night to a packed house whose enthusiasm kept mounting as the evening progressed. Indeed, it proved to be an occasion for unstinted rejoicing, for the Boston orchestra is once again, as it was until it fell a victim of the World War, without a peer. If orchestras can be said to have personality the Boston is like the finest Stradivarius, in the sense that it is all tone—dark, rich and mellow, from top to bottom. The band, is in fact, all of a piece, so beautifully are its several sections fused. One can point, in other orchestras, to excelling strings, to magnificent brasses, to this or that choir or to the virtuosity of solo instruments. The Boston is, in effect, a single instrument of haunting beauty, mechanically perfect and endlessly responsive.

It is easier to assemble a company of instrumentalists and train it toward perfection than to rehabilitate an old organization that had fallen on evil days. Dr. Koussevitzky has apparently accomplished the impossible, and to him alone must go the credit of the Boston orchestra's pre-eminence today. No lover of beautiful, co-ordinated instrumental sound could have failed last night to respond to the sheer loveliness of tone, the exquisite balance of the choirs and the niceties of adjustment in the more delicate sonorities. Nothing finer has been heard in this town than the tone quality of the string section in the "Adagio" of the Haydn B flat major Symphony (No. 9 of the London series) or the delicate precision with which it negotiated the babbling, fast-moving theme of the "Finale."

The transparencies of a Haydn symphony constitute the severest test of a symphonic body, and the Bostonians met the test triumphantly. Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the work could have been more robust, for to me at least there seemed too great an intrusion of preciosity. Yet it had its virile moments in the "Minuet," and the prankish humor of the "Finale" was pointedly conveyed. Is it possible that we are only now waking up to Haydn's greatness, after so long a period during which we were content to accept him dutifully as a historical figure—the "father" of the symphony, or something equally academic?

The orchestra again achieved a miracle of instrumental clarity in Debussy's "La Mer," and the conductor, for his part, mercilessly exposed the musical groundwork over which Debussy's waves and winds heave and sigh and hold colloquy. The audience hailed the performance unqualifiedly and cheered the orchestra and its leader. But, whether the spell of Toscanini's re-creation of this score is still upon me, or whether I still feel that the music is indeterminate, I was not as impressed by the interpretation as my neighbors appeared to be.

Beethoven's "Fifth" Symphony concluded the program. The first movement (the only one I heard) seemed to me to lack the fire, the strength and the imperious drive which can make the first act of the tremendous drama the overwhelming experience it should be. It may be that the conductor found himself hampered by the too deliberate tempo he took at the very beginning. The thing, at any rate, did not quite come off, I thought. The point of the evening, for me, was the super-excellence of the Boston Symphony.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

NOV 20 1936

Boston Symphony Opens 51st Season in Gotham

NEW YORK, Nov. 19 (AP)—The Boston Symphony tonight began the second half century of its concert seasons in New York. In all that time no concert ever has been canceled.

Only two have been postponed, one by a death, and the other by the blizzard of 1888.

For the opening of this 51st season the 109 members of the orchestra were followed to town by inanimate doubles. For on exhibit in the lounge of Carnegie Hall and closely inspected by the large audience were 109 charcoal sketches of the men in the orchestra, done this Spring by Gerome Brush.

The center of the display was the sketch of Serge Koussevitzky, one and only conductor. The other men of the group were hung two deep around the lounge; the sketches reproduced and bound, were also to be had in book form.

Dr. Koussevitzky played a Haydn Symphony in B Flat, the ninth of the London series, so-called; DeBussy's "La Mer," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, a favorite of the conductor's.

As usual, the orchestra will come five times to New York, playing twice here and once in Brooklyn at each trip.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 21 1936

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens 51st Season Here With Concert at Academy of Music

The 51st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's appearance in Brooklyn was opened auspiciously last evening when the first of five philharmonic concerts to be given through the Winter was presented in the Academy of Music Opera House. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted a program of exceptional interest including "Symphony in A Major," Mozart; Divertimento from "Le Baiser de la Fee," Stravinsky, and "Symphony in D Mino," Franck.

A new stage set designed by Claude Bragdon in collaboration with Willem Mengelberg formed an attractive background for the orchestra. Mrs. Henry J. Davenport is acting chairman of the Brooklyn committee for the orchestra; Mrs. Edward C. Blum is chairman of boxes for the season; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow is membership chairman of the Brooklyn committee and Miss Virginia Marvin chairman of the Junior League committee. The concerts are sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman.

Miss Phyllis Barnes was hostess in the committee box and had as her guests Miss Berenice N. Smith who is her house guest; Mr. and Mrs. Edward McGratty, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Edgar Chumasero Jr., Purcell B. Robertson and Kenneth Meytrott.

Mrs. William H. Good had as her guests Mr. and Mrs. Edwin H. Denby, Miss Mary Campbell, Miss Mary Osborn Polak, Albert L. Donovan, Horace Mann and Hugh Clark. Miss Campbell entertained the group at dinner at her home, 1315 Pacific St., before the concert.

Occupying another box were Miss Adeline S. Pettit, Miss Jeannette Wheldon and Mr. and Mrs. Roy M. Hart. Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr. and H. A. Hennessey were other box hosts.

The next concert will be given on Friday evening, Jan. 8.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 20 1936

Music of the Day

—By B. H. HAGGIN—

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Symphony Orchestra in a Notable Performance of Debussy's 'The Sea'—Buldrini in Recital

An audience of pre-depression size and appearance welcomed the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky when they made their first appearance of the season at Carnegie Hall last night, playing Haydn's Symphony No. 102 in B flat major, Debussy's "The Sea," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. It was good to have an opportunity to hear one of the finest of Haydn's symphonies, which had not been played here since Bruno Walter's first concert with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra four years ago. And I, for one, welcomed the opportunity to hear Mr. Koussevitzky's performance of "The Sea," which proved, as I had anticipated, to be one of extraordinary quality and his finest achievement of the evening.

I have remarked before that one has not really heard Debussy's "Clouds" and "Festivals," or his Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," if one has not heard them conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky. What gives these performances their unique distinction, setting them apart even from the performances of Toscanini or Stokowski, is, for one thing, the quality of Mr. Koussevitzky's imagination, but also the subtle colors in his tonal palette that are not in theirs. And last night's performance of "The Sea" acquired distinction in the same way. It was less intense, less robust, more subtly evocative than Toscanini's; and this was achieved by finer and more subtly differentiated coloring of a sort that was almost beyond belief. I hope there will be an opportunity to hear it again.

One was bound to wonder why a conductor capable of this fineness and subtlety in Debussy should have been capable of such heaviness and coarseness in the first three movements of the Haydn symphony. Apparently he was capable of fineness and subtlety when they were dictated by pictorial imagination, but not when they were required by a musical style. The last movement, however, taken at the speed at which Mr. Koussevitzky takes these movements in Hadyn symphonies, was as light as air; and its performance was a brilliant exhibition of the orchestra's extraordinary virtuosity.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

NOV 21 1936

Boston Symphony Coming Dec. 7

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to the Eastman Theater for a single concert on Monday evening, Dec. 7. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct.

All balcony seats have been taken. Seats still remain in the orchestra, loge and mezzanine.

The appearance of the Boston ensemble is listed as the third attraction in Series B of the concerts sponsored by the Civic Music Association.

ELYRIA, O.
Chronicle Telegram

NOV 21 1936

Oberlin Orchestra Concert Tuesday

OBERLIN, Nov. 21 — Under the direction of Professor Maurice Kessler, the Oberlin Conservatory Symphony Orchestra has this year reached a new peak in ability to play the works of the master composers. This will be demonstrated at the annual concert on Tuesday evening at 7:30 in Finney Chapel.

Professor Kessler gained recognition this summer as guest conductor of the Great Lakes Symphony Orchestra. His experience there and as first violinist for the Boston Symphony for four years before he came to Oberlin in 1916 has earned him deserved recognition in other annual concerts for the skillful way in which his youthful musicians have played Beethoven's Sixth Symphony and Brahms' First Symphony

This year the Conservatory Orchestra will play Brahms' Fourth Sympathy; Bach's D Major Suite; and three Wagner numbers: "Overture to Tannhauser," the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and the Overture to "Die Meistersinger." There is no admission charge and no ticket is required for the concert.

76.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEW YORK JOURNAL

NOV 20 1936

Music in Review

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

By Henriette Weber

What ripe enjoyment the superb Boston Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, can give! The Bostonian's fifty-first season here was ushered in last evening before the usual large and representative subscription audience. Three important works were presented: a Haydn symphony, Debussy's "La Mer," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

The Haydn which Dr. Koussevitzky selected is one from the same group of twelve symphonies which the composer wrote during his London period after he had reached the height of his powers, and from which Mr. Barbirolli had selected one for the Wednesday evening concert of the Philharmonic. It brought therefore into juxtaposition the two conductors via the same medium and gave one a curious sense of comparison.

The Boston conductor is an acknowledged master, with his years of experience giving added security. Brilliant beyond compare, subtle and cannily all-hearing as he leads the manifold instrument which a modern symphony orchestra is. He gave a distinguished reading of the Haydn, finished and polished to the last degree. Yet the fluent curve of many a phrase brought before one the fact, already noted repeatedly, that Mr. Barbirolli often achieves as nice a turn of phrase, indicating one of the phases of his conducting as a young man which promises much for the future.

The wistful imaginativeness of the Debussy sea pieces was caught and held with the adroitness for mood setting that Dr. Koussevitzky never fails to project. The noble reading of the great Fifth Symphony of Beethoven was the crown of the evening.

A reception was held in the lounge of Carnegie Hall after the concert for the exhibition of charcoal drawings by Gerome Brush of the 109 members of the orchestra and their leader. The drawings have been collected and published in book form.

A most promising debut recital yesterday afternoon was that of Frederick Buldrini. He is a winner of the Naumburg Musical Foundation Prize, and has reached a stage of artistic maturity that indicates he will go far. Showing his undoubted talent as a small boy, his parents sent him to Italy where he studied until 1930. Returning here there came a fellowship at Juilliard.

He is twenty now, a tall athletic young fellow bearing his honors modestly. He has just been accepted for the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra where he will occupy a desk immediately behind the concertmaster.

Young Buldrini selected a heavy program for his debut. The opening Brahms Sonata found him weighted down by consciousness of his audience, so his playing then was lackadaisical. Furthermore, he suffered from having an amateurish accompanist, Miss Irene Botts, who labored under the delusion that the sonata was a piano solo. With his second number, the Dohnanyi violin concerto, he began to emerge, and with the third movement he asserted himself, forgetting his audience under the emotional stress of the stirring music.

He has a carefully nurtured technic and innate musical feeling which but needs more public playing to reach its full expression. He was vigorously applauded by the large audience that included all the young members of the Mozart Sinfonietta and Wesley Sontag, their leader, with whom Buldrini has played, and who were out in full force to cheer him on.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

NOV 21 1936

Boston Symphony Coming Dec. 7

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to the Eastman Theater for a single concert on Monday evening, Dec. 7. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct.

All balcony seats have been taken. Seats still remain in the orchestra, loge and mezzanine.

The appearance of the Boston ensemble is listed as the third attraction in Series B of the concerts sponsored by the Civic Music Association.

HAS OPENING HERE

Debussy's 'La Mer' Presented Under Serge Koussevitzky at Carnegie Hall.

HAYDN WORK ON PROGRAM

B-Flat Symphony, 9th London Series — Concert Brings Vigorous Applause.

By OLIN DOWNES

The unsurpassed Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its singularly gifted leader, Serge Koussevitzky, returned to New York last night to give its opening concert of the season in this city in Carnegie Hall.

The event proved to be one of the memorable concerts in the annals of orchestral performance in this community. The performance of Haydn's B-flat symphony, the ninth of the London set, would have reflected glory enough, because of its tonal beauty and transparency, its technical finish, its mercurial flow of melody and wit, upon any orchestra and any leader. But the matchless moment was the interpretation of Debussy's "La mer."

Carnegie Hall audiences know this music well. They have become acquainted with its mysterious beauty under the best possible auspices. It is one of Toscanini's chef-d'oeuvres. The statement is self-explanatory, yet one is moved to say that last night we heard a new and marvelously evocative conception of the music, one not more full-blooded or effective in the exterior sense, but more glamorous and imaginative, more subtle and poetical in coloring, and of the two the most intimately related to the composer's thought.

Each Measure a Masterpiece

Koussevitzky's realization of the music is rich beyond description in marvel of detail, so that each measure seemed last night a masterpiece, an instant expected but awaited with a certain suspense. The deep chorale chanted in the orchestra toward the close of the opening movement was as the predestined fulfillment of some drama, mysterious and mighty beyond words. Always there were ebb and flow, whispers and clamors, of the elements, and a rhythm as fluctuating as the tides. Nothing was fixed, rhythms dissolved into rhythms, colors into colors, and yet there was a grand form.

It would be only fitting to mention the technical details of an incomparable orchestral performance, in which every player was a virtuoso, but the collective effect can only be mentioned here. Too often the three movements of "La mer" seem alike in general character. Is this the sea at dawn, the listener could ask, or at noon, or agitated by the storm? Last night the music began as distantly and mysteriously as the echo in a shell. The whole first movement was a gradual awakening, and flooding with light. Every second the orchestral color was changing like that of a cloud or the tints of the reflected sky.

A Breath-Taking Climax

The second movement is the scherzo of the winds and the deep; a flashing play of strange sounds and figurations, and Dr. Koussevitzky is deeply aware of the secret of Debussy's wind instruments. Prismatic orchestral effects accompanied a fantastic dance. This movement was of a higher tension than the dawn music, and an accumulating excitement, and was thus the bridge to the exultant finale.

There was the proud sweep, the sensuous call, and the wild coursing of the white-maned steeds of the sea. The climax, long and masterfully held in reserve, was breath-taking, and the audience relieved its excitement in crashing applause. It may be possible for another conductor and another orchestra, sometime, somewhere, to equal this revelation of Debussy's tone-poem, but it is gravely to be doubted. The audience last night in Carnegie Hall heard one of the greatest summits of instrumental interpretation of which the present day is capable.

Beethoven's Fifth symphony brought the concert to an end, when the sonority of the orchestra became as powerful and massive as it had been opalescent, and the eternal verities uttered by the greatest hero in music struck fire from those who listened and those who played. There was an immense audience, a packed house, salvos for orchestra and conductor, no more than just recognition of their deeds.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

NOV 20 1936

WORDS AND MUSIC

Boston Symphony Concert Here Rates a Panegyric

Sheer Elegance of Dr. Koussevitzky's Performance Enthralls Capacity Carnegie Hall Audience

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

THE Boston Symphony gave its first concert of the season at Carnegie Hall last night to a packed house whose enthusiasm kept mounting as the evening progressed. Indeed, it proved to be an occasion for unstinted rejoicing, for the Boston orchestra is once again, as it was until it fell a victim of the World War, without a peer. If orchestras can be said to have personality the Boston is like the finest Stradivarius, in the sense that it is all tone—dark, rich and mellow, from top to bottom. The band, is in fact, all of a piece, so beautifully are its several sections fused. One can point, in other orchestras, to excelling strings, to magnificent brasses, to this or that choir or to the virtuosity of solo instruments. The Boston is, in effect, a single instrument of haunting beauty, mechanically perfect and endlessly responsive.

It is easier to assemble a company of instrumentalists and train it toward perfection than to rehabilitate an old organization that had fallen on evil days. Dr. Koussevitzky has apparently accomplished the impossible, and to him alone must go the credit of the Boston orchestra's pre-eminence today. No lover of beautiful, co-ordinated instrumental sound could have failed last night to respond to the sheer loveliness of tone, the exquisite balance of the choirs and the niceties of adjustment in the more delicate sonorities. Nothing finer has been heard in this town than the tone quality of the string section in the "Adagio" of the Haydn B flat major Symphony (No. 9 of the London series) or the delicate precision with which it negotiated the babbling, fast-moving theme of the "Finale."

The transparencies of a Haydn symphony constitute the severest test of a symphonic body, and the Bostonians met the test triumphantly. Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the work could have been more robust, for to me at least there seemed too great an intrusion of preciosity. Yet it had its virile moments in the "Minuet," and the prankish humor of the "Finale" was pointedly conveyed. Is it possible that we are only now waking up to Haydn's greatness, after so long a period during which we were content to accept him dutifully as a historical figure—the "father" of the symphony, or something equally academic?

The orchestra again achieved a miracle of instrumental clarity in Debussy's "La Mer," and the conductor, for his part, mercilessly exposed the musical groundwork over which Debussy's waves and winds heave and sigh and hold colloquy. The audience hailed the performance unqualifiedly and cheered the orchestra and its leader. But, whether the spell of Toscanini's recreation of this score is still upon me, or whether I still feel that the music is indeterminate, I was not as impressed by the interpretation as my neighbors appeared to be.

Beethoven's "Fifth" Symphony concluded the program. The first movement (the only one I heard) seemed to me to lack the fire, the strength and the imperious drive which can make the first act of the tremendous drama the overwhelming experience it should be. It may be that the conductor found himself hampered by the too deliberate tempo he took at the very beginning. The thing, at any rate, did not quite come off, I thought. The point of the evening, for me, was the super-excellence of the Boston Symphony.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

20 1936

th fittings. 89¢ low as

NEW YORK, Nov. 19 (AP)—The Boston Symphony tonight began the second half century of its concert seasons in New York. In all that time no concert ever has been canceled.

Only two have been postponed, one by a death, and the other by the blizzard of 1888.

For the opening of this 51st season the 109 members of the orchestra were followed to town by inanimate doubles. For on exhibit in the lounge of Carnegie Hall and closely inspected by the large audience were 109 charcoal sketches of the men in the orchestra, done this Spring by Gerome Brush.

The center of the display was the sketch of Serge Koussevitzky, one and only conductor. The other men of the group were hung two deep around the lounge; the sketches reproduced and bound, were also to be had in book form.

Dr. Koussevitzky played a Haydn Symphony in B Flat, the ninth of the London series, so-called; DeBussy's "La Mer," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, a favorite of the conductor's.

As usual, the orchestra will come five times to New York, playing twice here and once in Brooklyn at each trip.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 21 1936

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens 51st Season Here With Concert at Academy of Music

The 51st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's appearance in Brooklyn was opened auspiciously last evening when the first of five philharmonic concerts to be given through the Winter was presented in the Academy of Music Opera House. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted a program of exceptional interest including "Symphony in A Major," Mozart; Divertimento from "Le Baiser de la Fee," Stravinsky, and "Symphony in D Mino," Franck.

A new stage set designed by Claude Bragdon in collaboration with Willem Mengelberg formed an attractive background for the orchestra. Mrs. Henry J. Davenport is acting chairman of the Brooklyn committee for the orchestra; Mrs. Edward C. Blum is chairman of boxes for the season; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow is membership chairman of the Brooklyn committee and Miss Virginia Marvin chairman of the Junior League committee. The concerts are sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman.

Miss Phyllis Barnes was hostess in the committee box and had as her guests Miss Berenice N. Smith who is her house guest; Mr. and Mrs. Edward McGratty, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Edgar Chumasero Jr., Purcell B. Robertson and Kenneth Meytrott.

Mrs. William H. Good had as her guests Mr. and Mrs. Edwin H. Denby, Miss Mary Campbell, Miss Mary Osborn Polak, Albert L. Donovan, Horace Mann and Hugh Clark. Miss Campbell entertained the group at dinner at her home, 1315 Pacific St., before the concert.

Occupying another box were Miss Adeline S. Pettit, Miss Jeannette Wheldon and Mr. and Mrs. Roy M. Hart. Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr. and H. A. Hennessey were other box hosts.

The next concert will be given on Friday evening, Jan. 8.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 20 1936

Music of the Day

By B. H. HAGGIN

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Symphony Orchestra in a Notable Performance of Debussy's 'The Sea'—Buldrini in Recital

An audience of pre-depression size and appearance welcomed the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky when they made their first appearance of the season at Carnegie Hall last night, playing Haydn's Symphony No. 102 in B flat major, Debussy's "The Sea," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. It was good to have an opportunity to hear one of the finest of Haydn's symphonies, which had not been played here since Bruno Walter's first concert with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra four years ago. And I, for one, welcomed the opportunity to hear Mr. Koussevitzky's performance of "The Sea," which proved, as I had anticipated, to be one of extraordinary quality and his finest achievement of the evening.

I have remarked before that one has not really heard Debussy's "Clouds" and "Festivals," or his Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," if one has not heard them conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky. What gives these performances their unique distinction, setting them apart even from the performances of Toscanini or Stokowski, is, for one thing, the quality of Mr. Koussevitzky's imagination, but also the subtle colors in his tonal palette that are not in theirs. And last night's performance of "The Sea" acquired distinction in the same way. It was less intense, less robust, more subtly evocative than Toscanini's; and this was achieved by finer and more subtly differentiated coloring of a sort that was almost beyond belief. I hope there will be an opportunity to hear it again.

One was bound to wonder why a conductor capable of this fineness and subtlety in Debussy should have been capable of such heaviness and coarseness in the first three movements of the Haydn symphony. Apparently he was capable of fineness and subtlety when they were dictated by pictorial imagination, but not when they were required by a musical style. The last movement, however, taken at the speed at which Mr. Koussevitzky takes these movements in Hadyn symphonies, was as light as air; and its performance was a brilliant exhibition of the orchestra's extraordinary virtuosity.

ELYRIA, O.
Chronicle Telegram

NOV 21 1936

Oberlin Orchestra Concert Tuesday

OBERLIN, Nov. 21 — Under the direction of Professor Maurice Kessler, the Oberlin Conservatory Symphony Orchestra has this year reached a new peak in ability to play the works of the master composers. This will be demonstrated at the annual concert on Tuesday evening at 7:30 in Finney Chapel.

Professor Kessler gained recognition this summer as guest conductor of the Great Lakes Symphony Orchestra. His experience there and as first violinist for the Boston Symphony for four years before he came to Oberlin in 1916 has earned him deserved recognition in other annual concerts for the skillful way in which his youthful musicians have played Beethoven's Sixth Symphony and Brahms' First Symphony

This year the Conservatory Orchestra will play Brahms' Fourth Sympathy; Bach's D Major Suite; and three Wagner numbers: "Overture to Tannhauser," the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and the Overture to "Die Meistersinger." There is no admission charge and no ticket is required for the concert.

77.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

NOV 20 1936

Boston Symphony Concert

Koussevitzky Offers Haydn, Debussy and Beethoven Works to Open Season.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its fifty-first season in this city with the concert of last evening in Carnegie Hall. It was a concert to be held long in lively remembrance. There was not a moment when the hearer did not feel glad that Boston was sufficiently close to New York to permit of regular visits from this group of virtuosi led by a conductor of authority, enthusiasm and understanding.

One sometimes is lost in wonder at the glory of the tone of the Boston orchestra, so rich, so lucent, so filled with delicate qualities and withal so virile and forthright. And with the tone go finish, precision, unanimity and infinite elasticity. It is a great orchestra and is greatly directed.

Last evening's program was compact, yet generous. There were three numbers, of which the first was Haydn's B flat symphony, No. 102. Hearing this composition as it was performed last night one is tempted to revise all his conceptions of Haydn. Rubinstein's lofty condescensions, his pat on the back for the genial old gentleman who brought his beloved Viennese every day a musical lollipop, becomes ridiculous. This is no mere stick of candy but a beautifully fashioned score, full of fancy, touched with gentle humor, ascending at times to regions of stormy emotion and at others descending to levels of elegant sentiment, but always with the grace of a courtly period and the occasional naivete of a humble mind, and all conveyed with such a mastery of the fundamentals of orchestration one can hardly believe that since the work was written Berlioz and Wagner revolutionized the art of instrumentation.

There have been few orchestral performances in this town so nearly approaching utter perfection as that of the Haydn symphony last evening. Not a detail was slurred, not a minor nuance neglected, not a single fragment of episodic character obscured, yet all was knit firmly into a strong and satisfying whole. The exquisitely poetic treatment of the broad introduction, the polished delivery of the slow movement, the impressiveness of Haydn's sudden modulations and exclamatory outbursts—which must have disturbed the sedate music lovers of London in 1795—and the scintillant finale, all were played with extraordinary smoothness and finesse. The audience was quick to perceive the excellence of the performance and its applause, given liberally to the conductor, increased in volume when the orchestra stood to receive the approbation of the public. If any one entertained a doubt about the genius of Haydn he must have had it painlessly extracted by the performance of this B flat symphony last evening.

The second number on the list was Debussy's tripartite orchestral sketch, with the title "La Mer." Here again the virtuosity of the orchestra was displayed splendidly. The music had the glow, the mystic glamour, the melting of tones and fusing of instrumental parts needed for a compelling evocation of its magic. Mr. Koussevitzky had not now to demonstrate his command of the Debussy idiom. He has long been known as one of the foremost exponents of this highly individual method of expression.

The concert came to its conclusion with Beethoven's fifth symphony. Thus the first concert of the new season presented three works, one representing the best thought of the early classical period, another the rich product of the impressionistic delineation almost created by Debussy, and the third the day of the crossing of the bridge between the two eras. There was no novelty. The Boston organization infrequently comes without one, but Mr. Koussevitzky is reserving it for tomorrow afternoon, when we shall learn something about the late adventurings of young France. We may hazard the conjecture that even then we shall not forget the preaching of the gospel according to Haydn.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 21 1936

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON HERE

Famous Orchestra Delivers Scores of Three Major Works

The Boston Symphony Orchestra unfolded its magic last night at the Academy of Music to the delight of musical Brooklyn.

Any appearance of the great orchestra, with its thaumaturgic leader, Serge Koussevitzky, is an exhilirating event, and last night was no exception. This company of superlative virtuosi delivered, as they should be, the csores of three major works which made up the concert, the first in a series of five to be given at the Academy.

The selections were Mozart's Symphony in A Major; Franck's in D Minor and Igor Stravinsky's Divertimento from "Le Baiser de la Fee." The Fairy's Kiss.)

The performance of the Stravinsky work was said to be a "first" in Greater New York. An orchestral mounting of a ballet the composer wrote for Ida Rubenstein in 1928, it is startlingly out of the style of the Russian modernist and those who adore, for example, his "Petrouchka" will not worry about hearing it again.

"To the muse of Tchaikowsky," the piece was dedicated, and it is merely a rehash of the Slav's melodies. The great Igor, nevertheless, recast his tones of the master in some of his own rigid tonal language and Dr. Koussevitzky and his men did marvelous things with the score.

But it was in the majectically beautiful Franck symphony that the full brilliance of the orchestra shone. The exhibition of tone, balance and plasticity Dr. Koussevitzky and his company gave took one' breath away. That fabulous string section of the Boston explained why it is a legend.

A not inconsiderable feature of the evening was an unmusical one—a new backdrop. Gone was that obtrusive, bright, vaudevillian background that always offended the eye and in its place a handsome bottle green setting. It was by "special arrangement" that it was here last night, the program explained, but it is hoped that the Academy will get a hold of it permanently. Claude Bragdon and Willem Mengelberg designed it.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

NOV 22 1936

Boston's Symphony Here on Dec. 7

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will come to the Eastman Theater Monday evening, Dec. 7, as the third attraction in Series B of the Eastman Theater concerts.

For his work with the orchestra, the famed conductor recently was awarded the ivory and gold star and the scarlet silk cravat of a commander of the French Legion of Honor, the highest honor France bestows.

The program here will be announced soon, according to Civic Music Association officials.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

NOV 21 1936

Music in Review

By HAROLD A. STRICKLAND

Bostonians at the Academy.

With the special stage set devised for the Brooklyn season by Claude Bragdon and Willem Mengelberg in the days just prior to the Dutch conductor's leaving the Philharmonic-Symphony Society's podium, the Boston Symphony Orchestra started its annual borough series of five concerts last night in the Academy of Music under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute.

Dr. Koussevitzky once more was on the podium and again brought out the remarkable string color which his band owns. It seemed, however, to this reviewer, that as time brings mellowness to his interpretations, he is tending again to revert to those early days here when his Russian ancestry was revealed in his readings.

Be that as it may, however, and this was not always in evidence last night, he finally permitted New York to hear Mozart, not as Mr. Barbirolli does, in pedestrian and stolid fashion, but in the dashing lilting, effervescent manner to which we have become accustomed. Last night's Mozart contribution to the program was the A Major Symphony and the string choir of the Bostonians was never revealed than in the muted andante which was followed by a typical Mozartean minuet rather than a Latin reading of what purported to be this composer.

Following it came his "novelty," a suite arranged by Stravinsky from his ballet "Le Baiser de la Fee," which the composer wrote for Ida Rubinstein in 1928 and which Stravinsky himself conducted last year in Boston and Chicago. It was new, however, to New Yorkers. Admitting that the source and much of the content is Tschaikovsky's, Stravinsky nevertheless had added his own arrangement and, if the earlier Russian is heard at all, it is only because the arranger at times has to yield because he himself is incapable of providing melodies and lyric episodes. Were not the antecedents admitted, however, it might readily be assumed that the valse episode is Straussean in origin, although Stravinsky, in permitting horn ejaculations as counterpoint, injects his own personality into the picture.

The Bostonians were thoroughly familiar with the score and Dr. Koussevitzky read it with some sense of appreciation.

The "jazz symphony" of Cesar Franck was the concluding number and here the conductor's racial attributes superseded the Belgian's own ideas in composing it. Dr. Koussevitzky preferred to accentuate each of the numerous motifs as they were introduced while the finale lacked that coherency which Franck intended.

Bach Series Continues.

Rarely are New York audiences provided with the opportunity to listen to large doses of the music of Johann Sebastian Bach. Such an opportunity is being afforded by the WPA Federal Music Project, which last night gave the fourth of a series of six Bach concerts by the Bach Chamber Orchestra at the New School.

On last night's program, conducted by Samuel Gardner, were three concertos, including the Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G Major and the Prelude to Cantanta No. 31 "Der Himmel Lacht."

Judith Sidorsky, as piano soloist for the Concerto in F Minor provided little contrast in tonal quality and tempi in the three movements.

V. C.

The outstanding performance of the evening came with the Concerto in A Minor, during which a harpsicord was substituted for a clavier and played by Yella Pessl. Walter Eisenberg and Frances Blaisdell also assisted.

Notes and Comment About Music

nov.30 Tran

The third annual meeting of the Association of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held in Symphony Hall next Thursday afternoon. Jerome D. Greene, director of the recent Tercentenary Celebration at Harvard, will be the speaker. Dr. Koussevitzky and members of the Orchestra vill present a short musical program. In the upper foyer of the hall there will be an exhibition of seventeenth and eighteenth century paintings from the collection of Alvan T. Fuller.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 21 1936

Music of the Day

By B. H. HAGGIN

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Symphony in New Stravinsky Work at Academy of Music—Willard MacGregor in Recital

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzy, paid its first visit of the season to Brooklyn last night, playing, at the Academy of Music, Mozart's Symphony in A, Koechel No. 201, a Suite from Stravinsky's allegorical ballet, "The Fairy's Kiss," and Franck's Symphony in D minor. tI was good to see an audience restored to something approaching its pre-depression size—to see, that is, evidence of awareness of Brooklyn's good fortune in having these concerts, which offer performances by one of the world's finest orchestras and one of the greatest of living conductors. By this I do not mean that all the performances reach the same high level of interpretive effect; and to say that Mr. Koussevitzky does better with some composers, some works than with others, is not to take anything away from his stature but to say only what is true of every conductor, as indeed of every interpretive artist. An actor plays one role better than another; a conductor does better with the music of one composer than with another. For the music, if it amounts to anything, is not a mere spinning of notes but in each case a product of human imagination and feeling; and the conductor brings to these his own imagination and feeling, which may match better in one case than the other.

Mr. Koussevitzky's keen, alert musical intelligence, for example, makes him a perfect interpreter of the music of contemporary composers. And last night it produced a superlative performance of Stravinsky's reconstructions of musical styles of the past, largely because in this instance he has retained a great deal of the actual substance of the original, Tchaikovsky, with whom, moreover, he feels a closer affinity than the Bach or Haendel, and whom he has treated with great affection. That is, he has scored the music with exquisite delicacy and inflicted on it less of the usual harmonic acerbity. Tchaikovsky does not, however, escape completely unscathed; and among other things a waltz—that most senuous of musical styles—is scored for wind instruments.

Also, though Mr. Koussevitzky does not do well with the greatest Mozart, he is successful with the lighter Mozart—with "Eine kleine Nachtmusick," for example. And last night he made a delightful thing of Mozart's marvelous little symphony by converting it into something lighter than it is. I refer to the first movement, which, when played moderately fast, as Mozart directs, has a wistfulness that was lost when Mr. Koussevitzky played it very fast.

It was evident that Mr. Koussevitzky was pleased and stimualted by the size and responsiveness of the audience; and it is to be hoped that succeeding concerts in the series will be as well attended.

* * *

Willard MacGregor

Willard MacGregor, American pianist, appeared at Town Hall last night in a program comprising the Bach-Busoni Chaconne—a Brahms group made up of the Sixteen Waltzes Opus 39, the E flat minor Intermezzo and the E flat Rhapsody; Schubert's Posthumous Sonata A, and a modern section of Ravel and Rachmaninoff, ending cleverly with Chopin's Scherzo in B flat minor.

Mr. MacGregor seems to have improved his digital equipment considerably since last year, and now faces mechanical problems squarely without resorting to such quasi-musical devices as retards and excessive pedaling, which some pianists use as a screen to conceal their shortcomings. But the fact that one can take technical hurdles in stride does not necessarily mean that one must maintain this stride regardless of other considerations, and certain other considerations—musical ones—might well receive Mr. MacGregor's attention at this point. Though his listeners breathed sighs of relief when he rumbled straight through passages where another pianist might have taken the tortuitous route of sentimentalism—in the Brahms Opus 39, for example—they caught their breath at the summary treatment accorded much of the music that cried out for gentless. Such was the case in the Schubert Sonata, whose point is not form, nor bravura, nor subtlety, but pure unpremeditated Viennese beauty, and that point was lost last night.

While discussing Mr. MacGregor's digital improvement it might be well to mention one digital problem that has apparently been neglected—that of the singing tone. This inedispensable adjunct of interpretation is mastered not by the slow heaving of arms or the wrapt facial expression—as some would have us believe—but by the mechanical process of fitting notes into a melodic line, and this process has to do with dynamics, balance and rhythm. Mr. MacGregor's tone seldom sings, and it would be unfair to ascribe this to a spiritual failing, or any failing more serious than an undeveloped technique.

END

RALPH WINETT.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

NOV 21 1936

Boston Symphony Opens Its 51st Season At Academy of Music

With a gala audience in attenddance, the 51st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn opened last night at the Academy of Music under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which Edward C. Blum is chairman of the Board of Trustees, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman.

The Brooklyn committee, following the concert, held a reception for subscribers in the ballroom of the Academy of Music to view the work the sti- ex- tly of is

The first of five concerts of the 1936-7 season was made notable by the first performance in Greater New York of Stravinsky's Diverimento from the ballet "Le Baiser de la Fee" (The Fairy's Kiss").

Box holders last night included: Miss Phyllis Barnes, who was the hostess in the committee box; Mrs. William H. Good, H. A. Hennessey, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. Thomas E. Murray, jr., and the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who opened his 11th season in Brooklyn last night, was warmly welcomed by the capacity audience which filled the Academy of Music.

Stravinsky's "Le Baiser de la Fee" is based upon melodies from Tchaikovsky, and dedicated to the memory of this composer by Stravinsky. It was composed in 1928 and performed in France as a ballet production in that year. Cont

The orchestral suite was conducted by Stravinsky in performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Chicago Orchestra, each in its own city, when the composer visited America two seasons ago. Last night's performance is the only one announced to be given in this vicinity.

The program opened with Mozart's Symphony in A major No. 29 (K. 201). This little known symphony belongs to the composer's 18th year. The program closed with Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

Miss Barnes entertained the following guests in the committee box: Miss Berenice Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Edward McGratty, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Edgar Chunasero, jr., Purcell B. Robertson and Kenneth Meytrott.

Mrs. Good's guests included: Mr. and Mrs. Edwin H. Denby, Miss Mary Campbell, Miss Mary Osborne Polak, Horace Mann, Albert Donovan and Hugh Clark.

In Mrs. Prince's box were: Mrs. Jessica Lozier Payne, Alfred E. Drake, Miss Helen Wright, Theodore Fitch and Harold Henry.

The box of the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association's box, of which Mrs. Roy M. Hart is president, was occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Hart, Miss Adeline Pettit and Miss Jeannette Wheldon.

By special arrangement, the background for the orchestra last evening was the stage setting designed by Claude Bragdon in co-operation with Willem Mengelberg.

PROVID
JOU

NO

Mozart Conc
Spalding
Oth

The Mozart vio played by Albert
Boston Symphony
ropolitan Theatre
ning is the one i it was announced

The orchestra
by Richard Burg and assistant cond
gram will be a s Sergeivich Kalin fellow-student in gei Koussevitzky
Boston orchestra.
the program will in C major, orche
ner.

The concerto is violin written b when he was 19.
usual graceful a ner.

The Bach toca known of his wo
liant and famou
the introduction
markable adagio.
has been arrang chestra by Alexa
a 'cello solo wit
ment by Pablo C

The orchestrat arranged in 1927
ing it a less so the original orch that will be use ploys tuba, ha threes, six horns
pani, strings and

Weiner, a Czec
He attended th in Budapest, faculty.

Kalinnikov w died in 1901 of t
two symphoni minor, is the on
It was played b tra in 1921, Pier
ing. It is descri radiant work,
joy of living."

Among the w are two miniat tet and doubleb posed in honor

NEW Y
NEW YOR

NOV

M

An import the matinee of the Boston
"The Forgot
Olivier Mess four young who have ban gether to rev famous by France." Si artistic per banner heads

This work, the Boston ba sevitzky, prov its religious parts, played entitled "Th
The Eucharis own confessio on the score:
Cross You s had forgotten ing movemen ing less tha lows the h
the sin-ridd
"Eucharist"
ures, is str
the beginnin

This was that called proval of th of the Bosto of concerts
7 and 9.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

NOV 20 1936

Boston Symphony Concert

Koussevitzky Offers Haydn, Debussy and Beethoven Works to Open Season.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its fifty-first season in this city with the concert of last evening in Carnegie Hall. It was a concert to be held long in lively remembrance. There was not a moment when the hearer did not feel glad that Boston was sufficiently close to New York to permit of regular visits from this group of virtuosi led by a conductor of authority, enthusiasm and understanding.

One sometimes is lost in wonder at the glory of the tone of the Boston orchestra, so rich, so lucent, so filled with delicate qualities and withal so virile and forthright. And with the tone go finish, precision, unanimity and infinite elasticity. It is a great orchestra and is greatly directed.

Last evening's program was compact, yet generous. There were three numbers, of which the first was Haydn's B flat symphony, No. 102. Hearing this composition as it was performed last night one is tempted to revise all his conceptions of Haydn. Rubinstein's lofty condescensions, his pat on the back for the genial old gentleman who brought his beloved Viennese every day a musical lollipop, becomes ridiculous. This is no mere stick of candy but a beautifully fashioned score, full of fancy, touched with gentle humor, ascending at times to regions of stormy emotion and at others descending to levels of elegant sentiment, but always with the grace of a courtly period and the occasional naivete of a humble mind, and all conveyed with such a mastery of the fundamentals of orchestration one can hardly believe that since the work was written Berlioz and Wagner revolutionized the art of instrumentation.

There have been few orchestral performances in this town so nearly approaching utter perfection as that of the Haydn symphony last evening. Not a detail was slurred, not a minor nuance neglected, not a single fragment of episodic character obscured, yet all was knit firmly into a strong and satisfying whole. The exquisitely poetic treatment of the broad introduction, the polished delivery of the slow movement, the impressiveness of Haydn's sudden modulations and exclamatory outbursts—which must have disturbed the sedate music lovers of London in 1795—and the scintillant finale, all were played with extraordinary smoothness and finesse. The audience was quick to perceive the excellence of the performance and its applause, given liberally to the conductor, increased in volume when the orchestra stood to receive the approbation of the public. If any one entertained a doubt about the genius of Haydn he must have had it painlessly extracted by the performance of this B flat symphony last evening.

The second number on the list was Debussy's tripartite orchestral sketch, with the title "La Mer." Here again the virtuosity of the orchestra was displayed splendidly. The music had the glow, the mystic glamour, the melting of tones and fusing of instrumental parts needed for a compelling evocation of its magic. Mr. Koussevitzky had not now to demonstrate his command of the Debussy idiom. He has long been known as one of the foremost exponents of this highly individual method of expression.

The concert came to its conclusion with Beethoven's fifth symphony. Thus the first concert of the new season presented three works, one representing the best thought of the early classical period, another the rich product of the impressionistic delineation almost created by Debussy, and the third the day of the crossing of the bridge between the two eras. There was no novelty. The Boston organization infrequently comes without one, but Mr. Koussevitzky is reserving it for tomorrow afternoon, when we shall learn something about the late adventurings of young France. We may hazard the conjecture that even then we shall not forget the preaching of the gospel according to Haydn.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

22 1936

Boston's Symphony Here on Dec. 7

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will come to the Eastman Theater Monday evening, Dec. 7, as the third attraction in Series B of the Eastman Theater concerts.

For his work with the orchestra, the famed conductor recently was awarded the ivory and gold star and the scarlet silk cravat of a commander of the French Legion of Honor, the highest honor France bestows.

The program here will be announced soon, according to Civic Music Association officials.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 21 1936

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS SEASON HERE

Famous Orchestra Delivers Scores of Three Major Works

The Boston Symphony Orchestra unfolded its magic last night at the Academy of Music to the delight of musical Brooklyn.

Any appearance of the great orchestra, with its thaumaturgic leader, Serge Koussevitzky, is an exhilirating event, and last night was no exception. This company of superlative virtuosi delivered, as they should be, the csores of three major works which made up the concert, the first in a series of five to be given at the Academy.

The selections were Mozart's Symphony in A Major; Franck's in D Minor and Igor Stravinsky's Divertimento from "Le Baiser de la Fee." The Fairy's Kiss.)

The performance of the Stravinsky work was said to be a "first" in Greater New, York. An orchestral mounting of a ballet the composer wrote for Ida Rubenstein in 1928, it is startlingly out of the style of the Russian modernist and those who adore, for example, his "Petrouchka" will not worry about hearing it again.

"To the muse of Tchaikowsky," the piece was dedicated, and it is merely a rehash of the Slav's melodies. The great Igor, nevertheless, recast his tones of the master in some of his own rigid tonal language and Dr. Koussevitzky and his men did marvelous things with the score.

But it was in the majectically beautiful Franck symphony that the full brilliance of the orchestra shone. The exhibition of tone, balance and plasticity Dr. Koussevitzky and his company gave took one' breath away. That fabulous string section of the Boston explained why it is a legend.

A not inconsiderable feature of the evening was an unmusical one—a new backdrop. Gone was that obtrusive, bright, vaudevillian background that always offended the eye and in its place a handsome bottle green setting. It was by "special arrangement" that it was here last night, the program explained, but it is hoped that the Academy will get a hold of it permanently. Claude Bragdon and Willem Mengelberg designed it.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

NOV 21 1936

Music in Review

By HAROLD A. STRICKLAND

Bostonians at the Academy.

With the special stage set devised for the Brooklyn season by Claude Bragdon and Willem Mengelberg in the days just prior to the Dutch conductor's leaving the Philharmonic-Symphony Society's podium, the Boston Symphony Orchestra started its annual borough series of five concerts last night in the Academy of Music under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute.

Dr. Koussevitzky once more was on the podium and again brought out the remarkable string color which his band owns. It seemed, however, to this reviewer, that as time brings mellowness to his interpretations, he is tending again to revert to those early days here when his Russian ancestry was revealed in his readings.

Be that as it may, however, and this was not always in evidence last night, he finally permitted New York to hear Mozart, not as Mr. Barbirolli does, in pedestrian and stolid fashion, but in the dashing lilting, effervescent manner to which we have become accustomed. Last night's Mozart contribution to the program was the A Major Symphony and the string choir of the Bostonians was never revealed than in the muted andante which was followed by a typical Mozartean minuet rather than a Latin reading of what purported to be this composer.

Following it came his "novelty," a suite arranged by Stravinsky from his ballet "Le Baiser de la Fee," which the composer wrote for Ida Rubinstein in 1928 and which Stravinsky himself conducted last year in Boston and Chicago. It was new, however, to New Yorkers. Admitting that the source and much of the content is Tschaikovsky's, Stravinsky nevertheless had added his own arrangement and, if the earlier Russian is heard at all, it is only because the arranger at times has to yield because he himself is incapable of providing melodies and lyric episodes. Were not the antecedents admitted, however, it might readily be assumed that the valse episode is Straussean in origin, although Stravinsky, in permitting horn ejaculations as counterpoint, injects his own personality into the picture.

The Bostonians were thoroughly familiar with the score and Dr. Koussevitzky read it with some sense of appreciation.

The "jazz symphony" of Cesar Franck was the concluding number and here the conductor's racial attributes superseded the Belgian's own ideas in composing it. Dr. Koussevitzky preferred to accentuate each of the numerous motifs as they were introduced while the finale lacked that coherency which Franck intended.

Bach Series Continues.

Rarely are New York audiences provided with the opportunity to listen to large doses of the music of Johann Sebastian Bach. Such an opportunity is being afforded by the WPA Federal Music Project, which last night gave the fourth of a series of six Bach concerts by the Bach Chamber Orchestra at the New School.

On last night's program, conducted by Samuel Gardner, were three concertos, including the Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G Major and the Prelude to Cantanta No. 31 "Der Himmel Lacht."

Judith Sidorsky, as piano soloist for the Concerto in F Minor provided little contrast in tonal quality and tempi in the three movements.

V. C.

The outstanding performance of the evening came with the Concerto in A Minor, during which a harpsicord was substituted for a clavier and played by Yella Pessl. Walter Eisenberg and Frances Blaisdell also assisted.

---

to Match Pl

AUGUSTA, Ga., Nov. 30 (AP)—

The Association of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held in Symphony Hall next Thursday afternoon. Jerome D. Greene, director of the recent Tercentenary Celebration at Harvard, will be the speaker. Dr. Koussevitzky and members of the Orchestra vill present a short musical program. In the upper foyer of the hall there will be an exhibition of seventeenth and eighteenth century paintings from the collection of Alvan T. Fuller.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 21 1936

Music of the Day

By B. H. HAGGIN

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Symphony in New Stravinsky Work at Academy of Music—Willard MacGregor in Recital

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzy, paid its first visit of the season to Brooklyn last night, playing, at the Academy of Music, Mozart's Symphony in A, Koechel No. 201, a Suite from Stravinsky's allegorical ballet, "The Fairy's Kiss," and Franck's Symphony in D minor. tI was good to see an audience restored to something approaching its pre-depression size—to see, that is, evidence of awareness of Brooklyn's good fortune in having these concerts, which offer performances by one of the world's finest orchestras and one of the greatest of living conductors. By this I do not mean that all the performances reach the same high level of interpretive effect; and to say that Mr. Koussevitzky does better with some composers, some works than with others, is not to take anything away from his stature but to say only what is true of every conductor, as indeed of every interpretive artist. An actor plays one role better than another; a conductor does better with the music of one composer than with another. For the music, if it amounts to anything, is not a mere spinning of notes but in each case a product of human imagination and feeling; and the conductor brings to these his own imagination and feeling, which may match better in one case than the other.

Mr. Koussevitzky's keen, alert musical intelligence, for example, makes him a perfect interpreter of the music of contemporary composers. And last night it produced a superlative performance of Stravinsky's reconstructions of musical styles of the past, largely because in this instance he has retained a great deal of the actual substance of the original, Tchaikovsky, with whom, moreover, he feels a closer affinity than the Bach or Haendel, and whom he has treated with great affection. That is, he has scored the music with exquisite delicacy and inflicted on it less of the usual harmonic acerbity. Tchaikovsky does not, however, escape completely unscathed; and among other things a waltz—that most senuous of musical styles—is scored for wind instruments.

Also, though Mr. Koussevitzky does not do well with the greatest Mozart, he is successful with the lighter Mozart—with "Eine kleine Nachtmusick," for example. And last night he made a delightful thing of Mozart's marvelous little symphony by converting it into something lighter than it is. I refer to the first movement, which, when played moderately fast, as Mozart directs, has a wistfulness that was lost when Mr. Koussevitzky played it very fast.

It was evident that Mr. Koussevitzky was pleased and stimualted by the size and responsiveness of the audience; and it is to be hoped that succeeding concerts in the series will be as well attended.

* * *

Willard MacGregor

Willard MacGregor, American pianist, appeared at Town Hall last night in a program comprising the Bach-Busoni Chaconne—a Brahms group made up of the Sixteen Waltzes Opus 39, the E flat minor Intermezzo and the E flat Rhapsody; Schubert's Posthumous Sonata A, and a modern section of Ravel and Rachmaninoff, ending cleverly with Chopin's Scherzo in B flat minor.

Mr. MacGregor seems to have improved his digital equipment considerably since last year, and now faces mechanical problems squarely without resorting to such quasi-musical devices as retards and excessive pedaling, which some pianists use as a screen to conceal their shortcomings. But the fact that one can take technical hurdles in stride does not necessarily mean that one must maintain this stride regardless of other considerations, and certain other considerations—musical ones—might well receive Mr. MacGregor's attention at this point. Though his listeners breathed sighs of relief when he rumbled straight through passages where another pianist might have taken the tortuitous route of sentimentalism—in the Brahms Opus 39, for example—they caught their breath at the summary treatment accorded much of the music that cried out for gentless. Such was the case in the Schubert Sonata, whose point is not form, nor bravura, nor subtlety, but pure unpremeditated Viennese beauty, and that point was lost last night.

While discussing Mr. MacGregor's digital improvement it might be well to mention one digital problem that has apparently been neglected—that of the singing tone. This inedispensable adjunct of interpretation is mastered not by the slow heaving of arms or the wrapt facial expression—as some would have us believe—but by the mechanical process of fitting notes into a melodic line, and this process has to do with dynamics, balance and rhythm. Mr. MacGregor's tone seldom sings, and it would be unfair to ascribe this to a spiritual failing, or any failing more serious than an undeveloped technique.

RALPH WINETT.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

NOV 21 1936

Boston Symphony Opens Its 51st Season At Academy of Music

With a gala audience in attendance, the 51st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn opened last night at the Academy of Music under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which Edward C. Blum is chairman of the Board of Trustees, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman.

The Brooklyn committee, following the concert, held a reception for subscribers in the ballroom of the Academy of Music to view the work of instructors and students in the art classes of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. The exhibit was organized by recently formed Art Students Committee of which Mrs. Robert E. Blum is chairman.

The first of five concerts of the 1936-7 season was made notable by the first performance in Greater New York of Stravinsky's Diverimento from the ballet "Le Baiser de la Fee" (The Fairy's Kiss").

Box holders last night included: Miss Phyllis Barnes, who was the hostess in the committee box; Mrs. William H. Good, H. A. Hennessey, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. Thomas E. Murray, jr., and the Adelphi Academy Aluminae Association.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who opened his 11th season in Brooklyn last night, was warmly welcomed by the capacity audience which filled the Academy of Music.

Stravinsky's "Le Baiser de la Fee" is based upon melodies from Tchaikovsky, and dedicated to the memory of this composer by Stravinsky. It was composed in 1928 and performed in France as a ballet production in that year. Con't

The orchestral suite was conducted by Stravinsky in performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Chicago Orchestra, each in its own city, when the composer visited America two seasons ago. Last night's performance is the only one announced to be given in this vicinity.

The program opened with Mozart's Symphony in A major No. 29 (K. 201). This little known symphony belongs to the composer's 18th year. The program closed with Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

Miss Barnes entertained the following guests in the committee box: Miss Berenice Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Edward McGratty, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Edgar Chunasero, Jr., Percell B. Robertson and Kenneth Meytrott.

Mrs. Good's guests included: Mr. and Mrs. Edwin H. Denby, Miss Mary Campbell, Miss Mary Osborne Polak, Horace Mann, Albert Donovan and Hugh Clark.

In Mrs. Prince's box were: Mrs. Jessica Lozier Payne, Alfred E. Drake, Miss Helen Wright, Theodore Fitch and Harold Henry.

The box of the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association's box, of which Mrs. Roy M. Hart is president, was occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Hart, Miss Adeline Pettit and Miss Jeannette Wheldon.

By special arrangement, the background for the orchestra last evening was the stage setting designed by Claude Bragdon in co-operation with Willem Mengelberg.

From the BOSTON TRANSCRIPT - Monday, November 23, 1936

BOSTON'S SUPERLATIVE SYMPHONY

Can one stand upon a peak and yet serve the people who dwell on the plain? It is not easy for any institution to achieve eminence. It is harder still, after climbing the pinnacle to retain hold upon a broad public - to be admired not in a passive way only but also with active appreciation, giving thousands of men and women enjoyment of a living kind, heartfelt not lip-spoken.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra fulfills these two roles so rarely combined. Throughout America, as in Europe, its excellence has become known. Its repute has invaluable power to sustain the name of this city as a center of merit. At the same time the orchestra, wherever it goes, gives vital and inspiring delight.

Fresh reports have just come of the pleasure which this Boston group offered at the first of its new season's concerts held last week in New York. The critics rose to an enthusiasm almost electric. "Unsurpassed," said one. Another declared that after the opening B-flat unison of the Haydn symphony which began the program, the orchestra "had only to exhibit the tone of those legendary strings in the singing phrase that followed it, to make us aware that one of the greatest companies of musicians in the world was playing again for our delight. ... Mr. Koussevitzky and his players were at their irresistible best."

So the band which was the first great symphony orchestra ever established in America holds its place at the top, whether on occasional visits to New York or in regular concerts to the number of sixty in Boston and eight in the city of Cambridge, besides others at distant points. Upon such a record of value, no wonder this institution has gained the support of a distinguished sodality known as "The Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra"! An appeal by this group, announcing the special concert to be given for the society's members on December 3, was issued today from the office of the Friends' chairman, Edward A. Taft, whose selfless effort to sustain Boston's leadership in an artistic work as great in quantity as it stands high in quality, is now being more and more recognized. All who can contribute to the Symphony Orchestra's support should do so, to uphold the happiness of this city's people at home while sustaining Boston's brilliance abroad.

Like climbing a hill looks easy at top but new peaks [illegible]
[illegible]

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

[illegible] 1936

MUSIC

Mozart Concerto in D Major, K. 218, to be Played by Spalding with Boston Symphony Orchestra. Other Concerts and a Competition

The Mozart violin concerto to be played by Albert Spalding with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday evening is the one in D major K. 218, it was announced last night.

The orchestra will be conducted by Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor. On the program will be a symphony by Basil Sergeivich Kalinnikov, who was a fellow-student in Moscow of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston orchestra. The third item on the program will be a Bach toccata in C major, orchestrated by Leo Weiner.

The concerto is one of five for the violin written by Mozart in 1775, when he was 19. It is in Mozart's usual graceful and melodious manner.

The Bach toccatta, one of the best known of his works, contains a brilliant and famous pedal passage in the introduction and an equally remarkable adagio. A melody from it has been arranged for string orchestra by Alexander Siloti, and as a 'cello solo with piano accompaniment by Pablo Casals.

The orchestration by Weiner was arranged in 1927. He revised it, giving it a less sonorous setting, but the original orchestration is the one that will be used Tuesday. It employs tuba, harp, woodwinds in threes, six horns, four trumpets, timpani, strings and three trombones.

Weiner, a Czech, was born in 1885 He attended the Landes Akademic in Budapest, and later joined its faculty.

Kalinnikov was born in 1866 and died in 1901 of tuberculosis. He wrote two symphonies. The first, in G minor, is the one to be played here. It was played by the Boston orchestra in 1921, Pierre Monteux conducting. It is described as a "serene and radiant work, permeated with the joy of living."

Among the works by Kalinnikov are two miniatures for string quartet and doublebass ad libitum, composed in honor of Dr. Koussevitzky.

NEW YORK MIRROR

NOV 22 1936

MUSIC

By JULIAN SEAMAN

BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, yesterday afternoon, Carnegie Hall.

THE PROGRAM.

Symphony in A (No. 29, Koechel 201) .... Mozart
"The Forgotten Sacrifice" .... Messiaen
(First New York performance)
"Don Juan" tone poem .... Strauss
Symphony No. 5 in E flat (Opus 82) .... Sibelius

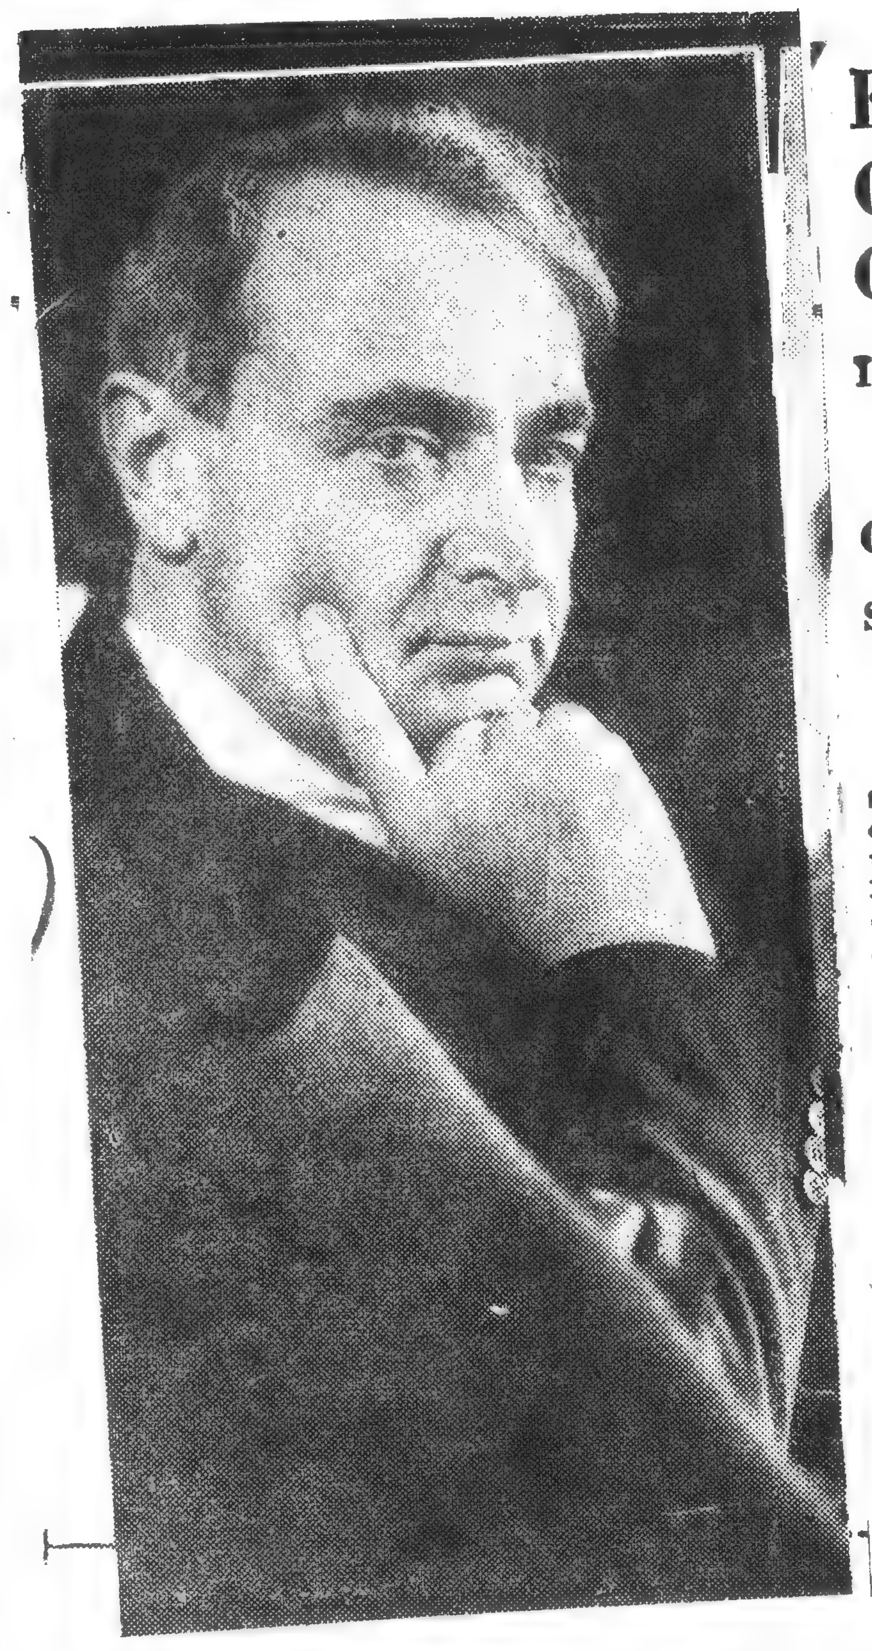
Mr. Koussevitzky gave us some very young music in the first half of his program yesterday afternoon—Mozart at 18; Strauss, the valiant rebel; Messiaen, who is now 28 and one of a prevailing clique—there is always one in any age—clamoring for the "freedom" of music.

M. Messiaen's "Meditation Symphonique" constituted the one novelty of the program. It is difficult to appraise the work after a single hearing. Its three segments have been titled: "The Cross," "The Sin," "The Eucharist." The ardent yet lofty mysticism which surrounds this work, the iridescent, translucent tone color of its orchestral voices, its dispassionate yet mundane tale of renunciation would seem to stamp it at once with the approval of artistic sincerity. But the composer has not been "free" enough to divorce the Debussy-Stravinsky Muse.

And as for "Don Juan," never has this ageless creation had a more brilliant reading. Granting that the revolts of yesterday become the platitudes of today, the fervors and ecstasies of the young Strauss deserve immortality.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

NOV 22 1936



Eastman School Symphony Orchestra, which will play in Eastman Theater Tuesday, top; Serge Koussevitski, conductor of Boston

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 22 1936

Koussevitzky Opens Saturday Concert Series

Introduces Composition of Messiaen Here With the Boston Symphony

Offers Work by Mozart

Strauss and Sibelius Also on Afternoon Program

By Francis D. Perkins

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra met their Saturday afternoon subscribers for the first time this season yesterday in Carnegie Hall, where the conductor began his diversified program with an early symphony by Mozart in A major, written in Salzburg when the composer was eighteen, and the first performance here of "Les Offrandes Oubliees," by Olivier Messiaen, one of the four young French composers who style themselves collectively "La Jeune France." The rest of the concert was devoted to familiar works by the two best-known septuagenarians among modern composers, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" and the fifth symphony of Jean Sibelius.

The appearance of "Les Offrandes Oubliées" on the program, five weeks after its first American hearing in Boston, served as a reminder that there is now a generation of French composers junior to that represented by Honegger, Milhour, Poulenc, Auric and the others regarded not so very many years ago as representatives of the latest tendencies in Gallic music. "Les Offrandes" is probably the first major work by a member of this youngest French generation to be made known here. The other three composers of "La Jeune France," Daniel-Lesure, Yves Baudrier and André Jolivet are thus far only names to us, as most of the other composers cited by Gilbert Chase in an article "Some Young French Composers" in the current issue of the London "Musical Times"—Marcel Delannoy, Henry Barraud and Jean Francaix, for instance.

Expresses Catholic Mysticism

Messiaen, who is not quite twenty-eight, studied at the Paris Conservatoire with Marcel Dupre and Paul Dukas, but his aesthetic background, according to Mr. Chase, is that of the Paris Schola Cantorum. "His music," states this writer, "is for the most part impregnated with religious mysticism, based on Catholic theology," and Mr. Burke's program notes quote a similar statement, that the composer "aims primarily to express with the utmost possibility of emotion and sincerity the truths of the Catholic faith.'" The verbal description attached to the score and the designations of its three sections, "La Croix," "Le Péché," "L'Eucharistie," and, indeed, the music itself, bear out this description.

"Les Offrandes" was played last June in Paris at the first joint concert of "La Jeune France," but its publication and first performance had taken place five years before. At a first hearing, it impresses as deeply felt, sincere and devoted music, the work of one who has meditated much on the events and mysteries which inspire it. According to Mr. Burk's notes, Florent Schmitt, writing in the Paris "Temps," admitted a frank preference for the section representing sin, but yesterday it seemed that Messiaen's most individual and cogent music was in the first part and the last, with its meditative muted strings. "Le Pèché" was expressed in a more conventional and familiar manner, and without the benefit of program notes, one might have mistaken its theme as a representation of mechanical speed, such as Honegger's "Pacific 231." It is true that it also suited the phrase, "in a race breathless, frantic, without release" in the description in the score, but this points to one of the difficulties involved in program music.

The other sections gave a certain impression of individuality and the harmonic basis of "L'Eucharistie" provided a characteristic flavor, although it would take further hearing of Messiaen's music to tell whether the principles on which his work is said to be based tend to limit its range of color and thereby its ultimate interest.

The Mozart symphony, his twenty-ninth and the 201st item in the Kochel catalogue, has had only one other production here during the last ten or twelve years, by the Philharmonic-Symphony under Mr. Toscanini in November, 1931. It is brief, taking only fifteen minutes to play, but is remarkable for its revelation of an already well-developed musical individuality; the themes and their treatment are essentially Mozartian throughout, and the lyrically serious andante could cause renewed astonishment at the earliness of the flowering of Mozart's genius, although this has long been one of the best-known facts of musical history.

Dr. Koussevitzky and his admirable orchestra were in their best form, and successfully realized the contrasted atmosphere of both these works, while another memorable feature of the concert was the imposing proclamation of the close of the Sibelius symphony.

Gerald Tracy's Recital

Meanwhile Gerald Tracy, a young pianist from Denver who has already played here in 1933 and 1934, was giving his third New York recital at Town Hall with a program that included Bach's toccata in D major and Schubert's sonata, Op. 53, in the same key; Brahms's Handel Variations and Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin."

Mr. Tracy's playing again gave an impression of good technical grounding and ample digital skill and fleetness, with a vigor generally kept well in hand. In the Schubert sonata he often, while not consistently, set forth the romantic expressiveness of many of its measures, but could not prevent it from seeming rather long. The Ravel suite was well executed, with laudable clarity of detail, although the interpreter missed some of the underlying pensiveness of some of its sections, such as the Forlane. He was warmly received by a good-sized audience.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEW YORK JOURNAL

NOV 23 1936

Music in Review

By Henriette Weber

An important novelty marked the matinee concert Saturday of the Boston Orchestra. It was "The Forgotten Sacrifice," by Olivier Messiaen, one of the four young French composers who have banded themselves together to revive the label made famous by Berlioz, "La jeune France." Sincerity and sound artistic perception are their banner heads.

This work, played exquisitely by the Boston band under Dr. Koussevitzky, proved to be gripping in its religious intensity. The three parts, played without pause, are entitled "The Cross—The Sin—The Eucharist." The composer's own confession of faith is inscribed on the score: "On the tree of the Cross You shed Your blood. We had forgotten it." The slow opening movement can be called nothing less than devout. Then follows the harried desperation of the sin-ridden, and finally the "Eucharist" with its tender measures, is strongly reminiscent of the beginning.

This was one item in a program that called forth resounding approval of the magnificent playing of the Bostonians. The next pair of concerts here will be January 7 and 9.

CONCERTO BY SOWERBY

Brinkman Plays His Sec-

proved this here

The vexing question of what the young artist should play was brought forcibly to mind at last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the second of the current Monday series. An Iowan pianist, Joseph Brinkman, head of the department of music at Ann Arboor, made his Boston debut as soloist in the first performance anywhere of the Second Concerto of Leo Sowerby. Had Mr. Brinkman, apparently a most capable pianist, played one of the standard concertos, there would be the usual and inevitable comparison of his performance with those of his great predecessors. As it was, the listener's attention was largely centered on the music of Mr. Sowerby. And it is the music, rather than the performance of it that calls for extended comment.

As an American of English and Canadian descent, a native of Michigan, Mr. Sowerby as composer sedulously avoids the influence Teutonic and the influence Gallic. The thematic sources of this concerto, a brief, vigorous and diverting piece, are predominantly Celtic, Gaelic, American Indian and Afro-American. The so-called "Scotch snap," prominent in this work, is in fact characteristic of all the last three idioms.

In the modern fashion, Mr. Sowerby combines three movements in one, using partly the same material in the first and last. These two sections have plenty of "go," though the latter seems to end somewhat prematurely. The middle, slow division, achieves a considerable richness of thought and sound, and without recourse to conventional formulae. It is here that the composer seems to have the most to say. The concerto as a whole, quickly over, was something that one would gladly hear again. Mr. Brinkman, submerging himself in Mr. Sowerby's music, was twice recalled. Less able pianists have been more enthusiastically received when the music they played was known to the audience.

For the rest last night's programme contained pieces that Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra have already given us this season: Mozart's early Symphony in C major and the Symphony of Cesar Franck.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1936

Boston's Superlative Symphony

Can one stand upon a peak and yet serve the people who dwell on the plain? It is not easy for any institution to achieve eminence. It is harder still, after climbing the pinnacle, to retain hold upon a broad public—to be admired not in a passive way only but also with active appreciation, giving thousands of men and women enjoyment of a living kind, heartfelt not lip-spoken.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra fulfills these two roles so rarely combined. Throughout America, as in Europe, its excellence has become known. Its repute has invaluable power to sustain the name of this city as a center of merit. At the same time the orchestra, wherever it goes, gives vital and inspiring delight.

Fresh reports have just come of the pleasure which this Boston group offered at the first of its new season's concerts held last week in New York. The critics rose to an enthusiasm almost electric. "Unsurpassed," said one. Another declared that after the opening B-flat unison of the Haydn symphony which began the program, the orchestra "had only to exhibit the tone of those legendary strings in the singing phrase that followed it, to make us aware that one of the greatest companies of musicians in the world was playing again for our delight. . . . Mr. Koussevitzky and his players were at their irresistible best."

So the band which was the first great symphony orchestra ever established in America holds its place at the top, whether on occasional visits to New York or in regular concerts to the number of sixty in Boston and eight in the city of Cambridge, besides others at distant points. Upon such a record of value, no wonder this institution has gained the support of a distinguished sodality known as "The Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra"! An appeal by this group, announcing the special concert to be given for the society's members on Dec. 3, was issued today from the office of the Friends' chairman, Edward A. Taft, whose selfless effort to sustain Boston's leadership in an artistic work as great in quantity as it stands high in quality, is now being more and more recognized. All who can contribute to the Symphony Orchestra's support should do so, to uphold the happiness of this city's people at home while sustaining Boston's brilliance abroad.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The populous and enthusiastic patrons of the second of this season's Monday evening Symphony concerts were present at an important first performance—that of Leo Sowerby's new concerto, for pianoforte, his second. Joseph Brinkman was pianist. In addition to this premiere, the program contained Mozart's Symphony in C major, No. 34 (K. 338), and the Franck Symphony.

As always, Dr Koussevitzky declined to consider Mozart in terms of "museum music." True, his orchestra is diminished for the occasion, yet he retains a sufficient number to have always at command a rich, healthy volume of tone. By such means—in addition to his particularly felicitous comprehension of this composer—Dr Koussevitzky is enabled to transmit a very human and moving sort of message, where others often find only the decorative and rococo.

Performed as it was last night, and received the same, the Sowerby concerto can definitely be chalked up a success. Like most concertos of the present day, this work of Sowerby's is not definitely divided into the three traditional movements, but, externally at least, takes the form of a symphonic poem with pianoforte. Itself, the music is forthright, sometimes blunt; but it is saved from any suggestion of starkness by a constant tunefulness and—despite the angularity of its melodic form and line—a paradoxical sense of the plastic. By simplest means the composer obtains an exceptionally resonant tone—in no small measure the result of the most expert writing for horns. The slower middle section is vaguely tinged with an atmosphere described in folk music of some sections of our country as "lonesome tunes." And once in a great while one catches an unconscious harking to Messrs Grofe and Gershwin. As pianist, Mr Brinkman's performance was expert. The work at hand was not one to test an artist's ability to express deep and varied emotions and moods. Both conductor and soloist were obviously in most hearty accord with the composer's intentions—the auguring of a spirited and successful performance.

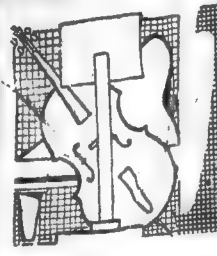
It almost seemed, in the Franck symphony, that the orchestra was not exactly at top form. Many times it appeared that they did not achieve the shadings Dr Koussevitzky desired; and though, in the climaxes, Dr Koussevitzky's exhortations carried their usual fire, the orchestra was not able to produce its magnificent ultimate.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

78.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 20 1936



MUSIC

Mozart Concerto in D Major, K. 218, to be Played by Spalding with Boston Symphony Orchestra. Other Concerts and a Competition

The Mozart violin concerto to be played by Albert Spalding with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday evening is the one in D major K. 218. it was announced last night.

The orchestra will be conducted by Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor. On the program will be a symphony by Basil Sergeivich Kalinnikov, who was a fellow-student in Moscow of Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston orchestra. The third item on the program will be a Bach toccata, in C major, orchestrated by Leo Weiner.

The concerto is one of five for the violin written by Mozart in 1775, when he was 19. It is in Mozart's usual graceful and melodious manner.

The Bach tocatta, one of the best known of his works, contains a brilliant and famous pedal passage in the introduction and an equally remarkable adagio. A melody from it has been arranged for string orchestra by Alexander Siloti, and as a 'cello solo with piano accompaniment by Pablo Casals.

The orchestration by Weiner was arranged in 1927. He revised it, giving it a less sonorous setting, but the original orchestration is the one that will be used Tuesday. It employs tuba, harp, woodwinds in threes, six horns, four trumpets, timpani, strings and three trombones.

Weiner, a Czech, was born in 1885. He attended the Landes Akademie in Budapest, and later joined its faculty.

Kalinnikov was born in 1866 and died in 1901 of tuberculosis. He wrote two symphonies. The first, in G minor, is the one to be played here. It was played by the Boston orchestra in 1921, Pierre Monteux conducting. It is described as a "serene and radiant work, permeated with the joy of living."

Among the works by Kalinnikov are two miniatures for string quartet and doublebass ad libitum, composed in honor of Dr. Koussevitzky.

NEW YORK MIRROR

NOV 22 1936

MUSIC

By JULIAN SEAMAN

BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, yesterday afternoon, Carnegie Hall.

THE PROGRAM.

Symphony in A (No. 29, Koechel 201) .... Mozart
"The Forgotten Sacrifice" ...... Messiaen
(First New York performance)
"Don Juan"—tone poem .... Strauss
Symphony No. 5 in E flat (Opus 82) .... Sibelius

Mr. Koussevitzky gave us some very young music in the first half of his program yesterday afternoon—Mozart at 18; Strauss, the valiant rebel; Messiaen, who is now 28 and one of a prevailing clique—there is always one in any age—clamoring for the "freedom" of music.

M. Messiaen's "Meditation Symphonique" constituted the one novelty of the program. It is difficult to appraise the work after a single hearing. Its three segments have been titled: "The Cross," "The Sin," "The Eucharist." The ardent yet lofty mysticism which surrounds this work, the iridescent, translucent tone color of its orchestral voices, its dispassionate yet mundane tale of renunciation would seem to stamp it at once with the approval of artistic sincerity. But the composer has not been "free" enough to divorce the Debussy-Stravinsky Muse.

And as for "Don Juan," never has this ageless creation had a more brilliant reading. . Granting that the revolts of yesterday become the platitudes of today, the fervors and ecstasies of the young Strauss deserve immortality.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEW YORK JOURNAL

NOV 23 1936

st —

novelty marked the matinee concert Saturday of the Boston Orchestra. It was "The Forgotten Sacrifice," by Olivier Messiaen, one of the four young French composers who have banded themselves together to revive the label made famous by Berlioz, "La jeune France." Sincerity and sound artistic perception are their banner heads.

This work, played exquisitely by the Boston band under Dr. Koussevitzky, proved to be gripping in its religious intensity. The three parts, played without pause, are entitled "The Cross—The Sin—The Eucharist." The composer's own confession of faith is inscribed on the score: "On the tree of the Cross You shed Your blood. We had forgotten it." The slow opening movement can be called nothing less than devout. Then follows the harried desperation of the sin-ridden, and finally the "Eucharist" with its tender measures, is strongly reminiscent of the beginning.

This was one item in a program that called forth resounding approval of the magnificent playing of the Bostonians. The next pair of concerts here will be January 7 and 9.

CONCERTO BY SOWERBY

Brinkman Plays His Second With Symphony

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The vexing question of what the young artist should play was brought forcibly to mind at last evening's concert of the' Boston Symphony Orchestra, the second of the current Monday series. An Iowan pianist, Joseph Brinkman, head of the department of music at Ann Arboor, made his Boston debut as soloist in the first performance anywhere of the Second Concerto of Leo Sowerby. Had Mr. Brinkman, apparently a most capable pianist, played one of the standard concertos, there would be the usual and inevitable comparison of his performance with those of his great predecessors. As it was, the listener's attention was largely centered on the music of Mr. Sowerby. And it is the music, rather than the performance of it that calls for extended comment.

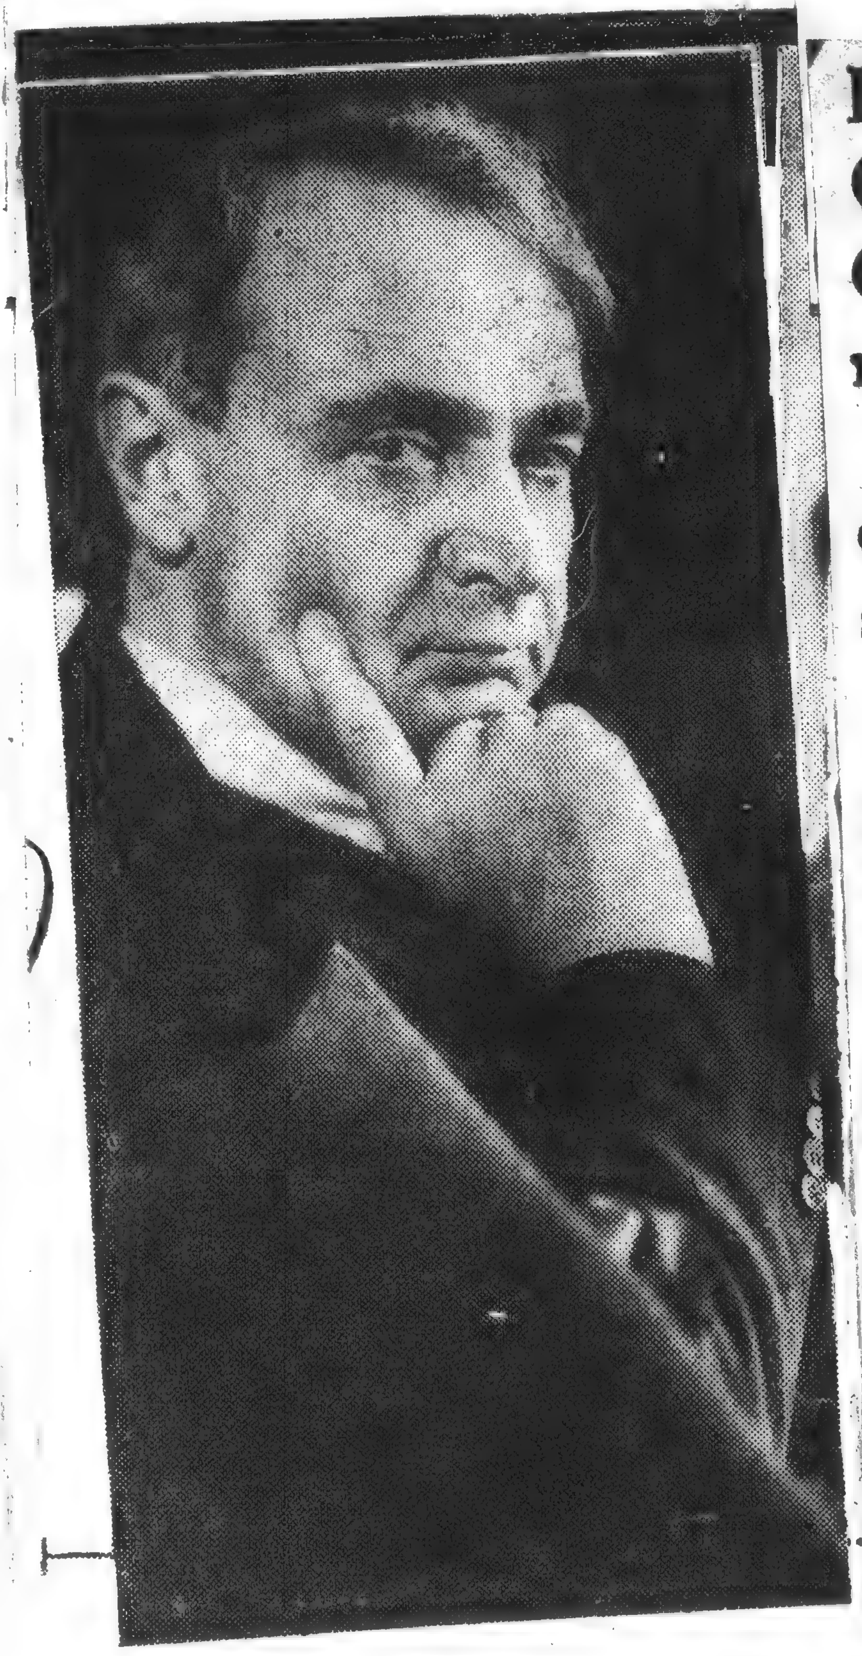
As an American of English and Canadian descent, a native of Michigan, Mr. Sowerby as composer sedulously avoids the influence Teutonic and the influence Gallic. The thematic sources of this concerto, a brief, vigorous and diverting piece, are predominantly Celtic, Gaelic, American Indian and Afro-American. The so-called "Scotch snap," prominent in this work, is in fact characteristic of all the last three idioms.

In the modern fashion, Mr. Sowerby combines three movements in one, using partly the same material in the first and last. These two sections have plenty of "go," though the latter seems to end somewhat prematurely. The middle, slow division, achieves a considerable richness of thought and sound, and without recourse to conventional formulae. It is here that the composer seems to have the most to say. The concerto as a whole, quickly over, was something that one would gladly hear again. Mr. Brinkman, submerging himself in Mr. Sowerby's music, was twice recalled. Less able pianists have been more enthusiastically received when the music they played was known to the audience.

For the rest last night's programme contained pieces that Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra have already given us this season: Mozart's early Symphony in C major and the Symphony of Cesar Franck.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

NOV 22 1936



Eastman School Symphony Orchestra, which will play in Eastman Theater Tuesday, top; Serge Koussevitski, conductor of Boston

---

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1936

+

Boston's Superlative Symphony

Can one stand upon a peak and yet serve the people who dwell on the plain? It is not easy for any institution to achieve eminence. It is harder still, after climbing the pinnacle, to retain hold upon a broad public—to be admired not in a passive way only but also with active appreciation, giving thousands of men and women enjoyment of a living kind, heartfelt not lip-spoken.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra fulfills these two roles so rarely combined. Throughout America, as in Europe, its excellence has become known. Its repute has invaluable power to sustain the name of this city as a center of merit. At the same time the orchestra, wherever it goes, gives vital and inspiring delight.

Fresh reports have just come of the pleasure which this Boston group offered at the first of its new season's concerts held last week in New York. The critics rose to an enthusiasm almost electric. "Unsurpassed," said one. Another declared that after the opening B-flat unison of the Haydn symphony which began the program, the orchestra "had only to exhibit the tone of those legendary strings in the singing phrase that followed it, to make us aware that one of the greatest companies of musicians in the world was playing again for our delight. . . . Mr. Koussevitzky and his players were at their irresistible best."

So the band which was the first great symphony orchestra ever established in America holds its place at the top, whether on occasional visits to New York or in regular concerts to the number of sixty in Boston and eight in the city of Cambridge, besides others at distant points. Upon such a record of value, no wonder this institution has gained the support of a distinguished sodality known as "The Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra"! An appeal by this group, announcing the special concert to be given for the society's members on Dec. 3, was issued today from the office of the Friends' chairman, Edward A. Taft, whose selfless effort to sustain Boston's leadership in an artistic work as great in quantity as it stands high in quality, is now being more and more recognized. All who can contribute to the Symphony Orchestra's support should do so, to uphold the happiness of this city's people at home while sustaining Boston's brilliance abroad.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 22 1936

Koussevitzky Opens Saturday Concert Series

Introduces Composition of Messiaen Here With the Boston Symphony

Offers Work by Mozart

Strauss and Sibelius Also on Afternoon Program

By Francis D. Perkins

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra met their Saturday afternoon subscribers for the first time this season yesterday in Carnegie Hall, where the conductor began his diversified program with an early symphony by Mozart in A major, written in Salzburg when the composer was eighteen, and the first performance here of "Les Offrandes Oubliees," by Olivier Messiaen, one of the four young French composers who style themselves collectively "La Jeune France." The rest of the concert was devoted to familiar works by the two best-known septuagenarians among modern composers, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" and the fifth symphony of Jean Sibelius.

The appearance of "Les Offrandes Oubliées" on the program, five weeks after its first American hearing in Boston, served as a reminder that there is now a generation of French composers junior to that represented by Honegger, Milhour, Poulenc, Auric and the others regarded not so very many years ago as representatives of the latest tendencies in Gallic music. "Les Offrandes" is probably the first major work by a member of this youngest French generation to be made known here. The other three composers of "La Jeune France," Daniel-Lesure, Yves Baudrier and André Jolivet are thus far only names to us, as most of the other composers cited by Gilbert Chase in an article "Some Young French Composers" in the current issue of the London "Musical Times"—Marcel Delannoy, Henry Barraud and Jean Francaix, for instance.

Expresses Catholic Mysticism

Messiaen, who is not quite twenty-eight, studied at the Paris Conservatoire with Marcel Dupre and Paul Dukas, but his aesthetic background, according to Mr. Chase, is that of the Paris Schola Cantorum. "His music," states this writer, "is for the most part impregnated with religious mysticism, based on Catholic theology," and Mr. Burke's program notes quote a similar statement, that the composer "aims primarily to express with the utmost possibility of emotion and sincerity the truths of the Catholic faith."' The verbal description attached to the score and the designations of its three sections, "La Croix," "Le Péché," "L'Eucharistie," and, indeed, the music itself, bear out this description.

"Les Offrandes" was played last June in Paris at the first joint concert of "La Jeune France," but its publication and first performance had taken place five years before. At a first hearing, it impresses as deeply felt, sincere and devoted music, the work of one who has meditated much on the events and mysteries which inspire it. According to Mr. Burk's notes, Florent Schmitt, writing in the Paris "Temps," admitted a frank preference for the section representing sin, but yesterday it seemed that Messiaen's most individual and cogent music was in the first part and the last, with its meditative muted strings. "Le Pèché" was expressed in a more conventional and familiar manner, and without the benefit of program notes, one might have mistaken its theme as a representation of mechanical speed, such as Honegger's "Pacific 231." It is true that it also suited the phrase, "in a race breathless, frantic, without release" in the description in the score, but this points to one of the difficulties involved in program music.

The other sections gave a certain impression of individuality and the harmonic basis of "L'Eucharistе" provided a characteristic flavor, although it would take further hearing of Messiaen's music to tell whether the principles on which his work is said to be based tend to limit its range of color and thereby its ultimate interest.

The Mozart symphony, his twenty-ninth and the 201st item in the Kochel catalogue, has had only one other production here during the last ten or twelve years, by the Philharmonic-Symphony under Mr. Toscanini in November, 1931. It is brief, taking only fifteen minutes to play, but is remarkable for its revelation of an already well-developed musical individuality; the themes and their treatment are essentially Mozartian throughout, and the lyrically serious andante could cause renewed astonishment at the earliness of the flowering of Mozart's genius, although this has long been one of the best-known facts of musical history.

Dr. Koussevitzky and his admirable orchestra were in their best form, and successfully realized the contrasted atmosphere of both these works, while another memorable feature of the concert was the imposing proclamation of the close of the Sibelius symphony.

Gerald Tracy's Recital

Meanwhile Gerald Tracy, a young pianist from Denver who has already played here in 1933 and 1934, was giving his third New York recital at Town Hall with a program that included Bach's toccata in D major and Schubert's sonata, Op. 53, in the same key; Brahms's Handel Variations and Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin."

Mr. Tracy's playing again gave an impression of good technical grounding and ample digital skill and fleetness, with a vigor generally kept well in hand. In the Schubert sonata he often, while not consistently, set forth the romantic expressiveness of many of its measures, but could not prevent it from seeming rather long. The Ravel suite was well executed, with laudable clarity of detail, although the interpreter missed some of the underlying pensiveness of some of its sections, such as the Forlane. He was warmly received by a good-sized audience.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The populous and enthusiastic patrons of the second of this season's Monday evening Symphony concerts were present at an important first performance—that of Leo Sowerby's new concerto, for pianoforte, his second. Joseph Brinkman was pianist. In addition to this premiere, the program contained Mozart's Symphony in C major, No. 34 (K. 338), and the Franck Symphony.

As always, Dr Koussevitzky declined to consider Mozart in terms of "museum music." True, his orchestra is diminished for the occasion, yet he retains a sufficient number to have always at command a rich, healthy volume of tone. By such means—in addition to his particularly felicitous comprehension of this composer—Dr Koussevitzky is enabled to transmit a very human and moving sort of message, where others often find only the decorative and rococo.

Performed as it was last night, and received the same, the Sowerby concerto can definitely be chalked up a success. Like most concertos of the present day, this work of Sowerby's is not definitely divided into the three traditional movements, but, externally at least, takes the form of a symphonic poem with pianoforte. Itself, the music is forthright, sometimes blunt; but it is saved from any suggestion of starkness by a constant tunefulness and—despite the angularity of its melodic form and line—a paradoxical sense of the plastic. By simplest means the composer obtains an exceptionally resonant tone—in no small measure the result of the most expert writing for horns. The slower middle section is vaguely tinged with an atmosphere described in folk music of some sections of our country as "lonesome tunes." And once in a great while one catches an unconscious harking to Messrs Grofe and Gershwin. As pianist, Mr Brinkman's performance was expert. The work at hand was not one to test an artist's ability to express deep and varied emotions and moods. Both conductor and soloist were obviously in most hearty accord with the composer's intentions—the auguring of a spirited and successful performance.

It almost seemed, in the Franck symphony, that the orchestra was not exactly at top form. Many times it appeared that they did not achieve the shadings Dr Koussevitzky desired; and though, in the climaxes, Dr Koussevitzky's exhortations carried their usual fire, the orchestra was not able to produce its magnificent ultimate.

79.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 22 1936

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Povla Frijsh, Danish Soprano, Is Heard at Town Hall—Gerald Tracy in Recital.

By OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, which has never distinguished itself more signally in its New York visits than during the last week, gave its second concert of the Autumn season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The program was unusually interesting. It did not state what previous performances of the Mozart symphony in A major, No. 29, had been given in this city. To the last decade of concert-goers in this city, it is in all probability a novelty, and it is perfectly charming.

The modern novelty of the occasion followed, the first New York performance of "Les Offrandes oubliées," a "méditation symphonique" by one of the young men of France, Olivier Messiaen. This work, in three sections, professes to embody in tones spiritual expression of Catholicism. Far indeed is it from the "méditations religieuses" of other and Massenetisn days.

Then came the tone-poem, still a work of flaming youth, by Richard Strauss—his "Don Juan,"—and the concert ended with the crashing grandeurs of Sibelius's fifth symphony.

Strauss Tone-Poem Thrills

Even today the furious onslaught of the opening measures of Strauss's tone-poem, which is nearly half a century old, takes the listener aback, as later pages can still sweep him from his feet by reason of the consuming sensuousness and intensity of expression. But a hundred times more, if he listens receptively, will he be taken aback by the opening theme of Mozart's adorable symphony. Why is this so? Ask the secret of a perfume or explain the irresistible force of the growing violet! It is transcendent beauty, this music, and also youth. It moves on winged feet, and with a certain divine coquetry. There is no inextricable rhythmic complication, or harmonic novelty about it, but there is the sense of complete and joyous miracle.

In this symphony by the 18-year-old Mozart there are no experimental pages, no hesitation, and, so far as a single hearing proves, no fault whatever of instrumental combinations and balances. If we did not know in advance that an 18-year-old was the creator of it, we might not be prompted to find in the score, as sole evidence of the composer's youth, a certain extreme conciseness, as in the brevities of "codas" at the end of some of the movements. There is not, for example, such amplitude and masterly summation as in the codas of the great G minor and C major symphonies. The young composer, with a plenitude of inspiration, fills the classic mold, and stops, in good time. He could have spoken longer, and might have done so in a later year. But this is speculation, and does not matter anyhow, for the symphony is a glorious flight, and sheer beauty fills the form.

Music Played Memorably

The music would not have fallen on our ears so memorably if it had not been played so well. The singing of the strings in the andante communicated something that is not communicable either in spoken words or cold type. It was flawless, radiant and warm—not a cold classicism, not the pleasing formality of an eighteenth century melodic line, but a pure and ardent youthful song, wonderfully conveyed. There is no need to go on with the chronicle of the symphony, except to say that it does not flag in a single movement, and that the orchestra, in the course of the performance, did not abate by one jot or tittle the distinction of style with which it introduced the opening movement.

And Mr. Koussevitzky accomplished what he did with a finish and economy of baton technic which could serve as a model for any conductor. No one who judges a conductor's qualities by the eye would have had the remotest conception of his remarkable feat.

Oliver Messiaen, born at Avignon in 1908, belongs to a young group of Frenchmen now designated, among musicians, as "La jeune France." Just after the war we had in Paris the scintillant "Six," young composers who proclaimed the wit of Jean Cocteau, the glories of Brazilian jazz and Gounod. In various ways they exalted smartness, elaborate vulgarity and neoclassicism. In the music heard yesterday there is a manifestation of something more earnest and something which aims, at least, at the expression of deeper feeling. Doubtless Mr. Messiaen is acquainted with the music of the late Eric Satie, one time impressionist, later the aide and abettor of the aforesaid "Six," the composer, also, of "Socrate," and, much earlier, of music for ceremonies of Rose Cross.

The melodic line of the music heard yesterday is simple and clear. Catholic mysticism might be found in his opening and closing movements, which are in a devout vein. There is also the suggestion of the Christian primitive in the austerity of the harmonization.

Work is In Three Movements

The three movements are called respectively "The Cross," "The Sin," and "The Eucharist." The energetic middle movement is for this listener the least convincing. The opening theme promises well, but might sound to a matter-of-fact ear as if a good melody had been given the wrong harmonization. In other words, it is a little hard to believe in the naturalness of this harmonic writing. The last movement made the best impression yesterday.

There was a very finished, a brilliant performance of Strauss's music. For this writer it was too finished, not brutal enough, not sufficiently abandoned in its sweep, and with too much top and too little middle and bottom of orchestral tone. This, of course, is largely a matter of taste. Others, and in all probability Mr. Koussevitsky himself, would feel that the vulgarities and excesses of the music gained by such discriminating treatment. The audience responded with vehement applause.

The Sibelius symphony, however, was the balance and climax of the concert, which had begun with Mozart. Here was another kind of a musical form, vast and, at first, apparently inchoate. Then the music accumulates, endlessly, inexorably, and a master's formal intention begins to become evident. The symphony grows from modest beginnings, where the actual material is concerned. The tripping theme of the scherzo movement becomes the basis of a remarkable passacaglia. The murmurings and the rustlings as of wind, the curious calls and other insignia of Sibelius lead finally to those passages of savage splendor which represent one of the greatest pages of modern music. There is dissonance for you! There is the catastrophic clash of line and of harmonic bodies, brought about not merely by the accumulation of sound but by the conflict of powerful and purely musical elements. Here we are near to the sublime. Here Mr. Koussevitzky's performance also reached its climax, in a passage superbly prepared and driven home.

This concert, like Mr. Koussevitzky's concert of last Thursday night, testified equally to the unique excellence of the orchestra and the interpretive powers, which appear constantly greater, of the conductor. No composer and no school of composition seem foreign to his understanding. Classic and ultra-modern composers find in him the intuitive spokesman and propagandist. Only those who study the symphonic repertory with some care can be aware of the distance that lies between Haydn and the Debussy of "La Mer," Mozart and the colossal Sibelius, and the idiom of a young contemporaneous Frenchman. This is not only masterly conducting but supreme music-making.

The dimensions of the audience, the quality of its enthusiasm, bespoke the merits of the occasion.

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

NOV 1 9 1936

Symphony Concert

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will direct the Boston Symphony orchestra from 8:45 to 9:30 o'clock over WJZ-NBC. The concert marks the beginning of its fifth season. The program comes from Carnegie hall, New York, and listeners will hear the Haydn Symphony No. 104 in B Flat Major and Claude Debussy's tone poem, "La Mer."

As New York Critics Regard Our Orchestra

Trans. Nov. 23/36

Remarkable Enthusiasm Greet Musicians and Conductor At Season's Opening

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began its fifty-first New York season in Carnegie Hall last week. These columns carried on Saturday some comment from an informed Bostonian on the greeting of the Manhattan audience to the visiting musicians on Thursday evening. The reviewers for the metropolitan press, who have not been remiss in praise of Dr. Koussevitzky and the Orchestra in recent seasons, outdid themselves on this occasion. Let them speak for themselves:

Prelude

It was a concert to be held long in lively remembrance. There was not a moment when the hearer did not feel glad that Boston was sufficiently close to New York to permit of regular visits from this group of virtuosi led by a conductor of authority, enthusiasm and understanding.

One sometimes is lost in wonder at the glory of the tone of the Boston orchestra, so rich, so lucent, so filled with delicate qualities and withal so virile and forthright. And with the tone go finish, precision, unanimity and infinite elasticity. It is a great orchestra and is greatly directed. (W. J. Henderson in the Sun.)

Occasion

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season is always an exhilarating occasion for musical New Yorkers. There are the memories of eventful years, reaching backward through Monteux, Muck, Paur, Gericke, Nikisch, and the rest—memories of salient musical personalities, and of a virtuoso orchestra, dazzling, suave, electric, with an attack like the crack of a whip and a string-tone that incited connoisseurs and critics to the desperate invention of extravagant metaphors.

There are, too, those lively expectations aroused by the present attainments of a great and successful organization: a brilliant band of players, equal to the delivery of any score; a wide-visioned, fertile-minded leader, a master of discipline and effect, planning wisely and adventurously his policies and programs, searching the past, the present, and the future for his material.

There is, finally, the audience, in itself a joyous and heartening spectacle; for it is one of the choicest gatherings of musical cognoscenti to be found in this or any other town.

Thus there was ozone in the atmosphere last night, and warm expectancy, and the excitement of recognition and renewal. Mr. Koussevitzky was greeted as an old and tried friend of whom much was expected—and received. As for the necromantic orchestra, it had only to sound the opening B-flat unison of the Haydn Symphony which began the program, had only to exhibit the tone of those legendary strings in the singing phrase that followed it, to make us aware that one of the greatest company of musicians in the world was playing again for our delight. (Lawrence Gilman in the Herald Tribune.)

Haydn

There have been few orchestral performances in this town so nearly approaching utter perfection as that of the Haydn symphony last evening. Not a detail was slurred, not a minor nuance neglected, not a single fragment of episodic character obscured, yet all was knit firmly into a strong and satisfying whole. The exquisitely poetic treatment of the broad introduction, the polished delivery of the slow movement, the impressiveness of Haydn's sudden modulations and exclamatory outbursts—which must have disturbed the sedate music lovers of London in 1795—and the scintillant finale, all were played with extraordinary smoothness and finesse. (Mr. Henderson.)

Debussy

Carnegie Hall audiences know this music well. They have become acquainted with its mysterious beauty under the best possible auspices. It is one of Toscanini's chef-d'oeuvres. The statement is self-explanatory, yet one is moved to say that last night we heard a new and marvelously evocative conception of the music, one not more full-blooded or effective in the exterior sense, but more glamorous and imaginative, more subtle and poetical in coloring, and of the two the most intimately related to the composer's thought.

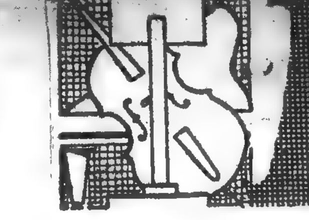
Koussevitzky's realization of the music is rich beyond description in marvel of detail, so that each measure seemed least night a masterpiece, an instant expected but awaited with a certain suspense. The deep chorale chanted in the orchestra toward the close of the opening movement was as the predestined fulfillment of some drama, mysterious and mighty beyond words. Always there were ebb and flow, whispers and clamors, of the elements, and a rhythm as fluctuating as the tides. Nothing was fixed, rhythms dissolved into rhythms, colors into colors, and yet there was a grand form.

It would be only fitting to mention the technical retails of an incomparable orchestral performance, in which every player was a virtuoso, but the collective effect can only be mentioned here.

There was the proud sweep, the sensuous call, and the wild coursing of the white-maned steeds of the sea. The climax, long and masterfully held in reserve, was breathtaking, and the audience relieved its excitement in crashing applause. It may be possible for another conductor and another orchestra, sometime, somewhere, to equal this revelation of Debussy's tone-poem, but it is gravely to be doubted. The audience last night in Carnegie Hall heard one of the greatest summits of instrumental interpretation of which the present day is capable. (Olin Downes in the Times.)

Beethoven and Finale

Beethoven's Fifth symphony brought the concert to an end, when the sonority of the orchestra became as powerful and massive as it had been opalescent, and the eternal verities uttered by the greatest hero in music struck fire from those, who listened and those who played. There was an immense audience, a packed house, salvos for orchestra and conductor, no more than just recognition of their deeds. (Mr. Downes.)



MUSIC

Enthusiastic Audience Greets Richard Burgin Conducting Boston Symphony Orchestra, With Albert Spalding as Soloist

Nov. 25/36

By G. Y. Loveridge

A different figure on the podium, an eminent violinist and an unfamiliar symphonic work spiced the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in the Metropolitan Theatre. The large audience gave vigorous approval.

Richard Burgin, concert master and assistant conductor, led the orchestra, instead of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The soloist was Albert Spalding, famed American.

The rather brief program sailed along briskly, with Mozart and Kallinikoff to catch the fancy and Bach for ballast.

Mr. Burgin, who has conducted here at least once before, we believe, showed himself a capable leader. He has a pleasant, unassuming air, and is nergetic to the point of violence. Where Dr. Koussevitzky is suave, Mr. Burgin is happily pugnacious. It was an interesting contrast.

* * *

Mr. Burgin opened the program with a hearty reading of the Bach toccata and fugue in C major for organ, orchestrated by Leo Weiner. The first section had clouded moments, although in general it was put forth clearly and forcibly. In the adagio, woodwind voices, with harp and other strings, produced an exquisite effect of lofty contemplation. There was, now and again, an angularity in the broad outline of this section, but the pervading sense of exaltation and majestic calm was well sustained.

It was in the fugue, we thought, that Mr. Burgin was most effective. Although a fugue may be felt to make an appeal more mathematical than emotional, this one has life and gusto. The subject ends with a snap like a line of skaters "cracking the whip," and the whole fugue bounds and tumbles. Mr. Burgin attacked it forcefully, bringing splendid sonority from the strings and brilliance from the brass. It was impossible to find here the Bach of popular misconception, cold, pedantic, hardly human. Everything danced and stamped.

The audience recalled Mr. Burgin several times. At his insistence, the whole orchestra took a bow.

* * *

Mr. Spalding performed a Mozart concerto in D major, K. 218. He is a man of graceful carriage, with smooth black hair parted somewhat left of centre. He stood reflectively while the orchestra reduced to 18th century court orchestra size, voiced the long introduction. He took a white handkerchief from his breast pocket and unobtrusively rubbed the frog of the bow and the neck of the Stradivarius, giving one the uneasy feeling that he wouldn't come in on time.

But of course he did, and the audience was quickly treated to an exhibition of virtuosity such as has not been heard or seen hereabouts for a long time. He played clearly and restrainedly, producing a tone of great beauty. Throughout he was the serious and masterly musician. The concerto abounds with chances for display—difficult bowing, harmonics, rapid passages, double-stops embellished with trills—and Mr. Spalding made the most of them. Nowhere did he exaggerate. The cadenza in the allegro was performed with such brilliance that the audience broke in at the end of the movement to applaud, and in this they were joined by the orchestra.

The songful andante cantabile showed the full beauty of tone of which the fine instrument was capable, and the rondo brought the concerto to a gay, delightful close.

Mr. Spalding was summoned to the stage half a dozen times by insistent applause. When some members of the orchestra arose for intermission somewhat too soon, they were promptly applauded back into their seats again, while Mr. Spalding was summoned forth for renewed approval.

* * *

After intermission, the Kalinnikoff Symphony No. 1 in G minor was heard through the customary haze of tobacco smoke.

The symphony was written by a man who was a fellow-student with Dr. Koussevitzky in Moscow almost 40 years ago. Although he died young, of tuberculosis, the symphony exhibits no premonitory despondency. It is melodious, and also frequently monotonous. There are curious echoes in it, of Saint-Saens and Wagner and others, so that every now and then one has the impression he has heard it before.

The movements are: Allegro moderato, andante commodamente; scherzo, allegro non troppoe troppo, and finale, allegro moderato, allegro risoluto. The finale was played with all the spirit Mr. Burgin could give it. That was a good deal, and it made a rousing finish for a stimulating evening.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

* * *

One art and its practitioners have led to inspiration for another in a recent publication for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Charcoal drawings by Jerome Brush of the members of the orchestra, each portrait accompanied by a brief and piquant biographical notice, have been gathered together in a volume put out by the Merrymount Press, 712 Beacon Street, Boston. The book sells for $1.50.

LYNN, MASS.
ITEM

NOV 1 9 19

Radio Waves

The Boston Symphony Orchestra inaugurates its fifth season of broadcasts exclusively over NBC networks tonight. This program will be heard through WBZ from 8.45 to 9.30 o'clock, broadcast from New York, where the Symphony Orchestra will be playing the first of its annual subscription series of New York concerts. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct.

80.

Trans. Nov 25/36

Second Sound of a Pair of Symphonies

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Richard Burgin at its regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts of this week, will open the program with the great Organ Toccata in C-major of Bach in Leo Weiner's orchestration. The program continues with two symphonies, both of which will receive their second pair of performances in Boston. The Kalinnikov Symphony in G-minor was heard under Monteux, and Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler," under Richard Burgin only two seasons ago. The same program is also to be played in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, tomorrow evening.

The music of Hindemith is in three sections, each one illustrating a panel of Matthias Grunewald's famous Isenheim Altar. The movements bear the titles, "Concert of Angels," "The Entombment," and "Temptation of Saint Anthony."

When Basil Sergeivich Kalinnikov journed to Moscow to study music, he found himself a fellow student of a young man named Koussevitzky. Unfortunately for the composer, however symptoms of consumption appeared, and most of his creative work had to be done under the shadow of the dread disease, which finally completed its work when he was but thirty-five years of age, in 1901. But the symphony, completed only four years before his death, is not the music of a sick or a discouraged man: It is alive with an intense vigor and a rich joy of life.

The opening movement begins at once with the first theme, which is the principal subject of the whole work. It is in the Dorian mode, of a character unmistakably Slavic, and has an answering phrase of a thorough chromaticism not unexpected in those post-Franckian days. A long, rich second theme of ambiguous tonality is heard from horns and lower strings. There is much development and a fresh recapitulation in which the second theme shows its firm tonal nature by staying in G-minor. It has already appeared in the distant key of F-sharp minor in the exposition.

The Andante is brief. There is a theme for English horn against an evanescent whisper of harp and strings, a dramatic climax and a return to the music of the first pages. Similarly the Scherzo; but it is gay, alive, energetic. The trio is as Russian in its quiet song as is the main section in its dancing colors, its stamping boots.

Like Franck and Taneliev, both familiar to Kalinnikov, the composer has built his Finale of material from the earlier movements. Thus it commences with the main subject of the first part and reaches its great climax with the English horn theme from the slow movement. There is a new subject with a folk-dance-like refrain, which later serves as a contrepoint to the great concluding slow movement theme. G. H. L. S.

Tr. [illegible] /36

Programs in Prospect

Dr. Koussevitsky has made a change in the program for the Friday afternoon and Saturday night symphony concerts of this week. In place of the promised excerpts from the third act of "Die Meistersinger" the orchestra will play the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried." The rest of the program will remain the same.

Next week the Orchestra will give no concerts in Boston, since it will undertake a long tour that will take it successively to Rochester, Buffalo, Detroit, Ann Harbor, Toledo and Pittsburgh. The program for the week-end concerts of the following week (Dec. 18 and 19) will consist of Arthur Foote's Suite in E major, MacDowell's Second Piano Concerto and the Brahms Symphony in F major. Howard Goding, the well-liked Boston pianist, will be the soloist in the concerto of MacDowell, whose seventy-fifth birthday anniversary falls on Dec. 18.

The program for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on Thursday evening, Dec. 17, will be the same, with the exception that Tchaikovsky's Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," will be substituted for the suite by Foote.

MUSIC

Am Nov 28

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The seventh regular concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Bach
Organ Toccata in C major (orchestrated by Leo Weiner) Hindemith..Symphony, "Mathis der Maler" Kalinnikov.. Symphony No. 1 in G minor

When the definitive history of music since the war is written we may prophesy that the "Mathis der Maler" symphony and the third and fourth symphonies of Albert Roussel will take an important place in the discussion of orchestral music. It is not that they blaze new paths or mark the climax of a special trend, but that they sum up with consummate technical skill the musical thought of our time. Of course there are those who argue that the musical thought of our time is negligible, a statement with which we violently disagree. There is not much reason to bring Roussel's name into this review, except to help advance a theoretical opinion. The use of two names (even of composers who are dissimilar) serves to define an argument.

Hindemith in this symphony has refined his art; he is no longer the exuberant spinner of dissonant counterpoint. Mr. Ernest Newman firmly believes that he has merely shown himself in his true colors, those of the academic German musician. But this would only be a fair statement in the best sense of the word academic. If it applied to the composer's contrapuntal skill, to his adroit calculation of dynamic effects, we should have no quarrel with the criticism. Obviously Mr. Newman did not so intend his remarks.

Yet the poignant simplicity of the slow movement, "The Entombment," the marvellous interplay of voices in the last part of "The Angelic Concert" and the masterly opening of the last movement are hardly the work of a mere academic. The titles of the paintings are useful to set the mood of each movement, but they would not justify the assumption that Hindemith was a composer of program music in the sense that Strauss is one. To us this is a profoundly moving and beautiful work of musical art. That it is also ingenious is an additional pleasure to be derived. We admired it when Mr. Burgin conducted it two years ago. Yesterday, after an excellent performance by the orchestra again under Mr. Burgin, we admired it still more.

If the Hindemith symphony has a program, but is not really program music, the Kalinnikov symphony provides the exact converse of this proposition. It is a straightforward work, remarkable for its lyrical feeling. At times it has a folk-song character, although the composer did not lack for invention in the development sections. Philip Hale was astonished in his review of the first Boston performance of this symphony that it had not been performed before. Certainly it should not be neglected; but too frequent performances might easily cause its charms to fade. At the rate of one every 15 years we shall probably be saved the fate of feeling obliged to write unkindly of it!

The symphonic public is not likely to be in the habit of attending organ recitals, so that Bach's great works for that instrument will not be heard by it at all unless in some orchestral arrangement. This should be excuse enough, for it cannot be denied by the purists that such works as this C major Toccata or the G minor fantasy and fugue are extraordinarily effective when scored for a full orchestra.

Mr. Burgin conducted the orchestra with the main eye on fidelity to the composer's intentions. It is always a pleasure to have him lead the Boston Symphony, since he knows its qualities so intimately. Moreover he has a way of presenting us with a stimulating program such as that of yesterday. He will conduct the same program this evening. Next week Dr. Koussevitzky will return to his post in a program consisting of a concerto grosso of Handel, a symphony of Clementi (revised by Casella) and three selections from Wagner.

Her. MUSIC

[illegible] 1/36

MONDAY SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the second concert of the Monday evening series last night in Symphony hall. Joseph Brinkman pianist, was soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony in C major, No. 34......Mozart
Concerto for piano and orchestra, No. 2, in F major ....Sowerby
Symphony in D minor ....Franck

The second piano concerto by the American composer, Leo Sowerby was performed last night for the first time anywhere. It is an interesting work, but probably not one of great importance. A mood of exuberance, established in the opening measures, promised to provide refreshing entertainment. This exuberance was, unfortunately, carried too far, and induced a monotony of rhythm which was suggestive of jazz dance music. Mr. Sowerby does not seem to have a great deal of originality, either melodic or harmonic. The rather aimless recitative by the clarinet in the slow section is distinctly reminiscent of Negro melodies, and Mr. Sowerby's use of the modal and pentatonic scales suggests an atmosphere of folk-lore or Scottish popular songs. On the whole, the work appears to be a gallimaufry, made up of elements from all over the world. It is impossible to form an accurate judgment of Mr. Brinkmann's playing from his performance last night. There were long passages where the piano seemed completely inaudible but this may have been the composer's intention, on the pretence that the piano was to supply harmonic color as a background.

From the point of view of interpretation the most beautiful playing of the evening occurred in the slow movement of the Mozart Symphony. The balance and precision of the strings (accompanied only by the bassoons) were surely perfect; the phrasing and subtle nuances of the exquisite melody were unforgettable. The tempi of the first and last movements of this symphony, however, were questionable. An exceedingly fast tempo produces an effect of brilliance, but it does so at the expense of the melodic detail, which is inevitably rendered indistinct. This was particularly noticeable last night in the first movement, where the Lombard figures, so characteristic of the "Style galant" of the period were transformed into grace notes. The performance of the Franck symphony was eloquent and exciting. The long lines of the music were preserved without neglect of the exquisite detail. Mr. Speyer's English horn solo lent an expressive sadness to the pensive character of the allegretto. P. C. A.

CONCERTO BY SOWERBY

Brinkman Plays His Second With Symphony

Post Dec 1

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The vexing question of what the young artist should play was brought forcibly to mind at last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the second of the current Monday series. An Iowan pianist, Joseph Brinkman, head of the department of music at Ann Arboor, made his Boston debut as soloist in the first performance anywhere of the Second Concerto of Leo Sowerby. Had Mr. Brinkman, apparently a most capable pianist, played one of the standard concertos, there would be the usual and inevitable comparison of his performance with those of his great predecessors. As it was, the listener's attention was largely centered on the music of Mr. Sowerby. And it is the music, rather than the performance of it that calls for extended comment.

As an American of English and Canadian descent, a native of Michigan, Mr. Sowerby as composer sedulously avoids the influence Teutonic and the influence Gallic. The thematic sources of this concerto, a brief, vigorous and diverting piece, are predominantly Celtic, Gaelic, American Indian and Afro-American. The so-called "Scotch snap," prominent in this work, is in fact characteristic of all the last three idioms.

In the modern fashion, Mr. Sowerby combines three movements in one, using partly the same material in the first and last. These two sections have plenty of "go," though the latter seems to end somewhat prematurely. The middle, slow division, achieves a considerable richness of thought and sound, and without recourse to conventional formulae. It is here that the composer seems to have the most to say. The concerto as a whole, quickly over, was something that one would gladly hear again. Mr. Brinkman, submerging himself in Mr. Sowerby's music, was twice recalled. Less able pianists have been more enthusiastically received when the music they played was known to the audience.

For the rest last night's programme contained pieces that Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra have already given us this season: Mozart's early Symphony in C major and the Symphony of Cesar Franck.

GAZETTE

Columbus

NOV 18 1936

WMAL at 8:45 p. m.:

The Boston Symphony under Dr. Serge ~~Koussevitzky~~ will give the first air performance of its regular 1936-37 season from the stage of Carnegie Hall in New York. The Orchestra will continue its broadcasts throughout the season, and with the return of this group to the air, radio will present to its listeners all of the major orchestras from New York to California. The Orchestra will offer Haydn's Symphony No. 104 in B Flat Major and a portion of Debussy's suite, "La Mer."

Globe MUSIC

Nov. 28/36

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Richard Burgin, concert-master and assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this week makes his annual appearance as conductor of a pair of concerts in the "regular" series. Dr Koussevitzky's now long-established custom of relinquishing the stand to Mr Burgin once a season has yielded various benefits. In the first place, it provides a brief respite for the Boston Symphony's intensely hard-working leader. Secondly, a number of interesting programs have been assembled by Mr Burgin, several of them bringing forth unusual novelties; last, and far from least important, these appearances have given Mr Burgin opportunity to demonstrate his own considerable gifts as a symphonic conductor.

Yesterday afternoon, in a program demanding the utmost in technical command and interpretive perception, Mr Burgin surpassed himself. The music by which this was accomplished consisted of a transcription by Leo Weiner, a Hungarian musician, of Bach's Organ Toccata in C major; the instrumental excerpts assembled under the title "Symphony" from the opera "Matthias the Painter," by Paul Hindemith, and the First Symphony of a long dead and little known composer of the late 19th century, Basil Sergeivich Kalinnikov.

The orchestra played at its best for Mr Burgin, who, in turn, showed plainly that his ability has increased during but a year. Weiner's transcription, for example, is transparent of texture though grandiosely and solidly written. A careless conductor, however, could easily have permitted this texture to become cloudy. As it was, strings, wood and brass were mingled and contrasted with superb clarity. What is more, Mr Burgin's reading brought out the showiness of Weiner's glitter added to the original brilliance of Bach.

This transcription ought to supply but little fuel to the arguments of thoughtful persons either favorably disposed of antipathetic to making-over Bach for orchestra. Weiner was justified in stressing force and the large dimensions of a work which represents the virtuoso organist, and not the spiritual Bach. The weakest points of the transcription are the recurrent quasiorgan effects, which may or may not have been deliberate.

One of the most notable pieces introduced to Boston by Mr Burgin is Hindemith's music inspired by the three paintings of Matthias Gruenewald for the altar at Isenheim, in Alsace. The so-called "Symphony" was first heard here Dec 7, 1934, and at that time created a remarkable impression. After two years, the more enduring of the three sections seems to be the last, on the temptation of St Anthony. "Angelic Concert" and "Entombment," especially the former, now appear to this reviewer to suffer from dryness.

"The Temptation of St Anthony," on the other hand, is more vital in spirit, and though Hindemith sought only to re-create the emotion aroused in him by the pictures, and not to write "program" music, one cannot escape the feeling that in the mingling of ancient melody with the dissonant contrapuntal methods of today, Hindemuth really depicts the grotesque of Gruenewald's painting. From a purely musical point of view, this section offers more variety of instrumentation and substance.

How regrettable that Kalinnikov died of tuberculosis just two days short of his 35th birthday! His first Symphony, in G minor, is a work of great promise, revealing that its creator had gone far in mastering the orchestra, that he possessed a budding individuality in melody and harmonization. Echoes of Tchaikovsky, perhaps of Taneiev, are forgotten in the warmth and high spirits of Kalinnikov's half revealed originality. It is remarkable, too, that a man dying from a dread disease should be able to put away the melancholy which must have fallen upon him, and write music full of strength.

In spite of Kalinnikov's talent, the First Symphony is typical of some Russian musical minds, of Taneiev and Rimski-Korsakov, for example, neither of whom could be impugned on grounds of crudity or dullness or melodic poverty. But somehow, like those two, Kalinnikov seems to have existed upon the surface; his music penetrates no deeper than one's waistcoat buttons. A matter of taste, no doubt, in which one may express a personal dislike without questioning the pleasure the work brings to others. C. W. D.

BURGIN AT HELM WITH SYMPHONY

Post Nov. 28/36

Well Selected List of Pieces Given Hearing

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

This week the Symphony Orchestra plays under the direction of its concertmaster and assistant conductor, Richard Burgin, and as always when that is the case, the programme is one which does not encroach upon Dr. Koussevitzky's territory. Thus we heard yesterday a semi-novelty, a piece introduced here by Mr. Burgin two years ago, and a resurrection from the days of Mr. Monteux.

BACH'S TOCCATA IN C

Bach's Toccata in C major, one of the most brilliant of his compositions for the organ, was played in its original form during the Bach-Handel Festival at Symphony Hall in the spring of 1935. It was heard yesterday in an orchestral transcription by the Hungarian, Leo Weiner. Hindemith's "Matthis der Mahler" has now been twice heard, both times from Mr. Burgin, and the remaining item on a generally interesting list was the First Symphony of Basil Kalinnikov, which enjoyed a single performance here in 1921.

To be sure, there has been a subsequent performance in Boston of Kalinnikov's Symphony at the hands of the People's Symphony orchestra, but many in yesterday's audience must have been hearing it for the first time. The piece is one which anyone might like, and over which no one is likely to get excited.

Lyrical and Rhythmical

A composer of talent and of promise who died in 1901 at the age of 35, Kalinnikov is now known chiefly by the piece which first brought him fame. Neither obviously derivative nor strongly individual, the symphony abounds in attractive themes of either a Slavic or a near-Eastern cast. In its lyric flow, its transparent orchestration and rhythmic impetus, the symphony recalls Schubert.

Yesterday Mr. Burgin gave full play to all these elements. In particular the last movement, in which themes from the first and second are recalled, was good fun.

A Superb Transcription

Those who object on principle to orchestral transcriptions of organ works will probably have none of Mr. Weiner's present effort, but even they must admit that he has accomplished his task respectfully. There is no parade of incongruous orchestral effects. There is often a clear simulation of the organ tone. Only the extreme purist would object to the harp octaves which serve as bass for the beautiful melody of the oboe in the second division. Such is the native splendor of the Toccata itself, with its exuberant introduction and its exhilirating final fugue, that in any medium it would be a joy to hear.

As he did later with the Symphony of Kalinnikov, Mr. Burgin gave the music the momentum which it requires.

Hindemith's Work

And so to Hindemith's orchestral reflections on the altar-piece of Matthias Gruenewald, which has been called "the most imposing single monument of German painting." The first and second movements, "The Angelic Concert" and "Entombment" capture not a little of the painter's emotion. There is here in Hindemith's music a flavor both mystical and medieval, although what he has accomplished is no mere reconstruction of an earlier medium. In "The Temptation of St. Anthony," which might be more convincing if it were briefer, the music measurably misses both the viciousness of the saint's tormentors and the elate ecstasy of his triumph.

The brass chorale at the end is impressive, but it lacks the proper lift. Nor can we shift the burden from the shoulders of Hindemith to those of Mr. Burgin, who seemingly interpreted the music with complete sympathy.

NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y.
STANDARD-STAR

NOV 19 1936

Boston Symphony Orchestra Returns To Air Waves Tonight

Famous Musical Organization To Broadcast Program Over WJZ at 8:45 o'Clock From Carnegie Hall—Cordell Hull To Speak

Another of radio's outstanding features returns to the air tonight when the world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra inaugurates its fifth season of broadcasts.

This program, to be heard over WJZ from 8:45 to 9:30 o'clock, will be broadcast from Carnegie Hall in New York where the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be playing the first of its annual subscription series of New York concerts.

81

What's Going On in the Arts

Christian Science Monitor

"Lady Precious Stream"

Last evening, at the Plymouth Theater, Morris Gest first presented "Lady Precious Stream" to a Boston audience as the second subscription play of the Theater Guild and American Theater Society season. This play needs small introduction, since it is one of the current season's Broadway successes and is nearing its 800th performance in London. Lacking quite definitely the virility and authenticity of a performance by Mei Lan-Fang, it still offers a real experience to the playgoer.

What, after all, has changed with the passing of more than 2000 years? So long has this story, by word of mouth, been handed down the years; yet to us it is as modern in its universal appeal as the latest gangster play—even more so. True, Dr. Hsiung, noted Chinese poet and playwright who has transcribed this ancient romance, has made certain concessions to our astonished eyes and ears. He permits us an Honorable Reader in impeccable evening clothes, who explains the happenings on the stage; who leads on our faltering understanding to furnish the traditional, stylized Chinese stage which is as empty of scenery as was the Elizabethan; who prepares us for the steppings over imaginary door-sills and the wrappings on nonexistent doors; who explains that, when a property man hands the hero a tasselled whip, we may know he is on horseback.

Yet no middleman is actually required to make intelligible to us the familiar story of the youngest daughter of the Prime Minister who insists upon marrying the gardener-poet, is abandoned by him in her poverty, and finally reclaimed when her adventurer-husband has become king of the fabulous western regions. Even 66 generations ago maids were faithful, brothers-in-law envious. and pompous, important ministers of state were ruled utterly by their wives. Hence we know this play, which might be found a trifle insipid, if it were not for the exquisite subtleties of the humor which moves always just beneath the surface.

Clarence Derwent, who plays the old Prime Minister, is excellent in his now testy, now affectionate regard for his favorite daughter; William Hutchison, as the gardener, Hsieh Ping-Kuei, furnishes good support; and Constance Carpenter, as Lady Precious Stream, is all grace and delicacy in the restraint of her portrayal. The other members of the cast were satisfactory, particularly perhaps the two property men. The eminent Chinese actor, Mei Lan-Fang, created, designed and executed the brilliantly beautiful costumes.

M. W.

Monday Symphony Concert

Patrons of the Monday series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts were fortunate in the program selected for performance last night in Symphony hall. Opening with the Mozart Symphony No. 34 in C major (K. 338) Dr. Koussevitzky proceeded to offer a new work in a first performance—the Pianoforte Concerto No. 2 in E major by Leo Sowerby, with Joseph Brinkman, pianist, making his initial bow to a Boston Symphony audience as soloist. The concert closed with Franck's Symphony.

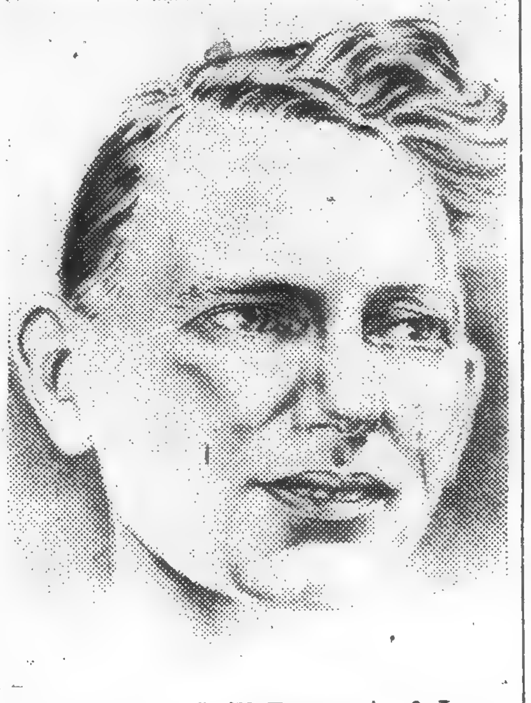
The Mozart symphony was heard in the regular Friday-Saturday series in early November, and the Franck symphony came to a hearing in this same series a fortnight or so ago.

The Sowerby concerto proved such in name but not in letter, if the listener demanded of it regularity in structure and development. It is written in one continuous movement, rather clearly outlined in three sections, with connecting interludes. Taking cognizance of the thematic material, the listener might with reason consider it a sort of musical frieze, painted in terms of modern rhythm and accented with more or less piquant harmonies. It would be simple to evolve a program for the work, but not at all necessary; it stands on its own very evident rhythmic feet. The opening measures are lively, with the thematic material somewhat angular in outline.

A central section is in more contemplative mood. The work ends in another exuberant outburst of tone. It is a continuation of the old-fashioned rag-time music, glorified, but it is not jazz as we of today interpret that term. It is entertaining, almost conversational music, but as a vehicle for displaying the talent of Mr. Brinkman it was rather a loss. We felt that the pianist deserved a better opportunity than that vouchsafed him by Mr. Sowerby, for Mr. Brinkman has a crisp technique and is evidently a man who does not spare himself in the preparation of a work. He justly won the several recalls demanded by the applausive audience.

G. M. S.

Artist-Virtuoso



Drawing by Will Rapport of Jean Bedetti, Who Is Giving a Cello Recital This Evening in Jordan Hall

Boston Stage Notes

Continuing productions on Boston stages are "Dead End," in its second week at the Colonial; "New Faces," in its final week at the Shubert, and "It Can't Happen Here," at the Repertory.

"Blossom Time," the operetta with Schubert's music, will return to the Shubert next Monday for a two-weeks engagement.

On the same evening, the San Carlo company opens with "Carmen" a week of opera at the Boston Opera House.

Next week at the Repertory, the Federal Theater will present a comedy, "Life's a Villain," by Frederick Hughes.

PAINTINGS AT SYMPHONY TO BE SHOWN THIS WEEK

A selection of paintings by the great English and Dutch masters, loaned by Alvan T. Fuller, will be shown at Symphony Hall during the concerts this week. They include master works by Van Dyck, Rembrandt, Reynolds, Gainsborough, Romney, Hoppner and Turner.

The paintings will be seen first by the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at their annual meeting which will take place at the hall this afternoon at 4, admission by card.

At this meeting there will be addresses by Jerome D. Greene, director of the Harvard tercentenary celebration. There will be music by the orchestra, under Dr Serge Koussevitzky. Tea will be served in the foyer.

At the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dr Koussevitzky will give the first American performances of a symphony of Muzio Clementi, the celebrated contemporary of Beethoven. The symphony, with three others, was recently discovered after having disappeared at his death 100 years ago. There will also be played Handel's Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 6; the three Wagnerian excerpts—"A Siegfried Idyl," "Forest Murmurs," and the Overture to "Tannhauser."

Globe Dec 3

READ THE

Symphony Concert

Monitor – Dec. 1/36

Joseph Brinkman Soloist in First Performance of Leo Sowerby's Second Piano Concerto

With none of the flourish that usually precedes the presentation of a contemporary American's new composition at a symphony concert, and with, indeed, an excessively modest notice in advance, Leo Sowerby's Second Piano Concerto in E major was given its first performance by Joseph Brinkman and the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at Symphony Hall last evening. "Excessively modest," because Mr. Sowerby is an honored and important name among American composers.

The concerto that we heard last night is not an important composition; that was immediately evident. But it is a pleasant one for which the composer need make no apologies in any company except that vanguard of the sophisticates who have forgotten the pleasures of reminiscence. For Sowerby's music is nothing if not reminiscent and nostalgic. It is even reminiscent in the less favorable sense: after the composer has given the bassoon its head with a tune that was our old friend "Pretty Baby" if it was anything, he called on the clarinet and accompanying instruments to give us their "impressions" of Respighi's "Pines of Rome."

Yet there seemed, somehow, nothing dishonest about the whole procedure. Sowerby writes here from the heart (which is still unfashionable) and he writes tunes that can be whistled (which is almost more unfashionable). But he manages to present a fairly individual face on the music. In the slow section—after the Respighian beginnings—you begin to be sure that you are listening to Rachmaninov; but then the composer catches up with you and convinces you that nobody but an American could have written this music.

The concerto is in a single movement, subdivided into a fast section a slow and another fast. The piano is treated principally as an instrument of song. It must have been treated more brilliantly by the composer, though, than it sounded last night, for Mr. Brinkman, who turned out to be a most musical pianist seemed also to be an excessively delicate one. The fault may have been in Mr. Sowerby's orchestration, or in the accompaniment under Dr. Koussevitzky, but I do not think either was the case. The orchestral portion seemed, in fact, to be reproduced with admirable conviction as well as clarity by the musicians under Dr. Koussevitzky's lead.

Returning after a week's vacation, the conductor resumed where he had left off. That is to say, it was an evening of superb orchestral playing. The opening number was the Mozart Symphony in C major (K. 338) and the closing one was Cesar Franck's Symphony—both of which had been heard at earlier week-end concerts of the orchestra this season. The playing of the strings in the slow movement was caressingly and captivatingly beautiful. The phrases were finely polished, the Mozartean sentiment was aristocratically reproduced. Never has the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky played Mozart more happily. The last movement was a little too fast, and, more important, a little too nervous; but here, too, it was possible to admire the unanimity and precision and lightness of the instruments.

The presentation of the first movement of the Symphony by Franck indicated no essential change from that given earlier in the season. Either Franck is hopelessly out of date and an over-rated composer to boot, or Dr. Koussevitzky's approach to the Symphony does not do it justice.

M. S.

Trav. Friends of the Symphony Dec 1/36

Two years young and two thousand strong, the association of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is on a revolutionary mission.

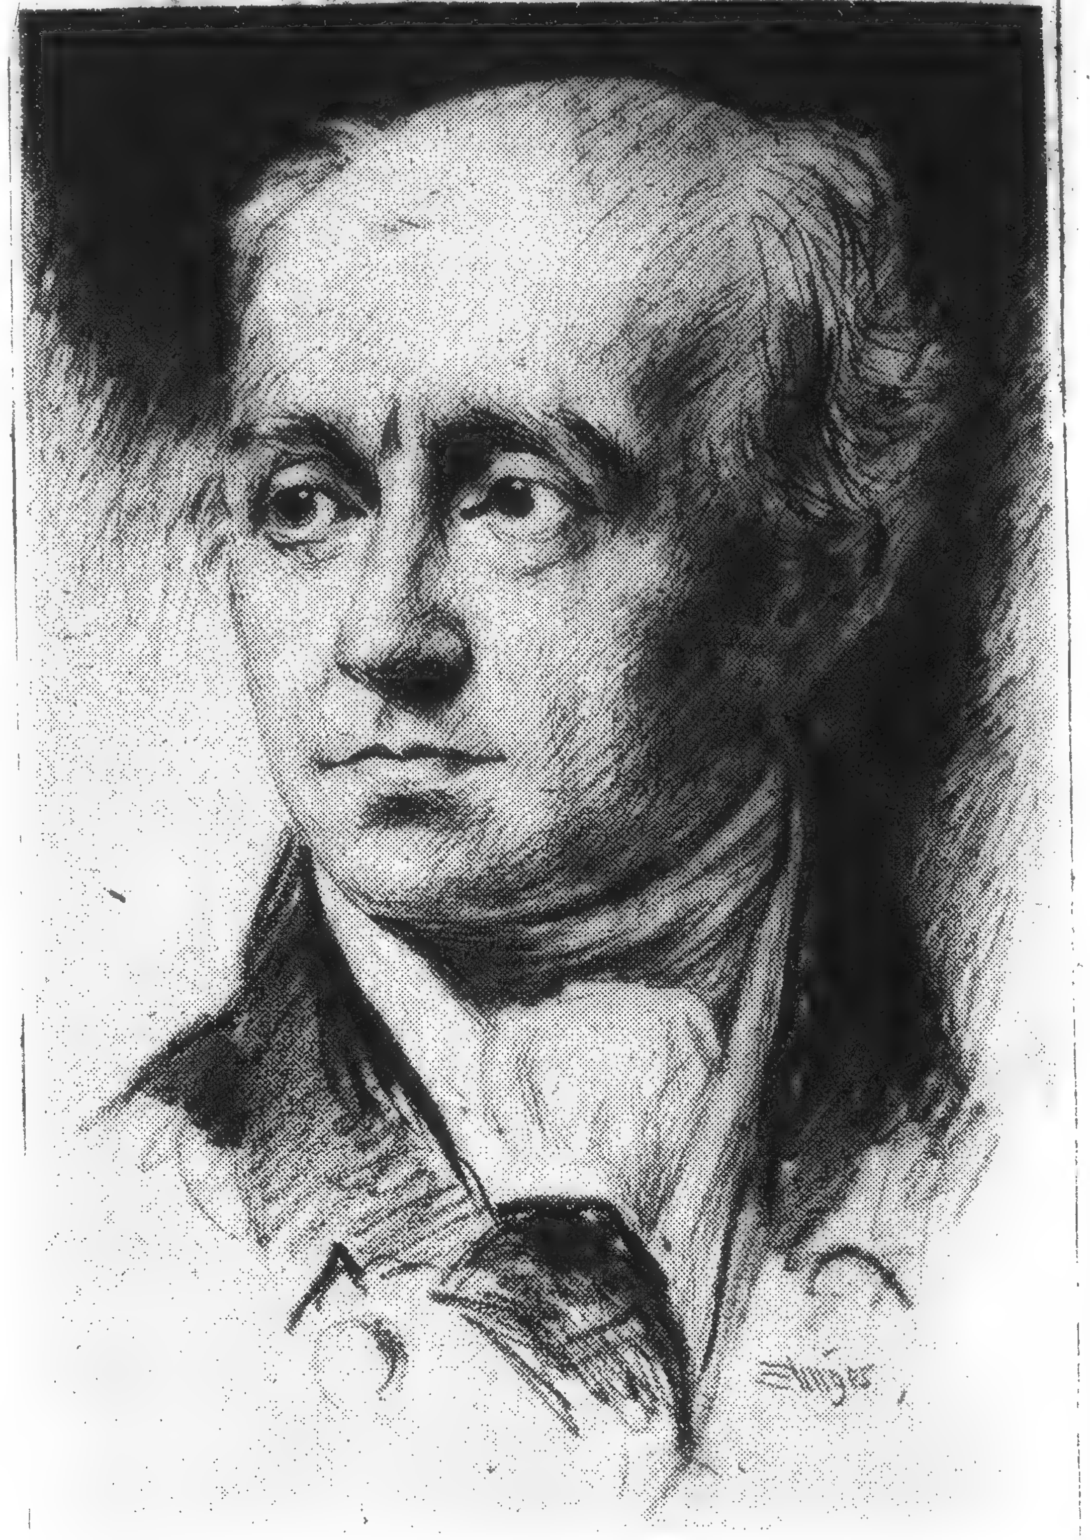
Its purpose is to strengthen by broadening the financial base of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Heretofore, a limited number of patrons kept the books balanced. Now we find that the Symphony's "friends," in growing numbers, are insistent upon shouldering some of the responsibility.

This is as it should be. The orchestra is of Boston and every person with a live interest in extending its successes is eligible as a "friend."

It isn't a question of "how much," for the size of the membership fee is left to the discretion of the individual. Few will forego the privilege and honor of being enrolled among the Friends of the Symphony.

Dec. 2/36

Master



By a Staff Artist

Muzio Clementi

Boston Symphony Rehearses Long-Lost Clementi Work

There is an air of climactic excitement in Symphony Hall.

Behind the great reddish curtain which separates the dim auditorium from the brightly lit stage, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky lashed his players with a thousand strokes of the baton.

For a new symphonic work is being rehearsed for the first time. A new symphonic composer has been discovered.

Now crouching beside his music stand, now half sitting on the stool-like conductor's chair, now standing tense and with arms outspread, calling for redounding climaxes, Dr. Koussevitzky interrupts his players at frequent intervals.

Play It Beautifully

"Dolce, dolcissimo," he pleads. "It is beautiful music, gentlemen. Play it beautifully. . ."

And following a mellifluous string passage.

"Non, non. It is too cold. . . . Give me the warm Italian sunshine, gentlemen." As he speaks, the inflections of his voice caress the music like the warm sun of which he speaks.

The orchestra arrives at a delicate duet passage for flute and oboe, Another halt. The background is obscuring the melody.

"As soft and fine as possible," whispers the conductor, displaying in a graceful movement of the hands the very fineness he wishes. "It must sound . . . Everything must sound."

Later still, a rapid movement fleets through the violin section.

"No, no. You are late." Using his baton to bow an imaginary violin, he asks for quicker shorter movements.

So for Two Hours

This goes on for nearly two hours. The three great shafts of light on the other side of the red curtain have moved many feet, throwing glints of light across the backs of the empty seats. Like immobile sentinels they stand. One almost expects them to be roused somehow by the excitement of the music.

Finally the break comes. With a few parting instructions, the maestro retires to his dressing room.

There, he expresses in words the intensity and enthusiasm which he has been displaying for the "new" work by a composer who wrote his last symphony more than 100 years ago.

He is Muzio Clementi, an Italian of the latter eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, whose 20 symphonies have been completely forgotten, while he is known today chiefly for his "Gradus ad Parnassum," a series of piano exercises.

Goes Into Repertoire

"You liked it?" asks Dr. Koussevitzky. "Yes, it is marvelous—and very difficult to perform, too," he remarks, and then, by way of explanation, "Well, you saw how we worked."

The distinguished conductor, who looked so tall on the stand, is rather a small man close to. But the stature of his enthusiasm, of his intensity, is undiminished. His eyes shine as he talks of the music.

"Clementi, yes, he was a master. . . . The symphony will certainly go into our repertoire and I shall try to discover some more of his works."

Dr. Koussevitzky explained further that between the eighteenth century and the post-war period there were no great Italian composers of absolute music.

Clementi an Exception

Clementi—ranked by contemporary critics with Mozart, Hayden, Beethoven—was the sole exception. But his works disappeared. Editors in those days were careless. And people became more interested in Clementi's piano exercises than in his symphonic works.

Asked whether the return to composers of an earlier period indicated a dearth of new contemporary material, Dr. Koussevitzky shrugged his shoulders.

"It is a poor time of creation," he said. "We are not in a period of creative activity. Everything lasting seems to have been done."

And then returning to Clementi he remarked, "Yes, this man had great talents. And Casella, who arranged the work, is a master."

To be exact, Alfredo Casella is not only a master composer, but his detective exploits in rediscovering Clementi sound like something out of a first-class detective yarn.

Something of a Mystery

Clementi himself was a mystery. Hailed by critics of his day as a composer of symphonies, he left not one orchestral manuscript. In 1817, he was reported to be working on six master symphonies which were to be his crowning glory. These also disappeared.

Just 100 years later, a batch of Clementi manuscripts from the estate of Dr. William H. Cummings, the English musicologist, were sold to the Library of Congress in Washington. And in 1934, Casella went to Washington, found four symphonies with incomplete first movements. He went over 1000 pages of manuscripts, revisions and final drafts.

One of the symphonies (in D major) he found to be complete except for the beginning of the first allegro and its introduction. Eagerly he went through the manuscripts again, but failed to find anything.

Found in British Museum

At last it occurred to him that the British Museum had an introduction and fragment of an allegro acquired in 1871 and catalogued under the classification, "Sketch."

Taking photostats of the Washington manuscripts to the British Museum, he found that his hopeful expectation was fulfilled—that the British Museum manuscripts had been mislabeled and that they were the missing initial sections of the second symphony.

And this is the Symphony, which after 100 years' obscurity, will be given its first performance by an American orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Masi
A Exhibitio

By Richard ing this we the Symph been fortun the occasion to the conc seasons. Fo which can o his program collection o when they c sical fare, sorted.

This wee the present matinee per peated, of c emplifies bo three numbe phony, "Mat lating music
cata in C ma
ly in the or terously over brilliant but orchestration core is almos end the conc Symphony in innikov, hea under Monte casual first at yesterday justification tal remains longed a re

The Hinde
est quickly to the perfo an afternoon
tral playing.
of the quite the Orchestr each succes beginning of because Bo reasonably a summary
There was hand, that a for the qua longed to Mr throughout authority, plasticity qu
he has prev
the podium.
of the Bach beginning m of its gorge clarity, a lit matter of yield readily matter, whe
in question.
The Kalin
a show-piec
Weiner tran one admired cision of th balance wit and among the prevail orchestra t ness (never the melody) speaks the here, too, home.

As to the that Hinde opera, it ma in the impre
the listene about Thurs

Stok
For Sympho

Musi

Masterful Performance of A Program Poorly Assorted

Trans. Nov. 28/36

Exhibition of Orchestral Virtuosity; Richard Burgin Appears as Conductor

By Moses Smith

Richard Burgin, who is conducting this week's Boston concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, has not been fortunate in his programs on the occasions of his infrequent trips to the conductor's stand in recent seasons. For one reason or another, which can only puzzle the bystander, his programs have tended to be a collection of hand-me-downs; or, when they consist of more solid musical fare, they tend to be ill-assorted.

This week's program, heard by the present writer at yesterday's matinee performance and to be repeated, of course, this evening, exemplifies both tendencies. Of the three numbers the Hindemith Symphony, "Mathis der Maler," is stimulating music. The Bach Organ Toccata in C major is, of course, masterly in the original, but it is preposterously over-dressed in Leo Weiner's brilliant but curiously characterless orchestration; the intrinsic musical core is almost totally submerged. To end the concert there is the revived Symphony in G minor by Basil Kalinnikov, heard here previously only under Monteux fifteen years ago. A casual first acquaintance, formed at yesterday's concert, offered little justification for disinterring the mortal remains after so quiet and prolonged a rest.

* * *

The Hindemith aside, one's interest quickly shifted from the music to the performance, because it was an afternoon of magnificent orchestral playing. It was a continuation of the quite incredible progress which the Orchestra has been making at each successive concert from the beginning of the season. Incredible, because Bostonians had already reasonably believed their orchestra a summary of perfections.

There was no doubt, on the other hand, that a fair share of the credit for the quality of the playing belonged to Mr. Burgin, who conducted throughout the program with an authority, relative ease and even plasticity quite surpassing anything he has previously exhibited here on the podium. For some, the playing of the Bach-Weiner music at the beginning may have seemed, in spite of its gorgeous color and wonderful clarity, a little stiff. But that was a matter of style. And some of us yield readily to Mr. Burgin in this matter, when the music of Bach is in question.

The Kalinnikov Symphony is not a show-piece for orchestra, as is the Weiner transcription. But even here, one admired the unanimity and precision of the attacks, the wonderful balance within the separate choirs and among them collectively, and the prevailing tunefulness in the orchestra to match the melodiousness (never mind the substance of the melody) of the score. The music speaks the Russian language; and here, too, Mr. Burgin was quite at home.

* * *

As to the playing of the Symphony that Hindemith drew out of his opera, it may perhaps be summarized in the impression the music made on the listener. The reviewer writing about Thursday night's performance in these columns, seemed on the basis of yesterday's repetition quite justified in referring to "Mathis der Maler" as one of the outstanding orchestral works of our time. It was also easy to agree with him as to the strength and, in a measure the weakness, of the score.

The second movement, "Entombment," is certainly the most unified in mood and content. The first movement, "Angelic Concert," has the typical Hindemith development—largely contrapuntal. If the music-making seemed too repetitive for the previous reviewer, perhaps he failed to take sufficiently into account the eventually theatrical basis of the music (which is not to say that the music is itself theatrical in the bad sense). Hindemith, according to his German apologist, is concerned in each of the three movements principally with mood. And the first movement is in this case successful, though not as much as the second.

The third movement, "The Temptation of Saint Anthony," is least integrated, but it has the best and most powerful matter. Indeed, the opening theme—twelve-tone in construction, by the way—is one of the most arresting passages in the contemporary music that this writer has been privileged to hear. The breadth and boldness—to quote from our German friend—of this subject and of much of its treatment place Hindemith among the great masters of tone. One's arrival at this conclusion, as already suggested, was made more easy by the clarity and vigor and precision of the orchestral playing under Mr. Burgin's understanding direction.

* * *

That same direction, combined with the virtuoso orchestra, could bring out the wonderful clarity that Weiner maintains in his scoring even at moments when all the instruments are sounding thunderously. But they could not justify the field-day that was being made out of the music of the poor, dead, defenseless Leipzig cantor. The only justification for Weiner's treatment would be his own originality. That is what justifies the Schonberg transcriptions. But there is no individuality in Weiner's approach; only knowledge and skill.

Nor could Mr. Burgin and the men at his disposal make the Kalinnikov Symphony convincing. It is not only that the music is ridiculously old-fashioned—which might almost be enough reason for damning it. It is that this music could never have been in good fashion. The harmonic cliches, the obvious and unerringly expected sequences, the feeble counterpoint are bad enough in their way, even worse is the undistinguished and almost infantile thematic material that threatens at any moment to degenerate into the Rubinsteinisms of "Kammenoi Ostrow." This impression is strengthened rather than weakened by the composer's pet technical devices—the ostinato bass, the single and double pedal points, the figures repeated ad nauseam (as in the sickly tremolo that persists in the violins through the slow movement). It begins to sound like a talented child improvising at the keyboard.

Stokowski's Boys Play Hot For Whiteman at Academy

Symphony Lovers Jam the House—and Like the Music While Jazz King Makes Orchestra History; 24 of Own Players Join Show.

By EDWIN H. SCHLOSS

Paul Whiteman made history in the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon with a hey-nonny-nonny, a hot-cha-cha, four bagpipers, 24 of his own band and the entire personnel of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The famous dance maestro has conducted Dr. Stokowski's boys before. But that was in the shirt-sleeved informality of Robin Hood Dell.

A 36-Year Record.

Yesterday afternoon, for the first time, the King of Jazz hunched his shoulders and wiggled his torso before an audience of regular Friday afternoon orchestra subscribers—reputedly one of the most patrician, highbrow musical congregations in the world.

Also yesterday was the first time in the orchestra's 36 years at Broad and Locust that the academy's historic old procenium arch swung for an entire afternoon to music hot and sweet, blue and scarlet—the gay and lusty products of Tin Pan Alley and the derivatives thereof.

Audience Loves It.

The house was jammed, with the usual Friday matinee preponderance of debs, sub-debs, post-debs and matrons in furs and orchids. Apparently few of Dr. Stowowski's clients had sent substitutes for the unwonted ordeal-by-jazz. The distaff side of Rittenhouse Square, Chestnut Hill and the Main Line was there in force. And they loved it.

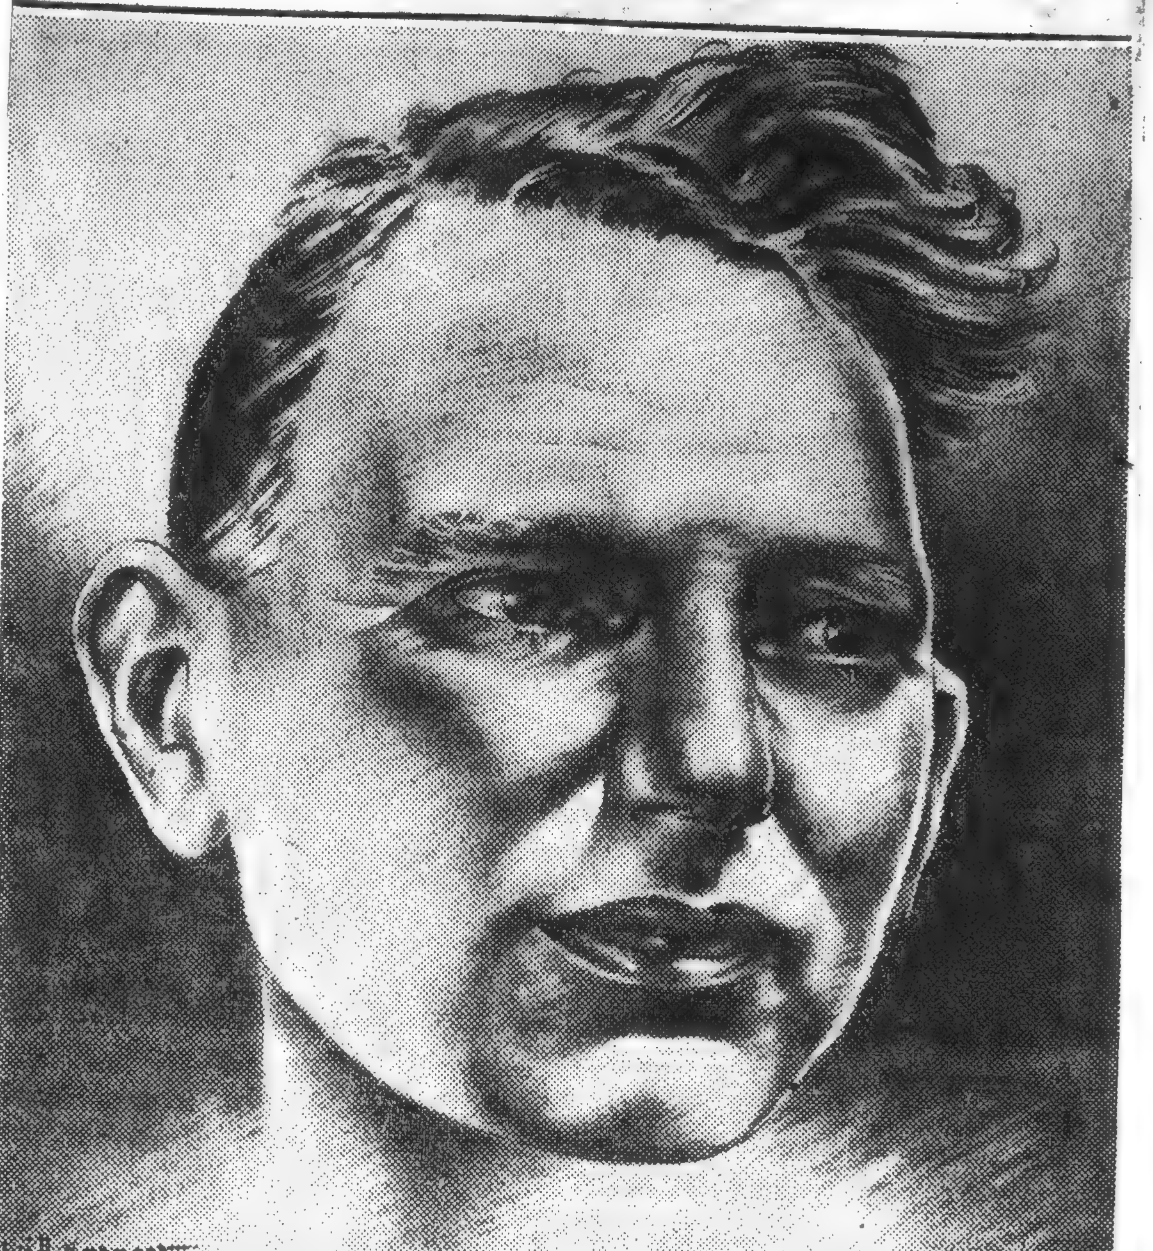
Nobody swooned, of course. But the gay excitement on the stage communicated itself to the audience, most of whom were there, as Deems Taylor said, on a "cultural vacation."

And then of course there were hard-shell symphonists present who listened with fingers crossed. But even they wore smiles of amused indulgence on their faces.

Promptly at the bell, Whiteman emerged from the wings swinging his famous yard-long baton and

Continued on Page 6, Column 6.

Lyrical Warmths



JEAN BEDETTI
First 'Cellist of the Symphony Orchestra, in Recital at Jordan Hall on Tuesday Evening.

WHITEMAN MAKES ACADEMY RESOUND BY JAZZ SYMPHONY

Philadelphia – Nov. 28/3

Tradition of Staid Olc Place Is Shattered by His "Tonal Artillery"

They ranged from a combination of tone poem and song recital in which a train announcer calls his cars and gets shot for his pains, to broad "kidding" of the "William Tell" Overture, and the music of Bach, and from a brand-new Scottish suite by an Englishman named Deutsch—who is the Whiteman chief orchestral arranger, introduc-

---

Stokowski's Boys Make Hot Music

Continued From First Page.

By EDWIN H. SCHLOSS

made his dapper way to the podium, bowing acknowledgements en route.

For the occasion the maestro had tricked himself out in a snappy ensemble of dark afternoon coat, gray pleated trousers, white spats and a white carnation, which made him, as one deb expressed it, "look just like he sounds."

Raising his arms and rolling his shoulders, the season's sole guest conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra lost no time in plunging into a program of generous length. It included the best features of a night club olio and an experimental laboratory for modern American music of the symphonic-jazz school.

In a Semi-Circle.

The Philadelphia Orchestra was arrayed in special alignment which permitted the 24 strings, plectrum, brass and wood-winds of the Whiteman ensemble to sit in a semi-circle facing their leader.

Taylor, noted American composer, writer, radio commentator and musical wit was on hand to supply "verbal program notes" between numbers. Rightly gauging the spirit of the occasion, Taylor attempted no propaganda for jazz as the basis of great American music.

He told his audience to relax and enjoy thmeselves and gently but pungently kidded the whole show to the amusement of orchestra, leader, audience and Manager Alfred Reginald Allen who hovered in the background all afternoon with a golden smile that wouldn't come off.

A Hot Harpist.

A Taylor nifty: "We are having verbal program notes today because most of Mr. Whiteman's followers can't read."

Though Whiteman himself was, of course, the center of the afternoon, the occasion presented three soloists—Casper Reardon, "world's premiere hot harpist"; Roy Bargy, pianist, and Ray Middleton, baritone soloist.

Middleton gave a fine vocal and dramatic performance of Roger and Hart's "All Points West," a clever tragi-comic musical monologue about a train starter.

"St. Louis Blues," Too.

Reardon played an arrangement of Handy's "St. Louis Blues" for solo harp and orchestra, exhibiting a brilliant technique creditable to Carlos Salzedo, his teacher at the local Curtis Institute in pre-jazz days.

Bargy ended the program with an admirable solo performance of Gershwin's jazz classic, "Rhapsody in Blue."

In the less terpsichorean part of the afternoon Grofe's symphonic sketch "Tabloid" proved most amusing, far outshining the earnest but rather dull "Ebon Chronicle," by the American Negro composer, William Grant Still.

Yesterday's audience was entertained most by Van Phillip's "Thank You, Mr. Bach," and the Scottish suite of Adolph Deutsch which brought four kilted pipers to the stage in full regalia; was most enchanted by Deutsch's arrangements of classical and popular waltzes, and chuckled most at the Rossini-Berry "William Tell Overture, 1937 Model."

Yesterday's concert will be repeated tonight in the Academy as the orchestra's regular Saturday evening event and also at the Hippodrome in New York next Tuesday evening for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund and Williams College.

The Whiteman Day.

The program follows:

Rainger ....La Bomba
(Orchestration by Allan Small)
Rossini-Berry—
William Tell Overture 1937 Model
(Arranged by Russell Case)
Jerome Kern..Waltz in Swingtime
(Arranged by Adolph Deutsche)
Still ....Ebon Chronicle
(First performance)
Phillip ......Thank You, Mr. Bach
Handy............. St. Louis Blues
(Harp Solo—Casper Reardon)
Rodgers and Hart..All Points West
(Orchestral arrangement by Adolph Deutsch. First performance.)
Deutsch . . . Scottish Suite for Orchestra and Bagpipes
(First performance)
Grofe ....Tabloid
An Essay on Waltzes . . . Selections from Beethoven, Strauss, Gounod, Delibes, Tschaikovsky, Chopin, Lehar, etc.
(Arranged by Adolph Deutsch)
Gershwin........Rhapsody in Blue
(Roy Bargy, piano soloist)

---

is now an old story here and requires no comment at this time, though it must have dumbfounded some regular symphonic subscribers. The concert began with Rainger's "La Bomba," a "hot" dance related to the rhumba. Then followed the Rossini-Berry satire on "William Tell," jazzed up to date, and Kern's "Waltz in Swingtime." Van Phillips' "Thank You, Mister Bach," shows that classic master as a father of swingtime. Other numbers were Handy's "St. Louis Blues," the original of all "blues," with "hot" harp solo by Casper Reardon; an extensive "Essay on Waltzes," from Beethoven down to today, and the familiar Gershwin "Rhapsody in Blue," with the piano part played by Roy Bargy.

Mon Tr 82.

NOVEMBER 28, 1936

What's

Mr. Burgin Leads the Symphony

Richard Burgin, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made yesterday afternoon his fall appearance on the podium. For program of this pair of concerts he had selected the Bach Organ Toccata in C major, orchestrated by Leo Weiner; Hindemith's "Symphony," entitled "Mathis der Maler," and the First Symphony, in G minor, of B. S. Kalinnikoff. The first of these compositions is having this week its first performances by the orchestra. The second was introduced to us by Mr. Burgin two years ago. The third was revived by him after it had lain on the shelf for 15 years.

Thus Mr. Burgin cannot be accused of giving us hackneyed works. Nor can he be charged with seeking for easy effects—so far at least as the first half of his program was concerned, for it was replete with contrapuntal austerities. Mr. Weiner's Bach is well and faithfully transcribed, but on the literal side, with not much illumination. A second hearing of Hindemith's so-called "symphony," consisting of three excerpts from his opera, "Mathis der Maler," did not substantially modify the first impression. It still strikes this listener as the music of one who knows his way about but has not been blessed with inspiration.

The Kalinnikoff Symphony is a simple composition, regular in form and filled with melodic charm and rhythmic vigor and Russian atmosphere of the old school. No doubt it sounded particularly naïve after the sophistication of Hindemith. It is music easy to enjoy, and this is probably its weakness. Its charms, we suspect, would not wear very well. Once in fifteen years is perhaps as often as it should be heard.

Mr. Burgin conducted with authority and the orchestra played with its usual virtuosity. The audience greeted the assistant conductor cordially and rewarded his performance of the Kalinnikoff symphony conductor.

Post Nov 29

We who attend the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra must content ourselves for the most part with legitimate symphonic music. The Philadelphians are in no such circumscribed case. To be sure Eugene Ormandy, now the regular conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, offers his listeners programmes such as those to which we are accustomed. But from time to time Mr. Stokowski, whose "resignation" is to be taken in a Pickwickian sense, appears at the Academy of Music and proffers, in addition to a few routine orchestral numbers, his own operatic arrangements, his transcriptions of everything from an organ fugue of Bach to a song of Tchaikovsky, his discoveries among contemporary Russian and American composers otherwise unknown, and his impromptu speeches. And at the concerts of the week just past, the Philadelphians heard a concert conducted by Paul Whiteman in which his own orchestra was combined with the Philadelphian band and in which the programme included much straight jazz and much jazzing of standard compositions, together with Ferdie Grofe's "Tabloid" and Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," all quite in the manner of the concerts which Mr. Whiteman once gave in Symphony Hall when jazz was by way of being taken seriously by the cognoscenti. On top of it all, Deems Taylor offered oral programme notes. Yes, we of Boston miss a great deal!

* * * *

The Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to meet in Symphony Hall on Thursday afternoon of this week at 4 o'clock to hear a short programme of music from Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, to hear Mr. Jerome D. Greene, director of the Harvard tercentenary celebration, speak briefly on the contribution made by the orchestra to that event, and then to adjourn to the upper foyer where Dr. Koussevitzky and the trustees of the orchestra will receive, tea will be served and paintings from the collection of the Hon. Alvan T. Fuller will be on view. Mr. Taft, the chairman of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, suggests that members should remind their friends who have not yet joined the society that prompt enrollment will enable them to be present at this occasion on Dec. 3.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
Nov. ITEM 26/36

The Boston Symphony's second broadcast of the season will begin over NBC-WSMB at 7 p. m. Richard Burgin, assistant conductor, will be in charge. The program will open with a Bach composition, "Toccato in C Major," and the second and concluding number will be Kalinnikov's "Symphony No. 1 in G Minor."

Masterful Performance of A Program Poorly Assorted

Trans. Nov. 28/36

Exhibition of Orchestral Virtuosity; Richard Burgin Appears as Conductor

By Moses Smith

Richard Burgin, who is conducting this week's Boston concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, has not been fortunate in his programs on the occasions of his infrequent trips to the conductor's stand in recent seasons. For one reason or another, which can only puzzle the bystander, his programs have tended to be a collection of hand-me-downs; or, when they consist of more solid musical fare, they tend to be ill-assorted.

This week's program, heard by the present writer at yesterday's matinee performance and to be repeated, of course, this evening, exemplifies both tendencies. Of the three numbers the Hindemith Symphony, "Mathis der Maler," is stimulating music. The Bach Organ Toccata in C major is, of course, masterly in the original, but it is preposterously over-dressed in Leo Weiner's brilliant but curiously characterless orchestration; the intrinsic musical core is almost totally submerged. To end the concert there is the revived Symphony in G minor by Basil Kalinnikov, heard here previously only under Monteux fifteen years ago. A casual first acquaintance, formed at yesterday's concert, offered little justification for disinterring the mortal remains after so quiet and prolonged a rest.

* * *

The Hindemith aside, one's interest quickly shifted from the music to the performance, because it was an afternoon of magnificent orchestral playing. It was a continuation of the quite incredible progress which the Orchestra has been making at each successive concert from the beginning of the season. Incredible, because Bostonians had already reasonably believed their orchestra a summary of perfections.

There was no doubt, on the other hand, that a fair share of the credit for the quality of the playing belonged to Mr. Burgin, who conducted throughout the program with an authority, relative ease and even plasticity quite surpassing anything he has previously exhibited here on the podium. For some, the playing of the Bach-Weiner music at the beginning may have seemed, in spite of its gorgeous color and wonderful clarity, a little stiff. But that was a matter of style. And some of us yield readily to Mr. Burgin in this matter, when the music of Bach is in question.

The Kalinnikov Symphony is not a show-piece for orchestra, as is the Weiner transcription. But even here, one admired the unanimity and precision of the attacks, the wonderful balance within the separate choirs and among them collectively, and the prevailing tunefulness in the orchestra to match the melodiousness (never mind the substance of the melody) of the score. The music speaks the Russian language; and here, too, Mr. Burgin was quite at home.

* * *

As to the playing of the Symphony that Hindemith drew out of his opera, it may perhaps be summarized in the impression the music made on the listener. The reviewer writing about Thursday night's performance in these columns, seemed on the basis of yesterday's repetition quite justified in referring to "Mathis der Maler" as one of the outstanding orchestral works of our time. It was also easy to agree with him as to the strength and, in a measure the weakness, of the score.

The second movement, "Entombment," is certainly the most unified in mood and content. The first movement, "Angelic Concert," has the typical Hindemith development—largely contrapuntal. If the music-making seemed too repetitive for the previous reviewer, perhaps he failed to take sufficiently into account the eventually theatrical basis of the music (which is not to say that the music is itself theatrical in the bad sense). Hindemith, according to his German apologist, is concerned in each of the three movements principally with mood. And the first movement is in this case successful, though not as much as the second.

The third movement, "The Temptation of Saint Anthony," is least integrated, but it has the best and most powerful matter. Indeed, the opening theme—twelve-tone in construction, by the way—is one of the most arresting passages in the contemporary music that this writer has been privileged to hear. The breadth and boldness—to quote from our German friend—of this subject and of much of its treatment place Hindemith among the great masters of tone. One's arrival at this conclusion, as already suggested, was made more easy by the clarity and vigor and precision of the orchestral playing under Mr. Burgin's understanding direction.

* * *

That same direction, combined with the virtuoso orchestra, could bring out the wonderful clarity that Weiner maintains in his scoring even at moments when all the instruments are sounding thunderously. But they could not justify the field-day that was being made out of the music of the poor, dead, defenseless Leipzig cantor. The only justification for Weiner's treatment would be his own originality. That is what justifies the Schonberg transcriptions. But there is no individuality in Weiner's approach; only knowledge and skill.

Nor could Mr. Burgin and the men at his disposal make the Kalinnikov Symphony convincing. It is not only that the music is ridiculously old-fashioned—which might almost be enough reason for damning it. It is that this music could never have been in good fashion. The harmonic cliches, the obvious and unerringly expected sequences, the feeble counterpoint are bad enough in their way, even worse is the undistinguished and almost infantile thematic material that threatens at any moment to degenerate into the Rubinsteinisms of "Kammenoi Ostrow." This impression is strengthened rather than weakened by the composer's pet technical devices—the ostinato bass, the single and double pedal points, the figures repeated ad nauseam (as in the sickly tremolo that persists in the violins through the slow movement). It begins to sound like a talented child improvising at the keyboard.

Stokowski's Boys Play Hot For Whiteman at Academy

Symphony Lovers Jam the House—and Like the Music While Jazz King Makes Orchestra History; 24 of Own Players Join Show.

By EDWIN H. SCHLOSS

Paul Whiteman made history in the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon with a hey-nonny-nonny, a hot-cha-cha, four bagpipers, 24 of his own band and the entire personnel of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The famous dance maestro has conducted Dr. Stokowski's boys before. But that was in the shirt-sleeved informality of Robin Hood Dell.

A 36-Year Record.

Yesterday afternoon, for the first time, the King of Jazz hunched his shoulders and wiggled his torso before an audience of regular Friday afternoon orchestra subscribers—reputedly one of the most patrician, highbrow musical congregations in the world.

Also yesterday was the first time in the orchestra's 36 years at Broad and Locust that the academy's historic old procenium arch swung for an entire afternoon to music hot and sweet, blue and scarlet—the gay and lusty products of Tin Pan Alley and the derivatives thereof.

Audience Loves It.

The house was jammed, with the usual Friday matinee preponderance of debs, sub-debs, post-debs and matrons in furs and orchids. Apparently few of Dr. Stowowski's clients had sent substitutes for the unwonted ordeal-by-jazz. The distaff side of Rittenhouse Square, Chestnut Hill and the Main Line was there in force. And they loved it.

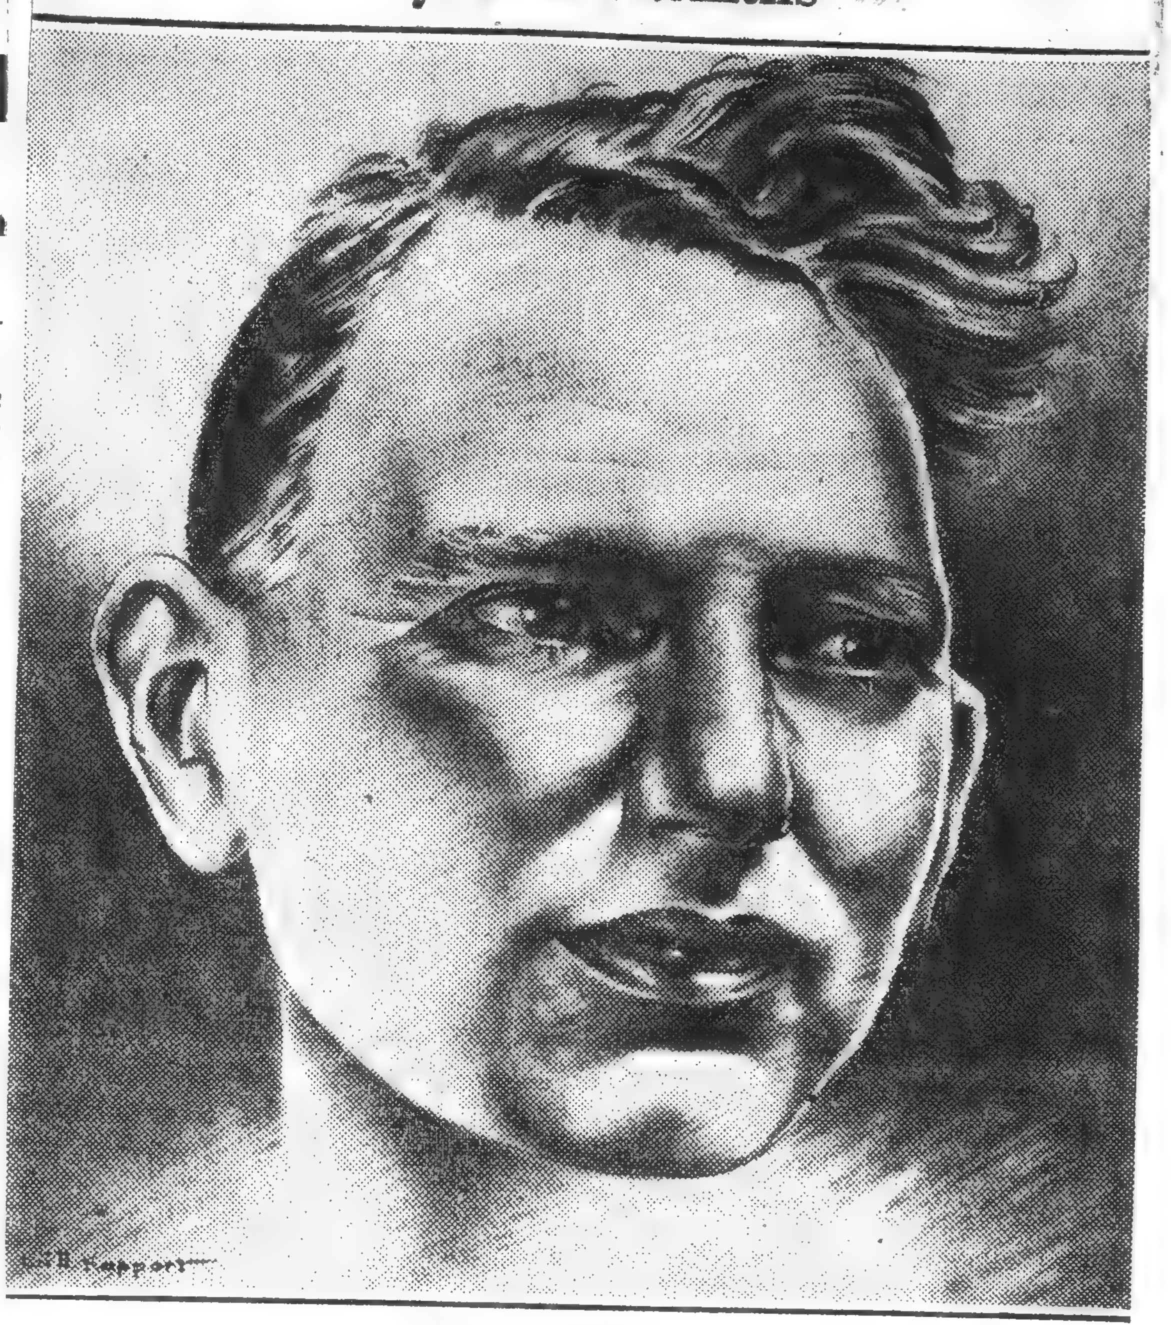
Nobody swooned, of course. But the gay excitement on the stage communicated itself to the audience, most of whom were there, as Deems Taylor said, on a "cultural vacation."

And then of course there were hard-shell symphonists present who listened with fingers crossed. But even they wore smiles of amused indulgence on their faces.

Promptly at the bell, Whiteman emerged from the wings swinging his famous yard-long baton and

Continued on Page 6, Column 6.

Lyrical Warmths



JEAN BEDETTI

First 'Cellist of the Symphony Orchestra, in Recital at Jordan Hall on Tuesday Evening.

WHITEMAN MAKES ACADEMY RESOUND BY JAZZ SYMPHONY

Philadelphia — Nov. 28/36

Tradition of Staid Old Place Is Shattered by His "Tonal Artillery"

By LINTON MARTIN

PAUL WHITEMAN bounced out upon the stage of the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon and gave such a show as never has been known in the 37 years' history of the Philadelphia Orchestra's regular series.

In a cockeyed but captivating combination of circus and symphony, he tore tradition to tatters with devastating and delirious effect. No peanuts and pink lemonade were visible. But almost everything else was audible, including some music of arresting interest.

All dolled up in white spats, with a flower in his buttonhole and flourishing a baton a yard long, the jazz generalissimo brought up his trick tonal artillery of gourds, accordion, pistols, clattering typewriters, guitar, banjo, saxophone and a few additional odds and ends including four bagpipers in Scottish highland kilts and costume, and reinforced by the full Philadelphia Orchestra as instrumental infantry. He won the capacity crowd without a struggle, even if his "swing time" did not set any elderly ladies in the audience dancing dizzily before it was all over.

'Vacation,' Says Deems Taylor

Deems Taylor, well-known composer and commentator, brought in especially to deliver spoken program notes through the microphone and loud speaker, urged the audience to regard the unconventional concert as "a vacation from culture."

His remarks, explained Mr. Taylor, were intended to do away with the deplorable practice of reading program-notes. "This audience," he said, "includes Stokowski's audience and Ormandy's audience. But it also includes Whiteman's audience. And the Whiteman audience can't read."

Mr. Whiteman leaned forward, murmured something in Mr. Taylor's ear, and the latter observed: "Neither can Mr. Whiteman's musicians."

"Why," said Mr. Taylor, "I have attended some Philadelphia Orchestra concerts when the audience was so deep in program notes you could not tell whether it was a symphony performance or a rainy afternoon at the public library."

Extra! Train Announcer Shot

Appearing on the stage after the third number, Mr. Taylor prophesied that "scandalous as were the things the audience already had heard, worse was yet to come."

Musical ideas and unmusical effects never before combined at one concert comprised the program of 14 numbers which occupied two and and a quarter hours in performance.

They ranged from a combination of tone poem and song recital in which a train announcer calls his cars and gets shot for his pains, to broad "kidding" of the "William Tell" Overture, and the music of Bach, and from a brand-new Scottish suite by an Englishman named Deutsch—who is the Whiteman chief orchestral arranger—introducing the kilted Scotchmen with their bagpipes, to the more familiar "Tabloid" sketches of a modern newspaper, by Ferde Grofe, with typewriters clicking, fire sirens and police car bells, guns, and presumably the roar of presses that sounded like busted machinery.

On such a scrambled occasion the novelties had better be discussed first, regardless of order or interest. The first of them, entitled "Ebon Chronicle," by the Negro composer, William Grant Still, purported to be a musical miniature of the Negro race. It simply turned out to be dull and pretentious, empty of originality, conventionally scored.

Suite in Five Movements

But "All Points West," by the prolific musical comedy team of Richard Rodgers and Lorenz Hart, was a vastly more momentous matter. It is, in short, nothing less than a quite novel musical form, combining, as Mr. Taylor sagely said, "orchestral tone poem, song cycle, and dramatic recitative," as the train announcer mingles personal asides with his official information. The orchestral and vocal music takes on real musical beauty, if with musical comedy leanings, and is deftly scored. The vocal solo was persuasively sung by Ray Middleton, baritone.

The "Scottish Suite for Orchestra and Bagpipes," by Adolph Deutsch, who is Mr. Whiteman's tower of strength as orchestral arranger, is in five movements of considerable contrast and ingenious effect. This is the number which brought forward the quartet of bagpipers in full regalia. It utilizes characteristic and traditional Scottish tunes, from "Annie Laurie" to "The Campbells are Coming," and achieves a few fine fugual effects.

Gershwin Ends the Show

The most sensational number on the program, Grofe's "Tabloid," is now an old story here and requires no comment at this time, though it must have dumbfounded some regular symphonic subscribers. The concert began with Rainger's "La Bomba," a "hot" dance related to the rhumba. Then followed the Rossini-Berry satire on "William Tell," jazzed up to date, and Kern's "Waltz in Swingtime." Van Phillips' "Thank You, Mister Bach," shows that classic master as a father of swingtime. Other numbers were Handy's "St. Louis Blues," the original of all "blues," with "hot" harp solo by Casper Reardon; an extensive "Essay on Waltzes," from Beethoven down to today, and the familiar Gershwin "Rhapsody in Blue," with the piano part played by Roy Bargy.

Monitor 82.

NOVEMBER 28, 1936

What's

Mr. Burgin Leads the Symphony

Richard Burgin, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made yesterday afternoon his fall appearance on the podium. For program of this pair of concerts he had selected the Bach Organ Toccata in C major, orchestrated by Leo Weiner; Hindemith's "Symphony," entitled "Mathis der Maler," and the First Symphony, in G minor, of B. S. Kalinnikoff. The first of these compositions is having this week its first performances by the orchestra. The second was introduced to us by Mr. Burgin two years ago. The third was revived by him after it had lain on the shelf for 15 years.

Thus Mr. Burgin cannot be accused of giving us hackneyed works. Nor can he be charged with seeking for easy effects—so far at least as the first half of his program was concerned, for it was replete with contrapuntal austerities. Mr. Weiner's Bach is well and faithfully transcribed, but on the literal side, with not much illumination. A second hearing of Hindemith's so-called "symphony," consisting of three excerpts from his opera, "Mathis der Maler," did not substantially modify the first impression. It still strikes this listener as the music of one who knows his way about but has not been blessed with inspiration.

The Kalinnikoff Symphony is a simple composition, regular in form and filled with melodic charm and rhythmic vigor and Russian atmosphere of the old school. No doubt it sounded particularly naïve after the sophistication of Hindemith. It is music easy to enjoy, and this is probably its weakness. Its charms, we suspect, would not wear very well. Once in fifteen years is perhaps as often as it should be heard.

Mr. Burgin conducted with authority and the orchestra played with its usual virtuosity. The audience greeted the assistant conductor cordially and rewarded his performance of the Kalinnikoff symphony conductor.

Post Nov 29

We who attend the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra must content ourselves for the most part with legitimate symphonic music. The Philadelphians are in no such circumscribed case. To be sure Eugene Ormandy, now the regular conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, offers his listeners programmes such as those to which we are accustomed. But from time to time Mr. Stokowski, whose "resignation" is to be taken in a Pickwickian sense, appears at the Academy of Music and proffers, in addition to a few routine orchestral numbers, his own operatic arrangements, his transcriptions of everything from an organ fugue of Bach to a song of Tchaikovsky, his discoveries among contemporary Russian and American composers otherwise unknown, and his impromptu speeches. And at the concerts of the week just past, the Philadelphians heard a concert conducted by Paul Whiteman in which his own orchestra was combined with the Philadelphian band and in which the programme included much straight jazz and much jazzing of standard compositions, together with Ferdie Grofe's "Tabloid" and Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," all quite in the manner of the concerts which Mr. Whiteman once gave in Symphony Hall when jazz was by way of being taken seriously by the cognoscenti. On top of it all, Deems Taylor offered oral programme notes. Yes, we of Boston miss a great deal!

* * * *

The Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to meet in Symphony Hall on Thursday afternoon of this week at 4 o'clock to hear a short programme of music from Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, to hear Mr. Jerome D. Greene, director of the Harvard tercentenary celebration, speak briefly on the contribution made by the orchestra to that event, and then to adjourn to the upper foyer where Dr. Koussevitzky and the trustees of the orchestra will receive, tea will be served and paintings from the collection of the Hon. Alvan T. Fuller will be on view. Mr. Taft, the chairman of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, suggests that members should remind their friends who have not yet joined the society that prompt enrollment will enable them to be present at this occasion on Dec. 3.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
Nov. ITEM 26/36

The Boston Symphony's second roadcast of the season will begin ver NBC-WSMB at 7 p. m. Richard Burgin, assistant conductor, will e in charge. The program will open with a Bach composition, "Toccato in C Major," and the second and concluding number will be Kalinnikov's "Symphony No. 1 in G Minor."

83.

Burgin Directs

◆ ◆ ◆

Symphony in Concert

Amer Nov 28

By RUTH MARSTERS

The usual large audience of the Friday afternoon Boston Symphony concerts extended a cordial reception to Richard Burgin, assistant conductor of the orchestra, as he appeared in the capacity of conductor for the first time this season.

Leo Weiner's orchestral transcription of Bach's Toccata in C major opened the program. Weiner, Hungarian composer, made the transcription in 1927, and though it has been performed in other American cities, it had not previously been heard at these concerts.

This Toccata, which contains all the robust vitality and inventive spontaneity of Bach at his best, is attributed to the Weimar period when the master had freed himself from the rigid formality of Buxtehude's precepts and had come under the influence of such Italians as Corelli, and Vivaldi.

It is written in three sections, a prelude, adagio, and fugue, the tender songfulness of the second section in admirable contrast to the animated vigor of the prelude and fugue.

Mr. Burgin's reading of the score was straightforward and lucid. The performance under his authoritative direction was possessed of exuberant vitality and solidity.

Hindemith's Symphony "Mathis der Maler" (Matthias the Painter), which followed, was first introduced to Boston audiences by Mr. Burgin at these concerts in 1934.

Comprising three excerpts from the composer's opera of the same name, its three movements bear the titles I. Angelic Concert; II. Entombment; III. The Temptation of Saint Anthony.

The music has no program other than its depiction of the moods created by the three paintings of the triptych which Grunewald ("Mathis" of Hindemith's opera) painted for the Isenheim Altar at Colmar.

The program was brought to a sonorous close with the performance of Basil Kalinnikov's First Symphony in G minor. Kalinnikov, a Russian composer of the Moscow school, died in 1900 in the prime of his career. The first symphony is one of the better known of the works which he left.

TO PAY BACK TAXES ON SYMPHONY HALL

Orchestra's Friends Thank Mr and Mrs Dane

Gl. ~~Dec~~ 4

The Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gathered at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon for their third annual meeting. Edward A. Taft presided. There were speeches by Bentley W. Warren, president of the orchestra's trustees, and Jerome D. Green, director of the Harvard tercentenary celebration.

Mr Taft reported a substantial increase this year in the society's membership and the amount of money pledged for this season's deficit of the orchestra. The membership on Dec 1 was 1502 and contributions already pledged amount to $55,000, against $36,000 at this time a year ago.

After referring to the fact that the Boston Symphony has passed through six years during which deficits mounted and gifts decreased, without lowering of artistic standards, Mr Warren said the last three years have been particularly difficult.

Had it not been for munificent financial assistance from two persons in particular, Mr and Mrs Ernest B. Dane, he continued, it might not have been possible to come through these three seasons without impairment of the orchestra's standards.

Mr Warren at this point announced what he called a "supersubsidy" from Mr and Mrs Dane—an offer to pay personally three years' back taxes on the Symphony Hall property. These taxes are said to be between $20,000 and $30,000.

With this debt cleared, Mr Warren said, it will be possible to apply the $72,000 legacy from the late Belle Hunt to the Boston Symphony's endowment fund. With this addition the endowment fund is brought to $537,000.

Mr Warren, in considering the present brilliant status of the orchestra as an artistic institution, remarked that the Friends were not asked to support a moribund institution, but one which, in the opinion of some judges, holds leading place among the orchestras of America.

Mr Taft was chosen to serve another year as chairman. A rising vote of thanks was given Mr and Mrs Dane, and a further resolution was passed thanking out-of-city contributors for their gifts. It was also resolved that each member be expected to secure another member during the season.

Mr Taft announced that pledges made last season came to within $2100 of covering that season's deficit. The remaining amount, he added, was later subscribed and accounts were balanced.

Jerome D. Green spoke on the Boston Symphony's share in the academic celebration at Harvard University last September.

Dr Serge Koussevitzky conducted a small orchestra of Symphony men in the Haydn Symphony in B-flat, No. 102.

Tea was served in the Huntington-av foyer, where members of the Society were privileged to preview an exhibition of paintings and tapestries loaned by Ex-Gov Alva T. Fuller.

SYMPHONY HALL BACK TAXES PAID

Friends of Orchestra Vote Thanks to the E. B. Danes

It was, as Edward A. Taft, the chairman, remarked, a "happy family" which gathered in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon for the third annual meeting of the Association of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a family which has within the past year enjoyed an increase in numbers, an increase in income and—most remarkable circumstance of all—has had its back taxes paid off!

RISING VOTE OF THANKS

From Mr. Bentley Warren, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, the assembled friends of the orchestra heard of the extraordinary generosity of Mr. and Mrs. Ernest B. Dane in removing the incubus of those two years' unpaid taxes. With a somewhat wry smile Mr. Warren assured his hearers that even better lawyers than he had considered the orchestra not legally liable for those taxes, but the Supreme Court decided otherwise and the accumulation of some $60,000 added enormously to the orchestra's deficit.

It is common knowledge that Mr. and Mrs. Dane have been invaluable friends and supporters of the orchestra during the recent depression years, but the rising vote of thanks tendered them yesterday by the friends of the orchestra is the first general acknowledgement which has been made of the extent of their benefactions.

Mr. Taft as chairman of the association was able to announce yesterday an increase of some hundreds in membership and an increase in contributions this year of almost $20,000 over last year at the same time; the actual figures are $36,000 and $55,000. Yet the note of appeal must still be sounded. For all this year's good showing, more members and more funds are needed to meet current expenses and this year's large tax bill. A motion was passed making it the duty of each member of the association to recruit one other member before the season's close in May.

NEW YORK WOMAN
NEW YORK, N. Y.

NOV 18 1936

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, Seventh at 57th, Thursday at 8:45; Saturday at 2:30. Subscriptions from $10 to $17.50 for the series of five. Sergei Koussevitzky conducting, as always.

Burgin Leads The Symphony

Adv. Nov. 28/36

By Ruth Marsters

Music Editor

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra returned from its first concert tour of the season to perform the seventh regular pair of concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and an additional concert in Sanders Theater on Thursday evening.

The three concerts, alike in program, were conducted by Richard Burgin.

Though there was no lack of cordiality on the part of the audience in its reception of the able assistant conductor, one felt it to be somewhat divided in its response to the program itself.

Mr. Burgin, in his periodic appearances on the podium, habitually chooses to conduct works, which either because they are seldom heard or, as is frequent, possessed of cacophony to a degree, or both, contrive at any rate for one reason or another to stir up dissension in a nevertheless polite audience.

* * *

DISSENSION, though mild, was apparent on Friday afternoon despite the fact that the program selected on this occasion was well balanced, interesting, and stimulating.

Leo Weiner's orchestration of Bach's Toccata in C major for Organ, which opened the program had not previously been performed in Boston.

This Toccata, attributed to Bach's Weimar period when the master, through Italian influence, had freed himself from the stricture of Buxtehude's formalism, is one of five Toccatas for Organ. It is written in three sections, a prelude of great breadth of structure and imaginativeness of detail; a singing adagio; and an animated fugue.

Under Mr. Burgin's direction the performance was such as to emphasize the fine vigorousness, the fresh spontaneity, and solidity of the work.

As an interpreter of the written score Mr. Burgin is direct and straightforward rather than subtle. Always a competent conductor, he appears to have gained in authority, an authority deriving from profound musicianship.

Weiner's orchestration, arranged in 1927, is rich and colorful, deftly and strongly done.

The Bach, it is true, won a spontaneous burst of applause.

* * *

HINDEMITH'S Symphony, "Mathis der Maler" (Matthias the Painter) which followed, was first introduced to Boston audiences by Mr. Burgin at these concerts in 1934.

Comprising three excerpts from the composer's opera of the same name, its three movements bear the titles: I. Angelic Concert; II. Entombment; III. The Temptation of Saint Anthony.

The symphony depicts, or rather exorcises, the moods produced by the three paintings of the triptych which Grunewald, "Mathis" of Hindemith's opera, painted for the Isenheim Altar at Colmar.

Thus although the idiom is not that of the "Impressionist" school, being inately Hindemith's own, the creative idea is essentially of an impressionist nature. Hindemith's speech, neo-classic in tendency, is more difficult to adjust oneself to than Debussy's. Probably simply because it is less familiar to most. It is music that demands the utmost receptivity on the part of the listener. One who finds it difficult to listen to is not, in our opinion, hearing it at all.

The program was brought to a close with the First Symphony in G minor of Basil Kalinnikov, its melodiousness and euphonious harmonies, rewarding those whose patience had been tried during the Hindemith.

* * *

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the second concert of the Monday series tomorrow evening in Symphony Hall.

Joseph Brinkman will be the soloist in the first performance of Lee Sowerby's Second Pianoforte Concerto. The program will also include Mozart's Symphony in C major No. 34, K338, and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

At the eighth regular pair of Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, December 4 and 5, Dr. Koussevitzky will give the first performance in America of Symphony in D by Clementi, revised by Alfredo Casella.

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST

NOV 16 1936

THURSDAY

Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, under the direction of Guy Fraser Harrison: WFIL, 3.15-4 p. m.

Overture, "Euryanthe" ....Weber
By the Tarn ....Goossens
Tam O'Shanter ....Goossens
First Piano Concerto............Beethoven
Scotch Symphony ....Mendelsshon

Chamber Music by Brahms comprises the Library of Congress musicale with William Kroll, violinist; Nicholas Moldavan, viola; Victor Gottlieb, 'cellist, and Frank Sheridan, pianist: WCAU, 3.30-4.30 p. m.

Quartet in C minor, Op. 60........Brahms
Sonata in F, Op. 99...............Brahms

Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, begins its fifth season on the air; the opening broadcast is from Carnegie Hall, New York: WFIL, 8.45-9.30 p. m.

Symphony No. 104 in B flat major..Haydn
La Mer ....Debussy

Meeting of Friends Of Boston Symphony

The saving of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from straits of the depression which threatened curtailment either of personnel or of performance was due in very large measure to the financial generosity of two individuals, it was revealed by Bentley W. Warren, president of the board of trustees, addressing members of the Association of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their third annual meeting at Symphony Hall yesterday. Announcement that they had now offered to discharge tax obligations on the hall, two years in arrears, was also made by this speaker.

"Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," Mr. Warren said, "are not being asked to support a moribund institution. Under the present conductor and personnel it has vindicated itself as head of the American orchestras today."

Edward A. Taft, trustee, and chairman of the Friends, presided. He reported the steady growth of this group, pledged to assist the orchestra financially according to their means, and morally by enrolling new members. On Dec. 1, two years ago, there were 875 members; on Dec. 1, last year, 950; and to date, 1312. Included were 110 from New York, 37 from Providence, one each from New Mexico and England. This year the Friends have made gifts of $55,000.

Mr. Taft introduced Jerome D. Green, director of the Harvard Tercentenary, who expressed gratitude on behalf of the university for the participation of Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra in three special Tercentenary concerts.

Mr. Koussevitzky then led the orchestra in a sparkling performance of Haydn's Symphony, No. 102. Responding to the applause at the end, the conductor spoke of the joy of performing music before friends.

The meeting adjourned for tea and inspection of an exhibition in the foyer of paintings and tapestries lent by Alvan T. Fuller for this occasion and the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Boston Symphony In Book Sketches

"What I wouldn't give to be personally acquainted with one of the world's famous musical artists!" Who has not said that? Now comes a simple means of realizing the ambition—and not in respect to one musical celebrity, but more than a hundred

Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony orchestra, which he conducts, are rated by authorities as either the greatest conductor and the greatest orchestra in the world, or as among the three greatest. Certainly that makes Koussevitsky and his men a group with whom acquaintanceship would be an enviable distinction

And now anyone may feel on friendly footing with all of them simply by turning the pages of a very engaging book It contains sketches of Koussevitsky and his musicians made from life by a noted artist Gerome Brush. Each of the 108 members of the world-famous orchestra was sketched in action—the first time such a thing has been achieved with the Boston Symphony or any other great orchestra. With each portrait Mr. Brush also provides a word-sketch written by himself, which gives intimate sidelights on the personality and career of each man.

The book has been designed by a celebrated typographical designer, D. B. Updike, and beautifully printed at the Merrymount Press, Boston. Yet, despite all these distinctions, the volume costs but $1.50. The title is, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1936," and it may be ordered from Symphony hall, Boston.

To South Shore music lovers this book should have particular appeal. Close-ups of musicians heard in this city are fascinating to see and read, and hours can be spent turning the pages of one of the most informative yet entertaining books published.

The biographical sketches are alphabetically arranged and Mr. Brush's charcoal drawings are an important feature. If most of the musicians are Europeans by birth there are still a few who were born in Massachusetts, and these make especially interesting reading.

83.

Burgin Directs

◆◆◆

Symphony in Concert

Amer Nov 28

By RUTH MARSTERS

The usual large audience of the Friday afternoon Boston Symphony concerts extended a cordial reception to Richard Burgin, assistant conductor of the orchestra, as he appeared in the capacity of conductor for the first time this season.

Leo Weiner's orchestral transcription of Bach's Toccata in C major opened the program. Weiner, Hungarian composer, made the transcription in 1927, and though it has been performed in other American cities, it had not previously been heard at these concerts.

This Toccata, which contains all the robust vitality and inventive spontaneity of Bach at his best, is attributed to the Weimar period when the master had freed himself from the rigid formality of Buxtehude's precepts and had come under the influence of such Italians as Corelli, and Vivaldi.

It is written in three sections, a prelude, adagio, and fugue, the tender songfulness of the second section in admirable contrast to the animated vigor of the prelude and fugue.

Mr. Burgin's reading of the score was straightforward and lucid. The performance under his authoritative direction was possessed of exuberant vitality and solidity.

Hindemith's Symphony "Mathis der Maler" (Matthias the Painter), which followed, was first introduced to Boston audiences by Mr. Burgin at these concerts in 1934.

Comprising three excerpts from the composer's opera of the same name, its three movements bear the titles I. Angelic Concert; II. Entombment; III. The Temptation of Saint Anthony.

The music has no program other than its depiction of the moods created by the three paintings of the triptych which Grunewald ("Mathis" of Hindemith's opera) painted for the Isenheim Altar at Colmar.

The program was brought to a sonorous close with the performance of Basil Kalinnikov's First Symphony in G minor. Kalinnikov, a Russian composer of the Moscow school, died in 1900 in the prime of his career. The first symphony is one of the better known of the works which he left.

Dec 4 36
Post

SYMPHONY HALL BACK TAXES PAID

Friends of Orchestra Vote Thanks to the E. B. Danes

It was, as Edward A. Taft, the chairman, remarked, a "happy family" which gathered in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon for the third annual meeting of the Association of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a family which has within the past year enjoyed an increase in numbers, an increase in income and—most remarkable circumstance of all—has had its back taxes paid off!

RISING VOTE OF THANKS

From Mr. Bentley Warren, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, the assembled friends of the orchestra heard of the extraordinary generosity of Mr. and Mrs. Ernest B. Dane in removing the incubus of those two years' unpaid taxes. With a somewhat wry smile Mr. Warren assured his hearers that even better lawyers than he had considered the orchestra not legally liable for those taxes, but the Supreme Court decided otherwise and the accumulation of some $60,000 added enormously to the orchestra's deficit.

It is common knowledge that Mr. and Mrs. Dane have been invaluable friends and supporters of the orchestra during the recent depression years, but the rising vote of thanks tendered them yesterday by the friends of the orchestra is the first general acknowledgement which has been made of the extent of their benefactions.

Mr. Taft as chairman of the association was able to announce yesterday an increase of some hundreds in membership and an increase in contributions this year of almost $20,000 over last year at the same time; the actual figures are $36,000 and $55,000. Yet the note of appeal must still be sounded. For all this year's good showing, more members and more funds are needed to meet current expenses and this year's large tax bill. A motion was passed making it the duty of each member of the association to recruit one other member before the season's close in May.

TO PAY BACK TAXES ON SYMPHONY HALL

Orchestra's Friends Thank Mr and Mrs Dane

Gl. Dec 4

The Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gathered at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon for their third annual meeting. Edward A. Taft presided. There were speeches by Bentley W. Warren, president of the orchestra's trustees, and Jerome D. Green, director of the Harvard tercentenary celebration.

Mr Taft reported a substantial increase this year in the society's membership and the amount of money pledged for this season's deficit of the orchestra. The membership on Dec 1 was 1502 and contributions already pledged amount to $55,000, against $36,000 at this time a year ago.

After referring to the fact that the Boston Symphony has passed through six years during which deficits mounted and gifts decreased, without lowering of artistic standards, Mr Warren said the last three years have been particularly difficult.

Had it not been for munificent financial assistance from two persons in particular, Mr and Mrs Ernest B. Dane, he continued, it might not have been possible to come through these three seasons without impairment of the orchestra's standards.

Mr Warren at this point announced what he called a "super-subsidy" from Mr and Mrs Dane—an offer to pay personally three years' back taxes on the Symphony Hall property. These taxes are said to be between $20,000 and $30,000.

With this debt cleared, Mr Warren said, it will be possible to apply the $72,000 legacy from the late Belle Hunt to the Boston Symphony's endowment fund. With this addition the endowment fund is brought to $537,000.

Mr Warren, in considering the present brilliant status of the orchestra as an artistic institution, remarked that the Friends were not asked to support a moribund institution, but one which, in the opinion of some judges, holds leading place among the orchestras of America.

Mr Taft was chosen to serve another year as chairman. A rising vote of thanks was given Mr and Mrs Dane, and a further resolution contributors for their gifts. It was was passed thanking out-of-city also resolved that each member be expected to secure another member during the season.

Mr Taft announced that pledges made last season came to within $2100 of covering that season's deficit. The remaining amount, he added, was later subscribed and accounts were balanced.

Jerome D. Green spoke on the Boston Symphony's share in the academic celebration at Harvard University last September.

Dr Serge Koussevitzky conducted a small orchestra of Symphony men in the Haydn Symphony in B-flat, No. 102.

Tea was served in the Huntington-av foyer, where members of the Society were privileged to preview an exhibition of paintings and tapestries loaned by Ex-Gov Alva T. Fuller.

NEW YORK WOMAN
NEW YORK, N. Y.

NOV 18 1936

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, Seventh at 57th, Thursday at 8:45; Saturday at 2:30. Subscriptions from $10 to $17.50 for the series of five. Sergei Koussevitzky conducting, as always.

Burgin Leads The Symphony

Adv. Nov. 28/36

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra returned from its first concert tour of the season to perform the seventh regular pair of concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and an additional concert in Sanders Theater on Thursday evening.

The three concerts, alike in program, were conducted by Richard Burgin.

Though there was no lack of cordiality on the part of the audience in its reception of the able assistant conductor, one felt it to be somewhat divided in its response to the program itself.

Mr. Burgin, in his periodic appearances on the podium, habitually chooses to conduct works, which either because they are seldom heard or, as is frequent, possessed of cacophony to a degree, or both, contrive at any rate for one reason or another to stir up dissension in a nevertheless polite audience.

* * *

DISSENSION, though mild, was apparent on Friday afternoon despite the fact that the program selected on this occasion was well balanced, interesting, and stimulating.

Leo Weiner's orchestration of Bach's Toccata in C major for Organ, which opened the program had not previously been performed in Boston.

This Toccata, attributed to Bach's Weimar period when the master, through Italian influence, had freed himself from the stricture of Buxtehude's formalism, is one of five Toccatas for Organ. It is written in three sections, a prelude of great breadth of structure and imaginativeness of detail; a singing adagio; and an animated fugue.

Under Mr. Burgin's direction the performance was such as to emphasize the fine vigorousness, the fresh spontaneity, and solidity of the work.

As an interpreter of the written score Mr. Burgin is direct and straightforward rather than subtle. Always a competent conductor, he appears to have gained in authority, an authority deriving from profound musicianship.

Weiner's orchestration, arranged in 1927, is rich and colorful, deftly and strongly done.

The Bach, it is true, won a spontaneous burst of applause.

* * *

HINDEMITH'S Symphony, "Mathis der Maler" (Matthias the Painter) which followed, was first introduced to Boston audiences by Mr. Burgin at these concerts in 1934.

Comprising three excerpts from the composer's opera of the same name, its three movements bear the titles: I. Angelic Concert; II. Entombment; III. The Temptation of Saint Anthony.

The symphony depicts, or rather exorcises, the moods produced by the three paintings of the triptych which Grunewald, "Mathis" of Hindemith's opera, painted for the Isenheim Altar at Colmar.

Thus although the idiom is not that of the "Impressionist" school, being inately Hindemith's own, the creative idea is essentially of an impressionist nature. Hindemith's speech, neo-classic in tendency, is more difficult to adjust oneself to than Debussy's. Probably simply because it is less familiar to most. It is music that demands the utmost receptivity on the part of the listener. One who finds it difficult to listen to is not, in our opinion, hearing it at all.

The program was brought to a close with the First Symphony in G minor of Basil Kalinnikov, its melodiousness and euphonious harmonies, rewarding those whose patience had been tried during the Hindemith.

* * *

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the second concert of the Monday series tomorrow evening in Symphony Hall.

Joseph Brinkman will be the soloist in the first performance of Lee Sowerby's Second Pianoforte Concerto. The program will also include Mozart's Symphony in C major No. 34, K338, and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

At the eighth regular pair of Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, December 4 and 5, Dr. Koussevitzky will give the first performance in America of Symphony in D by Clementi, revised by Alfredo Casella.

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST

NOV 16 1936

THURSDAY

Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, under the direction of Guy Fraser Harrison: WFIL, 3.15-4 p. m.

Overture, "Euryanthe" ....Weber
By the Tarn
Tam O'Shanter ....Goossens
First Piano Concerto ....Goossens
..........Beethoven
Scotch Symphony ....Mendelsshon

Chamber Music by Brahms comprises the Library of Congress musicale with William Kroll, violinist; Nicholas Moldavan, viola; Victor Gottlieb, 'cellist, and Frank Sheridan, pianist; WCAU, 3.30-4.30 p. m.

Quartet in C minor, Op. 60..........Brahms
Sonata in F, Op. 99..........Brahms

Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, begins its fifth season on the air; the opening broadcast is from Carnegie Hall, New York: WFIL, 8.45-9.30 p. m.

Symphony No. 104 in B flat major..Haydn
La Mer..........Debussy

Meeting of Friends Of Boston Symphony

The saving of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from straits of the depression which threatened curtailment either of personnel or of performance was due in very large measure to the financial generosity of two individuals, it was revealed by Bentley W. Warren, president of the board of trustees, addressing members of the Association of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their third annual meeting at Symphony Hall yesterday. Announcement that they had now offered to discharge tax obligations on the hall, two years in arrears, was also made by this speaker.

"Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," Mr. Warren said, "are not being asked to support a moribund institution. Under the present conductor and personnel it has vindicated itself as head of the American orchestras today."

Edward A. Taft, trustee, and chairman of the Friends, presided. He reported the steady growth of this group, pledged to assist the orchestra financially according to their means, and morally by enrolling new members. On Dec. 1, two years ago, there were 875 members; on Dec. 1, last year, 950; and to date, 1312. Included were 110 from New York, 37 from Providence, one each from New Mexico and England. This year the Friends have made gifts of $55,000.

Mr. Taft introduced Jerome D. Green, director of the Harvard Tercentenary, who expressed gratitude on behalf of the university for the participation of Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra in three special Tercentenary concerts.

Mr. Koussevitzky then led the orchestra in a sparkling performance of Haydn's Symphony, No. 102. Responding to the applause at the end, the conductor spoke of the joy of performing music before friends.

The meeting adjourned for tea and inspection of an exhibition in the foyer of paintings and tapestries lent by Alvan T. Fuller for this occasion and the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Transcript, Dec. 4/36

~~[illegible] Nov 24~~

Boston Symphony In Book Sketches

"What I wouldn't give to be personally acquainted with one of the world's famous musical artists!" Who has not said that? Now comes a simple means of realizing the ambition—and not in respect to one musical celebrity, but more than a hundred.

Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony orchestra, which he conducts, are rated by authorities as either the greatest conductor and the greatest orchestra in the world, or as among the three greatest. Certainly that makes Koussevitsky and his men a group with whom acquaintanceship would be an enviable distinction.

And now anyone may feel on friendly footing with all of them simply by turning the pages of a very engaging book. It contains sketches of Koussevitsky and his musicians made from life by a noted artist, Gerome Brush. Each of the 108 members of the world-famous orchestra was sketched in action—the first time such a thing has been achieved with the Boston Symphony or any other great orchestra. With each portrait Mr. Brush also provides a word-sketch written by himself, which gives intimate sidelights on the personality and career of each man.

The book has been designed by a celebrated typographical designer, D. B. Updike, and beautifully printed at the Merrymount Press, Boston. Yet, despite all these distinctions, the volume costs but $1.50. The title is, "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1936," and it may be ordered from Symphony hall, Boston.

To South Shore music lovers this book should have particular appeal. Close-ups of musicians heard in this city are fascinating to see and read, and hours can be spent turning the pages of one of the most informative yet entertaining books published.

The biographical sketches are alphabetically arranged and Mr. Brush's charcoal drawings are an important feature. If most of the musicians are Europeans by birth there are still a few who were born in Massachusetts, and these make especially interesting reading.

84.

The Record Player

Speaking of classical music, a perfect way to start the present symphony season is to hear the recording of Serge Koussevitsky's restudied interpretation of Schubert's enthralling and exquisitely beautiful Unfinished Symphony as played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There are three reasons why this new recording merits your interest: the lovely music given to the strings is one of the most charming things in this work; the string section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the best in the country; and one of the greatest improvements brought about by Higher Fidelity recording is in the reproduction of strings. Dr. Koussevitsky's interpretation follows as closely as possible the composer's intention. The Symphony covers five sides of three 12-in. records. The odd side presents an appropriate selection from Schubert's Ballet Music from Rosamunde. (Victor M-319.)

Another Victor Musical Masterpiece Set of unusual interest is the release of the tone poems Night Ride and Sunrise and Oceantides (both selection by Sibelius) as played by Adrian Boult. These records have heretofore been obtainable only by members of the Sibelius Society.

Night Ride and Sunrise after a short and turbulent Introduction is highly descriptive and exciting. A steady galloping figure is inserted by the strings, and this urgent rhythmic figure continues for over three hundred bars. After a powerful climax is attained, the Night Ride ends and the Sunrise music begins. This is very impressionistic with woodwinds suggesting the awakening of nature, with chirpings of birds to announce the dawn. The Oceantides tells the story of the three thousand daughters of Oceanus who, according to Homer, was the beginning of all things. (Victor M-311.)

The Boston Pops Orchestra under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, has recorded two of our old favorites—the Hungarian Dances Nos. 5 and 6 by Brahms. We like their rendition of both. (Victor 4321) And Eugene Ormandy heading the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra has brought us the Pizzicato Polka by Johann and Josef Strauss. It is a delightful number to listen to, and backing it is the Valse Bluette by Drigo-Auer. (Victor 1757)

Now is the time to think of Christmas gifts. Come into the Lake Forest Radio Shop for gift suggestions in the way of Musical Masterpiece Sets, record reproducing instruments, etc.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
Mid-Week Pictorial

SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
EXPRESS

NOV 15 1936

CONCERT TICKETS IN GOOD DEMAND

Despite Changes Three Orchestras Do Well

(By Associated Press)

NEW YORK, Nov. 14. — New York hears its young-old philharmonic-symphony society throughout the winter. It also hears 10 concerts each winter from Serge Koussevitzky's Boston symphony, and from Leopold Stokowski's Philadelphia orchestra.

Two of these three orchestras have undergone major operations this fall. Many patrons any many observers and most managers stroked their beards in the spring, and came out with the idea that these major operations would most likely reduce audiences this winter. They were wrong.

Philadelphia's noble band "lost" Stokowski. That is, Stokowski became so enamored of the movies and their mass possibilities that he asked his directors to elect a permanent conductor for three years, leaving him free to conduct as little as he chose.

They picked Eugene Ormandy. Hitherto, the Philadelphia has played to packed houses in New York. This winter it is doing the same. And last Tuesday, when Stokowski came to town with an all-Russian program which included Sergei Rachmaninoff's brand new Third Symphony, the last minute people just didn't get into Carnegie Hall.

The Philharmonic is, however, even more astonished. Last spring Arturo Toscanini departed these shores forever, saying among other things, it is declared, that the Philharmonic is the greatest orchestra ever assembled. The Philharmonic directors at once set their sails to fit what they thought would be a period of calm—they cut down the season six weeks, and expected reduced business.

But they didn't get reduced business; business is better. Subscription sales are actually ahead of last winter. John Barbirolli, the young Italian-French-English conductor, is not only doing well at the box office, he is doing well on the podium.

Partly this is musical ability, partly the public's curiosity, and (oddly enough) partly tact. No musician ever stood in hotter shoes that Barbirolli a week and three days ago when he began the first piece he ever conducted on American soil—Berloiz' "Roman Carnival" overture. Many thoughtless persons, even a reviewer or so, had spoken of him as an "unknown" chosen to "replace" Toscanini.

Barbirolli extricated himself from his hot spot neatly by frankly admitting wonder at being chosen, by disclaiming any intention of "replacing" anybody, by declaring that he was a young man trying to make a living. He had won the men of the orchestra. Now he seems to be winning the public.

Koussevitzky brings his Bostonese to town for the first time this season next Thursday. He always plays to packed houses, and he never yet has engineered a publicity stunt to pack them. By now he is accustomed to being pointed out as the supreme American example of what a superlative orchestra can accomplish when left to one conductor through a period of years.

PORT CHESTER, N. Y.
N. Y. ITEM

NOV 19 1936

PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGON JOURNAL

NOV 15 1936

Piatigorsky, 'Cellist, to Be Soloist

Russian Artist Will Be Guest of Portland Orchestra November 24.

Portland is to have the privilege at last of hearing Gregor Piatigorsky, the great Russian 'cellist, when he appears as guest soloist with the Portland Symphony orchestra under the direction of Willem van Hoogstraten, November 24.

Piatigorsky is one of the outstanding figures in the music world today, being hailed by critics of four continents as the greatest of all continents. Six feet 3 inches tall, with black hair and dark eyes, he makes a striking figure on the concert platform. He handles his instrument — a magnificent Montagnana of the year 1739—with brilliance and virtuosity, but at the same time he brings out and intensifies all of the native richness and color of the violoncello.

There is an interesting story back of his fine instrument. In 1934 the 'cellist was making a tour of the British Isles. Walking down a London street, he suddenly met an American friend, a wealthy Bostonian, who was not an ardent music-lover but a member of the board of directors of the Boston symphony. "What is the matter?" the American asked, for he immediately noticed that Piatigorsky seemed to be worried and preoccupied. "To tell the truth," the 'cellist returned, "it's my 'cello. It's sick. I do not know what to do with it—something always seems to be going wrong with it. There is only one person who might be able to put it in shape—but he is in Florence. It is impossible for me to go to Italy now, for I am playing concerts almost every day here."

The next morning Piatigorsky had a telephone call. His friend again. He was leaving for America that afternoon. There was just one thing he wanted to see in London before sailing, the best collection of old musical instruments. Would Piatigorsky take him?

Busy though he was, the 'cellist did not like to refuse, so he took him to the house of W. E. Hill & Son, internationally famous dealers. They admired the Stradivarii and Guarnerii and other priceless instruments. Finally the Bostonian turned to Alfred Hill and asked: "Have you any good 'celli?"

"Yes," answered Hill. "I have a magnificent one. It's been buried on the country estate of one of our old families for 70 years, but now it is on the market. I wish you would try it."

He brought out a Montagnana, 1739, with a luminous golden brown surface, and handed Piatigorsky a bow. Piatigorsky drew the bow over the strings. A few scales—a chord or two—then he was playing in earnest. An hour passed—two—three—then Piatigorsky realized that he was alone. The proprietor came smiling. "Your friend had to catch the boat train," he said. "But he left the 'cello for you as a gift." And it is on this priceless instrument that Piatigorsky will play the Dvorak concerto with the Portland symphony.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will appear at the Masonic Auditorium, Wednesday, Dec. 9, under the auspices of the Masonic Temple Association.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
UTAH TRIBUNE

NOV 29 1936

Old Symphony Brought To Light, Being Played

BOSTON, Nov. 28 (AP)—A symphony that has lain in dusty oblivion for a century will receive its first American performance next Friday afternoon when the Boston orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, plays the symphony in D major by the Americanized Italian, Muzio Clementi.

Musicologists credit Alfredo Casella, Italian composer-pianist-scholar, and former conductor of the Boston Pops orchestra, with astonishing detective work in weaving together disordered pages of manuscript, which now fill a 100-year gap in musical history.

As far back as 1817, a German musical periodical reported that Clementi, some of whose 100 sonatas were held in high regard by Beethoven and Haydn and who as an established pianist gave an audition in 1824 to Franz Liszt, then 13 years old, was composing six symphonies that were to be his bid for symphonic fame.

Mellowed newspaper clippings later attested to the popularity, between 1786 and 1824, of these and his other 14 symphonies. Yet when he died in 1832, bequeathing all his manuscripts to his widow, none but sonata scores could be found.

Clementi was a practical man of affairs, and his large estate was in good order. But his symphonies never had been printed, and they dropped from public knowledge for the next 40 years. Two manuscripts came into the possession of the British museum in 1871, but, unconnected, they merely intensified the fruitless search for the others.

Then in 1917, Dr. William H. Cummings, a London music scholar, died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts, incomplete and in utter disorder.

A public auction in London soon resulted in their purchase by Carl Engel, chief of the music division for the Library of Congress of the United States.

In 1924, a magazine article concerning the Washington scores

(Continued from Page Twelve)

piqued the curiosity of Casella, who had been intensely interested in earning recognition for Clementi as a great symphonist. Ten years passed before Casella finally crossed the ocean to begin serious study of the scores.

Putting them together was similar to reassembling several jig-saw puzzles at once. Nevertheless, hard work yielded four symphonies last year, although in each the first movement was incomplete.

Recalling the two manuscripts held in the British museum, Casella went to London, armed with photostatic copies of the Washington library scores. Careful work restored all four, and two were performed and published last year. The first, third and fourth required some slight filling in by Casella, but the second, which will be performed Friday, was complete, and received its first performance under Casella in Rome last January.

Dr. Koussevitzky first learned of the scores from Casella, and after studying them minutely the last few weeks, described the music as possessing "great charm and brilliance."

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
NEWS

NOV 18 1936

There's Music on the Air

By THANKFUL EVERETT

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, will resume broadcasts Thursday at 7:45 p.m. over NBC-WJZ. This will be the fifth season of music of the world-famous group that has been carried over NBC. Instead of broadcasting the entire series from Boston as heretofore, concerts this year will be heard from Symphony Hall, Boston; Carnegie Hall, New York; Sanders Theater at Harvard University, Cambridge, and the Academy of Music, Brooklyn. The series of twenty-one programs will include nine of the "pop concerts" and all will be presented over a coast-to-coast network. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is recognized throughout the world as one of the greatest symphonic organizations. It has played under Dr. Koussevitzky continuously for the past several years.

Thankful Everett

The Philadelphia Orchestra, with Leopold Stokowski conducting, will present the second in the series of weekly broadcasts, sponsored by leading banking institutions from coast to coast, on Friday at 9 p.m. over the Columbia system. The program, originating from the Curtis Institute of Music, Philadelphia, will include "Danse Macabre" (Saint-Saens), "March" and "Trepak" from "The Nutcracker Suite" (Tschaikowsky) and "Second Hungarian Rhapsody" (Liszt). W. M. Kiplinger, Washington journalist, will speak briefly.

Rear Admiral William Woodward, United States Navy, retired, will make a brief talk on "Music in the Home" on the Music Is My Hobby broadcast to be heard Thursday at 6:15 p.m. over NBC-WJZ. Mrs. Phelps will be guest artist, playing the piano works of Bach, Schubert and Chopin.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

NOV 19 1936

ON THE AIR

NBC (Red) WEAF | NBC (Blue) WJZ | Columbia WABC

SYMPHONY TO OPEN NEW SERIES

Boston Orchestra Inaugurates Fifth Season on Air Tonight

Another of radio's outstanding features returns to the air tonight when the world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra inaugurates its fifth season of broadcasts exclusively over networks of the National Broadcasting Company.

This program, to be heard over the NBC-Blue Network from 8.45 to 9.30 will be broadcast from Carnegie Hall in New York where the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be playing the first of its annual subscription series of New York concerts.

With Dr. Serge Koussevitzky again conducting, two noted masterworks of symphonic literature will be performed: Haydn's B Flat Symphony, No. 102, the ninth of his "London Symphonies"; and Debussy's "La Mer."

---

15 1936

Forthcoming broadcasts: The world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky opens its fifth season Thursday, November 19, over NBC. . . . A series of eight concerts featuring the important chamber works of Johannes Brahms will be presented by the Coolidge String Quartet over the Columbia network beginning Tuesday, November 12, from 3:00 to 4:00 p.m., EST. . . . America's Town Meeting of the Air, based on the traditional town meetings of early America, will resume broadcasts every Thursday from 9:30 to 10:30 p.m., EST, over NBC.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Returns To Air Waves Tonight

Famous Musical Organization To Broadcast Program Over WJZ at 8:45 o'Clock From Carnegie Hall—Cordell Hull To Speak

Another of radio's outstanding features returns to the air tonight when the world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra inaugurates its fifth season of broadcasts.

This program, to be heard over WJZ from 8:45 to 9:30 o'clock, will be broadcast from Carnegie Hall in New York where the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be playing the first of its annual subscription series of New York concerts.

Secretary of State Cordell Hull and Dr. Jose Carlos de Macedo Soares, Minister of Foreign Affairs of Brazil, will discuss a phase of the Pan-American Peace Conference during a broadcast from Rio de Janeiro from 10:30 to 11 P. M. over WJZ.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 29 1936

Concert Thursday

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Sinfonietta, composed of 50 players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be presented by the Pawtucket Civic Music Association in its second concert of the season, Thursday evening, at 8:30 o'clock, in the auditorium of the Pawtucket senior high school.

◆ ◆ ◆

84.

Lake Forest Ill
Forester

NOV 12 1936

The Record Player

Speaking of classical music, a perfect way to start the present symphony season is to hear the recording of Serge Koussevitsky's restudied interpretation of Schubert's enthralling and exquisitely beautiful Unfinished Symphony as played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There are three reasons why this new recording merits your interest: the lovely music given to the strings is one of the most charming things in this work; the string section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the best in the country; and one of the greatest improvements brought about by Higher Fidelity recording is in the reproduction of strings. Dr. Koussevitsky's interpretation follows as closely as possible the composer's intention. The Symphony covers five sides of three 12-in. records. The odd side presents an appropriate selection from Schubert's Ballet Music from Rosamunde. (Victor M-319.)

Another Victor Musical Masterpiece Set of unusual interest is the release of the tone poems Night Ride and Sunrise and Oceantides (both selection by Sibelius) as played by Adrian Boult. These records have heretofore been obtainable only by members of the Sibelius Society.

Night Ride and Sunrise after a short and turbulent Introduction is highly descriptive and exciting. A steady galloping figure is inserted by the strings, and this urgent rhythmic figure continues for over three hundred bars. After a powerful climax is attained, the Night Ride ends and the Sunrise music begins. This is very impressionistic with woodwinds suggesting the awakening of nature, with chirpings of birds to announce the dawn. The Oceantides tells the story of the three thousand daughters of Oceanus who, according to Homer, was the beginning of all things. (Victor M-311.)

The Boston Pops Orchestra under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, has recorded two of our old favorites—the Hungarian Dances Nos. 5 and 6 by Brahms. We like their rendition of both. (Victor 4321) And Eugene Ormandy heading the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra has brought us the Pizzicato Polka by Johann and Josef Strauss. It is a delightful number to listen to, and backing it is the Valse Bluette by Drigo-Auer. (Victor 1757)

Now is the time to think of Christmas gifts. Come into the Lake Forest Radio Shop for gift suggestions in the way of Musical Masterpiece Sets, record reproducing instruments, etc.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
Mid-Week Pictorial

NOV 18 1936

Forthcoming broadcasts: The world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky opens its fifth season Thursday, November 19, over NBC. . . . A series of eight concerts featuring the important chamber works of Johannes Brahms will be presented by the Coolidge String Quartet over the Columbia network beginning Tuesday, November 12, from 3:00 to 4:00 p.m., EST. . . . America's Town Meeting of the Air, based on the traditional town meetings of early America, will resume broadcasts every Thursday from 9:30 to 10:30 p.m., EST, over NBC. 11-7

SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
EXPRESS

NOV 15 1936

CONCERT TICKETS IN GOOD DEMAND

Despite Changes Three Orchestras Do Well

(By Associated Press)

NEW YORK, Nov. 14. — New York hears its young-old philharmonic-symphony society throughout the winter. It also hears 10 concerts each winter from Serge Koussevitzky's Boston symphony, and from Leopold Stokowski's Philadelphia orchestra.

Two of these three orchestras have undergone major operations this fall. Many patrons any many observers and most managers stroked their beards in the spring, and came out with the idea that these major operations would most likely reduce audiences this winter. They were wrong.

Philadelphia's noble band "lost" Stokowski. That is, Stokowski became so enamored of the movies and their mass possibilities that he asked his directors to elect a permanent conductor for three years, leaving him free to conduct as little as he chose.

They picked Eugene Ormandy. Hitherto, the Philadelphia has played to packed houses in New York. This winter it is doing the same. And last Tuesday, when Stokowski came to town with an all-Russian program which included Sergei Rachmaninoff's brand new Third Symphony, the last minute people just didn't get into Carnegie Hall.

The Philharmonic is, however, even more astonished. Last spring Arturo Toscanini departed these shores forever, saying among other things, it is declared, that the Philharmonic is the greatest orchestra ever assembled. The Philharmonic directors at once set their sails to fit what they thought would be a period of calm—they cut down the season six weeks, and expected reduced business.

But they didn't get reduced business; business is better. Subscription sales are actually ahead of last winter. John Barbirolli, the young Italian-French-English conductor, is not only doing well at the box office, he is doing well on the podium.

Partly this is musical ability, partly the public's curiosity, and (oddly enough) partly tact. No musician ever stood in hotter shoes that Barbirolli a week and three days ago when he began the first piece he ever conducted on American soil—Berloiz' "Roman Carnival" overture. Many thoughtless persons, even a reviewer or so, had spoken of him as an "unknown" chosen to "replace" Toscanini.

Barbirolli extricated himself from his hot spot neatly by frankly admitting wonder at being chosen, by disclaiming any intention of "replacing" anybody, by declaring that he was a young man trying to make a living. He had won the men of the orchestra. Now he seems to be winning the public.

Koussevitzky brings his Bostonese to town for the first time this season next Thursday. He always plays to packed houses, and he never yet has engineered a publicity stunt to pack them. By now he is accustomed to being pointed out as the supreme American example of what a superlative orchestra can accomplish when left to one conductor through a period of years.

PORT CHESTER, N. Y.
N. Y. ITEM

NOV 19 1936

Boston Symphony Orchestra Returns To Air Waves Tonight

Famous Musical Organization To Broadcast Program Over WJZ at 8:45 o'Clock From Carnegie Hall—Cordell Hull To Speak

Another of radio's outstanding features returns to the air tonight when the world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra inaugurates its fifth season of broadcasts.

This program, to be heard over WJZ from 8:45 to 9:30 o'clock, will be broadcast from Carnegie Hall in New York where the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be playing the first of its annual subscription series of New York concerts.

Secretary of State Cordell Hull and Dr. Jose Carlos de Macedo Soares, Minister of Foreign Affairs of Brazil, will discuss a phase of the Pan-American Peace Conference during a broadcast from Rio de Janeiro from 10:30 to 11 P. M. over WJZ.

PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGON JOURNAL

NOV 15 1936

Piatigorsky, 'Cellist, to Be Soloist

Russian Artist Will Be Guest of Portland Orchestra November 24.

Portland is to have the privilege at last of hearing Gregor Piatigorsky, the great Russian 'cellist, when he appears as guest soloist with the Portland Symphony orchestra under the direction of Willem van Hoogstraten, November 24.

Piatigorsky is one of the outstanding figures in the music world today, being hailed by critics of four continents as the greatest of all continents. Six feet 3 inches tall, with black hair and dark eyes, he makes a striking figure on the concert platform. He handles his instrument — a magnificent Montagnana of the year 1739—with brilliance and virtuosity, but at the same time he brings out and intensifies all of the native richness and color of the violoncello.

There is an interesting story back of his fine instrument. In 1934 the 'cellist was making a tour of the British Isles. Walking down a London street, he suddenly met an American friend, a wealthy Bostonian, who was not an ardent music-lover but a member of the board of directors of the Boston symphony. "What is the matter?" the American asked, for he immediately noticed that Piatigorsky seemed to be worried and preoccupied. "To tell the truth," the 'cellist returned, "it's my 'cello. It's sick. I do not know what to do with it—something always seems to be going wrong with it. There is only one person who might be able to put it in shape—but he is in Florence. It is impossible for me to go to Italy now, for I am playing concerts almost every day here."

The next morning Piatigorsky had a telephone call. His friend again. He was leaving for America that afternoon. There was just one thing he wanted to see in London before sailing, the best collection of old musical instruments. Would Piatigorsky take him?

Busy though he was, the 'cellist did not like to refuse, so he took him to the house of W. E. Hill & Son, internationally famous dealers. They admired the Stradivarii and Guarnerii and other priceless instruments. Finally the Bostonian turned to Alfred Hill and asked: "Have you any good 'celli?"

"Yes," answered Hill. "I have a magnificent one. It's been buried on the country estate of one of our old families for 70 years, but now it is on the market. I wish you would try it."

He brought out a Montagnana, 1739, with a luminous golden brown surface, and handed Piatigorsky a bow. Piatigorsky drew the bow over the strings. A few scales—a chord or two—then he was playing in earnest. An hour passed—two—three—then Piatigorsky realized that he was alone. The proprietor came smiling. "Your friend had to catch the boat train," he said. "But he left the 'cello for you as a gift." And it is on this priceless instrument that Piatigorsky will play the Dvorak concerto with the Portland symphony.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will appear at the Masonic Auditorium, Wednesday, Dec. 9, under the auspices of the Masonic Temple Association.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
UTAH TRIBUNE

NOV 29 1936

Old Symphony Brought To Light, Being Played

BOSTON, Nov. 28 (AP)—A symphony that has lain in dusty oblivion for a century will receive its first American performance next Friday afternoon when the Boston orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, plays the symphony in D major by the Americanized Italian, Muzio Clementi.

Musicologists credit Alfredo Casella, Italian composer-pianist-scholar, and former conductor of the Boston Pops orchestra, with astonishing detective work in weaving together disordered pages of manuscript, which now fill a 100-year gap in musical history.

As far back as 1817, a German musical periodical reported that Clementi, some of whose 100 sonatas were held in high regard by Beethoven and Haydn and who as an established pianist gave an audition in 1824 to Franz Liszt, then 13 years old, was composing six symphonies that were to be his bid for symphonic fame.

Mellowed newspaper clippings later attested to the popularity, between 1786 and 1824, of these an his other 14 symphonies. Yet whe he died in 1832, bequeathing all hi manuscripts to his widow, none bu sonata scores could be found.

Clementi was a practical man o affairs, and his large estate was i good order. But his symphonie never had been printed, and the dropped from public knowledge fo the next 40 years. Two manu scripts came into the possession the British museum in 1871, but, unconnected, they merely intensified the fruitless search for the others.

Then in 1917, Dr. William H. Cummings, a London music scholar, died, and in a chest in his attic were found a number of Clementi manuscripts, incomplete and in utter disorder.

A public auction in London soon resulted in their purchase by Carl Engel, chief of the music division for the Library of Congress of the United States.

In 1924, a magazine article concerning the Washington scores

(Continued from Page Twelve)

piqued the curiosity of Casella, who had been intensely interested in earning recognition for Clementi as a great symphonist. Ten years passed before Casella finally crossed the ocean to begin serious study of the scores.

Putting them together was similar to reassembling several jig-saw puzzles at once. Nevertheless, hard work yielded four symphonies last year, although in each the first movement was incomplete.

Recalling the two manuscripts held in the British museum, Casella went to London, armed with photostatic copies of the Washington library scores. Careful work restored all four, and two were performed and published last year. The first, third and fourth required some slight filling in by Casella, but the second, which will be performed Friday, was complete, and received its first performance under Casella in Rome last January.

Dr. Koussevitzky first learned of the scores from Casella, and after studying them minutely the last few weeks, described the music as possessing "great charm and brilliance."

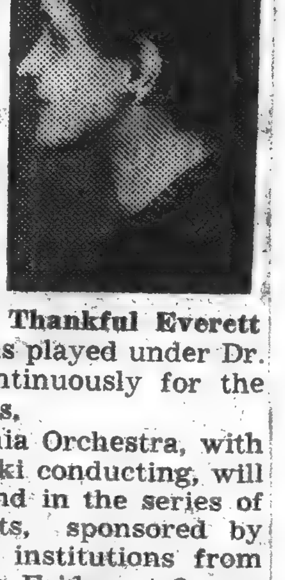
CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
NEWS

NOV 18 1936

There's Music on the Air

By THANKFUL EVERETT

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, will resume broadcasts Thursday at 7:45 p.m. over NBC-WJZ. This will be the fifth season of music of the world-famous group that has been carried over NBC. Instead of broadcasting the entire series from Boston as heretofore, concerts this year will be heard from Symphony Hall, Boston; Carnegie Hall, New York; Sanders Theater at Harvard University, Cambridge, and the Academy of Music, Brooklyn. The series of twenty-one programs will include nine of the "pop concerts" and all will be presented over a coast-to-coast network. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is recognized throughout the world as one of the greatest symphonic organizations. It has played under Dr. Koussevitzky continuously for the past several years.



Thankful Everett

The Philadelphia Orchestra, with Leopold Stokowski conducting, will present the second in the series of weekly broadcasts, sponsored by leading banking institutions from coast to coast, on Friday at 9 p.m. over the Columbia system. The program, originating from the Curtis Institute of Music, Philadelphia, will include "Danse Macabre" (Saint-Saens), "March" and "Trepak" from "The Nutcracker Suite" (Tschaikowsky) and "Second Hungarian Rhapsody" (Liszt). W. M. Kiplinger, Washington journalist, will speak briefly.

Rear Admiral William Woodward, United States Navy, retired, will make a brief talk on "Music in the Home" on the Music Is My Hobby broadcast to be heard Thursday at 6:15 p.m. over NBC-WJZ. Mrs. Phelps will be guest artist, playing the piano works of Bach, Schubert and Chopin.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 29 1936

Concert Thursday

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Sinfonietta, composed of 50 players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be presented by the Pawtucket Civic Music Association in its second concert of the season, Thursday evening, at 8:30 o'clock, in the auditorium of the Pawtucket senior high school.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

NOV 19 1936

ON THE AIR

NBC (Red) WEAF | NBC (Blue) WJZ | Columbia WABC

SYMPHONY TO OPEN NEW SERIES

Boston Orchestra Inaugurates Fifth Season on Air Tonight

Another of radio's outstanding features returns to the air tonight when the world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra inaugurates its fifth season of broadcasts exclusively over networks of the National Broadcasting Company.

This program, to be heard over the NBC-Blue Network from 8.45 to 9.30 will be broadcast from Carnegie Hall in New York where the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be playing the first of its annual subscription series of New York concerts.

With Dr. Serge Koussevitzky again conducting, two noted masterworks of symphonic literature will be performed: Haydn's B Flat Symphony, No. 102, the ninth of his "London Symphonies"; and Debussy's "La Mer."

Boston Post, Nov. 2/36

85

WPA BAND PLAYS FOR SOKOLOFF

125 Musicians Give Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem"

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Whatever may be the fate in future of the federal music project, its fruits have been many. At the Opera House last evening a very large audience heard and applauded in no uncertain manner such pieces as the First Symphony of Brahms and Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem." The occasion was a concert by some 125 WPA musicians under the leadership of Dr. Nikolai Sokoloff, national director of the music project.

Besides the pieces mentioned the programme also listed Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, a Minuet by the Milwaukee-born composer Heinz Roemheld, and the Sailors' Dance from Gliere's "The Red Poppy."

FRIEND OF LOEFFLER

If one fruit of these WPA musical activities has been a widened appreciation of good music on the part of the public, another has been an increase in proficiency on the part of the local orchestral musicians. If everything at the Opera House last evening was not quite what it might have been at Symphony Hall, the performances were adequate—which is quite a bit to say. And one item on the programme received a more stirring and vital reading than is often its lot under loftier auspices. That piece was "A Pagan Poem."

As a member of the Symphony Orchestra when "A Pagan Poem" was first played by that organization in 1907, as a pupil and friend of Mr. Loeffler and one who has worked ardently for his music at every turn, Dr. Sokoloff might well be expected to prove an authoritative interpreter of this composition. Last night he was that and more, and as assistants he had both a responsive orchestra with its solo English horn and trumpets and Heinrich Gebhard, who might be called the official pianist of "A Pagan Poem," so cleverly has he been identified with the life of this composition. The facts here stated were presented to the audience by Dr. Sokoloff himself when, after the ovation tendered the performance, he made an impromptu speech of gratitude.

GAZETTE

NOV 19 1936

BOOK REVIEW

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA 1936

An attractive new volume to reach the Herald's book reviewer is entitled "Boston Symphony Orchestra 1936". This volume will appeal greatly to those persons who are acquainted with the Boston Symphony, its membership, its traditions, and the superb musical genius which is incorporated in the concerts presented at Symphony Hall in Boston.

This volume is made up of charcoal drawings of the orchestra members with biographical sketches, the work of Jerome Brush, and is printed by the Merrymount Press of Boston.

An appreciation by Edward Weeks, incorporated in the book, truly states that Gerome Brush has performed a public service. "He has singled out the black and white keys of one of the greatest instruments in the world. With the strokes of his crayon and the sympathy of his pen he has brought to light the individuality of the one hundred and nine members of the Boston Symphony."

"Each musician sat for him in the little room that houses the Casadesus Collection; each played for him a solo in order to banish the last vestige of self-consciousness, and from each he has drawn comments, bits of personal history, and the gleam of aspirations which are characteristic."

This volume, with its unusually fine portrait charcoal drawings, and its short and fascinating biographical sketches, should enlarge our power of musical appreciation and allow us to realize in the Symphony concerts not alone an impersonal harmony but also to know something of the performers.

TARRYTOWN, N. Y.
NEWS

NOV 19 1936

Boston Symphony Orchestra Returns To Air Waves Tonight

Famous Musical Organization To Broadcast Program Over WJZ at 8:45 o'Clock From Carnegie Hall—Cordell Hull To Speak

Another of radio's outstanding features returns to the air tonight when the world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra inaugurates its fifth season of broadcasts.

This program, to be heard over WJZ from 8:45 to 9:30 o'clock, will be broadcast from Carnegie Hall in New York where the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be playing the first of its annual subscription series of New York concerts.

Secretary of State Cordell Hull and Dr. Jose Carlos de Macedo Soares, Minister of Foreign Affairs of Brazil, will discuss a phase of the Pan-American Peace Conference during a broadcast from Rio de Janeiro from 10:30 to 11 P. M. over WJZ.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

NOV 19 1936

RADIO
NEWS • PROGRAMS • VIEWS

Symphony to Inaugurate Its Fifth Annual Series

Boston Orchestra Returns to Radio Tonight—Governor of Puerto Rico—Peace Conference—University Extension Debate—'Music Is My Hobby'—'Then and Now'—Bing Crosb

One of radio's outstanding features will return to the air tonight when the Boston Symphony orchestra inaugurates its fifth season of broadcasts. The program, to be heard over WBZA between 8.45 and 9.30, will be broadcast from Carnegie hall, New York city, where the orchestra will be playing the first of its annual subscription series of New York concerts. The program is listed in the "Music in the Air" column.

Blanton Winship, governor of Puerto Rico, will discuss the commercial importance of this United States island possession in a talk over WMAS this afternoon at 4.30. Gov Winship arrived from Puerto Rico a few days ago to confer with President Roosevelt on proposed legislation for the betterment of the island.

Secretary of State Cordell Hull and Dr Jose Carlos de Macedo Soares, minister of foreign affairs of Brazil, will discuss a phase of the Pan-American peace conference during a broadcast from Rio de Janeiro tonight at 10.30 over WBZA. "The peace conference and Brazilian-American relations" is the topic for the discussion. Edward Tomlinson will direct the program.

GAZETTE

NOV 20 1936

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PUBLISHES BROCHURE

The new brochure entitled "Boston Symphony Orchestra - Charcoal Drawings of its Members, with biographical sketches by Gerome Brush", and containing a foreword of appreciation by Edward Weeks, is indeed a masterpiece of portraiture through the medium of charcoal. The "appreciation" is beautifully written and the biographical sketches are brief and breezy and seem to reflect in spirit the harmony and the rhythm of the artists they describe.

To the lovers of orchestral music this brochure will become a treasured reminder of happy hours spent under the spell of music written by the masters and interpreted by a group of over one hundred of the world's finest musicians under the able direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

Ever since the Boston Symphony Orchestra was founded by Henry Lee Higginson in 1881, it has continued to reach and has attained to greater heights of musical attainment, and this new and beautiful brochure which we acknowledge with grateful appreciation will do much to renew old friendships and revive support for this outstanding New England contribution to the world of fine arts.

MECHANICSBURG, PA.
LOCAL NEWS

NOV 20 1936

NEXT ORCHESTRA CONCERT ON DEC. 1

Harrisburg Symphony to Play "The White Peacock" of Charles Griffes

When the Harrisburg Symphony Orchestra presents its second concert of the season on December 1, George King Raudenbush will present for the first time in Harrisburg, "The White Peacock," one of the outstanding compositions of Charles Griffes America's lately recognized genius.

In presenting this number Mr. Raudenbush is including in this concert an unusual work and one which is considered as typifying best the style of the composer. Mr. Griffes, a native of New York State, had a brief but arduous life. He died in 1920 at the age of 36. Since his death it has been realized that America lost a rare and original musician. His talent was first given wide recognition in 1919 when the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented his symphonic poem after Coleridge, "The Pleasure of Kubla Khan." Inclusion of Griffes' compositions in more and more concert programs since then has advanced him to a national position.

"The White Peacock" is one of "Four Roman Sketches" originally written for piano in 1915-1916, and first presented by the young composer before the MacDowell Club in New York in 1918. It is based on a poem by William Sharp. The story is that of the languid movement of a white peacock through a sunlight flooded garden where, in the words of the poet, he appears as if "a dream of the moonlight were real for a moment."

In Griffes' symphonic setting of the poem the clarinets and flutes play the leading themes while the strings furnish an harmonic background. The combined whole is an unique and beautiful musical composition.

CINCINNATI, O.
POST

NOV 19 1936

Waltzing on the Record

You may be finding yourself in a waltz mood any minute now, what with long evenings, old-fashioneds and the like. When the humor hits, you may be prepared with a new RCA Victor musical masterpiece album:

BRAHM'S WALTZES AND INTERMEZZI, played by Wilhelm Bachaus, pianist.

A layman may be pardoned a slight prejudice in favor of the waltzes, particularly those moments suggesting Chopin. Here Mr. Bachaus and the recording engineers have entrapped melody and rhythm that are likely to leave anyone utterly worn out with ecstacy. For more serious listeners, and those who know their music, the intermezzi, obviously, will reveal superior depth and craftmanship.

From the same company and in the same series comes:

SHUBERT'S SYMPHONY No. 8 IN B MINOR, played by the Boston Symphony with Serge Koussevitsky conducting.

Next to its immaculate Goossens, Cincinnati often rates Koussevitsky as its favored conductor, largely because the wily Serge brought here his band for a performance of works which had been road-showed so often that the organization was letter-perfect. Be that as it may, the old master has contrived in these records a tenderly clinging beauty whose appeal ranges through all classes of readers—from those who know the noble "Unfinished" as grand music on down to those who imagined that "Blossom Time" was an original creation by a show composer of the present generation.

To these two albums we subscribe heartily because they should capture the fancy and approval of anyone, be he a technician or just a fellow who wants his music a substantial joy.

New from RCA Victor come these individual records:

BALI, parts one, two and three, symphonic variations by Henry Eicheim, played by Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra. And here the stormy "Stokie" exercises his players' talents and his listeners' ears. On the remaining side of the second record awaits "Etenraku," an 18th century ceremonial prelude orchestrated by Hidemaro Kunoye. And Stokowski is still playing!

CHOPIN'S Masurka in C Sharp Minor, Etude in C Sharp Minor and Etude in G Flat Minor, played by Vladimir Horowitz, pianist. To Horowitz, for his several local appearances, Cincinnati invariably extends acclaim, he being one of the master showmen at the keyboards for the moment. In these exquisite passages Cincinnati will find him superlative and as circusy as ever.

—F. A.

CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER

Revue Music Writer Has Varied Interests

Composes Under Name of Duke, Goes 'Classic' as Dukelsky; Ballet Given

Vernon Duke, one of the more prominent composers of music, returns to this city this week in a dual role. As Duke, he, with Ted Fetter, created much of the music for Vincente Minnelli's revue, "The Show Is On" which brings Bee Lillie and Bert Lahr to the Forrest Theatre for a two week engagement beginning November 22. As Dukelski he composed "Tragedian," the Paul Haakon ballet which is one of the more ambitious features of the show.

It is difficult to know which one of this Russian composer's two 'selves' should be signaled out for special commendation. Certainly his music for the revue genre, as judged by "The Show Is On" and "Ziegfeld Follies," has carried him in the last two years to the Olympian heights, while his popular tune "April in Paris," has been called one of the finest light songs ever sung on our stage during the past 10 years.

On the other hand as Vladimir Dukelsky his oratorio "Epitaph" was recently presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky and previous to that two symphonies and a ballet suite of his were included in earlier programs of the distinguished orchestra.

He was born in northern Russia in October of 1903, of Russian and Spanish parents. He studied in the conservatories of Moscow and Kiev, and completed his musical education when he was 16. It was under the beneficient influence of Kiev that he wrote his first orchestral work, "Intermezzo" which was finished when he was 12.

The revolution of 1919 forced him out of Russia and by various ways and means he got to America by 1921. His first year and a half in this country was spent writing music alien to the type which now bears the name of Vernon Duke. He returned to Europe and published a piano concerto, which brought him notice, with the result that he was commissioned by the late Diaghileff to write a ballet. The work was "Zephr" and "Flora" which was performed all over Europe. It had quite a success, and Duke began to achieve some fame. To cite one instance of it, he was done in oil by Picasso.

Then he went to London and met Charles B. Cochran. It is believed that Mr. Cochran grew persuasive and sought to instruct him in the musical comedy thesis that one saxophone is worth a dozen violins.

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST

NOV 21 1936

Revue Music Writer Has Varied Interests

Composes Under Name of Duke, Goes 'Classic' as Dukelsky; Ballet Given

Vernon Duke, one of the more prominent composers of music, returns to this city next week in a dual role. As Duke, he, with Ted Fetter, created much of the music for Vincente Minnelli's revue, "The Show Is On" which brings Bee Lillie and Bert Lahr to the Forrest Theatre for a two week engagement beginning November 22. As Dukelski he composed "Tragedian," the Paul Haakon ballet which is one of the more ambitious features of the show.

It is difficult to know which one of this Russian composer's two 'selves' should be signaled out for special commendation. Certainly his music for the revue genre, as judged by "The Show Is On" and "Ziegfeld Follies," has carried him in the last two years to the Olympian heights, while his popular tune "April in Paris," has been called one of the finest light songs ever sung on our stage during the past 10 years.

On the other hand as Vladimir Dukelsky his oratorio "Epitaph" was recently presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky and previous to that two symphonies and a ballet suite of his were included in earlier programs of the distinguished orchestra.

He was born in northern Russia in October of 1903, of Russian and Spanish parents. He studied in the conservatories of Moscow and Kiev, and completed his musical education when he was 16. It was under the beneficient influence of Kiev that he wrote his first orchestral work, "Intermezzo" which was finished when he was 12.

The revolution of 1919 forced him out of Russia and by various ways and means he got to America by 1921. His first year and a half in this country was spent writing music alien to the type which now bears the name of Vernon Duke. He returned to Europe and published a piano concerto, which brought him notice, with the result that he was commissioned by the late Diaghileff to write a ballet. The work was "Zephr" and "Flora" which was performed all over Europe. It had quite a success, and Duke began to achieve some fame. To cite one instance of it, he was done in oil by Picasso.

Then he went to London and met Charles B. Cochran. It is believed that Mr. Cochran grew persuasive and sought to instruct him in the musical comedy thesis that one saxophone is worth a dozen violins.

NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
HERALD

NOV 21 1936

Mr. and Mrs. Richard White of Elbridge road entertained Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Cooper at dinner on Tuesday evening before attending the Boston Symphony concert at Bushnell Memorial hall in Hartford.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 20 1936

American Pianist Will Be Soloist with Orchestra

Sheridan to Play Schumann Concerto Under Gordon

FRANK SHERIDAN

Frank Sheridan, who will appear as guest pianist with the Hartford Symphony, Nov. 24, at the Bushnell, was born in New York and received all his training in this country.

After successful appearances here, he went to Europe where he won plaudits in Vienna, Milan, Florence, Rome, Venice, Bologna and Pisa. His success in London and Berlin may be judged from the fact that he gave two recitals in the former city and three in the latter.

Returning to this country, he rolled up 10 recitals in Carnegie and Town Hall to his credit, as well as solo appearances with the New York Philharmonic, Boston, Chicago and Detroit Symphony Orchestras. Mrs. E. S. Coolidge chose him to take part in the Coolidge Music Festivals at the Library of Congress in Washington and in the Stanford University Brahms chamber music series in California.

Member of Noted Family

The Sheridan family tree is a voluminously branched one with roots extending far down into Irish, English, German, Russian and Portuguese soil. His great-uncle was librarian of the erstwhile New York Symphony when Dr. Leopold Damrosch was the conductor.

Other uncles were members of the noted Klein family: Charles, the playwright who went down in the Lusitania; Manuel, who composed music for the old Hippodrome shows; Alfred, comedian with De Wolf Hopper; Herman, London teacher.

Apparently, however, Mr. Sheridan is the first of the family to adopt a musical instrument as a profession. He began studying at the age of seven and made his first public appearance when he was 12. Later he established himself as a pianist of ability by winning a competitive test which entitled him to appear at the Stadium with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony.

Pupil of Stillman and Bauer

After his preliminary studies he worked with Louis Stillman in preparation for study under Raffael Joseffy, but that eminent pianist's death compelled a revision of plans and he remained with Stillman for eight years. This was followed by a "glorious summer," as he terms it, with Harold Bauer at Seal Harbor, Me. Then came the start of the career which led to the European tour of 1929-30 and numerous American appearances since then.

Mr. Sheridan will play the solo in Schumann's Concerto in A Minor for piano and orchestra with the Hartford Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Jacques Gordon in his appearance at the Bushnell Memorial next Tuesday at 8:30 p. m.

HARRISBURG, PA.
PATRIOT

NOV 20 1936

NEXT ORCHESTRA CONCERT ON DEC. 1

Symphony to Play "The White Peacock," Composition of Charles Griffes

When the Harrisburg Symphony Orchestra presents its second concert of the season on December 1, George King Raudenbush will present for the first time in Harrisburg, "The White Peacock," one of the outstanding compositions of Charles Griffes America's lately recognized genius.

In presenting this number Mr. Raudenbush is including in this concert an unusual work and one which is considered as typifying best the style of the composer. Mr. Griffes, a native of New York State, had a brief but arduous life. He died in 1920 at the age of 36. Since his death it has been realized that America lost a rare and original musician. His talent was first given wide recognition in 1919 when the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented his symphonic poem after Coleridge, "The Pleasure of Kubla Khan." Inclusion of Griffes' compositions in more and more concert programs since then has advanced him to a national position.

"The White Peacock" is one of "Four Roman Sketches" originally written for piano in 1915-1916, and first presented by the young composer before the MacDowell Club in New York in 1918. It is based on a poem by William Sharp. The story is that of the languid movement of a white peacock through a sunlight flooded garden where, in the words of the poet, he appears as if "a dream of the moonlight were real for a moment."

In Griffes' symphonic setting of the poem the clarinets and flutes play the leading themes while the strings furnish an harmonic background. The combined whole is an unique and beautiful musical composition.

* * *

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

Thursday

The Thanksgiving day football battle between University of Pennsylvania and Cornell university at Franklin field, Philadelphia, will be broadcast over WGR, Thursday, at 1:45 o'clock.

* * *

"The Courtship of Miles Standish," one of America's best known literary successes, will be dramatized during a special program on Thursday at 2 o'clock over WBEN. The script and original music to be employed in the re-telling of the story was written by Wells Hively, young American composer.

* * *

Richard Burgin, assistant conductor of the orchestra, will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in a concert broadcast from Sanders theater, Harvard university, on Thursday at 8 o'clock, WEBR. Burgin has programmed the Toccato in C Major, one of Bach's many organ compositions, to open the concert. The second and concluding number will be Kalinnikov's Symphony No. 1 in G Minor.

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

NOV 22 1936

Boston Symphony Dec. 9

The Masonic Temple Association announces the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting at the Masonic Auditorium on Wednesday evening, Dec. 9.

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
EAGLE NEWS

NOV 21 1936

Englishman Groomed for Toscanini's Job

HE HAS A JOB

John Barbirolli, "capable fellow but young," is following Toscanini as conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony.

NEW YORK—(AP)—John Barbirolli, poor man, may very well feel like a Galahad among the Gadarene swine, for he has the toughest job of any musician in the western hemisphere.

Mr. Barbirolli is succeeding Arturo Toscanini.

One hurdle is that very fact. There can be, in the public mind at least, no replacing the peerless and unique Toscanini, idolized as no conductor ever was.

Item: there is, in a certain composition board locker in Carnegie hall, a hole. The hole was kicked in the locker by Toscanini in a tantrum. The owner of the locker, one of the minor employes of the famous hall, says, "As long as I use the locker the hole never will be repaired."

Many Wanted Job

Another is the fact that practically every conductor in the world aspired to the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society podium, exceptions being Serge Koussevitzky in Boston, Leopold Stokowski in Philadelphia and Frederick Stock in Chicago.

Item: "Yes indeed," says a certain well known conductor, "I'm sure Mr. Barbirolli is a very capable fellow. Of course, he's very young—"

Another is the fact that many reviewers who will deal with Mr. Barbirolli have fairly set ideas on him before he even makes his debut.

Item: one New York "critic" already has published a somewhat caustic comment on the Philharmonic's decision to hire a conductor nobody knew.

And also there is the matter of Barbirolli's nationality. In spite of his Italian name, he is English.

Item: "Whoever heard of a first rate conductor out of England?" asked a well known pianist the other day.

Has Many Novelties

Just the same Barbirolli has already announced almost as many interesting novelties for his ten-week tenure of office as Toscanini played in the decade he headed the orchestra.

One of them is Vaughan Williams' "Masque for Dancing in Nine Scenes." Others include: Leo Wiener's transcription of Liszt's "Weinen Klagen"; the overture to "Les Deux Aveugles de Toledo" by Mehul; Sibelius' "Pojola's Daughter"; Bax's "The Garden of Fand"; Liadoff's "The Enchanted Lake"; Barbirolli's own concerto for oboe and strings based on themes from Pergolesi; the Purcell-Wood Trumpet Voluntary, and a dance rhapsody of Delius.

And his choices from the standard repertoire are as unconventional. One is Schubert's second symphony, which is more than a hundred years old, and has never been played by the Philharmonic.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

NOV 21

Spalding Is to Be Violin Soloist at Concert Tuesday

ALBERT SPALDING

Richard Burgin to Wield Baton for the First Time in Providence

Albert Spalding, American violinist, will be guest artist for the second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Metropolitan theatre, Tuesday evening, it was announced today. A native of Chicago who obtained the larger part of his musical education in Italy. Spalding will appear with the orchestra in Mozart's concerto in D major. The concerto was composed by Mozart during the early days of his career in Paris.

Spalding was graduated from the Bologna Conservatory at 11 and continued his studies in Paris with Lefort, making his first public appearance as a violinist in the French capital in 1905. His career was interrupted during the war when he served as an aviator in Italy. He is to appear later in the season in Boston.

The baton will be in the hands of Richard Burgin, assistant conductor and concert master of the orchestra, Tuesday night, for the first time in Providence. He will lead the orchestra in the first symphony of Kalinnikov, the Russian composer, who died on the threshhold of a brilliant career at the end of the last century. The symphony is regarded as characteristically Slavic in theme, a melodious and transparent work throughout. The program will open with the organ toccata and fugue in C major, of Johann Sebastian Bach. The number has been scored for full orchestra by Leo Weiner, Hungarian composer.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

NOV 21 1936

ON THE AIR

BOSTON SYMPHONY—The first two of a series of concerts under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky: Thurs. Eve., Nov. 19, at 8:45; and Thurs. Eve., Nov. 26, at 8, WJZ.

FOOTBALL—Sat. Aft., Nov. 21: Yale vs. Harvard, at 1:45, WOR; Princeton vs. Dartmouth, at 1:45, WABC; see daily papers for games to be broadcast over WEAF and WJZ. . . . Sun. Aft., Nov. 22: N. Y. Giants vs. Green Bay Packers, at 2:15, WOR. . . . Thurs. Aft., Nov. 26: Pennsylvania vs. Cornell, at 1:45, WABC.

SAN FRANCISCO OPERA—Second act of "Das Rheingold," with Schorr, Manski, and others: Sat., Nov. 21, at 12 midnight, WJZ.

RICHARD CROOKS—Tenor soloist with the Ford Symphony and Chorus, Iturbi conducting: Sun. Eve., Nov. 22, at 9, WABC.

GLADYS SWARTHOUT—Singing with the Cleveland Orchestra, Rodzinski conducting: Sun. Eve., Nov. 22, at 10, WEAF.

SOME WEEKLY FEATURES (Listing is chronological) Rochester Philharmonic, Harrison conducting: Thurs. at 3:15, WJZ. . . . Coolidge String Quartet: Thurs. and Tues. at 3:30, WABC. . . . Rudy Vallée's Varieties: Thurs. at 8, WEAF. . . . Lanny Ross and Al Goodman: Thurs. at 9, WEAF. . . . March of Time: Thurs. at 10:30, WABC. . . . Music Appreciation Hour, Damrosch conducting: Fri. at 2, WEAF-WJZ. . . . Kreiner String Quartet: Fri. at 3, WABC. . . . Hollywood Hotel: Fri. at 9, WABC. . . . Philadelphia Orchestra, Stokowski conducting: Fri. at 10 WABC. . . . Cincinnati Conservatory of Music Sat. at 11 A.M., WABC. . . . Abram Chasins: Sat. at 12 noon, WEAF. . . . Football scores: Sat. at 6:30 and 7:15, WABC. . . . Ed Wynn: Sat. at 8, WJZ. . . . Alexander Semmler: Sun. at 10:30 A.M., WABC. . . . Pittsburgh Symphony, Modarelli conducting: Sun. at 2, WABC. . . . Philharmonic-Symphony, Barbirolli conducting: Sun. at 3, WABC. . . . Stoopnagle and Budd: Sun. at 5:30, WJZ. . . . Echoes of New York Town: Sun. at 6, WJZ. . . . Jack Benny: Sun. at 7, WEAF. . . . Classics of the Keyboard: Sun. at 7:15, WOR. . . . Phil Baker: Sun. at 7:30, WABC. . . . Nelson Eddy: Sun. at 8, WABC. . . . Eddie Cantor: Sun. at 8:30, WABC. . . . Paul Whiteman: Sun. at 9:15, WJZ. . . . Rochester Civic Orchestra, Harrison conducting: Mon. at 3, WJZ. . . . E. Robert Schmitz: Mon. at 3:30, WABC. . . . Helen Hayes: Mon. at 8, WJZ. . . . Fred Astaire, Charles Butterworth, and Johnny Green: Tues. at 9:30, WEAF. . . . Fannie Brice: Wed. at 8, WJZ. . . . Ethel Barrymore: Wed. at 8:30, WJZ. . . . Burns and Allen: Wed. at 8:30, WABC. . . . Fred Allen: Wed. at 9, WEAF. . . . Nino Martini and André Kostelanetz: Wed. at 9, WABC. (Times are P.M.)

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

NOV 22 1936

Boston Symphony Members Sketched

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he conducts, are rated by authorities as either the greatest conductor and the greatest orchestra in the world, or as among the three greatest. Certainly that makes Koussevitzky and his men a group with whom acquaintanceship would be an enviable distinction. And now anyone may feel on friendly footing with all of them simply by turning the pages of a very engaging book. It contains sketches of Koussevitzky and his musicians made from life by a noted artist. Gerome Brush. Each of the 108 members of the world-famous orchestra was sketched in action—the first time such a thing has been achieved with the Boston Symphony or any other great orchestra.

COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN Nov. 21/36

Off the Record

JOHANNES BRAHMS appears at his most characteristic—the grave or gay poet, the thoughtful craftsman—in two of the month's albums of records. For Columbia Myra Hess, Yelli d'Aranyi and Gaspar Cassado have made the Opus 87 Trio for piano, violin and 'cello. For Victor Wilhelm Bachaus has played some of the outstanding piano music, the 16 Waltzes of Opus 39 and assorted Intermezzi from 116, 117 and 119.

The waltzes (of which that in A-flat is, in sundry perverted versions, almost too familiar) were originally written for four hands, but were re-cast in this form by the composer. The deftest and most entrancing of miniatures, they reflect the joy which the serious, North German Brahms found in the urbane gaiety of Vienna where, at the age of 29, he made his home. The Intermezzi are the work of his maturity, and display effortless mastery of form and depths of controlled emotion.

These lovely works are all among the indispensable treasures of piano literature. For these records, they have been handled with the greatest penetration and skill by the distinguished German artist, who made a similar Brahms album in 1934. Pianists with notions of their own may quarrel with this or that detail, but on the whole, it is the authentic Brahms who speaks from these fingers and this wax.

Strangely and unfortunately, the recording engineers have not captured the essential timbre of the piano here as successfully as they have, for instance, in the Horowitz record on the current list. His performances of Chopin's Mazurka in C-sharp-minor and of two of the Etudes of Opus 10 (4 and 5) for Victor are not only marvels of dexterous and imaginative pianism, but of incredibly faithful reproduction as well.

Chamber music was particularly congenial to Brahms. He disliked crowds, but expanded in a roomful of his friends; his music often reflects the intimate nature of his personal relationships. The second of his three trios for piano and strings is a model of the compactness of which he was master. A wealth of thematic material is used with the utmost economy, yet the effect is of richness rather than spareness. That the work ever was considered forbidding is beyond belief; at first hearing it is captivating, and it becomes more endearing upon repetition. The three present performers bring it to resonant life with the highest skill and sensitivity, with, if fault is to be found, a restraint too considered and too mutually submissive. The recording is of the best.

* * *

IN 1822 a musical society of Graz rather casually offered an honorary membership to a modest young Viennese composer, known chiefly for his prodigious output of songs. The 25-year-old Schubert proffered, as thanks for the honor, two movements of a symphony on which he had been working, and for which he had sketched the few opening bars of a scherzo. He indicated that he would complete it and dedicate it to the Grazers, but that musical fellowship did not even trouble to acknowledge the priceless gift and the B-minor symphony did not come to performance during the composer's brief and pathetic life.

In our time, however, the "Unfinished" has become the most popular of symphonies. The Gramophone Shop's Encyclopedia lists 11 different recordings of it. This month Victor makes that an even dozen with a new reading by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky. If only as a mechanical feat, the beauty of the recording will make it the most desirable of the 12. But that is not to say that the famous orchestra does not achieve one of its smoothest and shapeliest performances with the perennial work. Mr. Koussevitzky seems a little indefinite about certain of his tempos, but, apart from that, he projects the work with uncommon clarity and skill.

Two notable violinists turn to two ancient masters for the November records. Albert Spalding, with his faithful Andre Benoist at the piano, presents, for Victor, the "Devil's Trill" sonata of Tartini with a sort of exyielding competence. He presents, to be exact, half of the sonata; a completing record was delayed until December. Fiddling of a more warm and sensitive sort is recorded, for Columbia, by Nathan Milstein, companioned by Leopold Mittmann, in the A-major sonata of Vivaldi, Felicien David's arrangement. Music, performance and recording are all of the first quality.

—R. L. F. M.

86

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 20 1936

American Pianist Will Be Soloist with Orchestra

Sheridan to Play Schumann Concerto Under Gordon

FRANK SHERIDAN

Frank Sheridan, who will appear as guest pianist with the Hartford Symphony, Nov. 24, at the Bushnell, was born in New York and received all his training in this country.

After successful appearances here, he went to Europe where he won plaudits in Vienna, Milan, Florence, Rome, Venice, Bologna and Pisa. His success in London and Berlin may be judged from the fact that he gave two recitals in the former city and three in the latter.

Returning to this country, he rolled up 10 recitals in Carnegie and Town Hall to his credit, as well as solo appearances with the New York Philharmonic, Boston, Chicago and Detroit Symphony Orchestras. Mrs. E. S. Coolidge chose him to take part in the Coolidge Music Festivals at the Library of Congress in Washington and in the Stanford University Brahms chamber music series in California.

Member of Noted Family

The Sheridan family tree is a voluminously branched one with roots extending far down into Irish, English, German, Russian and Portuguese soil. His great-uncle was librarian of the erstwhile New York Symphony when Dr. Leopold Damrosch was the conductor.

Other uncles were members of the noted Klein family: Charles, the playwright who went down in the Lusitania; Manuel, who composed music for the old Hippodrome shows; Alfred, comedian with De Wolf Hopper; Herman, London teacher.

Apparently, however, Mr. Sheridan is the first of the family to adopt a musical instrument as a profession. He began studying at the age of seven and made his first public appearance when he was 12. Later he established himself as a pianist of ability by winning a competitive test which entitled him to appear at the Stadium with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony.

Pupil of Stillman and Bauer

After his preliminary studies he worked with Louis Stillman in preparation for study under Raffael Joseffy, but that eminent pianist's death compelled a revision of plans and he remained with Stillman for eight years. This was followed by a "glorious summer," as he terms it, with Harold Bauer at Seal Harbor, Me. Then came the start of the career which led to the European tour of 1929-30 and numerous American appearances since then.

Mr. Sheridan will play the solo in Schumann's Concerto in A Minor for piano and orchestra with the Hartford Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Jacques Gordon in his appearance at the Bushnell Memorial next Tuesday at 8:30 p. m.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

NOV 21 1936

Thursday

The Thanksgiving day football battle between University of Pennsylvania and Cornell university at Franklin field, Philadelphia, will be broadcast over WGR, Thursday, at 1:45 o'clock.

* * *

"The Courtship of Miles Standish," one of America's best known literary successes, will be dramatized during a special program on Thursday at 2 o'clock over WBEN. The script and original music to be employed in the re-telling of the story was written by Wells Hively, young American composer.

* * *

Richard Burgin, assistant conductor of the orchestra, will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in a concert broadcast from Sanders theater, Harvard university, on Thursday at 8 o'clock, WEBR. Burgin has programmed the Toccato in C Major, one of Bach's many organ compositions, to open the concert. The second and concluding number will be Kalinnikov's Symphony No. 1 in G Minor.

HARRISBURG, PA.
PATRIOT

NOV 20 1936

NEXT ORCHESTRA CONCERT ON DEC. 1

Symphony to Play "The White Peacock," Composition of Charles Griffes

When the Harrisburg Symphony Orchestra presents its second concert of the season on December 1, George King Raudenbush will present for the first time in Harrisburg, "The White Peacock," one of the outstanding compositions of Charles Griffes America's lately recognized genius.

In presenting this number Mr. Raudenbush is including in this concert an unusual work and one which is considered as typifying best the style of the composer. Mr. Griffes, a native of New York State, had a brief but arduous life. He died in 1920 at the age of 36. Since his death it has been realized that America lost a rare and original musician. His talent was first given wide recognition in 1919 when the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented his symphonic poem after Coleridge, "The Pleasure of Kubla Khan." Inclusion of Griffes' compositions in more and more concert programs since then has advanced him to a national position.

"The White Peacock" is one of "Four Roman Sketches" originally written for piano in 1915-1916, and first presented by the young composer before the MacDowell Club in New York in 1918. It is based on a poem by William Sharp. The story is that of the languid movement of a white peacock through a sunlight flooded garden where, in the words of the poet, he appears as if "a dream of the moonlight were real for a moment."

In Griffes' symphonic setting of the poem the clarinets and flutes play the leading themes while the strings furnish an harmonic background. The combined whole is an unique and beautiful musical composition.

* * *

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

NOV 22 1936

Boston Symphony Dec. 9

The Masonic Temple Association announces the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting at the Masonic Auditorium on Wednesday evening, Dec. 9.

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
EAGLE NEWS

NOV 21 1936

Englishman Groomed for Toscanini's Job

NEW YORK—(AP)—John Barbirolli, poor man, may very well feel like a Galahad among the Gadarene swine, for he has the toughest job of any musician in the western hemisphere.

Mr. Barbirolli is succeeding Arturo Toscanini.

One hurdle is that very fact. There can be, in the public mind at least, no replacing the peerless and unique Toscanini, idolized as no conductor ever was.

Item: there is, in a certain composition board locker in Carnegie hall, a hole. The hole was kicked in the locker by Toscanini in a tantrum. The owner of the locker, one of the minor employes of the famous hall, says. "As long as I use the locker the hole never will be repaired."

Many Wanted Job

Another is the fact that practically every conductor in the world aspired to the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society podium, exceptions being Serge Koussevitzky in Boston, Leopold Stokowski in Philadelphia and Frederick Stock in Chicago.

Item: "Yes indeed," says a certain well known conductor, "I'm sure Mr. Barbirolli is a very capable fellow. Of course, he's very young—"

Another is the fact that many reviewers who will deal with Mr. Barbirolli have fairly set ideas on him before he even makes his debut.

Item: one New York "critic" already has published a somewhat caustic comment on the Philharmonic's decision to hire a conductor nobody knew.

And also there is the matter of Barbirolli's nationality. In spite of his Italian name, he is English.

Item: "Whoever heard of a first rate conductor out of England?" asked a well known pianist the other day.

Has Many Novelties

Just the same Barbirolli has already announced almost as many interesting novelties for his ten-week tenure of office as Toscanini played in the decade he headed the orchestra.

HE HAS A JOB

John Barbirolli, "capable fellow but young," is following Toscanini as conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony.

One of them is Vaughan Williams' "Masque for Dancing in Nine Scenes." Others include: Leo Wiener's transcription of Liszt's "Weinen Klagen"; the overture to "Les Deux Aveugles de Toledo" by Mehul; Sibelius' "Pojola's Daughter"; Bax's "The Garden of Fand"; Liadoff's "The Enchanted Lake"; Barbirolli's own concerto for oboe and strings based on themes from Pergolesi; the Purcell-Wood Trumpet Voluntary, and a dance rhapsody of Delius.

And his choices from the standard repertoire are as unconventional. One is Schubert's second symphony, which is more than a hundred years old, and has never been played by the Philharmonic.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

NOV 21 1936

ON THE AIR

BOSTON SYMPHONY—The first two of a series of concerts under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky: Thurs. Eve., Nov. 19, at 8:45; and Thurs. Eve., Nov. 26, at 8, WJZ.

FOOTBALL—Sat. Aft., Nov. 21: Yale vs. Harvard at 1:45, WOR; Princeton vs. Dartmouth, at 1:45, WABC; see daily papers for games to be broadcast over WEAF and WJZ. . . . Sun. Aft., Nov. 22: N. Y. Giants vs. Green Bay Packers, at 2:15, WOR. . . . Thurs. Aft., Nov. 26: Pennsylvania vs. Cornell, at 1:45, WABC.

SAN FRANCISCO OPERA—Second act of "Das Rheingold," with Schorr, Manski, and others: Sat., Nov. 21, at 12 midnight, WJZ.

RICHARD CROOKS—Tenor soloist with the Ford Symphony and Chorus, Iturbi conducting: Sun. Eve., Nov. 22, at 9, WABC.

GLADYS SWARTHOUT—Singing with the Cleveland Orchestra, Rodzinski conducting: Sun. Eve., Nov. 22, at 10, WEAF.

SOME WEEKLY FEATURES (Listing is chronological) —Rochester Philharmonic, Harrison conducting: Thurs. at 3:15, WJZ. . . . Coolidge String Quartet: Thurs. and Tues. at 3:30, WABC. . . . Rudy Vallée's Varieties: Thurs. at 8, WEAF. . . . Lanny Ross and Al Goodman: Thurs. at 9, WEAF. . . . March of Time: Thurs. at 10:30, WABC . . . Music Appreciation Hour, Damrosch conducting: Fri. at 2, WEAF-WJZ. . . . Kreiner String Quartet: Fri. at 3, WABC. . . . Hollywood Hotel: Fri. at 9, WABC. . . . Philadelphia Orchestra, Stokowski conducting: Fri. at 10, WABC. . . . Cincinnati Conservatory of Music Sat. at 11 A.M., WABC. . . . Abram Chasins: Sat. at 12 noon, WEAF. . . . Football scores: Sat. at 6:30 and 7:15, WABC. . . . Ed Wynn: Sat. at 8, WJZ. . . . Alexander Semmler: Sun. at 10:30 A.M., WABC. . . . Pittsburgh Symphony, Modarelli conducting: Sun. at 2, WABC. . . . Philharmonic-Symphony, Barbirolli conducting: Sun. at 3, WABC. . . . Stoopnagle and Budd: Sun. at 5:30, WJZ. . . . Echoes of New York Town: Sun. at 6, WJZ. . . . Jack Benny: Sun. at 7, WEAF. . . . Classics of the Keyboard: Sun. at 7:15, WOR. . . . Phil Baker: Sun. at 7:30, WABC. . . . Nelson Eddy: Sun. at 8, WABC. . . . Eddie Cantor: Sun. at 8:30, WABC. . . . Paul Whiteman: Sun. at 9:15, WJZ. . . . Rochester Civic Orchestra, Harrison conducting: Mon. at 3, WJZ. . . . E. Robert Schmitz: Mon. at 3:30, WABC. . . . Helen Hayes: Mon. at 8, WJZ. . . . Fred Astaire, Charles Butterworth, and Johnny Green: Tues. at 9:30, WEAF. . . . Fannie Brice: Wed. at 8, WJZ. . . . Ethel Barrymore: Wed. at 8:30, WJZ. . . . Burns and Allen: Wed. at 8:30, WABC. . . . Fred Allen: Wed. at 9, WEAF. . . . Nino Martini and André Kostelanetz: Wed. at 9, WABC. (Times are P.M.)

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

NOV 22 1936

Boston Symphony Members Sketched

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he conducts, are rated by authorities as either the greatest conductor and the greatest orchestra in the world, or as among the three greatest. Certainly that makes Koussevitzky and his men a group with whom acquaintanceship would be an enviable distinction. And now anyone may feel on friendly footing with all of them simply by turning the pages of a very engaging book. It contains sketches of Koussevitzky and his musicians made from life by a noted artist. Gerome Brush. Each of the 108 members of the world-famous orchestra was sketched in action—the first time such a thing has been achieved with the Boston Symphony or any other great orchestra.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

NOV 21

Spalding Is to Be Violin Soloist at Concert Tuesday

ALBERT SPALDING

Richard Burgin to Wield Baton for the First Time in Providence

Albert Spalding, American violinist, will be guest artist for the second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Metropolitan theatre, Tuesday evening, it was announced today. A native of Chicago who obtained the larger part of his musical education in Italy, Spalding will appear with the orchestra in Mozart's concerto in D major. The concerto was composed by Mozart during the early days of his career in Paris.

Spalding was graduated from the Bologna Conservatory at 14 and continued his studies in Paris with Lefort, making his first public appearance as a violinist in the French capital in 1905. His career was interrupted during the war when he served as an aviator in Italy. He is to appear later in the season in Boston.

The baton will be in the hands of Richard Burgin, assistant conductor and concert master of the orchestra, Tuesday night, for the first time in Providence. He will lead the orchestra in the first symphony of Kalinnikov, the Russian composer, who died on the threshhold of a brilliant career at the end of the last century. The symphony is regarded as characteristically Slavic in theme, a melodious and transparent work throughout. The program will open with the organ toccata and fugue in C major, of Johann Sebastian Bach. The number has been scored for full orchestra by Leo Weiner, Hungarian composer.

COLUMBUS, O.
Nov. CITIZEN 21/36

Off the Record

JOHANNES BRAHMS appears at his most characteristic—the grave or gay poet, the thoughtful craftsman—in two of the month's albums of records. For Columbia Myra Hess, Yelli d'Aranyi and Gaspar Cassado have made the Opus 87 Trio for piano, violin and 'cello. For Victor Wilhelm Bachaus has played some of the outstanding piano music, the 16 Waltzes of Opus 39 and assorted Intermezzi from 116, 117 and 119.

The waltzes (of which that in A-flat is, in sundry perverted versions, almost too familiar) were originally written for four hands, but were re-cast in this form by the composer. The deftest and most entrancing of miniatures, they reflect the joy which the serious, North German Brahms found in the urbane gaiety of Vienna where, at the age of 29, he made his home. The Intermezzi are the work of his maturity, and display effortless mastery of form and depths of controlled emotion.

These lovely works are all among the indispensable treasures of piano literature. For these records, they have been handled with the greatest penetration and skill by the distinguished German artist, who made a similar Brahms album in 1934. Pianists with notions of their own may quarrel with this or that detail, but on the whole, it is the authentic Brahms who speaks from these fingers and this wax.

Strangely and unfortunately, the recording engineers have not captured the essential timbre of the piano here as successfully as they have, for instance, in the Horowitz record on the current list. His performances of Chopin's Mazurka in C-sharp-minor and of two of the Etudes of Opus 10 (4 and 5) for Victor are not only marvels of dexterous and imaginative pianism, but of incredibly faithful reproduction as well.

Chamber music was particularly congenial to Brahms. He disliked crowds, but expanded in a roomful of his friends; his music often reflects the intimate nature of his personal relationships. The second of his three trios for piano and strings is a model of the compactness of which he was master. A wealth of thematic material is used with the utmost economy, yet the effect is of richness rather than spareness. That the work ever was considered forbidding is beyond belief; at first hearing it is captivating, and it becomes more endearing upon repetition. The three present performers bring it to resonant life with the highest skill and sensitivity, with, if fault is to be found, a restraint too considered and too mutually submissive. The recording is of the best.

* * *

IN 1822 a musical society of Graz rather casually offered an honorary membership to a modest young Viennese composer, known chiefly for his prodigious output of songs. The 25-year-old Schubert proffered, as thanks for the honor, two movements of a symphony on which he had been working, and for which he had sketched the few opening bars of a scherzo He indicated that he would complete it and dedicate it to the Grazers, but that musical fellowship did not even trouble to acknowledge the priceless gift and the B-minor symphony did not come to performance during the composer's brief and pathetic life.

In our time, however, the "Unfinished" has become the most popular of symphonies. The Gramophone Shop's Encyclopedia lists 11 different recordings of it. This month Victor makes that an even dozen with a new reading by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitsky. If only as a mechanical feat, the beauty of the recording will make it the most desirable of the 12. But that is not to say that the famous orchestra does not achieve one of its smoothest and shapeliest performances with the perennial work. Mr. Koussevitsky seems a little indefinite about certain of his tempos, but, apart from that, he projects the work with uncommon clarity and skill.

Two notable violinists turn to two ancient masters for the November records. Albert Spalding, with his faithful Andre Benoist at the piano, presents, for Victor, the "Devil's Trill" sonata of Tartini with a sort of exyielding competence. He presents, to be exact, half of the sonata; a completing record was delayed until December. Fiddling of a more warm and sensitive sort is recorded, for Columbia, by Nathan Milstein, companioned by Leopold Mittmann, in the A-major sonata of Vivaldi, Felicien David's arrangement. Music, performance and recording are all of the first quality.

R. L. F. M.

87.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

NOV 21 1936

Orchestra's Jubilee Boston began to share with New York the privilege of hearing her famous orchestra five years after it was founded in 1881 by Henry L. Higginson, the banker and civic philanthropist. The distinguished band of musicians, again led by their eminent conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, opened its fifty-first season in New York last Thursday night.

The metropolis is loyal to its own Philharmonic, founded more than ninety years ago; but the visitors from Boston get just as warm a welcome from a large section of the concert-going public. It is a notable fact that during half a century no concert of the Boston orchestra has been cancelled. Two have been postponed, for unavoidable reasons.

By way of celebrating the golden jubilee there are on exhibition in the lounge of Carnegie Hall 109 charcoal sketches of the musicians and their leader. New York is to be congratulated that these familiar faces will once more be seen on the stage of the venerable concert hall in Fifty-Seventh Street. During the black years of the depression there was a very real danger that the orchestral season would be interrupted, permanently or temporarily. Today there is rejoicing among music lovers that that catastrophe has been averted.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

NOV 21 1936

The oft-heard query: "What's become of Gerome Brush?" is now answered. He has been in Boston, it seems, doing portraits of every individual member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has been doing them so to speak, both ways. That is, he drew their likenesses with a Sargentesque crayon and supplemented them with written words that say the same thing. That done, he turned the combination into a handsome book.

Such a procedure must mean several things, but principally that Gerome Brush must be helplessly sincere and that it doesn't matter whether he does it with his right hand or his left—the result is the same. And it's always a nice result. The portrait drawings are the kind that people like to have done of themselves—free and sketchy, but not so sketchy but that you know who it is; and so sympathetic that you can see the artist liked the sitter and emphasized the things in the sitter he liked best. Gerome apparently loved every single member of the orchestra. It is a surprise to learn that Gerome is so musical. But it seems he is. You can't be "that way" about an entire orchestra without being musical.

Drawings and writings founded on love must have value. It is so, at any rate, in this case. It contrives to be about the pleasantest book about musicians—of a gift-book quality—that we have yet turned out, and it's going to make the other orchestras in this country wildly jealous.

During the three days of the orchestra's stay in town this week, the drawings have been on view in the art gallery next door to Carnegie Hall—very convenient for all concerned.

H. McB.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

NOV 21 1936

Boston Symphony.

Albert Spalding will be the distinguished soloist at the second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Metropolitan Theatre next Tuesday evening, at 8:15. The famous American violinist will appear with the orchestra in the Concerto in D major of Mozart. Richard Burgin, the assistant conductor and also the concertmaster of the orchestra, will direct this concert, appearing as conductor for the first time in Providence. Mr. Burgin will present the First Symphony of Kalinnikov, the Russian composer, who at the end of the last century was cut off by death on the threshold of a brilliant career. The symphony is described as characteristically Slavic in theme, as melodious and transparent work throughout. The opening number will be the Organ Toccata and Fugue in C major, of Johann Sebastian Bach, which has been scored for full orchestra by Leo Weiner, the Hungarian composer.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

21 1936

ALBERT SPALDING WILL PLAY HERE

Albert Spalding will be the soloist at the second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in the Metropolitan Theatre Tuesday evening, at 8:15. The famous American violinist will appear with the Orchestra in the Concerto in D major of Mozart. Richard Burgin, the assistant conductor and also the concertmaster of the orchestra, will direct this concert, appearing as conductor for the first time in Providence. Mr. Burgin will present the First Symphony of Kalinnikov, the Russian composer, who at the end of the last century was cut off by death on the threshold of a brilliant career. The Symphony is described as characteristically Slavic in theme, a melodious and transparent work throughout. The opening number will be the Organ Toccata and Fugue in C major, of Johann Sebastian Bach, which has been scored for full orchestra by Leo Weiner, the Hungarian composer.

Albert Spalding, born in Chicago in 1888, obtained the larger part of his musical education in Italy. Graduating from the Bologna Conservatory at the age of 14, he continued his studies in Paris with Lefort, making his first appearance in public as violinist in Paris in 1905. His career as a concert violinist is long and distinguished. It was interrupted during the war when he served as an aviator in Italy. Mr. Spalding has appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on numerous occasions. He is to appear there later in the present season.

GREENVILLE, S. C.
NEWS

SYMPHONY MUSIC SLATED ON WFBC

Boston Group To Be Heard Thursday In 45-Minute Concert From Harvard

Richard Burgin, assistant conductor of the orchestra, will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in a concert broadcast from Sanders theater, Harvard university, on Thursday, November 26, from 8 to 8:45 p. m., EST, over the NBC-WFBC network.

Burgin has programmed the Toccato in C Major, one of Bach's many organ compositions, to open the concert. The second and concluding number will be Kalinnikov's Symphony No. 1 in G Minor. This concert, the first in the series to come from the stage of the historic Harvard theater, is the second in a season of broadcasts by the famous Boston orchestra to be heard over NBC networks.

PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN

NOV 22 1936

Praise Given High Artistry and Technique

When three famous men, a conductor, a composer and a writer, representing the creative, interpretative and the critical criteria of music, agree to call a musician "great"—it is news.

It is, therefore, news that Gregor Piatigorsky, the "Russian Casals," who is to be heard here as guest soloist with the Portland Symphony orchestra at its concert next Tuesday evening at the public auditorium, has recently been hailed as "great" by the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky; by the most famous living composer, Richard Strauss, and by the dean of critics, Ernest Newman of the London Times.

Cellist Acclaimed By Critics

Koussevitzky stated publicly: "Piatigorsky is the greatest cellist of our day. He combines high artistry with unlimited technical skill, great depths of feeling and poetry with the beauty volume of tone that are without equal."

Strauss wrote in a letter to Piatigorsky: "Thank you once more for your wonderful "Don Quixote"; technically, musically and interpretatively a model. I wish for the sake of all of us you could play it wherever the work is performed under a good conductor."

Newman said in the London Sunday times under the headline, "A Great Cellist": "The slower sections of Beethoven's variations of Handel's 'See the Conquering Hero Comes' gave Mr. Piatigorsky opportunities for the display of his exquisite legato, but for the rest one was left wondering which was worse, the original tune or the variations on it. However, even in bad music Mr. Piatigorsky is a great cellist, while in good music he is equally great as a cellist and still greater as an interpreter. To exhibit Mr. Piatigorsky's brillance we had a Crancoeur sonata with a very difficult vivo; while the Delius sonata was a stream of loveliness."

Concerto to Be Played

Piatigorsky will play the brilliant Dvorak cello concerto in B minor with the Portland Symphony, Willem van Hoogstraten conducting, on Tuesday evening. It is seldom that music lovers have the chance of hearing this colorful concerto for cello and orchestra, and Portland symphony devotees are looking forward to one of the highlights of the musical season in the concert Tuesday evening.

The other numbers which Dr. van Hoogstraten has chosen for this concert are the Rameau-DeLamarter ballet suite from "Dardanus" and the titanic Brahms Symphony No. 4.

Prior to the concert Frederick W. Goodrich will give an informal lecture on the composers and the compositions to be played. The lecture will commence at 7:40 and will be held in the south wing of the auditorium.

Tickets for the concert are on sale at the J. K. Gill company.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

THURSDAY

The second concert in the broadcast season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come from the stage of historic Sanders Theater at Harvard University. Richard Burgin, assistant conductor, will be on the podium. WJZ, 8-9 p.m.

Toccata in C Major for Organ......Bach
Symphony No. 1 in G Minor...Kalinnikov

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

Second Boston Symphony Concert

The second concert in the broadcast season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, over WJZ Thursday at 8 p. m., will come from the stage of the Sanders Theater at Harvard University. Richard Burgin, assistant conductor, will be on the podium.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER

NOV 22 1936

'Unfinished' On Discs

Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony is masterfully played by the great Boston Symphony in a new Victor album.

The conductor is Koussevitzky. The only fault with the recording is that it is somewhat too reverberant.

For Columbia, Selmar Meyrowitz leads the Paris Symphony in an admirable performance of Berlioz' autobiographical "Fantastic" Symphony.

Here are Berlioz' famed color and individuality in full measure. He was, unluckily, no Wagner or Brahms. But the "Fantastic" remains the most fascinating second-rate symphony in all music.

Other record issues:

Mengelberg conducts the superb Amsterdam Concertgebouw (Columbia) in Brahms' "Academic Festival" Overture.

Two popular arias of Saint-Saens' "Samson" (including, of course, "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix") are sung with deep, warm voice (Victor) by Gladys Swarthout.

Egon Petri (Columbia) gives glamorous power to the old-school piano virtuosity of Liszt's "Mazeppa."

In a hearty reading of Bach's "Brandenburg" Concerto No. 2 (Victor) the players are the Paris Ecole Chamber Orchestra and the conductor is Alfred Cortot.

OMAHA, NEB.
WORLD-HERALD

NOV 29 1936

Ancient Symphony Will Get Hearing

Boston, Mass., Nov. 28 (AP).—A symphony that has lain in dusty oblivion for a century will receive its first american performance next Friday afternoon when the Boston orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, plays the symphony in D Major by the Americanized Italian, Muzio Clementi.

Musicologists credit Alfredo Casello, Italian composer-pianist-scholar, and former conductor of the Boston Pops orchestra, with astonishing detective work in weaving together disordered pages of manuscript which now fill a one-hundred-year gap in musical history.

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

NOV 22 1936

Boston Symphony Plays Here Dec. 11

The Boston Symphony orchestra will return to the Toledo Museum of Art peristyle Thursday night, Dec. 11, to present its third concert in as many years.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the ensemble's leader for 13 years, will conduct. The event will be the annual concert complimentary to museum members. It is not connected with the museum's regular concert course.

The Boston symphony, now in its 55th season, is one of the oldest symphonic orgnaizations on the continent.

Cont

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 22 1936

Burgin to Lead Symphony, With Spalding as Soloist

Concert Here, Tuesday Night, Will Be Marked by Former's Debut as Conductor and Noted Violinist's Playing.

IN a program marked by the appearance of Albert Spalding, as soloist, and Richard Burgin, as conductor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes for its second concert of the season Tuesday night in the Metropolitan Theatre at 8:15 o'clock.

Mr. Spalding will play with the orchestra Mozart's Violin Concerto in D-major. The distinguished American violinist has been soloist with the Bostonians on several occasions and later in the season will join them again. He was born in Chicago in 1888 and obtained most of his musical education in Italy, graduating from the Bologna Conservatory at the age of 14. He continued his studies in Paris with Lefort and made his public debut as a violinist in Paris in 1905. His notable career as a concert artist was halted during the war when he served as an aviator in Italy.

The concert may be put down also as a debut for Mr. Burgin for although, as the orchestra's concertmaster and assistant conductor, he has led the players on several occasions this will be the first time he has taken the stand in Providence. A familiar figure to subscribers in the front seat to the left of Dr. Koussevitzky, he is also known to concert goers here as soloist in various recitals.

He will open the program with the Organ Toccata and Fugue in C-major, by Johann Sebastian Bach, which has been scored for full orchestra by the Hungarian composer, Leo Weiner. The third number will be the First Symphony in G-minor of Kalinnikov, the Russian composer, who at the end of the last century was cut off by death at the beginning of a brilliant career. His symphony is described as characteristically Slavic in theme, melodious and transparent.

◆ ◆ ◆

Academy Orchestra

A concert by St. Mary's Academy Orchestra, Bainbridge avenue, is announced for tomorrow night at 8 o'clock. The orchestra is under the direction of Prof. J. Henri Faucher and Mme. Marie B. Faucher.

◆ ◆ ◆

Opera Casts

Casts for Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana" and Leoncavallo's "I Pagliacci," which the New England Grand Opera Company will perform Tuesday night, Dec. 1, in the Metropolitan Theatre, are announced as follows: "Cavalleria" — Santuzza, Mlle. Matilde Bastulli; Lola, Mlle. Ann Manfredi; Mamma Lucia, Mlle. Harriet Eden; Turiddu, Sig. Giuseppe Barsotti; Alfiio, Sig. Ciro de Ritis, "I Pagliacci"—Nedda, Mlle. Alba Camilucci; Canio, Sig. Giuseppe Radaelli; Tonio, Sig. Ciro de Ritis; Beppo, Sig. Costante Sorvino; Silvio, Sig. Luigi Delle Molle.

The chorus will be composed of members of the New England Grand Opera Choral Society, with the Providence Orchestra out in front. Danilo Sciotti is the conductor, Anthony Stivanello, stage director, and Lillian Migliori, assistant conductor. The double bill will inaugurate the company's third season.

◆ ◆ ◆

Young People's Program

The program announced for the concert for young people by Martha Baird, pianist, and the Providence Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Wassili Leps, conductor, in the Metropolitan Theatre, Saturday afternoon, Dec. 5, is as follows: Prelude to the opera, "Hansel and Gretel," Humperdinck; "Carnival of the Animals" (excerpts), Saint-Saens; Air on the G-string, Bach, arr. for orchestra by Wassili Leps; Pizzicato, from the Fourth Symphony, Tschaikowski; Concerto in A-minor for Piano and Orchestra, Grieg; "Entrance of the Boyars," Halvorsen. The ages of the young folk for whom the concert has been arranged, are set at from eight to 18. Children or groups of children under 12 years must be accompanied by an adult, according to the announcement by the Parents' League of Providence, assisted by the Rhode Island Congress of Parents and Teachers, under whose auspices the program is being presented.

◆ ◆ ◆

Fiedler in Pawtucket

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Sinfonietta will give the second concert for the Pawtucket Civic Music Association Thursday evening, Dec. 3, in the Senior high school. The orchestra is composed of 50 players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

◆ ◆ ◆

The Blackstone Valley Junior Music Club will hold its regular meeting Saturday afternoon at 3:15 o'clock in the Pawtucket Y. M. C. A. music studio, with Miss Corina Papino, councillor, in charge, and Frank Bonati, Milton Bateman and Searles Bray as hosts. On the prgoram will be Frank Bonati, violin, accompanied by Miss Jessie F. Chace; Milton Bateman, 'cello, accompanied by Mrs. Bateman; readings, Robert Barrie (guest); Searls Bray, violin, accompanied by Miss Bertha Burlingame, and musical items by Lillian Lawrence, Gloria Brogi and Rosina Stroccio. Applicants will be heard at this meeting.

◆ ◆ ◆

Arrangements for its first public concert of the season will be made at the meeting of the Chaminade Junior Club at the Music Mansion, Saturday afternoon, at 2:30 o'clock. The musical program will be given by Francis Siewerts, Evelyn Holmquist, Betty Ortiz, William Richards, Phyllis Tyson and Louise Morris. Visitors are welcome. The period of open membership will close on Dec. 2. Until that date applications for membership from students between the ages of 13 and 18 years will be received. Information may be had from Francis Carney, 81 Rock avenue, Pawtucket, or from Mrs. George Hail, 88 Meeting street, Providence.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 22 19

THURSDAY

Boston Symphony Orchestra plays on the stage of the Sanders Theatre at Harvard University, with Richard Burgin, assistant conductor, wielding the baton: WJZ, 8-9 P. M.

Toccata in C Major for Organ........Bach
Symphony No. 1 in G Minor.....Kalinnikov

FRIDAY

Sounds of Industry—The microphone will visit eleven cities and industrial centers to pick up sounds of machinery and comments by working men, which in an international broadcast will reveal to the world that America's slogan is "Forward." The program directors who have planned this "show" report that "in all cases it will be the candid story of the worker at the scene of his labor that will be broadcast." Harper Sibley, president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, speaking from Washington, will interpret the meaning of the industrial sounds and interviews during the hour on the air: WEAF, WJZ, 2 P. M.

Simon Barer, Russian concert pianist who made his American début a fortnight ago, is the soloist with the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra directed by Eugene Goossens: WABC, 2:45-4:45 P. M.

Symphony in C major, No. 41......Mozart
Concerto in C minor, No. 2..Rachmaninoff
Variations, Carnival of Venice..Tommasini
Overture, Le Baruffe Chiozzotte.Sinigaglia

Philadelphia Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski directing a program of Spanish and Russian music featuring his own arrangements of themes from the original score of Mussorgsky's "Boris Godunoff." Professor Walter B. Pitkin speaks briefly on a topic of current interest: WABC, 10-10:30 P. M.

Aragonaise and Seguidilla, "Carmen"..Bizet
From "Boris Godunoff".......Mussorgsky
Polotvetsian Dances, Prince Igor...Borodin

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
AMERICAN

Boston Symphony in Second Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the second in a series of broadcast concerts Thursday evening over an NBC network. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will wield the baton.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 22 1936

TO BE SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Albert Spalding, noted American violinist, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Metropolitan Theatre Tuesday night.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

Nov. 22/36

Local Orchestra To Give Concert Tuesday Night

Frank Sheridan, Pianist, To Be Guest Artist of Hartford Symphony

The Hartford Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Jacques Gordon, will give its second concert of their first series at the Bushnell Hall on Tuesday of this week at which they will feature the outstanding and distinguished pianist, Frank Sheriden of New York.

Mr. Sheriden, who will play the Schumann Concerto for piano and orchestra in A minor Opus 54 with the Hartford Symphony at 8:30 p. m. on Tuesday, has impressed audiences in past years with his scintillating pianistic exhibitions. as being no less superior than such superb artists as Hess. Brailowsky, the recent Gabrilowitsch. Bauer, Rachmaninoff, Horowitz, Samuels, Lhevinne, Hofmann, Schnabel and others. Born in New York, this sterling artist received all his training and schooling in this country. After successful appearances here, he went to Europe to win plaudits from descendents of a century-old culture, then returned to gather more laurels from his own countrymen. As a result, he is rated among the elite of pianists, among the notables of interpretive art.

Distinguished appearances in which Mr. Sheridan has been acclaimed as a genuine artist includes that with the New York Philharmonic Symphony, the Boston Symphony, Chicago Symphony, the Detroit Symphony, the National Orchestral Association, the Dresden Philharmonic, the Vienna Symphony, two recitals in London. three recitals in Berlin, Vienna, Milan, Florence, Rome, Venice, Bologna, Pisa, ten recitals in Carnegie and Town Halls in New York, Boston and Chicago, recitals, in collaboration with the Gordon String Quartet, the Musical Art Quartet (1936 Festival, Baltimore, Md.) Kroll-Britt-Sheridan Trio, the Pro Arte Quartet, the Perole Quartet the Stradivarius Quartet and the E. S. Coolidge Foundation Chamber-Music Festivals, Washington. D. C. and Stanford University, Berkeley, Cal. the last two for which he was selected because he places himself unreservedly at the service of the composers and in addition attaining a well-balanced and carefully-blended ensemble.

Besides the procurement of Mr. Sheridan for the Bushnell Concert by the Hartford Symphony Orchestra under the Jacques Gordon's baton the program will also consist of the Beethoven Leonore Overture No. 3 and the Symphony in D Minor by Brahms.

FRANK SHERIDAN

Mr. Sheridan will appear as soloist with The New York Philharmonic Symphony Dec. 5 and 6, John Barbirolli, conductor.

TUCSON, ARIZ.
STAR

NOV 22 1936

While the Boston symphony under its own Koussevitzky and the New York Philharmonic - Symphony under John Barbirolli, guest conductor, are giving frequent concerts in New York, the Philadelphia orchestra is preparing to go to New York for another season of guest appearances before the end of the month. One of the compositions which it will present for the first time at that time is "Arizona" by Victor Young.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
SUNDAY AMERICAN

Nov. 22/36

Boston Symphony Due At Eastman on Dec. 7

One of the outstanding musical events of the season is scheduled for Monday evening, December 7, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to the Eastman Theater for a single concert under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

The conductor has not as yet submitted his program, but is understood it will be made up entirely of standard works, known and loved throughout the world.

Balcony seats for the concert are sold out, according to box office reports, but a good selection of seats remains in the loges, orchestra and mezzanine.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 22 1936

Latin Audience Is Sought for U. S. Programs

JohnRoyal,ofN.B.C.,Leaves on Tour to Arrange for Exchange of Broadcasts

Plans to broadcast radio programs from the United States into South and Central America to compete with European programs now dominating the air there, were announced yesterday by the National Broadcasting Company. John F. Royal, N. B. C. vice-president in charge of programs, departed last week on a 17,000-mile trip through Mexico, Central and South America, to arrange for extensive exchanges of broadcasts between the two continents.

"We definitely are entering the competition for listeners in Latin America," Mr. Royal declared before leaving "Germany, England and other European countries have been building programs for South America for several years. The United States, to which our neighbors to the south should naturally look for a mutual exchange of entertainment and ideas, has stood by and let Europe capture the attention of South American listeners. Now the National Broadcasting Company is going to take its rightful place on American radio dials below the RioGrande."

Conference Broadcasts Planned

As the first step in the new policy, Mr. Royal announced that N. B. C. was arranging for an extensive series of broadcasts from the Pan-American Peace Conference in Buenos Aires. Mr. Royal, accompanied by Carlton Smith, announcer, and Albert E. Johnson, engineer in charge of the Washington studios, left Wednesday by plane for Rio de Janeiro. They will precede President Roosevelt in order to prebare to bring radio listeners in the United States any broadcasts he may make while in South America. Following the opening of the conference, daily summaries of the proceedings will be broadcast to the United States.

Upon Mr. Royal's return, after visiting leading Latin American countries, both short-wave broadcasts from this country of specially built programs for Central and South American listeners and exchanges of typical radio programs between N. B. C. and broadcasting organizations in the Southern countries will be inaugurated.

Face Same Problems

It will take some time for the exchange plan to get into operation, Mr. Royal said, because of certain transmission problems, which have limited programs in the past.

Co-operation of the South American press representatives and other sources will be used in building programs especially designed for consumption on the southern continent. Spanish-speaking announcers will be used as well as English. Among the suggested material to be broadcast from the United States were the Metropolitan Opera, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, championship prizefights, football games and educational features.

GREENVILLE, S. C.
NEWS

BRIEF ITEMS

Mrs. A. F. McKissick, who recently returned from a trip to the New England states, says that one of the high lights of her visit was hearing the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, in Providence, R. I.

• Concluding the program was a number in which the Harvard Glee club appeared. The tenor soloist for the club was Rulon Y. Robison.

* * *

89.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

NOV 22 1936

Schubert's Immortal Unfinished Symphony On Masterpiece Disc

Great Tonal Creation of Composer Is Given Topmost Place in Review Of New Recordings

By RALPH LEWANDO
Press Music Critic

RECENT RCA-Victor phonograph releases in the Musical Masterpieces series and Red Seal discs include reproductions of classic, romantic and ultra-modern compositions by composers who occupy a foremost place in the history of musical art.

Mr. Lewando

The gentle Franz Schubert, whose grand tonal creations poured forth uninterruptedly under the spell of his amazing inspiration, is represented by the immortal 8th symphony in B-minor, universally known as "The Unfinished."

Played by the Boston Symphony led by Serge Koussevitzky, it is given new lustre, for Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of the score of this work is quite different from that of other noted conductors in matters of tempo and interpretive subtleties. Yet he makes of the two movements a performance of loveliness. Five and a half disc sides form the pressing, the remaining side being assigned to an excerpt from Schubert's ballet music from Rosamunde.

Through the onward drift of time Johannes Brahms' music becomes more and more significant to the musician and more comprehensible to the layman. Brahms looms as one of the titans of the musical domain. Whatever he chose to compose and leave behind him bears the indellible stamp of his genius. Essentially a lyricist, Brahms gave striking utterance of intense musical feeling not only through the medium of orchestral and chamber works but also through his superb art songs and vital piano compositions.

A piano virtuoso of first rank, Brahms never lost his love for the instrument. This is indicated by his pianoforte works—works which time has not dimmed. In fact, Brahms' first composition to bear an opus number is his piano sonata in C-major, opus 1.

ASHEVILLE, N. C.
CITIZEN [illegible]

Richard Burgin will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert broadcast from Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, over NBC and WWNC between 8:15 and 9 o'clock tonight. The program will begin with one of Bach's many compositions written originally for the organ, the Toccata in C Major. The second and concluding number will be Kalinnikov's Symphony in G Minor.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

NOV 22 1936

Music Box Office Business Increases; Major Orchestras Play to Capacity Audiences

By JOHN SELBY

New York, Nov. 21 (AP).—New York hears its young-old Philharmonic-Symphony Society throughout the winter. It also hears 10 concerts each per winter from Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony, and from ~~Leopold~~ Stokowski's Philadelphia Orchestra.

Two of these three orchestras have undergone major operations this fall. Many patrons and many observers and most managers stroked their beards in the spring, and came out with the idea that these major operations would most likely reduce audiences this winter. They were wrong.

Philadelphia's noble band "lost" Stokowski. That is, Stokowski became so enamored of the movies and their mass possibilities that he asked his directors to elect a permanent conductor for three years, leaving him free to conduct as little as he chose.

They picked Eugene Ormandy. Hitherto, the Philadelphia ~~has played~~ to packed houses in New York. This winter it is doing the same. And last Tuesday, when Stokowski came to town with an all-Russian program which included Sergei Rachmaninoff's brand new third symphony, the last minute people just didn't get into Carnegie Hall.

The Philharmonic is, however, even more astonished. Last spring Arturo Toscanini departed these shores forever, saying among other things, it is declared, that the Philharmonic is the greatest orchestra ever assembled. The Philharmonic directors at once set their sails to fit what they thought would be a period of calm—they cut down the season six weeks and expected reduced business.

But they didn't get reduced business; business is better. Subscription sales are actually ahead of last winter. John Barbirolli, the young Italian-French-English conductor, is not only doing well at the box office,, he is doing well on the podium.

Partly this is musical ability, partly the public's curiosity, and (oddly enough) partly tact. No musician ever stood in hotter shoes than Barbirolli a week and three days ago when he began the first piece he ever conducted on American soil—Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture. Many thoughtless persons, even a reviewer or so, had spoken of him as an "unknown" chosen to "replace" Toscanini.

Barbirolli extricated himself from his hot spot neatly by frankly admitting wonder at being chosen, by disclaiming any intention of "replacing" anybody, by declaring that he was a young man trying to make a living. He had won the men of the orchestra. Now he seems to be winning the public.

Kcussevitzky brings his Bostonese to town for the first time this season next Thursday. He always plays to packed houses, and he never yet has engineered a publicity stunt to pack them. By now he is accustomed to being pointed out as the supreme American example of what a superlative orchestra can accomplish when left to one conductor through a period of years.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

NOV 22 1936

N. B. C. Seeks Field In South America

The National Broadcasting Company plans to broadcast U. S. radio programs to Central and South America to compete with the European programs now dominating the air there.

John F. Royal, N. B. C. vice president in charge of programs, left last week for a 17,000-mile trip through Mexico, Central and South America, to arrange for extensive exchanges of broadcasts between the two continents.

"We definitely are entering the competition for listeners in Latin-America," Royal declared. "Germany, England and other European countries have been building programs for South America for several years. The United States, to which our neighbors to the south should naturally look for a mutual exchange of entertainment and ideas, has stood by and let Europe capture the attention of South American listeners. Now the National Broadcasting Company is going out to take its rightful place on American radio dials below the Rio Grande."

As the first step in the new policy, Royal announced that N. B. C. was arranging for an extensive series of broadcasts from the Pan-American Peace Conference in Buenos Aires. The radio executive, assisted by Carlton Smith, N. B. C. Presidential announcer, and Albert E. Johnson, engineer in charge of the N. B. C. Washington studios, will bring radio listeners in the United States any broadcasts President Roosevelt may make while in South America.

Upon Royal's return, shortwave broadcasts from this country of specially built programs for Central and South American listeners, and exchanges of typical radio programs between N. B. C. and broadcasting organizations in the southern countries, will be inaugurated.

It will take some time for the exchange plan to get into operation, Royal said, because of certain transmission problems, which have limited programs in the past. Whatever is necessary, however, to get N. B. C.'s signals into South America clearly, he declared, will be done.

Co-operation of South American press representatives and other sources will be used in building programs especially designed for consumption on the Southern continent. Spanish-speaking announcers will be used as well as English. No propaganda in any language will be broadcast and all programs sent to Latin America will be typical of American ideals.

Among the material suggested for broadcast from the United States were the Metropolitan Opera, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, championship prize fights, football games and educational features.

NEWARK, N. J.
CALL

NOV 22 1936

Princeton's Music Faculty Expanding

Sunday Call Special Service.

PRINCETON, Nov. 21.—For the third consecutive year, there has been an expansion of musical instruction in Princeton University, Prof. Roy Dickinson Welch, head of the department, announced today. When Professor Welch was called to Princeton in the fall of 1934 from Smith College, no music courses were in the curriculum.

He became the lone instructor in the department. At present, the staff has expanded to five and there are 225 undergraduates enrolled in the department, whereas two years ago there were only 36.

Robert Hufstader, formerly head of the department of music at the University of Buffalo, has become assistant professor of music here and also university organist and chapel choir director. Robert H. Sessions, the composer, has been appointed a lecturer in the freshman and sophomore harmony courses. His new violin concerto will be played next month by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Koussevitsky.

An assistant to Professor Welch last year, James A. Giddings, '30, is now an instructor in the department and director of the University Glee Club. Edward Canby, who received his master's degree in music from Harvard this year, will take charge of the study periods, in which phonograph records and scores are made available for direct use by the students.

[Kreste Roger]

ELMIRA, N. Y.
TELEGRAM

NOV 22 1936

World of Music

By John Selby

NEW YORK—(AP)—New York hears its young-old Philharmonic-Symphony Society throughout the winter. It also hears 10 concerts each per winter from Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony and from Leopold Stokowski's Philadelphia Orchestra.

Two of these three orchestras have undergone major operations this fall. Many patrons and many observers and most managers stroked their beards in the spring and came out with the idea that these major operations would most likely reduce audiences this winter. They were wrong.

Philadelphia's noble band "lost" Stokowski. That is, Stokowski became so enamored of the movies and their mass possibilities that he asked his directors to elect a permanent conductor for three years, leaving him free to conduct as little as he chose.

* * *

THEY picked Eugene Ormandy. Hitherto, the Philadelphia has played to packed houses in New York. This winter it is doing the same. And last Tuesday, when Stakowski came to town with an all-Russian program which included Sergei Rachmaninoff's brand new Third Symphony, the last-minute people just didn't get into Carnegie Hall.

The Philharmonic is, however, even more astonished. Last spring Arturo Toscanini departed these shores forever, saying among other things, it is declared, that the Philharmonic is the greatest orchestra ever assembled. The Philharmonic directors at once set their sails to fit what they thought would be a period of calm—they cut down the season six weeks, and expected reduced business.

But they didn't get reduced business; business is better. Subscription sales are actually ahead of last winter. John Barbirolli, the young Italian-French-English conductor, is not only doing well at the box office, he is doing well on the podium.

Partly this is musical ability, partly the public's curiosity, and (oddly enough) partly tact. No musician ever stood in hotter shoes than Barbirolli when he began the first piece he ever conducted on American soil—Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture. Many thoughtless persons, even a reviewer or so, had spoken of him as an "unknown" chosen to "replace" Toscanini.

* * *

BARBIROLLI extricated himself from his hot spot neatly by frankly admitting wonder at being chosen, by disclaiming any intention of "replacing" anybody, by declaring that he was a young man trying to make a living. He had won the men of the orchestra. Now he seems to be winning the public.

Koussevitzky brought his Bostonese to town for the first time this season last Thursday. He always plays to packed houses and he never yet has engineered a publicity stunt to pack them. By now he is accustomed to being pointed out as the surpreme American example of what a superlative orchestra can accomplish when left to one conductor through a period of years.

WORCESTER, MASS.
Nov. TELEGRAM 22/

MUSIC Of Today and Tomorrow

By
Walter W. Farmer

A UNIQUE book entitled "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, 1936," has just been issued. This volume contains charcoal sketches made from life of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, and every one of the 108 members of this world-famed organization. With each portrait, Gerome Brush, the artist, has provided also a word-sketch written by himself which gives intimate sidelights on the personality and careers of each man. The book has been designed by the typographical expert, D. B. Updike and is beautifully printed with the cover reproducing the design and color associated for so many years with the program-books of the Boston Symphony.

The biographical sketches are concise and informative and many of them contain flashes of humor. M. Fernand Gillet, the distinguished oboe player, when asked what instrument he thought the best, replied laconically, "A great artist." Manuel Zung, violinist, because of the alphabetical order, occupies the final pages of the book and the concluding sentence is: "Thus these biographies end in classical style with the down beat of the baton and a resonant ZUNG."

LAST week a New York newspaper contained the following item: "Bagpipers have been excluded from the Musicians' Union of Canada on the ground that they are not musicians. It appears that one of the reasons for the judgment that they are not musicians is that they are not obliged to read musical notation. This surely is a mistake, for many of the great pibrochs were reduced to ordinary musical notation more than 100 years ago and have been published as sheet music—and very difficult music, too.

True, a few pibrochs are still preserved in the old syllables with which the hereditary pipers used to teach the classics to their apprentices. Here, for example, are the opening discords of the pibroch Coghiegh Shie as taught from time immemorial by the McCrimmons of Syke:

Hodroho, hodroho, haninin, hiechin,
Hodroha, hodroho, hodroho, hachin."

Can any member of the Musicians' Union of Canada play that on his bassoon?"

While the bassoon often has been referred to as "the clown of the orchestra," the double-bass also is capable of producing weird and ominous sounds. Max Eastman's new book "The Enjoyment of Laughter" includes among other examples of humor, the story of the man at a concert seated near the double-bass. After listening for some time to the subterranean rumblings of the "bull-fiddle" he inquired of the player, "How much would you charge to haunt a house?"

HARRISBURG, PA.
COURIER

NOV 22 1936

Symphony Orchestra Prepares New Selection For Second Concert

The Harrisburg Symphony Orchestra during its second concert of the season Tuesday, December 1, will present under the direction of Geoge King Raudenbush for the first time in Harrisburg "The White Peacock," one of the outstandinf compositions of Charles Griffes, America's lately recognized genius.

In presenting this number Mr. Raudenbush is including in this concert an unusual work and one which is considered as typifying best the style of the composer. Mr. Griffes, a natvie of New York State, had a brief but arduous life. He died in 1920 at the age of 36. Since his death it has been realized that America lost a rare and original musician. His talent was first given wide recognition in 1919 when the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented his symphonic poem after Coleridge, "The Pleasure of Kubla Khan." Inclusion of Griffes' compositions in more and more concert programs since then has advanced him to a national position.

"The White Peacock" is one of "Four Roman Sketches" originally written for piano in 1915-1916, and first presented by the young composer before the MacDowell Club in New York in 1918. It is based on a poem by William Sharp. The story is that of the languid movement of a white peacock through a sunlight flooded garden where, in the words of the poet, he appears as if "a dream of the moonlight were real for a moment."

In Griffes' symphonic setting of the poem the clarinets and flutes play the leading themes while the strings furnish an harmonic background. The combined whole is an unique and beautiful musical composition.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

1936

Beethoven Association Will Honor Zimbalist

Special to The News.

NEW YORK, Nov. 22.—Efrem Zimbalist will be honored on the occasion of the twenty-fifth anniversary of his American debut by the Beethoven Association with a dinner on Dec. 5 and on Dec. 8 the violinist will appear in a silver jubilee recital at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Zimbalist, who will return from a European tour late in November, made his first American appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as soloist Oct. 27, 1911.

90.

TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES ADVERTISER

NOV 2 2 1936

Campus Interest In Music Booms

Expanded Curriculum and Concert Series Boost Princeton Study

PRINCETON, Nov. 21.—Interest in music at Princeton University has reached a new high this year among students and faculty, with an expanded curriculum, a large teaching staff and an increased general support of the university concert series and Glee Club, it was revealed here today by Professor Roy Dickinson Welch, head of the music department.

For 21 years chairman of the department of music at Smith College, Professor Welch was called to Princeton in the Fall of 1934 as visiting professor of music. At that time he organized two courses with a total enrollment of 36 undergraduates. Today 225 students are taking music here. Several new subjects have been added, and the teaching staff numbers five.

Among the additions to the music faculty this year is Roger H. Sessions, who has been engaged as lecturer in the freshman and sophomore harmony courses. Mr. Sessions is one of the most distinguished exponents of the modern school of composition in this country. His new violin concerto will be played by Albert Spaulding, with Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra next month.

Robert Hufstader, formerly head of the department of music at the University of Buffalo, is also a new appointment this year. He will act as assistant professor of music and university organist, and in addition will direct the University Chapel choir.

Assistant to Professor Welch in teaching last year, James A. Giddings, '30, has been made an instructor this Fall and will also lead the University Glee Club. Edward Canby, who received his master's degree in music at Harvard University this year, completes the list of additions. He will be in charge of study periods, where phonograph records and scores are available to undergraduates for direct study.

One of the original courses, an introduction to the literature of music, is now open to sophomores and a few qualified freshmen, with about 150 undergraduates enrolled. Last year nine men took the course in elementary harmony, which requires some preliminary knowledge of the subject, while 24 men signed up this Fall. Among the additions to the curriculum is a sophomore course in advanced harmony and elementary counterpoint.

The university concert series includes nine programs for the 1936-37 season, featuring a performance of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Igor Strvinsky, on either February 18 or 19. Inaugurating a new policy of presenting more of its concerts in Princeton, the University Glee Club will sing here three times during the Winter.

SAN JOSE, CALIF.
MERCURY-HERALD

NOV 23 1936

Institute Offers Sibelius Music

The D Major, or second symphony of Jean Sibelius will be heard at the weekly Institute of Music concert tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock. A recording made by Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony orchestra will be used to illustrate the opus.

The significance of Jean Sibelius in the modern scheme of music wil be discussed by LeRoy V. Brant, who has spent many years of study on the works of this master, and who has had much correspondence with the composer himself.

This musicale will be open to interested persons who will obtain cards of admission at the Institute office, 97 South Sixth street.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

NOV 23 1936

Real Musical Treats in Week-end Events

By PITTS SANBORN.

A holiday of concert-going would suitably describe one New Yorker's Saturday, for there was nothing of drudgery about his visits to Carnegie Hall in the afternoon and the Town Hall in the evening. There was, however, a great deal of thorough satisfaction. The matinee, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra officiating, provided orchestral execution of the first order, together with some music of the first order. The evening's entertainment, a song recital by the Danish soprano Povla Frijsh, brought in its turn some unsurpassable singing.

Not only did the Boston orchestra excel, but so did its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, in a beautiful symphony in A major that Mozart composed at the age of 18, the "Don Juan" of Richard Strauss, and the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius, only the extreme tempo adopted for the headlong opening phrase of the "Don Juan" made it seem hurried rather than fast.

Work by Young Composer.

The program afforded also a "first performance in New York" of a "symphonic meditation" by a young French composer (he is not yet 28) who signs himself Olivier Messiaen, which tempts one to the question "What's in the name?" The title of the work is "Les Offrandes oubliees" ("Forgotten offerings"), under which are grouped three sections, played continuously—"The Cross," "The Sin," "The Eucharist."

Olivier Messiaen is one of four French composers who boldly denominate themselves "La Jeune France." Of him individually it has been said that he "aims primarily to express with the utmost possible emotion and sincerity the truths of the Catholic faith."

